PRINCE of ORANGE.

*Count of Nassaw, Catzenelbogen, Vianden, Dietz, Lingen, Moeurs, Bueren, Leerdam, &c. Marquess of ter Vere and Vlissingen; Lord and Baron of Breda; of the City of the Grave and Land of Kuyck, Dieft, Grimbergen,

I Will honour them that honour me, saith the LORD. But who can tell what shall be done unto them whom the Lord will honour? Certainly, those do honour him, who serve him religiously. They who are careless of Religion, do pretend that they cannot serve God, because there be so many Religions, and they cannot know which is the right.
But if they were unfeignedly desirous to know, they might be resolved; since our Lord, who is gracious, mercifull, and abundant in goodness and truth, leaves us not in the mist or unto uncertainties; but at several times, and in divers waies, hath spoken unto the Fathers by the Prophets; and in the last daies hath spoken unto us by his Son, and hath commanded all men to hear

hear Him: He is the Way, the Verity and the Life, none comes unto the Father but by Him. On which words Chrysostom writes thus; It is as if our Saviour had said, I am the Way; that is, By me ye shall come: The Verity, because assuredly those things shall be which I have promised; neither is any lie in me: And the Life, because Death cannot hinder you from me: And since I am the Way, ye need not another Guide: Since I am Truth, I speak no false thing: Since I am Life, although ye shall die, ye shall enjoy what I have promised. And Cyrill. Alexandr. on the same words saith; By three things we shall come into these Heavenly mansions; by the action of true verity, by right faith, and the hope of eternal life: of all which, none is the giver, none is the fountain, nor is any the cause, but our Lord Jesus Christ, for he hath given commandments above the Law; he hath shewed us the Way: And he is also the Truth; that is, the true straightness and determination, the uprightest rule, and the best square of faith: And he is also the Life, for none but he can restore unto us that life, which we hope shall be in holiness and blessedness without perishing: He certainly shall raise us up, though we die, from that curse for sin, and bring us into Heaven; therefore all excellent things come, and shall be unto us, through him. But those Worldlings say, The Word of Christ is large, and so many things are in it, that we cannot search them. Nevertheless He directs all men to search the Scriptures; and the Evangelist teacheth, that those are written that we might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing, we might have life through his name. Yea in that written Word he hath certain rules and notes, where-whereby the true Religion may be known. Certainly, that is the most true Religion, which ascribes most glory unto God, and most transcends the natural reason of men, and most elevates the hearts and affections of men towards God and Heaven. By application of those undoubted and unquestionable principles, each one may understand, that among all Religions the Reformed is the only true Religion; for not only our Profession in the general, but all the branches of our Doctrine, are grounded on God's written Word; and tend unto God's glory, transcend our natural reason, and lead men to think continually of God, and to hope for blessedness in Heaven by Christ alone. And amongst those who profess this Religion, they are most devoted unto God, and most constant in their profession; who aim most at God's glory; who are most acted by supernatural principles; who do most think of God, and whose hope of felicity in Heaven is most active: And such as seek but their own or other mens interests, or be led by political or human reasons mainly, are the wavering Professors. On the other side, all other Religions, though they pretend the glory of God, they are not truly grounded on God's Word; but are underpropped with natural reason, and tend to earthly mindedness; as appears by induction of the particulars wherein they differ from us; some aiming at the advancement of mens abilities, and others at worldly honour and gain. This is clear in the Romish Religion; for what else is the advancing of man's ability without or with a little help of God? their Justification by works? their Deifying of the Pope above all that is called God? their equalling of Mens Traditions and Decrees with the

Sacred Scriptures? What else is their Mass, their fancy of Purgatory, &c? Here it is remarkable what is written by their Jesuit Cardinal Bellarmin, de Indulg. Lib. 1. Cap. 12. Sect. Rationes; We see (saith he) that the amplest Indulgences are given for a very slight cause; as, when plenary Indulgence is given unto all who stand before the Door of St. Peter's Church, and the Pope blesteth all the people solemnly. And Sect. Observandum, he saith, That standing before St. Peter's Porch is a very light and slight cause, if it be considered absolutely in it self; and nevertheless it is a weighty and just cause, because that frequency of the people, at that time, is a fit and usefull means of protesting their Faith concerning the Head of the Church, and it serves for the honour of the Apostolical See; which [honour] is the end of that Indulgence. So be. The Pope then and the People do aid one another mutually; for the People confirms the Supremacy of the Pope by their presence, and receiving that Indulgence; and He, by dispensing his Indulgence so liberally, confirms the People in their Superstition and Pharaisaical opinion of Works. But what is there for the glory of God or promoting Piety? They are wont to object several pretences of their Religion, which may be reduced into ten. 1. The stateliness of their Churches, in comparison of the emptiness and baseness of others. 2. Their Union and Harmony when others fall into Shivers. 3. Their Antiquity, and others are but of Yesterday. 4. They press us to acknowledge, that the Church of Rome was once true: And then they infer; therefore they are the true Church as yet, since the true Church cannot perish, nor be changed in the Essentials. 5. They call call for the time, place and persons, when, where, and by whom the change came. 6. Where did our Church lurk so long? 7. The Authours of the Reformation had no Commission to attempt it. 8. They vaunt of their succession without interruption. 9. They glory of the substance of Religion, which cannot be denied to be still with them. 10. They bewitch the people with ambitious ostentation of innumerable Friars; who, amongst them, have renounced the World, that they may attain Eternal Life. All these pretences are clearly refuted by Io. Calvin. Lib. de Scandalis; and after him by Io. Cameron, Lib. de Rom. Ecclesiæ præjudiciis, in a direct and dogmatical way; but they are (as it were) sensibly demonstrated to be but idle words, by Histories, where we see them all confuted; not only by such as did separate or were cast out of the Roman Church; but even by such as lived and died in it, without any separation, except in judgement. The Papists cannot deny, but plainly confess, that their Church was corrupt, both in the pretended Head and Members, in respect of Manners, so that a Reformation was necessary; but they deny the corruption in Faith or Doctrine: And they say, Though the Popes were wicked men, yet they wanted not their power of Jurisdiction, and of dispensing the sacred Mysteries. Unto the first part the Apostle saith; When some have put away a good Conscience, they make shipwreck concerning the Faith. On these words Chrysostom saith; That is truly said; for where the Life is rebukable, such Doctrine must needs follow; and so ye may see very many to have fallen into the Pit of Miseries, and to have returned into Heathenish Rites; for lest they be tor-

tormented with the fear of evils to come, they endeavour every way to perswade themselves, that all things are false which our Religion teaches; and so they turn from the Faith. Accordingly the Histories shew, that some Popes have denied the Immortality of the Soul, and have called the Gospel of Christ, a Fable. As for the Pope's Jurisdiction, it was not so from the beginning as it is now, neither Ecclesiastical nor Civil; for other Bishops had power, within their own Diocies, without dependance upon the Sec of Rome; as the Bishops of Millan, of Ravenna and others, in Italy; and the Bishops of other Nations: And Pope Gregory the I. (as others before him) did acknowledge the Emperour as his Lord, and himself his Servant; afterwards the Pope did salute the Emperour as his Son; and by degrees they made the Emperours their Vassals, Servants and Lacqueys: So that if Peter and Paul were alive on Earth, they would certainly deny the Popes to be their Successours; because they differ (besides many other Articles of the Faith) so far in the point of subjection; or rather, exalting themselves above all that is called God; yea certainly, they would call the Pope the Antichrist, according to what they have written in 2 Theff. 2. and 2 Pet. 2. The Romanists say, That in this point they have advantage against us; because the Antients have written, that Antichrist must be one Person, of the Tribe of Dan, sit in Jerusalem, &c. Truly it is no marvel, that in the primitive times the most learned were mistaken (I except the Apostles) concerning the Antichrist; since the prophecies could not be thoroughly understood, before they were in some good measure accomplished. But if

we inquire the judgement of the learned and prudent men, in the middle times, concerning the Antichrist, and generally of the corruption of the Church, we may receive more sure information; and certainly those are the best Witnesses of what was done in their daies. A good number of their Testimonies, in all ranks, I have compiled, for this end, in this Book, which is humbly presented unto Your HIGHNES; first trusting that under Your Patronage others may the more willingly look upon it, and be informed in the Truth; and then, with confidence, it shall be graciously accepted; because

with the same travel of reading in Your tender years, Your HIGHNES may learn, both the condition of God's Church in former times, and the lives of Your Glorious Ancestours, Emperours and Kings, of whom You have Your Illustrious Descent; and so from them You may know how to serve God, and how to deport Your Self in all the daies of Your Pilgrimage, that You may be glorious in Heaven, and the following Ages may have Your example, outvying and outstripping (if possible) all the Williams, Charlsses, Henries, Jameses, Adolphs and others in Christian Prudence, Righteousness, Prowess and Temperance. So prayeth

YOUR HIGHNESSES

ALEX. PETRIE.

THE FIRST TABLE.

Shewing some Texts of Scripture that are now controverted, and how they were expounded in former times.

For understanding these Tables, it is to be noted, that because the Book is divided into two parts, in respect of numbring the pages; therefore in the Tables the letter S signifieth the second part, and the number following directs unto the second part; and where S is not, the number directs unto the first part. Likewise, as if every page were divided into three parts; the letter b pointeth at the beginning or first part of the page; the letter m at the middle or second part or thereby; and the letter e at the end or third part. In this first Table the letter p stands between the numbers of the verse and of the page.

THE P R E F A C E.

THE experience of alterations in the Church, suffereth the History to be divided into five parts. The first Age or Part, is of the Church spreading and suffering, when the Word of the Gospel was in sowing thorow the World, and the Professours thereof were under Persecution, about the space of 300. years, until the days of Constantine the Great. The second Age, is of the Church flourishing and wrestling with Heresies the space of other 300. years, until the days of Phocas Emperour. The History of these two Ages is plainly written by diverse both ancient and late Writers; but the other three are not so easie to be found: therefore was I moved to gather these Observations out of sundry Authors for my particular use. The third Age, is of the Church Fading, and of Antichrist Rising, which contains 400. years and more, till the days of Pope Gregory the V. during which time Churchmen did swell in pride and ambition, and were no little changed from the simple sincerity of the primitive times: albeit in outward profession then was some face of a Church, yet corruption of Doctrine, Superstition, and Hypocrisie came apace; and the Roman Empire being removed, Antichrist or the Bishop of Rome, by degrees lifteth up his head above all that is called God. Bernard (who lived about the year 1140.) comparing these three Ages in a Sermon, which he calleth Parabola de Nuptiis Filij Regis, saith, when Satan saw that he could not by open Battell prevail against the Church in the days of the Apostles and Martyrs, but that she did spread and increase, he turneth to hid and fraudulent persecution, to deceive some of her Members, by whom, the more powerfully and subtilly he might execute his malice: so by his craft he stirreth up Arrius, Pelagius, Photinus and such others, who feigning themselves to be the servants of Christ, might lead away his Spouse into Errors: which Policy when the Holy Teachers did perceive, they did oppose, wrestle by disputations, confute the Hereticks, and brought their Lady again into the way of I ruth Behold the enemy is overcome both in his open persecutions, and hid seductions! and now the Spouse having no enemy, walketh in pomp. Nevertheless the crafty Serpent indeavoureth to spoil her, and what he cannot do in the high way, he layeth snares by the way side: here he setteth Money-changers with much gold and silver; there he setteth the Sellers of precious cloaths and ornaments; in another place wines and pleasant drinks, and all sort of meats; in another, the Triumphs of them that glory in worldly pomp; in another, he shews fair maids and all enticements of Lust: but who is wise, walks with the Bride in the right way; and the fools leave the way, and take their pleasure in the Devils Tents, and prefer them unto Christ. And what shall I say of them who when they should rule the Church of God, and having entred into the right way, do look aside with admiration into the Tents of the Devil, do look upon the things there, and not finding to satisfie their desires, do spoil the Bride of her Ornaments, and wast them filthily fulfilling their wicked lusts? so she goeth in rags and few abide with her: so saith Bernard. The fourth Age is worse, of Antichrist reigning, and the Church lurking; and contains the space of almost 300. years; in which time both doctrine and holiness of conversation was almost utterly extinguished. In the East the Mahometists did prevail thorow Asia and Africk; and in the West the Bishops of Rome turn all up side down, except that in some places and persons as well in the East as West holiness of life, and purity of doctrine did in some measure remain: but Pope Gregory the VII. and his successors, so far as they could, did wrest all religion to serve their gain and ambition: and to this end they violate all order, dissolve all discipline, deface all religion, and domineer over Princes, Emperours, Nations and Consciences of men. Before that time one might have spoken freely for the true Faith: but now whatsoever the Pope willeth that must stand for an Oracle, because the Pope cannot err, forsooth! and whatsoever is spoken against him, ipso facto it is black heresie, and punished with fire and sword. Then it might have been said, the Church is gone into the Wilderness; yet sending forth sufficient witnesses, whose names are not obscure, nor their doctrine unknown, of whom some are mentioned here; but for brevity I have passed over many, who are recorded by others; and many thousands who bowed not their knee to Baal, nor received the Mark of the Beast, are unknown. The Fifth Age is of the Church reverting, and Antichrist raging, untill this present age, when Reformation was aimed at and begun in the West, Antichristian pride was detected, and the number of true Believers did increase. Then Satan was let loose again, the thousand years of his binding, from the daies of Constantine, being expired: then persecutions were frequent; Antichrist foamed and opened his mouth wide to devour the sheep of Jesus. But he who preserved the Woman in the Wilderness, is the stronger, so that the Gates of Hell were not able nor shall be able to prevail against her; yea by the breath of his mouth and preaching of the Word, her enemies are scattered, Antichrist is revealed, and true Christians are multiplied. And in these five diversities of times (I suppose) the Church-history may well be comprised. Herein my aim hath been, to see where the true Church was before Martine Luther, as the Papists are oft objecting; and when the Romish Virgin became an Whore. And for better method herein, I have distinguished the foresaid Ages into their own Centuries, and every Century into five Chapters. The first Chapter is of Emperours, because times were reckoned by them, and in the second age they became chief Members of the Church (under Christ the only Head) both in degree and authority; and we have just reason to think that some chapters (or large passages) of the Holy Revelation are understood of their estate, seeing the Visions of Daniel run for the most part upon the civil Monarchies. The second chapter is of the Bishops or Popes of Rome, that we may know, when the Tyranny of Antichrist did arise, and how it came to such height. The third is, of divers Countries, and contains the most notable things that have befallen in other parts of the World. The fourth is of Britain, that we be not strangers at home. The last chapter is of Councils, and declares the most remarkable Acts of the Church: yet all the Canons that I have picked out, are not of one sort: for some are to be embraced, and others are to be rejected: which I have marked to let see, that such errors and ungodly constitutions have not been alwaies in the Church, as the vain glorious Papists believe, or would make us believe. These things (howsoever worthy of consideration) cannot be declared, but we shall therewith receive many other usefull instructions: especially what hath been the estate of the Catholick and true Church thorow these last thousand years; in what places and persons the Truth hath had her abode; and where and when Heresies did begin, and what opposition was against them both in their birth and growth; when a Nation or two was infected with an error, in the midst of the same erroneous Church were some Souldiers of Truth, some standing up for one article or more; and others maintaining other points; albeit in some points the same Souldiers were infected with the poisonous milk of their diseased Teachers. Or to speak more plainly, we will see in the Western Church (as it was wont to be called) some following the Truth-zealously in all points fundamental; and therefore have been separated from the Church of Rome, which being once a true Church, and first in order by humane constitution, hath in divers ages hatched many errors (for she hath not abandoned all the principles of Christianity, nor became so corrupt, all at once) and by her enchantments of worldly policy, or by violence hath caused these nations to follow her; now deceiving one Nation, and then another. Yet so, that the Romish Church was like to a lump of sundry Mettles, wherein are some pieces of gold and silver, but more of brass and baser mettle, all mingled in one cake: as there every one cannot point out where the good Mettle is, yet a cunning Mineralist knows, there is gold in that lump, and can sever the richer Mettle from the baser, and then purifie every Mettle from their own dross, and put another form upon them, that every one, who is not altogether ignorant, may know them. So in the Church of Rome, though Potentates and Nations for ignorance or fear of enmity, and sometimes for hope of advantage against their enemies, did cleave unto Rome, and seemed to make one visible Church; yet in all Countries, even in Italy under the face of Antichrist, many both of the Teachers and taught did detest the Tyranny and avaricious errors of the Pope; and in their hearts wished a Reformation, and by writ have published to the World all the Truth: for besides them who did openly contest with her, there is scarcely any article of controversie, but we shall find some of their School-men and Monks, disputing with us against the now-Romish errors. At last it pleased God, to put into the hearts of his refining Preachers and Princes to break the faction of the Romish Church, and purifie themselves with their adherents from the dross, that their Ancestors had contracted, and to unite themselves into another form of government. And as the Refiner cannot be said to make new gold, but only refineth the pre-existent Mettle, and gives it the face it had before the commixtion; so the Reformed Church is not a new Church (for that supposeth a new Church never heard of before) but they have taken themselves unto the old Truth, which was obscured for a space in the West, with corruption in the domineering part, and they have returned into the Discipline of the Primitive Church, that was interrupted, and they are become like unto them who were separate from the Romish Church; and both these have joined hands and hearts against the common errors. Herein wholesom is the direction of Cyprian to Pompey, contra Epistolam Steph. pap. saying, Devote and ingenious minds will readily lay aside error, and search and find the Truth. For if we return to the Head and Fountain of Divine Tradition, human error ceaseth, and the way of Heavenly Mysteries being perceived, whatsoever was darkly lurking under a cloud, is discovered by the light of Truth. If a pipe of a Conduit, which was wont to flow abundantly, shall fail at any time, will not men go unto the Fountain, that the cause of the failing may be known. whether it hath dried in the head, or whether that being whole and full, the fault be in the mid-way? But if it have failed by the fault of the broken and sinking pipe, that the water could not flow constantly, they amend and make strong the pipe, that the water may be brought for the use of the City, with the same abundance and integrity as it comes from the Fountain. This should the Priests of God do, which will keep his commands, that if truth should be in doubt or changed, we should return unto the Divine Fountain, the Evangelical and Apostolical tradition; and from thence let the reason of our acting arise, whence was the order and original. It hath been delivered unto us, that there is one God, and one Christ, and one Hope, and one Faith, one Church, and but one Baptism ordained in that one Church: from which whosoever departeth, he must be found among Hereticks: and if he will maintain them against the Church, he fights against the mystery of Divine Tradition. So far Cyprian.

CHAP. I.

Of EMPEROURS.

PHOCAS a mean Captain in Thracia, in a sedition of the people did kill his Sovereign Maurice, usurped the Crown, and held the Empire 7. years. He began to establish himself by favour. Cyriachus Patriarch of Constantinople had crowned him; and then did hate him for his cruelty against the house and friends of Maurice: the Western part of the Empire was aiming at liberty, and like to forsake him. Wherefore he dealt gently with Pope Gregory I. and after him he set up another of his own mind, and then another in the See of Rome. They played to others hands, the Emperour gave unto Boniface the Title of Universal Bishop, and the Pope promised fidelity unto Phocas. He was given unto Covetousness in oppressing the Provinces with Tributes; to Lust in defiling other mens wives; as for Intemperancy, carousing was his glory, Zonar. annal. li 3. In all the Provinces of the Empire was great disorder, and little justice. The Persians subdued Mesopotamia, Assyria, Syria, and took Jerusalem: for Cosroes pretending to revenge the death of his Father-in-law Maurice, killed the most part of that Army which had advanced Phocas or assisted him, and the rest of them were sent captive into Persia. Pe. Mexia. France had lately gone away; and now Germany, a great part of Italy, Pannonia, Misia and other parts made a full defection. Wherefore the Senate of Constantinople seeing that either the Empire or Tyrant must perish; especially Priscus one of the chief Captains under Maurice, and now the son-in-law of Phocas, and Heracleon the Governour of Affrick (whose wife Phocas had defiled) consulted together, and sent Armies from Affrick and Thracia: they took Phocas in Constantinople, and gave him just reward: they cut off his hands and

2. HERACLIUS son of Heraclon Governour of Affrick was made Emperour with general consent of People, Armies, and Senators, and was crowned by Sergius the Patriarch. He found the Empire in a troublous time, but his glory was the greater. His Deputy Camplinus usurps the Kingdome of Italy, and was quickly subdued and slain by Eleutherius, whom the Emperour sent against him. Bajanus made himself King of Bavaria, and molested the Empire in the West, that Cosroes had the less opposition in subduing Ægypt and Affrick unto Carthage: in the end Heraclius brought the Bavarians under command; he crowned his son Emperour, and went in person against the Persians. Pe. Mexia. First he dealt for peace by Ambassadors. Cosroes said, he would not lay down Arms, until he had abolished the worship of the crucified God, and the Persian God were worshipped every where. Then Heraclius was the more confident, that the Wars was not so much for the Empire, as for defence of the Church and worship of God. After publick invocation of Gods name, he joined with the enemy at Azotus, and put him to flight: then within Persia he overthrew his two Armies in two other fights: he defaced the Image of the Fire and Sun, which the Persians worshipped, Zonar. Annal. In the mean time Cosroes neglecting his eldest son Siroes, designed his second son Mardases to the Crown. Wherefore Siroes killed his father and his brother, and he agreed with Heraclius: they both restored captives: Heraclius received Syria and Jerusalem, and (as they say) the Cross where on Christ was crucified, which Cosroes had taken out of Jerusalem. So after seven years Heraclius returns with glory to Constantinople, holding the Cross in his hand, and gave thanks unto Christ. In remembrance of this Victory, he appointed the Feast of the Roode day Cario. chron. The Sarazens had served him in these Wars, and when they required their wages, the Emperours Treasurers answered them disdainfully, as follows in c. 3. This prosperity turns the Emperours mind to the worse: he marrieth his brothers daughter Martina, and became a Monothelite by the suggestion of the Patriarch of the Jacobites, and Sergius Patriarch of Constantinople. Sophronius Bishop of Jerusalem admonished him of his error. But he made an Edict that displeased both parties, that no man should speak of one will, or of two wills of Christ. Zonar. Annal. After this the Sarazens gathered in Arabia, and many Persians followed Mahumet because of the dissoluteness of his religion, whereof hereafter. Mahumet occupies all Arabia, and passeth into Persia, where because the King was dead, the whole country almost became his Subjects, and imbrace his religion: they were little more called Persians but Sarazens or Mahumetans. Heraclius went against them, and loseth in one Battell 150000. men. Pe. Mexia. Others also rebelled against him in the West, so that ere he died, the Empire was fore weakened. Rotharius became King of Lombardy: the Slavons possesse Illyricum; the Huns and Bavarians keep Hungary, Bavier and Austria; the Goths were reigning in Spain; and unto the Empire belonged the Provinces of Greece, a part of Italy, and the Isles of the Mediterranean Sea from Sardinia unto Cyprus, Asia the less, a small part of Affrick, and some other small Provinces. Pe. Mexia. After Heraclius had tried both fortunes, he died of hydropsie, an. 639.

Hid murder.

3. CONSTANTINE III. reigned not above four months after the death of his father: he was poisoned by his step-mother Martina with advice of Pirthus the Patriarch; that her son Heracleonas (begotten in incest) might be be Emperour. He was hated by Martina for his Throne; and by Pirrhus for forsaking the heresie of his father. Zonar.

4. HERACLEONAS was but eleven years old, and his Mother governed the Empire, but with no contentment of the Subjects. In the second year of his Reign the Senators rose against Martina and her son: they cut off his Nose, and her Tongue (that thereafter she should not move sedition among the people by her flattering words) and sent them both into Cappadocia, where they died in Prison. Pirrhus was drawn back from his flight and imprisoned. So Murther and Incest was punished. Is revenged.

5. CONSTANS the son of Constantine, was crowned by the Senate without the advice of the Souldiers: which was a rare thing in these daies. He was a Monothelite, as the Patriarch Paul, and (both his Predecessor and restored Successor) Pirrhus: and therefore he punished sundry persons for speaking against his Heresie: among whom Theodore Bishop of Rome narrowly escaped, and his Successor Martine was taken by Theodore Eparch of Ravenna, and carried in bonds to Constantinople, and banished to Cheronesus, where he died. He also slue his own brother Theodosius, and most cruelly vexed them all, who would not subscribe his Typus or Heretical confession. Therefore the Lord permits the power of the Sarazens to wax greater, that in the 13. year of his Reign they sent a Navy from Phœnicia, and spoiled the Coast of Asia without resistance: yet intestine Wars falling amongst them for choosing their Captain, Constans had two years peace. And then he hears of a Rebellion among the Lombards, and thinking to subdue them, he comes into Italy with a great Army, making a great shew and some expectation: but he received loss and shame. Thereafter he went to Rome, and was received by the Citizens and Pope Vitalian. Within few daies he spoiled the City, and carried all the Ornaments and Treasure into Siracuse: where (because he was hated at Constantinople) he kept Court six years, and at last was slain in a Bath of too-hot water, by Andrew one of his own servants in the 27. year of his Reign. Platina calleth him Constantius. An Heretick is a Persecuter. And hath no peace.

6. CONSTANTINE by surname Pogonatus or beardy was received into the Throne with his Father ere he went into Italy; and now the Souldiers in Sicily did salute Mizisus or Mizentius, with the honour of Emperour, but he was soon taken, and his head with the Authors of the Treason was carried to Constantinople. Constantine began his Government with the murder of his brethren, because the Nobility would have had them partners of the Empire: yet afterwards he proved valorous and good. In his time the Sarazens were strong: they entred into Sicily, and carried to Alexandria in Ægypt all the spoil that Constans had taken out of Rome. They invade Thracia, were repulsed seven sundry Summers at Constantinople; and in the end were so foiled, that their Captain Muthavia sought peace, and accepted hard conditions, to wit, they should pay yearly unto the Emperour, in name of Tribute 3000. pounds of gold, 50. servants, and as many good horses. They of the West hearing of so honourable peace, sent their Orators with gifts to congratulate the Victory. Then the Emperour had peace every where, and set his heart to take away the schism of the Monothelites: for he thought, if Christ have but one will, he hath but one nature, or else the other nature is not reasonable. Against this Heresie he calleth the sixth General Council, which he held and ruled at Constantinople. He keeps peace with the Bishops of Rome: he was a long time sick, and died an. 607. in the time of his sickness the Sarazens possessed all Affrick unto Carthage; and the Bulgarians came into Mysia. One beginneth wickedly, and proveth virtuous.

7. JUSTINIAN II. succeeds to his father in the 16. year of his age. In the beginning his Captains forceth the Sarazens to restore all that they had taken in his fathers time, and to sue for peace, which was concluded for ten years. Pe. Mexia. But the Emperour being more hardy then faithfull, made new Wars against the Sarazens in Syria, and was so streighted, that he sought peace with shame so Lampad. in Mellis. Then was peace in all the World; but this young Emperour is miscarried by two Minions Theodosius a Monk, and his Chaplain Stephen: he breaks the peace with the Bulgarians to his great reproach and loss: he assembleth a Councel at Constantinople, to annul the acts of the former, which were ended in his own time, and confirmed by him: by the perswasion of these two, he put his chief Captain Leontius in prison, and held him there two years: who escaping with the help of Callinicus the Patriarch, laid hands on Justinian, cutteth off his nose and ears, and sent him to Cherona in Pontus in the 11. year of his Reign; and they dragged the two sycophants by the feet through the streets, and then burnt them. Zonar. Annal. The Emperour Justinian I. had conquered Lybia from the Vandals, and Justinian II. losed it, that till this day the Sarazens and Mahumetans possess it.

8. LEONTIUS was crowned with the great joy of the common people. He sent an Army against the Sarazens in Affrick; but in a sedition amongst them, the souldiers choose Tiberius Apfimar as a Citizen of Constantinople, and General of the Army to be Emperour. He came quickly back upon Leontius, and took him, and served him as he had done to Justinian, in the 3. year of his Reign, and he exercised great cruelty against the friends of Leontius; yet did he nothing without advice of the Senatours, who delivered unto them their keys at his first coming.

9. TIBERIUS coming this way unto the Crown, sent his Brother Heraclius Governour of his Army against the Sarazens in Asia, and recovered Armenia from them. When Justinian had been four years in Pontus, he escaped, and by the aid of the Bulgarians he returned into Constantinople, and by force took Tiberius, and cast him into the same prison with Leontius, and having cut off his nose and ears, caused them both to be drawn through the City, and beheaded them, and he hanged Heraclius: so oft as he would have wiped his nose, he caused some of the friends of Leontius to be slain: he pulled out the eyes of the Patriarch Callinicus, and sent him bond to Rome to gratifie Pope Constantine, and set in his place Cyrus an Abbot, who had received and sustained him in Pontus. Beda de sex atat.

10. JUSTINIAN II. now lay at home, executing cruelties daily. He did invite (Platina saith, rogat. Abb. Ursper. saith, accescit. and Sigonius saith, obsecrat.) Pope Constantine to come into the East, that they may talk together of the affairs of the Republick, as he said; but in very deed, to ingage the Pope unto him by extraordinary honours, whereof he saw the Bishops of Rome were very desirous. Pe. Mexia. Platina saith, he sent ships to convey him safely: but Anastasius saith, the Pope caused ships to be built for himself. Pb. Mornay in Myster. The Emperour caused all his Subjects, where the Pope was to come, to receive him with such honour as they ow unto himself. As the Pope drew near to Constantinople, Cyrus the Patriarch with all the Clergy went out eight miles from the City, and set the Pope upon a Camel, and with solemn ostentation they conveyed him into the Emperours Palace: thence he went into Nicomedia, where the Emperour embraced not the Pope, but casting himself down before him, he craved pardon for his sins, and kissed the Popes foot with an unmeasurable shew of humility (as Mexia saith) and so was absolved. After this he became unthankfull to Tre-bellius King of Bulgaria (who had restored him) and entred into his land with hostility, and was shamefully beaten back. It was told him that Philip Bardanes had dreamed, that an Eagle had overshadowed him with her wings, and was therefore banished into the Isle Cephalonia by Tiberius; now Justinian conceives the same fear, and sent an Army against him, thinking on no such thing: the souldiers turn to his side, as Platina writes: but Mexia saith, upon this occasion Philippicus levieth an Army, and at Synope within 12. miles of Constantinople, Elias Prince of Cherson, in open Battle, slue Justinian and his son Tiberius; and with consent of all the subjects Philippicus received the Crown an. 712.

CHAP. II.

OF POPES.

GREGORY I. alias the Great, was Bishop of Rome about the 600. Gregorius ep-pugneth the Title of Universal Bishop. year of the Incarnation. The Bishops of Rome had the first place among the Patriarchs, with expresse limitation of jurisdiction and bounds, as well by the first general Council at Nice, as by the second at Constantinople. This order was brangled in the time of Gregory. For John, Patriarch of Constantinople, sought not only to have the first place, but also to be called Patriarcha Oecumenicus or Universal, because the Emperours chief Residence, was at Constantinople the head City & imperialis. Gregory writ many Epistles against the Title, unto John he saith, Thou was wont to confess thy self unworthy to be called a Bishop: but now thou art so puffed up, that despising thy brethren, thou seekest to be called the only Bishop At the last day of account, what wilt thou answer unto Christ the Head of the Universal Church, who indevoureth to make all his Members, subject unto thy self, by naming thy self Universal? Who (I pray) is before thee to follow him in this perverse word; but he, who despising the legions of Angels (socially ordered with him) would burst out unto the top of singularity, that he might seem to be under none, and he alone to be above all? Who also said, I will ascend into heaven, and exalt my Throne above the stars: I will sit in the mountain of the Testament, in the sides of the North. . . . For what are all thy brethren, the Bishops of the Universal Church, but the stars of heaven? Whose lives and tongues do glance among the sins and errors of men, as in the darkness of the night: above whom thou wilt prefer thy self by this word of pride, and tread down in comparison of thee; what else saiest thou, but I will ascend into heaven, and I will exalt my Throne above the stars? All which things while I see with tears, and do fear the secret judgements of God, my tears are increased, and my groans are not contained within my breast; that the holy man John, who was of so great humility and abstinence, is by the seducing tongues of his familiars burst out into so great pride, that by hunting after a perverse name, he will be like unto him, who when he would arrogantly be like to God, did also lose the grace of the given similitude; and therefore did forfeit true blessedness; because he sought false glory. Truly the Apostle Peter was the first member of the holy and universal Church, Paul, Andrew, John, what were they but heads of particular flocks? and yet they ALL were members of the Church under one head. And to comprise All in a short bundle, the godly before the law, the godly under the law, and the godly under grace; all these perfecting the body of Christ, are ordered among the Members of the Church, and none of them would ever be called Universal: and therefore let your Holiness know, what swelling is in you, who seeketh the name, wherewith never any did presume to be called, who was truly godly. Did not the reverend Synod at Chalcedon (as your Holiness knows) call the High-priests of this Apostolical See (which I do serve, as God hath disposed) Universal, by a profered honour? and nevertheless none of them would be named by such a word: not any of them did take unto them this temerarious Title, lest if in the degree of Priesthood, he had taken this glory of singularity, he had been thought to have denied it to all his brethren. Much more writes Pope Gregory of this kind, in that 38. Ep. li. 4. and especially, in the same Epistle he tels him, that he had given direction to his Deacon Sabinian, that he should not communicate with John, or be at the same [Missa] service with him, unless he did renounce that wicked and prophane pride. And in 32. Epistle of the same book, unto the Emperour Maurice, he calleth that a name of vanity, a new name, a wicked and arrogant name: and li. 6. Ep. 36. I say boldly, he who takes or affecteth this name, is the fore-runner or Usher of Antichrist, because in pride he preferreth himself above all others. The Emperour was not well pleased with these Letters, and when Cyriacus was Patriarch, he writ unto Gregory, that for to frivolous a word, he would not give so great scandal unto the Church. Gregory answereth li. 6. Ep. 30. saying, I intreat that your imperial Godliness would consider, that some frivolous words are very damnable, and some are not so hurtfull: When Antichrist shall call himself God, will it not be a frivolous word, and yet very pernicious; if you consider the quantity of the word Deus, it hath but two syllables: but if you consider the weight of iniquity, it is an vniversal plague: and I say boldly, that whosoever desireth to be called Universal Priest, he runneth before Antichrist in pride; because he presumptuously preferreth himself above all others; and with the same pride he is brought into all error: for as that man of sin, will seem to be above all men, so whosoever seeketh to be called the only Priest, exalt himself above all other Priests. Gregory writ also unto Eulogius Bishop of Alexandria, and Anastasius Bishop of Antiochia, li. 4. Ep. 36. that they would help in this common cause, and hinder so great pride. After the same manner did he write li. 7. Ep. 69. unto Eusebius Bishop of Thessalonica, and others in the daies of Cyriacus. If any will say, Gregory did invey against John and Cyriacus, because they did usurp what was due unto the Bishop of Rome; the words of the former Epistle unto John, shew the contrary; as also the Ep. 30. li. 7. indist. 1. unto Eulogius Bishop of Alexandria, where he writes thus; I said, that you should neither give unto me, nor unto any other such a Title; and behold in the beginning of the Epistle, which you have directed unto me, who have forbidden it, is the word of that proud Title, calling me Universal Pope: which I desire, that your most sweet Holiness do no more unto me: for it is withdrawn from you, which is given unto another more then reason requires: for I seek to prosper not in words, but in manners; nor do I think it my honour, wherein I know that my brethren come short of their honour . . . then am I honoured, when the honour which is due unto every one, is not denied to every one: for if your Holiness call me Universal Pope, you deny your self that, when you call me Universal: but far be that! away with words that blow up vanity, and wound charity. So far he. When Phocas had slain the Emperour Maurice, though Baronius adan. 605. calleth him a perjured and bloody murderer; yet unto him writes Gregory, saying, Glory in the highest places unto God, who (as it is written) changeth times, and transferreth Kingdomes: for by the incomprehensible dispensation of the Almighty God, is the moderation of mans life . . . when the mercifull

God will comfort the hearts of them who mourn, he advanceth unto the top of government one, by the bowels of whose mercy, he poureth the grace of gladness into the hearts of many: in the abundance of this joy we trust to be comforted, who are glad that the bountifulness of your Godliness is come to the high Empire: Let the heavens rejoice; let the earth be glad, and the people of all the Republick hitherto vehemently afflicted, become joyfull in your bountifulness, &c. li. 11. Ep. 36. Unto the Empress Leontia he did write the 44. Epistle of the same book, which beginneth thus: What tongue can tell, what mind can think, the thanks we owe unto the Almighty God, for the happiness of your Empire? And he endeth, praying, that they would love his Church, to whom it was said, Thou art Peter, and upon this rock---; and on the other side, he promiseth that Peter will protect their Empire here, and intercede for them in heaven; that for relieving the oppressed on earth, they may rejoice many years in heaven. What meaneth this so large congratulation, but that through the favour of Phocas, his own authority may be enlarged, at least, that none be preferred above him? So ready are some to speak against the faults of others, and to disguise the same in themselves, as they find occasion. But Gregory died, an. 604. when he had sitten 8. years. Because he is the first Church-man I speak of, it may seem necessary to shew what was the estate of the Church in his daies, in respect of Doctrine and Discipline, and this I will endeavour (God willing) in the next chapter, lest I seem to enlarge the life of one too far; for this present behold a little of the Papal power. In li. 4. Ep. 31. he bewails unto the Emperour Maurice, that in his Epistle he had called him a simple fool, and he saith, Let not our Lord, according to his earthly power, be too hastily angry against the Priests, but in singular consideration; for his sake whose servants they are, let him so reign over them, that he bestow due reverence on them. Bellarmin. de Ro. Pontif. lib. 2. c. 28. acknowledgeth that the Pope reckoneth himself amongst those Priests. And in Epistle 34. he saith, I trust in the Almighty God, that he will give long life unto our godly Lords, and according to his mercy he will protect us under your hands. Observe how reverently the Pope speaks unto the Emperour, and yet more submissively, in lib. 2. Ep. 61. he saith, He is guilty before the Almighty God, who is not sincere, in all that he doth or speaks unto his most gracious Lords. There he calleth himself the unworthy servant of his Godliness: and he shews the iniquity of an Imperial Ordinance (in his judgement) and he concludes thus; I being obedient unto your command, have caused the same law to be published through divers parts of the land; and because the law is not consonant unto the Almighty God, behold I have told it unto our most gracious Lords, by the page of our suggestion: therefore in both I have payed what I should, who have given unto the Emperour obedience, and have not been silent for God, so far as I know. The Jesuit saith, that he did write in such manner, partly in humility, and partly in necessity; because the Emperour had then the Temporal Authority in Rome, and the Pope had need to be defended from the Lombards, and the Emperour, being far off, did entrust him with many things, and the Bishop ought to give account of such things. But the foresaid Ordinance, was of a purpose Ecclesiastical. And lib. 4. c. 34. he complains, that Maximus was admitted Bishop of Salona, without consent of him, or his Nuntio; and nevertheless when he had received from the Emperour a command, he had loosed his sentence of Excommunication; as if Maximus had been ordained by his order. And li. 9. Ep. 41. he saith, if John Bishop of Justiniana will not dismiss his charge, the most godly Emperour may cause to choose another; seeing, what he commandeth to do, is in his power: as he knows, so may he provide: only he craves, that the Emperour would not cause him to meddle with such a Deposition. Here I do not intend to inquire the causes and equity of things, but to shew what was done: and we see the Pope subject unto the Emperour; but wait a space, and we shall see the Emperour subject unto the Pope. Is not this a novation? Behold what power the Bishops of Rome did exerce within his Patriarchal. When Constantius Bishop of Millain died, he sent word by his Clark Pantaleon unto the City, that they should chuse a Deacon Deus dedit to be Bishop, and cause him to be consecrated, lib. 9. indict. 4. Ep. 21. He gave charge to Passius Bishop of Firma, that he should chuse Opportunus to be Pastor, if he be able; lib. 10. ind. 5. Ep. 13. He commandeth under the censure of Excommunication all the Bishops of Dalmatia, that they ordain not any Bishop in Salona without his consent, lib. ind. 12. Ep. 16. He did also draw the causes of Arch-Bishops unto Rome; as when Severus Bishop of Aquileia had been accused of heresie, and restored, and after was accused again, he summoneth him, according to the command of the most Christian Emperour, to appear in St. Peters, that there, in a lawfull Synod, his cause may be judged, lib. 1. Ep. 16. He chargeth Natalis Bishop of Salonitan, that seeing the cause of Honoratus Arch-Deacon, seems to have been decided with contention in that Synod (and they had ordained him, against his will, to exerce the Office of a Priest; and removed him, as unworthy the Office of a Deacon) to restore the Arch-Deacon; and if any scandal shall arise thereupon, he willeth, that both the Arch-Deacon shall be cited to appear before him, and also the Bishop should direct some person for him, that the cause may be examined. Ib. Ep. 19. When Maximus was ordained Bishop of Salona, contrary to his order now named; he commandeth him to humble himself, and hasten to appear before him, without any excuse, lib. 5. indict. 14. Ep. 25. Out of the next Epistle it appears that Maximus did not obey, and the Clergy and Rulers did assist him: wherefore the Pope did write unto them, to cause Maximus to come and appear; and he promised that he would judge the cause uprightly. He drew civil things to his power, as lib. 8. ind. 3. Ep. 6. he ordered Savinus a Sub-Deacon, to cause Maria to pay unto Stopaulus and Marcellus, what her father had left unto them by Testament. In lib. 11. ind. 6. Ep. 54. among other directions that he gave unto John, going into Spain, he telleth him, how the Emperour Justinian had ordained, that if any had an action against a Clark or Monk or Deacon; he should first go unto the Bishop of the place, and there the cause to be decided; and if both parties did not rest contented, the Judge of the place should put the sentence in execution. This instance shews, that the Bishops had their power in civil things, by the Laws of the Empire. At that time, the Bishop of Rome had Revenues from other Churches; and lib. 10. Ep. 47. he bids his Clark Pantaleon to bring unto him, the silver which is left by the Clergy or people, that he might see the mony of the Churches, which the people and clergy have, safely kept. And in the 50. Epistle, he gives order unto John Bishop of Siracuse, concerning his Revenues paid there and in Panormitan. Pelagius the I. mad an Act, that all Metropolitans within his jurisdiction, should within three months (after their Consecration, as they speak) ask a Palle [Pallium, or a Bishops Coat] from Rome; Gratian. dist. 100. cap. 1 & 2. it seems that they did not regard the Palles; therefore Gregory obrudes the Palles upon them, and would have the Metropolitans to accept them; but would suffer nothing to be taken for them. li. 4. Ep. 51, & 56. He made a new form of Service, which they call the Masse, and did add many Ceremonies, that were not in use before: so that Platina saith, the whole institution of the Masse, was invented by him. Onuphrius saith, that Platina comes short in describing of his inventions, ons. He first did ordain the Stations and the great Letany; that is, upon occasion of a great inundation in Rome: he appointed, that on the 25. of April yearly, the people should resort to certain Churches; and if they please to confess their sins, they may receive forgiveness; Pol. Verg. de inven. rer. lib. 8. cap. 1. which custom still remains, but now upon necessity; whereas he said, if they please. Nor in that order makes he mention of indulgences; albeit some of his Sermons be extant, that he delivered upon these days, Rabanus de institut. cler. lib. 2. cap. 18. expounds these Stations to be the Fast, on Wednesday and Friday. He ordained the Lent to begin on Ash-wednesday, and the Ceremonies thereof, Po. Verg. lo. ci. lib. 6. cap. 3. and lest the people were detained too long from dinner, he ordained that Matins be closed before nine a clock.

2. SABINIAN was at Constantinople, when Gregory died, and was advanced into his Seat by Phocas. When he came to Rome there was great dearth, and the poor people besought him to follow the alms-deeds of Gregory: he answered, Gregory hunting after a popular applause, had wasted the patrimony of the Church. And he did so burn with wrath and envy, that Caranza saith, he did hate all the good works of Gregory; and he had burnt all his Books, saith Platina, if some Copies had not been saved by Peter a Deacon. The burning of Torches continually in Churches, and the distinction of hours by Bells was his device. Platin. He did propound unto Phocas, that the Title should be given unto the Bishop of Rome, which Gregory had so oft condemned; but because of mighty opposition, it could not so soon be carried. He sat 1. year and 5. months; after him the See was vacant 11. months and 26. daies.

3. BONIFACE III. being at Constantinople, was named by the Emperour; and now for envy of Cyriacus, was made Universal Bishop of the Church; and the See of Rome was ordained to be the head of all Churches; because the Church of Constantinople would have usurped this honour: Be-da de sex. etat. & Platin. Baronius in Annal. ad an. 606. saith, Because there was enmity betwixt Phocas and Cyriacus; for envy of him, the Emperour seems to have favoured the Bishop of Rome, beyond the custom of his Ancestors; and did ordain by Imperial Edict, that this name becomes the Roman Church only; and the Bishop of Rome should be called Universal, and not the Bishop of Constantinople: this Title then is a novation. But what is the meaning of it, it is controverted. Pope Innocent the III. writing unto the Patriarch of Constantinople, lib. 2. Ep. 206. gives two notions of it, saying, it is called the Universal Church, which consists of all the Churches; which in the Greek language is called, The Catholick Church; and according to this exception of the name, the Roman Church is not the Universal Church, but a part of the Universal Church; to wit, the first and chief, as the head in the body, because in her is the fulness of power, and a part of that fulness is derived unto others; again, the Universal Church is called, that one, that hath under her all other Churches; and according to this reason of the name, the Roman Church only, is called Universal; because she alone is preferred above all others by the privilege of singular dignity, as God is called the Universal Lord, Catalog. test. verit. lib. 6. I will not stay to dispute these exceptions; but observe the novation, and who is the Author of the Title; and how contrary it is unto the Epistles of Gregory the I. Bellarmin. de Ro. Pontif. lib. 2. cap. 32. would prove the lawfulness of this Title; because in former ages, some were called Bishops of the Universal Church. It is true, some were so intituled, not only the Bishops of Rome, but others also; as may be seen among the Epistle of Augustine and others: and Clemens the I. in the first Torches.

The title of Universal Bishop, first given to the Bishop of Rome.

Epistle unto James, the Lords brother, called him the Bishop of Bishops, who governed the Holy Church of the Hebrews in Jerusalem, and all the Churches, which by the providence of God were founded every where. Here a Bishop of Rome giveth such great Titles unto others: and Athanasius was called Bishop of the Catholick Church; and it seems not without disparagement to the Bishop of Rome: for Basilius Magnus in his 49. Epistle, writes unto him thus; so much the more as the diseases of the Church wax worse and worse, so much the more do we all turn unto your dignity; trusting that your government is the only comfort which is left unto us. Now will any say, that either James or Athanasius, had the power or jurisdiction over all the Churches? Where then is the power of the Bishop of Rome? But Basilius declares his mind in the words following, thus, Thou art thought by all alike who either in part by hearing, or by experience, know thy dignity able to help us from this horrible Tempest, by the power of thy prayers, and by thy knowledge to inform in the affairs that are most excellent. And more clearly in the 52. Epistle, he saith, it seemeth enough to others, that each one consider and have a care of what belongeth unto himself; but unto thee, this is not enough; for thy sollicitude is such for all the Churches, as well as for that which particularly is, by our common Lord, committed unto thee; who indeed intermittest no time from conference, admonishing, writing, and alwaies sending some who do inform in the best things. Behold here a sollicitude universal, and not a jurisdiction universal. But to return to Boniface, Platina testifieth, that this Title was not given unto him without great contention; for the Patriarch of Constantinople did alledge, that it appertained unto his See, seeing there was the head of the Empire; and the Bishop of Rome said, that Rome was the head of the Empire; and a Colony was sent from thence unto Constantinople, and the Emperour, is called Emperour of the Romans; and the people of Constantinople, even at that time, are called Romans, and not Constantinopolitans or Greeks. Platina addeth, I omit (saith he) that Peter, Prince of the Apostles, gave unto his successors, the Bishops of Rome, the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven; and the power that God had given unto him, he left in Legacy unto Rome, and not to Constantinople. Platina might well have omitted this; because he cannot shew out of any Author about that time, that Boniface did pretend this reason. It is true, some Bishops of Rome, before that time, had spoken of Peters primacy. But not in such sense, as they do now, as is clear from the words of Gregory the I. that are before. And here it may be remembered, what he writes to Eulogius Bishop of Alexandria, lib. 5. Ep. 60. saying, One thing tieth us unto the Church of Alexandria, by a certain peculiarity; and some way forceth us, by a special Law, to incline the more unto her love; for as all men know, that the blessed Evangelist Mark, was sent into Alexandria by his Master the Apostle Peter; by the unity of this Master and of the Disciple, are we tied; that as I seem to sit in the seat of the Disciple, because of the Master; so do you sit in the seat of the Master, because of the Disciple. We find not the responsory of Eulogius; but it is clear, he did not approve this pretence; for Gregory writ again unto him, lib. 6. Ep. 37. thus, Your most sweet Holiness, hath in your Epistles, written many things concerning the chair of St. Peter, Prince of the Apostles, saying, that he sitteth as yet in it, by his successors: and indeed I confess my self unworthy, not only of the honour of Rulers, but to be in the rank of standers also; but all that you said, I accept gladly, because you speak to me of the Chair of Peter, who sit in the chair of Peter. And albeit I have no delight in special honour; nevertheless, I did greatly rejoyce, that you who are most holy, have given unto your self, what you have allowed unto me:

Pope Gregory
saith, the power of Pe-

for who knows not, that the Holy Church is strengthened by the solidity of the Prince of the Apostles? because he carried strength of mind in his name, that he was called Petrus à Petra, to him by the voice of Truth it was said, Unto thee will I give the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven: and again, When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren; and again, Simon lovest thou me? feed my sheep. And so though the Apostles were many, yet only the See of the Prince of the Apostles, which [See] is but one in three places, and hath prevailed pro ipso principatu; for he hath advanced the See, where he would rest and finish his life; and he hath beautified the See, whereinto he sent the Evangelist a Disciple; and he hath strengthened the See [Antiochia] in which he sate 7. years, albeit he was to leave it: Seeing then the See is one, and of one; wherein now by Divine authority three Bishops do govern, whatsoever good I do hear of you, I account it mine own; and if you hear any good of me, impute it unto your merits; because we are all one in him, who said, That they may be all one, as thou, Father art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us. So far he. Whence it appears, that whatsoever may be understood by the Title, Prince of the Apostles; other Bishops did oppose, that it should be proper to the See of Rome; and Gregory was content to share with the Bishops of Antiochia and Alexandria. Likewise Basilus, Bishop of Cappadocia, in his 55. Epistle calleth Ambrose (who was Bishop of Milain) Bishop of the first See of the Apostles; certainly, not because any Apostle was ever Bishop of Milain; but because, as Ambrose held the doctrine of the Apostles, so at that time Milain was the Court of the Emperour Theodosius his residence; as Basil saith in the same Epistle, unto that Town is the Principedom of the whole [Roman] nation concredited. The primacy of the Bishop of Rome, being grounded in this manner, upon so sandy reasons, hath been usurped and enlarged by slight and might through many ages; and at that time gave the occasion of the great schism, betwixt the Greek and Latine Churches, and among the Latines themselves; for the Bishops of Ravenna and Milain, would not consent to the supremacy (as follows:) and therefore Ravenna, in contempt, was called Accephalos or headless; and the Bishops of Venice and Istria would not subject themselves. Phyl. Mor- nay in Myster. inq. pag. 117. This Boniface denounceth a curse to all them, who climb unto a Bishoprick by favour of men or bribery: he ordaineth, that the Election of a Bishop, should be by consent both of people and clergy, and be ratified, when the Prince of the City shall approve of it, and the Pope shall add his volumus & mandamus. Platina. Gregory said, he would not command, but only he would intimate or shew such things as he thought expedient, lib. 7. Ep. 30. but then Boniface, and all his Successors, in all their Constitutions, Grants, and Bulls, have no word so frequent, as Iubemus & mandamus. He sate 9. months.

4 BONIFACE III. succeeds an. 608. saith Onuphrius, Phocas gave unto him the Temple that was called Pantheon (that is, of Cybele and all other Gods) and he dedicated it unto Mary, and all other Saints; and therefore it was called Virgo ac Martyres. Platin. A noble change! not from Paganism to Christianity; but from one sort of idolatry to another. Neither was this his deed only, but of many other Popes, as Bellarmin sheweth de cultu Sancto. lib. 3. cap. 4. and therefore Agrippa de vanit. scient. cap. 58. saith, we know, this was the old superstition of the Gentils, to build to each God their own Temple; to whose imitation, afterwards Christians began to dedicate their Churches unto their Deities. In that chapter, Agrippa taxeth his Romanists: 1. That they think God hears prayers more in one place, than in another; albeit Christ biddeth enter into our Chamber; and he himself went unto the Mountaines to pray. 2. Hee reproves the multitude of their Churches, Chappels, and Oratories built and adorned so sumptuously; and in the mean time, the poor and living members of Christ, are starving for want of necessaries. From Augustin, contra Maximin. lib. 1. argum. 11. de Sp. San. we may learn a third fault of this kind: if we build (saith he) a Church of Stones or Trees unto any most excellent Angel; are we not accursed and anathematized from the truth of Christ, and from the Church of God; because then we give unto a creature, that service which is due unto God only. Hereunto did Bellarmin subscribe, saying, to offer Sacrifices, to build Churches and Altars, is a service due to God alone; de beatit. Sanctior. lib. 1. cap. 12. But in lib. 3. de cultu Sanctior. he varnisheth this practice of the Romish Church, saying, we build not Churches to our Martyrs, as to Gods, but as monuments to dead men, whose spirits live with God. He adds other answers, but such as he trusts not himself; and the most solid (as he saith) is, Holy houses may be built truly and properly to Saints, yet not under the name of a Church or Temple, but Basilica or Memoria. To omit the identity of the words, Agrippa said before, They build Churches unto their Divi: and Erasmus on the margine, above the fore-named words of Augustine, hath marked, This is done now to each one of the Divi. But experience is a sufficient witness, that almost all the Churches, under the obedience of Rome, had their names from Saints; nor were they called, the Memories or Monuments, but the Church of Saint Peter or some other Saint, and in Latine Templa Sanctorum, and in Greek iegg, as Bellarmin witnesseth de cultu Sanct. lib. 3. cap. 4. Wherefore we may see, that the Church of Rome hath turned the old idolatry, into a new sort of idolatry; giving their new Gods more fine and superstitious worship. This Boniface did first ordain the Feast of All-Saints, and that the Pope should say Mass that day. Catal. test. verit. lib. 6. He turned his fathers house into a Monastery, and sate 7. years: then the seat was vacant 6. months; for many strove for the pre-heminence, rather than for the cure of souls. At last

5. DEUSDEDIT or Theodatus, the son of a married Priest, was chosen, and sate 3. years. This only is written of him, that he was an holy man, and that he healed a man sick of the Palsie, by a kiss only; and that he ordained, that the son of him who had been witness of the Baptism of an infant, should not marry that infant being a woman. Platin. And hereby he enlarged spiritual alliance (as they call it) which was begun by Gregory, who did accurse the man who shall marry his god-mother. Grego. decreta.

6. BONIFACE V. is said to have been a man of singular vertue and bountifulness; especially toward those of the Clergy, who were most vigilant in their calling. He ordained, that so great reverence should be had unto the place of Gods worship; that whosoever shall take his refuge into a Church, should not be taken by force; (making the Law of God against murderers, and such ungodly men, to be of no effect by his tradition; because he loved them who bring, saith I. Beda in Catal. Scriptor. illust.) and that sacrilegious persons should be accursed (for he hateth them who take away.) In his time, Testaments were of strength, when they were confirmed by the Magistrates: but his Successours would have this power to themselves. His Epistles direct to England, as in Beda's history, wherein are sundry passages, fighting against the perfection of Christ's satisfaction. He sate 3. years, and died an. 622.

7. HONORIUS I. was a Monothelite, Onuphrius in Annot. in Platin. and Bellarmin, de Ro. Pont. lib. 4. cap. 11. would purge him of this blot, by the Epistles of a Monk Maximus, and of Emanuel Caleça, who lived about the year 1274. they cannot deny, that they saw in the most common books of Councils, this heresie imputed unto him in the sixth general Council; as also the Epistles of Sergius, Bishop of Constantinople, unto Honorius; and of Honorius to Sergius, were read in the twelfth Action or Session: and in the sixteenth Action, they both were accused for that heresie: and in the seventeenth, a Confession was published contrary to the error of the Monothelites; and after the Confession, Honorius Pope of old Rome, is reckoned amongst the Hereticks: see hereafter in Leo II. and some among the Romanists, stick not to call him an Heretick, as Melc. Canus in loc. Theol. li. 6. c. 8. Platina makes mention of his great care in building of Churches, and transporting Ornaments from the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, into the Church of St. Peter, but nothing of his spiritual building. He appointed Processions on the Lords day: whence was the compassing of Churches. Catal. test. verit. lib. 9. He sate 12. years, and then the Seat was vacant 1. year and 7. months.

8. SEVERINUS was confirmed by Isaacius, Eparch of Ravenna: Election of the Pope. for at that time the Election of the Pope was naught, till he were confirmed by the Emperour or his Eparch. Platin. Isaacius came to Rome for confirmation of the Pope, and saw great Treasure in the Lateran Church: he took it all away; because the Souldiers were in great necessity, in time of the wars against the Saracens; yet he gave only a part of it to the Souldiers, and sent the rest to Ravenna; whence he sent a part unto the Emperour: like unto all other Popes, Severinus was more carefull of houses then of souls. Platin. He by Epistle reproves the Scots; for observing Pentecost or Easter, on another day than the Church of Rome; but his reproof had no place there; because they were not accustomed with the yoke of the Romish Bishops, saith Catal. test. ver. He sate 1. year 2. months. Beda hist. lib. 2. cap. 19. hath written an Epistle at this time, thus, Unto the most learned, and most holy, the Scotch Bishops and Presbyters, and other Doctours and Abbots. Hilarius Arch-Priest, and keeping the place of the holy Apostolical See, John a Deacon, and chosen in the name of God; and John Primicerius, and holding the place of the Apostolical See, and John a servant and counsellor of the same Apostolical See. The writings which the Bearers brought unto Pope Gregory, of good memory (he departing this life) have not been answered till now. Which being opened, left the mist of so great a question should continue. . . . Hereby we know, that the Pelagian heresie beginneth to revive among you; wherefore we exhort you earnestly, that so venomous a work of superstition be put from your minds; for it cannot be unknown unto you, how that execrable heresie is damned; seeing it hath not only been abolished out this 240. years; but it is also daily condemned by us, by a perpetual anathema, and is buried: and we exhort, that among you their ashes be not stirred up, whose weapons are burnt: For who will not abhor the proud and wicked attempts of them who say, A man may be without sin by his proper will, and not by the grace of God? And indeed, the first foolish saying of blasphemy, is to say, A man is without sin: Which cannot be, except the only Mediatour of God and Man Christ Jesus, who was conceived and born without sin. For other men, being born with Original sin, are known to bear the testimony of Adam's transgression (even they who are without Actual sin) according to the Prophet, saying, Behold I was conceived in iniquity, and in sin hath my mother borne me. What may be collected out of this Epistle, I leave unto all Judicious Readers: only I would, that this were remarked, that in the inscription, they observe the stile and phrase of the Roman Court, directing their Letters unto the Scotch Bishops, &c.

whereas, neither at that time, nor many ages thereafter, was any Bishop in Scotland; but only Abbots who were Doctours, and Presbyters in several congregations.

Reliques.

9. JOHN IV. bestows all the Treasure (that Isaacius and Severine had left) on the redeeming of some captives of his Nation Dalmatia and Istria, from the Lombards. He transports the bodies of Vincentius and Anastasius Martyres, from Dalmatia to Rome; from the hands of enemies to the superstition of a more eminent place. In his time Lotharis, King of the Lombards (a good Justitiary, and Arrian) did permit in every City of his Kingdom, two Bishops, one Catholick (as they spoke then, or orthodox) and another Arrian. John sate 1. year 9. months.

availeth not.*

10. THEODORUS I. the son of Theodorus Bishop of Jerusalem, strove against Paul, Bishop of Constantinople, because he was a Monothelite, and sought his deprivation, but in vain; for he dealt by authority, and not by Scriptures or reason; and Paul despiseth his authority. Lotharis said, he was puffed up with ambition, and not inspired by a good spirit; and therefore he contemned him also, saying, He fostereth many errours, and reproveth one only. He dissuadeth the Emperour Constans, from the error of the Monothelites; therefore the Emperour sought his life. Thereafter all his care was, to adorn and adore the bodies of the departed Saints, and their Reliques: he died an. 647.

New Rites.

11. MARTIN I. augmenteth the number of holy daies; he commandeth the Priests to shave their hair continually; and that each Bishop should consecrate the chrism or holy ode yearly, and send it through all the Parishes of his Diocly; and that all the Clergy should, at their admission, vow single life. He sent unto Paul, Bishop of Constantinople, exhorting him to forsake his error; but Paul was so far from regarding his Ambassage, that he abused his Messengers, and sent them into sundry Islands. Wherefore the Pope assembled a Synod at Rome, of 150. Bishops, and reneweth the damnation of Syrus, Bishop of Alexandria; of Sergius and Pirhus, Bishops of Constantinople, and he accurseth Paul. Platina makes no mention that he did Excommunicate the Emperour. Certain it is, that the Emperour commandeth his Eparch Olympius, either to kill Martin, or (if he could) send him to Constantinople; because he had conspired against the Emperour, as appears in his own Epistle, written to Theodorus the former Eparch. Olympius sent a servant to kill him, in St. Maries Church. Platina saith, the servant was miraculously stricken with blindness. The Emperour restored Theodorus, and gave him the same Commission: he was received by the Romans very graciously, because he had foughten against the Lombards. Then professing to visit the Pope, at the first meeting causeth him to be bound, and sent him to Chersonesus, and died in great necessity. After he had sate 7. years, his See was vacant 14. moneths; because they had not had intelligence of his death.

censured.*

12. EUGENIUS I. receiveth Letters from Peter, Bishop of Constantinople, coming nearer the truth, than his Predecessour Paul: yet because he did not express the two natures and wills in Christ, the Clergy of Rome, did inhibit [Nota] the Pope to say Mass, until he abjured those Letters of Peter.

Prison-houses.*

Platin. He commanded, that Bishops should have Prisons for malefactors; and so they began to meddle with civil punishment. Catal. test. ver. lib. 7. He ordained, that Monks should not come out of their Cloisters, without express licence from their Superiour. He sate 2. years and 9. months.

13. VITALIAN ordained a new order in the Church, especially of singing; and for the better harmony, he brought in the Organs. Platin. Musical instruments. That new order of singing, must be understood of some new sort of musick; for Psalms were sung in the Church before: and Bellarmin de bon. oper. lib. 1. cap. 7. saith, Organs were not heard in the Church, before the year 820. and Thomas Aquin. 2. 2. qu. 91. ar. 2. saith, in the Old-Testament was use of musical instruments; because people were rude and carnal; and therefore had need to be stirred up by these instruments, as they were by earthly promises; as also they did prefigure something. And in object 4. of the same article, he saith, The Church suffers not musical instruments, as Cythars and Psalteries in the praising of God, lest they seem to Judaize. Whence it appears (as Card. Cajetan. hath observed in that place) that Organs were not in the Church in the daies of Thomas Aquin. In the year 666. he ordained, that all service in the Churches, every where, should be done in the Latine language; and so the number of the Beast, agreeth to his time and language, that he commandeth. But hence it appears, that at that time, the Nations had used their vulgar languages in the Churches; and this Pope began to restrain them. Pope Martine had ordained that Priests should not marry; and now Vitalian reproves Priests for their marriage; as appears by his Epistle to the Bishop of Creta, wherein he findeth fault, that the Bishops of that Island had wives. He commanded shaving and anointing; and under these signs, he gave liberty of buying and selling. Catal. test. ver. lib. 7. Three things, at that time, were called wonders, Monasteries with fair buildings, Kings become Monks, and whoredom of Priests was thought no fault. He sate 14. years.

14. ADEODAT followed him. Now a wondrous Comet was seen the space of three months; and also were extraordinary thunderings and inundations. Wherefore the Pope made frequent prayers, that God would avert the evils, which those prodigies seemed to pretend: but repentance, and abolishing of idolatry, was not conjoined with their prayers: so follows great dearth of corn; and the Sarazens entred into Sicily. He sate 2. years.

15. DONUS or Domnio sate 5. years. Theodore Bishop of Ravenna, submits his See unto him. To maintain the invocation of Saints, the Papists say, that at that time the soul of Dagobert, King of France, was delivered out of the hands of the Devil, by Dionisius and Maurice Martyres, and Martine the Confessor, whom Dagobert had worshipped.

16. AGATHO obtained from the Emperour Constantine, a discharge of the mony, which the Pope was wont to give unto the Emperour, for his confirmation; yet so, that when the Election should be made; he who is chosen, should not be ordained, until a general Decree be made, according to the old custom. Gratian. dist. 63. ca. Agatho. Platina saith, the sixth general Council, was called by Agatho: but the Books of Councils shew expressly, that it was called by the Emperour, in the daies of Pope Donus; and the Divalis sacra, was directed unto Donus, requiring him to send worthy and learned men unto the Council, which the Emperour had proclaimed. Donus died, and the Divalis was delivered unto Agatho; who in his Epistle to the Emperour (as it is Registered in the 4. Session of the same Council) acknowledged, that at his direction, and for obedience which he oweth unto him; he had called a Synod of 125. Bishops (whose names and subscriptions, are extant with the Acts of that Synod) at Rome, for due preparation unto the Council; and in that Epistle, he calleth himself often the Emperours servant; John Bishop of Portua, and John a Deacon of Rome, were sent unto the Council; they said the first Latine Mass, in the Church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, the Emperour being present. This one practice made the greater ter way unto the fore-named Decree of Pope Vitalian, in all other places. In the Synod at Rome he made the Canon, in Gratian. di. 19. All the Decrees of the Apostolick See, are to be embraced, as established by the divine voice of St. Peter. When Theodore Bishop of Ravenna died, the Clergy could not agree in the Election. Theodoricus, one of the Competitours, hastneth to Rome, and was confirmed by Pope Agatho: the people of Ravenna took it impatiently, that their Church, which was wont to contend with Rome in dignity; was now by the foolishness or madness of Theodoricus, become subject to Rome; and they took part with Felix, that he should be their Bishop, and maintain the libertie of their Church. The Emperour Justinian, gives order to Theodore the Eparch, to go with 8. ships to Ravenna; and cause Felix to give satisfaction to the Bishop of Rome; and if he refused, that he should send Felix, with the head-men of the City, unto Constantinople: Theodore doth so; and Felix had both his eys burnt out with hot bras; the Citizens were killed or banished: Sabellic. Ennead. 8. lib. 7. and upon this occasion, Pope Leo the II. obtained from the Emperour, that the Arch-Bishop of Ravenna, in all times coming, should receive investiture from Rome. Hence we see, that all Italy was not subject unto the See of Rome; seeing Ravenna had contended with Rome for dignity. Agatho sate 3. years.

The humble Letter of the Pope unto the Emperour.

17. LEO II. is called a learned Pope. He ordained, that no Arch-Bishop should pay any thing to the Church of Rome, for Investiture or Palle; because such a custome would breed many inconveniences. Platin. This Decree held not, and by length of time, the price of the Palle waxed so great; that Albert, Bishop of Ments, payed for it 30000. crowns, Sleidan. comment. ad an. 1523. Leo accurseth, at Rome, all them whom the sixth Council had condemned; as his Epistle written to the Emperour shews, out of which I have marked these passages: Unto the King of Kings we give thanks, who hath bestowed an earthly kingdom upon you; so that you should covet heavenly things: for it is better that you trust in God with a settled mind, then that you reign with honour given you from above: that is profitable to you; this to your subjects; for, by the mercy of God, you obtain the triumphal glory of your fathers Crown by birth: your godliness is the fruit of mercie; but your power is the conserver of discipline: by the one thereof, your Princelie mind is joined with God; by the other, discipline is done unto your Subjects: the riches of the one, relieve the poor; the happiness of the other, amendeth them who stray from the right way. It is no less care of them who are in authoritie, to amend the froward, than to triumph over an enemy.---The Legates of this Apostolical See, your mother, the Roman Church, the servants of your Holiness; together with the persons who went with them; who by our Predecessour, of Apostolical memory, Agatho, at the 8. indiction; for the cause of faith (your Godliness commanding) were hither directed: the tenth indiction, being now past, in the month of Julie; together with your Godliness Letters and Acts of the Council, did we receive with great joy in the Lord; and as it were we entred out of the gulf of grief, into the haven of longed-for calmness; and recovering strength, we began with great thanksgiving to cry out, Lord, save our most Christian King, and hear him. . . . Therefore, as we have received every one of the general Councils, of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, Chalcedon and Constantinople; all which the Church of Christ doth approve: So the sixth general Council, which was now celebrated in this Princely City, by means of your clemency; we as their footgrooms [Nota] do with the like reverence receive, and we discern the same Council to be numbred justly with them; as being gathered by the same, or alike grace of God : therefore we do anathematize and accurse all heresies, and all Authors or favourers of them, Theodore Bishop of Harranitan, Cyrus of Alexandria, Sergius, Pirthus, Peter and Paul, rather successours than Bishops of Constantinople; and Honorius, who did not adorn the Apostolical See, with doctrine of Apostolical tradition; but by his wicked traitory did endeavour to subvert the unspotted faith-----In the end, let your Princely magnanimity think worthy of your wonted acceptation and clemency, Constantine a sub-Deacon, the humble Bearer of these Presents; and give your godly ears unto his informations; that in the servant, you would worthily acknowledge the sender. Let the Reader consider, how different the stile of this Letter is, from the presumptuous Bulls of Popes afterwards, and see a Pope condemned of heresie. Leo sate 10. months, but his glory was so great (saith Platina) that it seemed, as if he had lived longer. The seat was vacant 11. months and 21. daies.

18. BENELECT II. was thought so singular in learning and godliness, that he was chosen with consent of all; and the Emperour thought so well of his Election, that then it was first ordained by him, whom the Clergie, People and Souldiers of Rome, should chuse unto the Papacie; he incontinently should be received, without sending unto Constantinople, but only unto the Eparch of Ravenna. We will see the practice in Conon and Sergius. Baronius speaks of the custom formerly, how the confirmation was sought from the Kings or the Goths; and after them from the Emperour; and lastly from the Eparch. But when the Popes began to despise the Emperour, they did not respect the Eparch. Pol. Virgil. de inven. rer. lib. 4. cap. 10. saith, The power of creating the Roman High-Priest, untill the Reign of the Emperour Constantine, without doubt, did appertain unto the Colledge of Roman Priests: then by degrees the Election of that Colledge, with the suffrages of the people, was firm; which the Emperour had approved: and this continued till the year 685.---this custom indured not long---the Successours of Charls the Great, were accustomed to confirm the Election: at last 1039. Pope Nicolas the II. did restrain the Election unto the Cardinals. Boniface was more carefull of outward, than spiritual Churches, as Platina shews. He sate scarce 11. months.

A little change in the election of a Pope.

19. JOHN V. was elected that year, wherein the Emperour Constantine died: he writ of the dignity of the Palle, and continued not one year. Then the Romans would have advanced Peter an Arch-Bishop, and the Souldiers were inclined to Theodore a Priest. But after long contention Contentions who shall be Pope.

20. CONON was preferred, he was beloved of many for natural and civil gifts of body and mind; but so soon as he was confirmed, he was taken with sickness: then Paschalis an Arch-Deacon, and Master of the Popes Treasure; gave great sums of money, to John the Eparch, to cause him to be elected. Conon died in the 11. month. Then some cry for the fore-named Theodore, and some strove for Paschalis; the matter was like to come to blows; till by the advice of some, both of people and souldiers, the tumult was pacified a third.

21. SERGIUS I. was chosen, and carried upon mens shoulders to the Lateran Church: thus by occasion of the pride of the Competitours, the pride of the beast is advanced another step; for his Successours will not let this shew go down. The Competitours salute and kiss him fore against their wills; for the multitude did compell them. Platin. Nevertheless Paschalis sent privily for the Eparch to come and aid him: the matter is disclosed unto the Pope, and Paschalis is accused of Magick, convicted, deposed, and shut into a Monastery, where he abode 5. years, still denying that whereof he was accused; and the Eparch would not admit Sergius, till he had paid five pounds of gold, that Paschalis had promised, though Sergius said he had not promised it: Bellarmin. ad an. 687. Bellarmin de Ro. Pont. lib. 3. saith, in the year 669. the Bishop of Rome began to have the Temporal sword, that is, temporal government; for Aripert King of the Lombards, gave unto the Bishop of Rome Alpes Coëtiæ by Genua; and an. 714. Luithprand did confirm the same gift, as is written by Ado. Vien. and Blondus dec. 1. cap. 10. whereupon Theod. Bibliander marketh (saith Bellarmin.) that the first Papal Province, was in the year 714. if that were true, which they talk, of that forged Donation, of the Emperour Constantine, where was it all this time? upon that passage of Bellarmine, Andrew Melvin, Master of the University of St. Andrews, about the year 1605. writes thus, If from the number 699. (wherein the Temporal Sword was first given to the Pope) you will take off the number of years, from Christ's birth, till his death; there remains the number of the Beast. In the time of Sergius, Pipin Duke of Austria, came to have place in the Court of France. Sergius sate 13. years, and 8. months, and died an. 701.

CHAP. III.

Of Divers Countries.

The Christian Church is divided into ten parts.

1. THE Heresies of former ages, and now the arrogant presumption of Prelates, causeth the Church of Christ to be divided into ten parts, differing all one from another; either in articles of faith, or discipline and rites (whereof they have been too zealous) each part, calling themselves the only true Church of Christ; most pitifull! These parts are, 1. The Latines or Western Churches, which hath been under the Bishop of Rome. 2. The Greeks, and with them, the Iberi, Slavoni, Russi, Muscovites, and others scattered through Europe; together with the Patriarchal Seas of Antioch and Jerusalem in Asia; and the Patriarchal See of Alexandria in Ægypt; all which were brought once under the Bishop of Constantinople. My aim hath been principally, to know the alterations of these two parts, at what time, and where the schism began, and how it did wax; and so have I followed, as the matter, and light of stories, gives occasion. It is remarkable, that Pope Gregory the I. in lib. 7. Ep. 53. writes, that all the four Patriarchs in the East, did hold the same faith and doctrine with the Synod at Chalcedon, and other General Councils before it; nor did they ordain any Bishop, who did not follow and maintain the same. 3. The Ethiopians or Abyssines, under Prester-John, in Affrick; they use to bathe or baptize themselves every year in rivers; not that they think it necessary to salvation; but they do it on the day of the Epiphany, in remembrance of Christ's baptism: for this, the Romanists call them Anabaptists. But we will, in Century XIII. hear Germanus, Patriarch of Constantinople, calling them Orthodox: they are circumcized by an old custom, rather than of religion: for Herodotus, in Euterpe, testifieth, that the Ethiopians and Ægyptians, in his time and before, were circumcized. 4. The Jacobites are so named, from Jacob Zanzala a Syrian, and Eutithian Heretick, who lived an. 613. and more shortly, they are called Copites (as Io. Scaliger. de emend. temp. lib. 5. writes) from a City in Ægypt, where Dioclesian slue 144000. Martyres, because they would not sacrifice to Idols: this sort are dispersed in Ægypt, Arabia and Chaldea: they are also circumcized. The Authour of the book, called the Catholick Traditions, first in French, and then translated into English) searches the differences rences of all Churches; and except ceremonies or rites, hath not marked great difference of the Abyssines and Jacobites, from our Reformed Churches; and in his Preface, he saith, they pretend to have their name Jacobites, from Jacob the old Patriarch; and the name Cophes or Cut, because they are circumcized: and in Qu. 5. he saith, they call themselves Christians of the first conversion. 5. The Nestorians, are said to have abjured the heresie of Nestorians; yet keep still the name for hatred and distinction of the Euthians: they dwell dispersed thorow Persia, India and Tartary; they use the Chaldean language in their Liturgy, and their Prelate resideth in Mosal or Seleucia. 6. Maronites dwell in Lybia and Phoenicia; they use the Arabian tongue; they are permitted to use Bells, after the manner of the Western Church; which is not granted to others in the East. They are said to have been free from all enemies till this day; not so much by strength, or number of souldiers, as by situation of the mountains. 7. The Armenians use only their own language, but are infected with fond heresies; they hold that Christ did not assume an human body of the Virgin Mary; but had an incorruptible body from the moment of his conception; and this body (say they) should be worshipped in the own nature of it; and therefore they are called Φρασελατοι, or worshippers of a corruptible thing; and because they worship the Cross of Christ, they are called Cross-worshippers. For these causes they are contemned by the Greeks; but Pope Lucius the II. accepted them; because, at that time, they did acknowledge the Pope, as head of the Church: nevertheless, the Romans hate them as Hereticks; but deal discreetly with them (as they say) to draw them unto their obedience: they call their Arch-Bishop, the Catholick Bishop. 8. The Georgians, are so called from St. George, whose badge they carry: they dwell in Media, Persia, and about the Caspian sea; they agree with the Greeks, both in language, rites and doctrine. 9. Suriani, are so named from Sur, a City of Assyria, and also are called Samaritani: they have the same language which the Sarazens had, and religion with the Greeks, for the most part; and they have leavened bread in the Sacrament. 10. Mazarabes, who dwelt first in Arabia, and thence they went in Colonies into Affrick, and then into Spain; but none of them remain till this day; because they would not contract with any of another Religion: in their Service, they were brought to use the Latine language, and to acknowledge the primacy of the Pope; but they would not change in sundry other articles. These are the remnants of the most ancient and famous Churches; the most part of which, agree in many more things of great importance, than those wherein they dissent: so that amongst the blind Pagans, and blasphemous Mahometists, the name of God is invocated, by some Christians, with more piety (it may be supposed) than among others where there is greater libertie and clearness of doctrine. Wheresoever the Word of God is preached, we must think, some are effectually called; for the rain coming from heaven, returns not again, but watereth the earth, and makes it to bud; so is the word of the Lord, 1/a. 55. And Jesus Christ is the Universal Shepherd of them all. The Authour of the fore-named Catholick Tradition, in the Annotation on the 5. question, saith, There are two or three hundred years past; since that, it hath been very hard, to judge by the multitude, whether the name of the Catholick Church, appertained to the Greeks or Latines. But now the Greek Church is diminished, by oppression of the Turks; as the Latine is increased, by the Conquests of the Spaniards, far otherwise then it was heretofore. So that if the multitude, gave the name of Catholick, the Grecians should have had it; and the certain time, when they lost this Title, is not to be known. Notwithstanding all this, these two Churches, and that of the Ja-

cobites, do profess themselves to be Catholicks; the passages or proofs before alledged, do shew, that every one of them is extended very wide. Under the name of Jacobites, we comprehend, the Cophites and Abyssines; and we may add the Nestorians: for Masius telleth us, that these people are rather differing in name, than in religion, whose testimony is reported to be very true. In Jerusalem they have divers Churches and Oratories, the one neer the other; and the reason is, to the end every nation may use the language which he best understandeth. . . . The same Masius, dischargeth the Nestorians of the crime of that heresie, which was imputed unto them: I am assured (saith he) they are free from that wicked doctrine of that infamous heretick Nestor; for having a great volumn of their solemn prayers, which they make to God, I have found nothing, that might offend any man of sound opinion in our religion; if it be not this, that I suspect them; because they, in many places, call not the Virgin Marie mother of God; but instead of this Title, they call her the mother of life and of light. And saith the fore-named Author, here is to be noted, that Villamont had some notice, that Prestern John had sent to the Pope, that he was willing to submit himself unto the Church of Rome: and Cotton, the Jesuit, affirms, that the Patriarch of the Cophites, had done the like. But we have now fresher news, and know that there is no such matter. So far out of the Catholick Tradition. Then of all these parts, we may think, that (except certain persons at several times) they all retain, or the most part, their ancient doctrines and traditions; as well in matters of faith, as in rites and discipline; except only the Western Church, which hath suffered no small change, sometimes to worse, and sometimes to better; not in general at once, but now one nation, and then another hath suffered their Eclipses, and have shewed again their bright beams. And the first declination began in Italy, by occasion of Wars, and partly in default of their Clergie. For when the many strangers made incursions upon Italie, in the two Centuries immediately preceding; they indeavoured, by all means, to abolish all other languages, except their own: and therefore, where they prevailed, they burned Studies, and all Books that they could find. Io. Bodin. Method. cap. 7. And then the Bishops of Rome, fishing in troubled waters, after that the Emperour, who did with-hold, was taken out of the way, they begun to exalt themselves above all. The religion and pietie of former Bishops, did move the Emperour to be bountifull unto them; and for peace in the Church, to limit their jurisdiction: But the following Bishops, looking unto wealth, more than devotion; and to dominion, more than peace; they begun to think a Bishoprick, to be nothing else but gain, revenues and dominion; as saith Po. Vergil. de inven. rer. lib. 6. cap. 14. neer the end, in the former ages, the subtil wits of the Greeks made heresies, and heresies begot schisms: but the Romans turn all religion into gain, and in all the articles of difference betwixt the Greeks and the Latines, the opinion of the Latines, serveth unto the gain and ambition of the Clergie, either directlie or indirectlie: now desire of money being alone (far more being conjoined with ambition) is the root of all ill; so that no wonder it is, if hunting after it, they have erred from the faith.

Gregory fore-saw the first defection.

2. Pope Gregory the I. saw this defection coming, when he said, all things that were fore-told, are now in doing: the King of pride is at hand; and which I fear to speak, the armie of the end. [Some read, exercitus; and some extitus] of Priests is at hand; for they do war under pride, who should be ring-leaders of humilitie, lib. 4. Ep. 38. And on Iob lib. 33. cap. 36. now ere Antichrist come by himself, some do preach him by their words, and manie by their manners. Are they not the Preachers of his hypocrisie, who when they have have obtained the holy Orders of God, do with their hearts or desires lay hold on this fading World? Who pretend that it is all vertue that they do, and yet it is all vice that they practice? And in Homil. on Luk. 10. he lamenteth, Behold the World is full of Priests, but few workmen in the Lords harvest: we accept the Office, but discharge not the work of the Office. I think, Brethren, that there is no greater wrack, then what God suffereth from Priests, when he seeth them examples of wickedness, whom he hath appointed for amending others: and which is more grievous, if they see one humble or continent, they deride him: What can befall the Flock, when the Shepherds become Wolves? they fear not to undertake the charge of the flock, who spare not to make prey of them; and they turn Ministry into the increase of ambition: we forsake the things that appertain unto God, and are intangled with the things of the earth: so it is fulfilled, like Priest, like people. There he speaks largely of this purpose, and this is remarkable that he saith, When Peter shall come [before Christ] with the converted Jews, whom he drew after him, and Paul leading (I may say) the converted World, And drew leading Achaia; and all the Shepherds, with their Flocks, shall come before the eternal Shepherd: what shall we wretched men say, who had the name of Shepherds, and have no sheep, who have received nourishment from us? Nevertheless, the Lord will feed his sheep by himself, whom he hath appointed unto life. Whereunto shall I liken bad Priests, but to the water of Baptism, which washing away the sins of the baptized, sendeth them into Heaven, and it is cast into a Sink. And lib. 4. Ep. 32. he saith of them, While we forsake things that become us, and mind things that become us not; we make our sins like unto the power of the barbarous enemies; and our fault which lieth heavy upon the Common-wealth, doth sharpen the swords of our enemies: what can we say who are unworthily set over the people of God, and press them down with the burthen of our sins? who destroy by our examples, what we preach with our tongues; who by our works teach wickedness, and by our voice only pretend equity; the Teachers of humility, and Captains of pride; with the face of a sheep, we do cover wolfish teeth. But what shall be the end of these things, but that we do counsel men, and are made known unto God? And lib. 8. Ep. 36. They who come after us, will see worse times; so that in comparison of their times, they will judge that we have had happy daies. Yea Gregory, not only foresaw this defection, but he was not the least agent in multiplying new Rites: he did frame a new order of Divine Service, or (as they call it) a new Mass; where it is clear, that the former manner did not please him. And li. 7. indist. 2. Ep. 63. he shews, that some of his friends, both Greeks and Latines, did grumble against it: and in the end of that Epistle it is remarkable, that he saith, Nevertheless if that [of Constantinople] or any other Church, hath any good, I am ready to follow in goodness, even my inferiours, to whom I forbid unlawfull things; for he is a fool who thinks himself chief, and that he will not learn the good things that he seeth. And when Augustine, whom he sent into Britain, did ask him, seeing the faith is one, why are the customes of the Churches diverse? And why is one sort of Mass in Rome, and another in France? Gregory answers, Thy Brother-hood knows the custom of the Roman Church, in which you have been nourished; but it pleaseth me, that whether in the Church of Rome or of France, or in any other, thou hast seen any thing that may more please the Almighty God, that thou diligently follow it: and in that Church of the English, which in respect of the Faith, is new, they ordain the best things that thou hast seen in many Churches; for things are not to be loved for the places, but the places must be loved for the good things: therefore chuse thou out of every Church, what things are godly, pious and right; and these being gathered into a bundle, put thou into the minds of the English for customes. Interrog. August. resp. 3. Whence it is clear, that although Gregory was the Authour of the Mass, yet he did not bind all men to follow it, nor any other Ceremonies. In his answer to Augustin's sixth question, he saith, The holy Law forbids to uncover the filthiness of kindred: therefore it is necessary now, that the third and fourth degree may lawfully marry; but should altogether abstain from the second. Here he wresteth Scripture, and restraineth the degrees which God permits. Then Augustine asketh, in his 7. question, Whether those who are so unlawfully married, shall be commanded to divorce, and shall be denied of the Communion? Gregory answereth, Because many in that nation, while they were infidels, were mixed in that unlawfull marriage, when they come into the faith, they are to be admonished to abstain, and let them know that it is an heinous sin: let them tremble at the fearfull judgement of God, lest for their carnal pleasure, they suffer everlasting torments; and yet they are not to be deprived of the Communion of the Holy Body and Blood of the Lord; lest we seem to revenge on them, the things whereunto they had bound themselves in their ignorance, before the Laurel of Baptism: for at this time, the holy Church correcteth some things in zeal; suffereth some things in meekness; dissembleth some things in prudence, that oft by tolerance and connivance, she may amend the ill which she hateth. But all they who imbrace the faith, are to be admonished that they do not such a thing; and if they shall then do it, they are to be deprived of the Communion of the body and blood of the Lord. Here is a good advice in this, but still he aimeth at his own conceit. He deviseth a superstitious manner of consecrating Churches, which the posteritie have changed: he did foster the fond conceits of men, by too credulous believing the false miracles of his time, saith, M. Canus in Theol. lib. 11. cap. 6. He praied for delivering the soul of Trajan out of Hell; Pope Siricius (who lived an. 387.) was the first who contradicted marriage of Priests and Deacons, Gratian. dist. 82. and forbad their societie with their wives whom they had married. And Pope Pelagius did ordain, that Deacons who had wives, should either put them away, or leave their Benefice, Ibid. but then Pope Gregory judgeth it contrarie unto the Gospel, to put away a wife, unless it be for fornication; and he ordained that no sub-Deacon should be admitted, unless he promise chastitie; and he thought by this means, to bring single life upon the Clergie; seeing they must be Deacons, ere they be Priests. Pol. Verg. de invent. rer. lib. 5. cap. 4. Nevertheless afterwards when he finds, that Priests lived not continentlie, and thereby many children were murdered, as he saw 6000. heads of children taken out of a pond, (see hereafter in the 9. Centurie, in the Epistle of Huldricus, Bishop of Augusta) he annulleth his own Act, and saith, It is better to marry, then to burn and murder: he was credulous of Purgatorie, of which it follows. For these, and other conceits, Gregory is called worse then any of his Predecessours; but for his soundness in other articles, and for his virtues worthy of praise, he is commended above all his Successours; for he taught far otherwise, then the Church of Rome doth now. In lib. 4. Ep. 40. he perswadeth Leander, a Physician, to diligent reading of the Scriptures; and that upon such reasons that concern all men, saying, The Scripture, is an Epistle sent from God to his creatures: if thou receivest a Letter from an earthly King, thou wilt not rest nor sleep till thou understandest it: but the King of Heaven, and God of Men and Angels, hath sent his Letters unto thee for the good of thy soul, and yet thou neglectest the reading of them: I pray thee therefore, study them, and meditate daily on the words of thy Creatour. And in the preface on Job, unto Bishop Leander, cap. 4. In the Scripture is milk for babes, and meat for the stronger. There is a river plain and deep, wherein lambs may wade, and Elephants may swim. He hath the same again in Ezek. lib. 1. hom. 9. in the end of this, he saith, whatsoever serves for edification and instruction, is contained in the holy Scriptures. In Iob lib. 19. cap. 17. The books of Maccabees are not Canonical Scripture; and he permits an excuse of citing a testimony out of them; to wit, he doth not inordinately herein, because they are written for edification, albeit they be not Canonical. Again lib. 5. cap. 7. he saith, Our righteousness is found to be unrighteous, when it is narrowly examined; and it stinketh in the censure of the Judge, which glistereth in the esteem of the worker. And lib. 18. cap. 25. some rejoice in their own power, and they do glory, that they are redeemed by their preceding merits; whose assertion, certainly, is contrary to it self: for while they say, They are innocent and redeemed, they make void ipso facto the name of redemption: for every one who is redeemed, certainly is delivered from bondage. Whence then is the man redeemed, if he was not captive under guilt? it is clear therefore, that he is very unwise who thinks so. Then he bringeth the example of the Thief on the Cross, who being a sinner, was changed by inward grace upon the Cross. Here by the way observe, Gregory useth the word meritum; but in another sense then the Papists do now: for in the same place he saith, Divine Grace finds not mans merit, that he may [or should] come; but when he hath come, he makes it; and God coming into an unworthy soul, maketh it worthy by coming, and he maketh in it merit, that he may reward, who did find only what he might have punished. He makes it clear, in cap. 26. They who hold that a man is saved by his own power, do guess that the confession of man, is by virtue of the man self; which if it were so, the Psalmist would not say to the praise of God, Confessio & magnificentia est opus ejus: wereceive therefore from him to confess, from whom it is given unto us to do great things, &c. There, thorow three chapters, Gregory speaks against mans merit or deserving; and he teacheth, that it is only by the grace of God, that man is able to do any good: and when he useth the word meritum, in a good sense, he understandeth simply good works, without the ad-signification of deserving. He useth also the word meruit improperly, as in the same book cap. 33. Abraham did never profess himself to be but dust and ashes, untill habere Dei meruit collocutionem, where that word cannot signifie to deserve, but to attain: as also Bernard in Cant. ser. 2. saith, Herod would have seen Christ, but because not of a good mind, non meruit, that is, he obtained not. Again on Pf. 7. peniten. Gregory saith, at the word, audiam fac: although God bestoweth Heaven according to works, yet he giveth it not for works. If the blessedness of the righteous be of mercy, what is that, He will render to every one according to his works? And if it be rendred according to works, how is it called mercy? It is one thing, according to works; and another, for works: where it is said, according to works, the qualification of works is meant; that whose good works are seen, shall have the reward of glory; for no labour or works can be compared unto that blessed life, where we shall live with God, and in God. It is sure then, that to whom it is mercifully given to do well in this life; unto those it is more mercifully given, that they shall be rewarded a hundred-fold in everlasting blessedness. This is the grace, that (as the Apostle saith) shall be given for grace unto the Saints of God; to whom is given, from God, the grace of holiness in this life; to them shall be given the grace of eternal felicity in the life to come. On Iob lib. 9. cap. 1.

narrowly examined by the inward Judge, will truly say, I cannot answer for one of a thousand; by a thousand is oft meant universality. In lib. 20. cap. 4. he saith fitly, if I would have gone unto them: for (as it is written Eph. 1.) he worketh all things according to the counsell of his will, not according to our merit; but because he so willet, the Lord enlighteneth us with his visitation: And so when he willet, he cometh: and when he cometh, he sitteth first; both because his coming into our heart is of his favour; and the appetite of desiring him in our thoughts, is not equal to our other desires. It followeth, When I fate---The Lord sitteth as King in the heart, because he governs the buzzing motions of the heart. Lib. 23. cap. 18. An afflicted heart in all that it desireth, and yet feeleth the contrary order of things; would (so far as can be) have an answer from the voice of God, why it is so or so; that it may have the advice of God in every controversie, and then rest knowing his answer: But in fore-seeing that God would give the Holy Scripture, that in it he might answer both the publick and private questions of men, saith, Thou contendest with him, that he hath not answered to all thy words: God speaks once, and will not repeat it; as if he had said, God answereth not to the private voices of every heart; but he gives such a word, by which he satisfieth the questions of all men; for in the words of his Scripture, every one of us find our causes, if we inquire: nor is it needfull, that what each one suffereth particularly, we should ask a particular answer by the voice of God. In Ezek. lib. 1. hom. 9. Behold, the voice of God biddeth the Prophet, when he lieth, to arise; but he could not arise at all, unless the Spirit of the Almighty had entred into him; because by the grace of the Almighty God, we may in-deavour unto good works, but we cannot do them, if he who commandeth doth not help. So when Paul did admonish his Disciples, saying, With fear and trembling work forth your salvation; immediately he sheweth who worketh these good things in them, saying, God worketh in you both the will and the deed. Hence truth himself saith, Without me ye can do nothing: but here it is to be considered, because if our good things be so the gift of God, that something in them be not ours, why seek we eternal reward as for works? But if they be so ours, that they are not the gift of God, why give we thanks for them unto God? But we must know, that our evils are ours only; but our good things are both God's and ours, because he preveineth us by inspiring that we do will; and he following us by helping, lest we will in vain, that we may fullfill what he willet: therefore by preveining grace and good will following, that which is the gift of God, becomes our work: which Paul declareth shortly and well, saying, I have laboured more then they all, and left he might seem to ascribe unto his own vertue what he had done, he addeth, yet not I, but the grace of God with me: for because he was prevented by heavenly gift, he confesseth himself as a stranger from his own work, yet not I: but because preveining grace had made will in him free and good, that by free-will he had followed the same grace unto the work, he addeth, But the grace of God with me: as if he had said, I have laboured in the good work, yet not I, but I also: for in respect that I was prevented by the meer gift of God, not I, but in respect that I followed the gift with my will, I also. These things I have said shortly against Pelagius and Cœlestine. Truth himself saith of the Preachers of Antichrist, They shall give signs and wonders, that the very elect (if it were possible) should be deceived: Why speaks he as doubting, seeing he fore-knows what shall be? It is one of two, because if they be elected, they cannot be deceived; and if they be deceived, they are not the elect. Therefore that doubting of our Lords words designeth temptation, because they who are elected to persist, shall be tempted to fall by the signs signs of the Preachers of Antichrist; for they shake, but fall not. It is said therefore, if it were possible, because they shall tremble; and neverthelesse they are called the elect, because they fall not. Again on Iob lib. 25. cap. 20. in that he saith, He causeth an hypocrite to reign for the sins of the people, Antichrist may be understood the head of hypocrites; for that deceiver feigneth holiness, that he may draw into wickedness; but for the sins of the people he is suffered to reign: albeit many have not seen his principality, yet they serve his principality by their sins: are they not his members, who by a shew of affected sanctity, would seem to be, what they are not? Certainly they come out of his body, who hide their iniquities under the cover of sacred honour. And in an Epistle to Wilmund Bishop of Aversa (which is in Gratian. dist. c. 8. de consuetudin.) he saith; If thou oppose custom, observe what the Lord saith, I am truth and life; he saith not I am custom, but I am truth. And truly to use the words of blessed Cyprian, Whatsoever custom, how old soever, is altogether to be postponed unto truth, and custom contrary unto truth, should be abolished. In lib. 7. Ep. 1. unto Sabinian, then his Resident at Constantinople, amongst many particulars he saith, Shew my most gracious Lords, that if I their servant would have medled with the death of the Lombards, this day that Nation should not have had either King, Dukes or Counts, and it might have been in utter confusion; but because I fear God, I am afraid to meddle with any mans death. Certainlie, his Successours neither have carried themselves as loyal servants of the Emperours, nor have they feared God in this manner, nor have they been so sparing of blood. In humilitie he (first) called himself, The servant of the servants of God; and his Successours retain the same Title, but they will not willinglie hear the name given them by another, Pol. Verg. ac invent. rer. lib. 8. cap. 2. for they will be Lord of Lords. Concerning the Lords Supper, his words are remarkable in Dialog. lib. 4. cap. 58. His bodie is taken, and his flesh is divided for the salvation of the people; his blood is now poured forth not into the hands of unbelievers, but into the mouths of believers: therefore let us consider, what a sacrifice this is for us, which for our absolution [representeth, or] follows continually the Passion of the only begotten Son. Here though he call the bread Christ's bodie and flesh; and the wine the blood; and the Sacrament a sacrifice: yet he shews, 1. That the bread was then divided. 2. The wine was given unto the people. 3. That the Sacrament is a continual representation or imitation of Christ's passion. All which are contrarie to the Doctrine of the Romish Church now, nor can they consist with the opinion of transubstantiation. Upon other occasions we shall yet see more of Gregorie.

3. It was received by many of the ancients in the third Centurie, and others following, that the souls departing must be purged from corruption, lest any unclean thing enter into heaven. Origenes wrote, this purgation must be by fire; and thereupon many have written of a purging or purgation fire; as Belarmin. lib. 1. de Purgator. cap. 6. hath a role of such testimonies. The Fathers did think, that all men must passe that fire; but they who had committed the most sins, or had been most superficial in their repentance on earth, must suffer the more pain. So Gregor. Nissen in Orat. pro mortuis, saith, He who goeth out of the bodie cannot be partaker of the Divinitie, unless the purging fire cleanse away the filth of the soul. And Origen in Psal. 36. All men must come to that fire, even Paul, or --- Belarm. de Purg. lib. 2. cap. 1. Theodoret. on Cor. 3. saith, The day of the Lord shall reveal, i. e. the day of judgement: if any mans work abide. Doctours teach heavenly things; but the hearers do chuse according to their own mind what is to be done: but in the day of the Lords coming, there shall be a sharp and great examination; and them that have lived rightly, that fire shall make them more glorious then gold or silver; but them who have committed iniquitie, it shall burn up like wood and hay: But the Teacher of good things shall not suffer punishment, but shall be judged worthy of salvation; for this he saith, he shall be saved; to wit, the Teacher. And the work shall be burned, that is, they who have made themselves evil work: For if we read the words so, we shall perfectly find the meaning of the words that are written, &c. Ye see, he differeth from the former, concerning the faithfull Teacher: they who thought that all shall suffer, did pray for the souls of all who die in hope of resurrection, so excluding the Reprobates only; as is manifest in some Greek Liturgies, who say, We offer unto thee, O Lord, sacrifice for the Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, Martyrs; and especially for the blessed mother of God, and we remember all the faithfull who are dead. Bellarmin. loc. Amongst others, he quoteth Lactantius Firmian, as a teacher of Purgatory; his unsolid and different opinion, is Institut. lib. 7. cap. 21. thus, All souls abide in one place untill the great day, and then they must all be examined by fire; they who have been perfectly righteous [and who are they? if the words be taken strictly] shall not feel the fire; they who have not been so godly, shall quickly pass through the fire, and be cinged about; and the wicked shall burn for ever. But Basilus (surnamed, the Great) when he was a dying, did expect to be received quicklie among the Angels; and Gregor. Nazianzen (who writ his life) did believe that his soul departing, should be received in the eternal Tabernacles, and with Basil behold the blessed Trinitie. Neither did any of the Fathers, before Augustine, dream of such a place in Hell, where (they say) this purging is before the day of judgement, nor speak they of any place thereof; and so they knew not of such an Inn in Hell, which the Romanists now call the place of Purgatorie: yea the Jesuits, Durans cont. Whitek. fol. 338. and Bellarmin. de purgat. lib. 2. cap. 2. say expresselie, that the Fathers expound that Text, 1 Cor. 3. of a metaphorical fire; and in cap. 6. of that book Bellarmin. saith, neither the Fathers, nor Gregorie himself, know where Purgatorie is; nor Petrus Damianus, who lived 400. years after Gregorie; for Gregorie believed, that the soul of Paschasius was purged in a bath at Puteoli; and Damian thought that the soul of Severinus was purged in a flood; and therefore (saith Bellarmin.) the Fathers, both Greeks and Latines, before the School-men, have erred: and nevertheless Bellarmin. and other Papists, for proof of their Purgatorie, do bring all the testimonies of these Fathers to prove this their opinion: whereas the opinions differ, 1. In regard of the persons, who are to be purged. 2. The place. 3. The durance there. 4. The nature of the fire. 5. (Which is the principal) they hold now, that the pains of Purgatorie may be mitigated and taken away, by the prayers and offerings of the living. Augustine (that renowned Bishop of Hippo) was the first amongst the Ancients who spoke of such a place, and he spake but doubtinglie: for in Enchir. ad Laur. cap. 68. he saith, As well they who build gold, as they who build straw, shall pass through the fire, whereof the Apostle speaketh: and therefore that fire is the tentation of tribulation in this life; but whether there be any such thing after this life, is not incredible, and it may be asked. But in serm. 62. ad fra. in Erem. and ser. 232. de temp. he saith, There be onlie two sorts of places, for two sorts of souls after this life, and this is no third. In lib. 5. hypognost. he saith, The Catholick Faith, by Divine authoritie, believes that the first place is Heaven, wherein the Reprobate [his word is, the not-baptized] is excepted. The second is Hell, where everie Apostate and alliant from the faith of Christ, shall suffer everlasting punishment; We are altogether ignorant of a third place, nor shall we find it in the holie Scriptures, saith he. And de Civit. Dei lib. 21. cap. 25. after the words of Gal. 5. 19, 20, 21. he saith, Certainlie this saying of the Apostle is false, if such men being delivered, after what time soever, shall possess the Kingdom of God; but because it is not false, trulie they shall not possess that Kingdom; and if they shall never enter into the Kingdom of God, they shall be held in everlasting punishment; because there is no middle place, where he is not punished, who is not brought into the Kingdom. Pope Gregorie, Dial. lib. 4. cap. 39. moveth the question, Whether after death there be a Purgatorie fire? He answereth, In the Gospel the Lord saith, Walk while ye have light: and by the Prophet, In an acceptable time have I heard thee: which the Apostle Paul expoundeth, saying, Behold now is the acceptable time, now is the day of salvation: Solomon also saith, Whatsoever thy hand can do, do it instantlie; because there is neither work, nor reason, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave [he hath it, apud inferos] whither thou goest: David also saith, His mercie endureth forever; out of which sayings it is certain, that in what condition everie man departeth, in the same shall he be represented in judgement. But yet for some light faults, a purging fire may be believed to be before judgement: because truth saith, If any speak blasphemie against the holie Spirit, it shall not be forgiven unto him in this life, nor in the life to come. In which saying, it is given to understand, that some faults may be forgiven in this life, and some in the life to come; for what is denied of one, it follows consequentlie, that it is granted of some. But (as I said) it is to be believed of little and very small sins, as all idle words continuallie, &c. Thus unto Augustin's question, Whether it be? Gregorie answereth, It is to be believed: and that he gathereth out of one negative, and contrarie unto the affirmative, that he had confirmed by several sentences of Scripture. And concerning the Text in 1 Cor. 3. he adds there, Although this may be understood of the fire of tribulation in this life; yet if one will take it of the fire of the future purging, it may be diligentlie considered. In the following chapter, he sheweth his motive, to think so: But first consider, that the Doctrine of the Church before him was, that the dead doth not appear; as Chrysostom to 1. de Laz. con. 4. saith, If souls did return to shew men what were done after this life, Satan might verie easilie deceive the World; for as when God sent Prophets, Satan sent false Prophets; when Christ came, Satan sent false Christs; when the Apostles were sent, he sent false Apostles, still mixing tares with wheat: so if God did send the dead back into the World, most easilie might Satan counterfeit that also; not raising dead men, but by deceiving the eyes with false enchantments; or by suborning some men, to feign themselves dead, or to say they have been dead, and so he might confound all things. But the all-knowing God hath prevented this falshood; and he sparing us, suffereth none to come from the dead, to tell the living what things are done there; to the end, we should learn and believe the Scriptures. But now Pope Gregorie saith, he was induced to think that there is a purging fire after death; because the soul of Paschasius (a Deacon of Rome, in the contention betwixt Laurentius and Symmachus) had appeared before Germanus, Bishop of Capua (as he heard it said, when he was young) in a bathe, and did service unto him; and when the Bishop asked him, Why he was there? he answered, For no other cause am I appointed to this place of punishment, but because I was on the side of Laurentius against Symmachus: but I beseech you, pray the Lord for me; and by this you shall know that he hath heard you, if when you return hither, you shall not find me. The Bishop did so, and after a few daies returning, he found not Paschasius in that place. Thus we see what was Pope Gregorie's opinion of Purgatorie, and what were his grounds and motives, Bellarmin. de purg.

The beginning of indulgence.

Prayer for

Purg. lib. 1. cap. 7. promisseth to prove Purgatorie by more apparitions, from testimonies of most grave Authours; but he cannot alledge one before this Gregory; who (as I said before from Mel. Canus) was too credulous. In a word, as Roffensis hath well observed, and ingeniously confesseth, in Respons. contra Luther. art. 18. and Pol. Verg. de invent. rer. lib. 6. cap. 1. repeats it, Little or no mention of purgation is amongst the ancients, and the Greeks, untill this day, believe it not; so long as there was no fear of Purgatorie, none sought indulgences; for upon it depends all esteem of indulgences; take away Purgatorie, and what need is there of indulgence? say they. Nor was it universally believed in the Latine Churches, nor was it reckoned an article of faith, till it was established by the Councel at Florence, an. 1439. where the Greeks did oppose it, till they were hasting to an end; and then they would not strive against the word, but would never believe the thing.

4. About the same time, another question like unto the former, began to decline from worse to worse; to wit, Whether it be lawfull to pray for the dead? We read of the practice and divers opinions of the Ancients, but some of them bring no confirmation of their opinions from Scripture; and their diverse opinions were, according as they thought, diversly of the condition of departed souls; all did consider the souls either in the estate of salvation or damnation. Some Greeks did believe the souls of the Elect, to be without the Court of Heaven in a place of rest, as they call it. So saith Chrysostom on 1 Cor. hom. 39. What saiest thou Paul, shall not the souls live? yea, and shall be immortal; but although they were six hundred times immortal, yet without the flesh, they shall not enjoy these wonderous good things, neither shall they be punished with pain; for if the bodie rise not, the soul shall remain uncrowned, and without the blefs of Heaven. And before him, Irenaus lib. 5. near the end saith, Seeing the Lord went away in the midst of the shadow of death, where the souls of the dead were; and thereafter he arose again bodily, and after his resurrection was taken up; it is manifest that the souls of his Disciples, for whom the Lord did these things, shall go into an invisible place appointed of God for them, and there they shall abide awaiting the Resurrection; and thereafter when they have received their bodies, and are perfectly risen, that is, corporally, they shall come into the presence of God. Unto them may be adjoined Theophylact, though he lived in another age, on Hebr. 11. near the end, he saith, Without us, that is, without our honour and glorie; for lest they might seem to take that which belongeth unto us, he hath appointed one time for crowning all men: neither saith the Apostle, they shall not be crowned, but they shall not be perfected, that is, receive perfection; whereby it appears, that then they are perfected, when they receive their Crowns; and in the mean time, they have a most sure pledge of their honour and glorie. Doth not God wrong them, seeing they have been first in suffering, that they must await us? but such delay is very acceptable unto them, that they may with their brethren receive perfection and glorie: we are all one bodie, and surely it is great pleasure unto the bodie, when it is wholly crowned, &c. The same is the Doctrine of the Greek Churches at this day; as I learned from Antonius, who had famous attestations, calling him Metropolitan of Dirrachium, when he was in Scotland, an. 1626. But many of the ancient Greeks thought otherwise; for Polycarpus, a Disciple of the Apostles, and placed Bishop of Smyrna, by them who saw the Lord, in an Epistle unto the Philippians saith, Paul with the rest of the Apostles being perswaded for certain, that all these ran not in vain; but in faith and righteousness, now resting with the Lord. Euseb. hist. lib. 3. cap. 36. according to the Greek, and 32. in English. Iustin. Martyr lib. Quæst. & resp.

ad orthod. qu. 75. After the departure of the souls out of the bodies, immediately the just, are separated from the unjust, and are carried by Angels, where they enjoy the companie and sight of Angels and Arch-angels, by seeing our Saviour himself, as it is said, We are from or without the bodie, and are present with the Lord. But the souls of the unjust go into Hell. Athanasius lib. de Virginit. near the end. There is no death unto the righteous; but a translation; for they are translated out of this World into everlasting rest, not otherwise than if one were going from his Watch; so the Saints depart from this evil life, unto the good things that are prepared for them, which the eye hath not seen, nor the ear hath heard, nor have entred into the heart of man, which God hath prepared for them that love him: on the other side, Hell waiteth for the sinners. And Cyrillus, Bishop of Alexandria, on Ioh. lib. 12. cap. 36. We should believe, when the souls of Saints depart out of the bodies, they are commended unto God's goodness, as into the hands of a most dear Father; neither do they abide on earth (as some Unbelievers have thought) untill they be honoured with burial; nor are they carried as the souls of sinners, into the place of torment; another way being prepared for them by Christ; but they flie into the hands of the Father: for He also delivered his soul into the hands of the Father; to the end, that beginning at it, and by it, we might have certain hope of this: believing firmly, that after death we shall be in the hands of God, and live a far better life, and for ever with Christ: therefore Paul did wish to be dissolved, and to be with Christ. They of the Latine Churches, were of this faith, as is manifest out of many parts of Cyprian; especially lib. de mortalit. he saith, We should not put on black cloaths for them, who have now received white robes; nor should we give occasions to check us, as if we mourn for them as lost and gone, whom we say, that they are living with God. And near the end he saith, Who being abroad will not hasten to return into his native soil? Who desiring to sail home, doth not earnestlie wish a fair wind, that he may quicklie embrace his dear friends? We call Paradiſe our native Countrey, and have begun to call the Patriarchs our Parents: why then do we not hasten and run, that we may see our native soil, and greet our Parents? A great companie of friends do expect us: how sweet is the great pleasure of the heavenlie Kingdoms, without fear of dying, and with eternitie of living? how great and perpetual is that felicitie? there is the glorious Queer of the Apostles; there is a number of rejoicing Prophets; there is an innumerable multitude of Martyrs, that are crowned after their warring and suffering; there are ----- who having kept the Lord's commandments, have translated their earthly Patrimonies, into the heavenlie Treasures. Beloved brethren, let us with all earnestness hasten, that we may be speedilie with them, and let us wish that we may come soon unto Christ: Bellarm. lib. 1. de Sanctior. beat. cap. 5. declareth the same of the Fathers generally, excepting only some few, who did believe otherwise; as Lactantius did believe, that all souls both of good and reprobate, did remain in one place till the day of resurrection, Instit. lib. 7. cap. 21. Augustine in Ench. ad Laur. cap. 68 & 69. hath that opinion that I have mentioned lately. But in Ioh. tract. 49. he saith, All souls departing this life have not the same mansions; the good have joy, and the wicked have torments. And on Pf. 116. he saith, All the just, all the holy men, behold in the face of God, that which is written unto us. Now to return unto the prayers and oblations for the dead, Augustine in Ser. 32. de verb. Apost. saith, This is the tradition of the Fathers, and observed by the whole Church, that when the defunct are mentioned at the sacrifice; we should pray for them who have departed in the Communion of the Bodie and Blood of Christ; and that it should be told, that it is offered for them. It is without doubt, that these things are available unto the defunct; but such as have lived so before their death, that they may profit them after death: But they who have gone out of their bodies without faith, which worketh by love, such duties of holiness are bestowed on them in vain; seeing while they were here, they received no grace, or received it in vain; and did treasure unto themselves no mercie, but wrath. And Confess. lib. 9. cap. 3. he praith for his mother Monica, and addeth, Lord, I believe that thou hast done what I crave; yet approve the voluntaries of my mouth, for she did crave to be remembered at thy Altar. Bellarmine faith, that the Church was wont to pray, on the Feast daies, for particular Saints; as on the Feast of Leo, they said, We beseech thee, Lord, grant that this oblation may be helpfull unto saint Leo: But (saith he) this sentence is now changed. And Ambrose did pray for the soul of Theodosius, but as they who did so pray, do never bring any warrant from Scripture for it; so neither can they tell whatto make of such prayers. Epiphanius contra Aeri. haer. 75. saith, These prayers and oblations were at first instituted, partly as Thanksgivings unto God, to glorifie him in his servants; partly in commendation of their praises, who sleep in the Lord; partly that others might thereby be moved to the imitation of their godliness; and partly to shew publickly the faith, hope, charitie and love of the living; their faith (saith he) because albeit these were departed, yet the living believe, they are enjoying a blessed life; hope, because they are awaiting the same; their charitie, because they retain a sweet remembrance of the departed; and their esteem, because they judge them who are departed in the fear of the Lord, howbeit in a blessed estate; yet to be inferiour unto Christ, seeing they praied unto him for them. So far he. Augustine in the fore-named Sermon saith, It is not to be doubted that the dead are helped by the prayers of the holy Church, and sacrifices and alms that is given for their souls; that the Lord would deal more mercifully with them, than their sins have deserved. Where Cyprian in 34. Epistle, saith, We offer sacrifices continually for them: Pamelius expounds it not to be otherwise, then in remembrance of them; and he proves this out of the Canon of the Mass presently in use: and out of Augustine in 1ob. tract. 84. where he saith, The Martyrs we remember at the Table, not to as we remember others who rest in peace, to pray for them also; but rather that they would pray for us, that we may cleave unto their steps. This washing excuse doth add more guilt, as followeth. Bellarmin. de Purgat. lib. 1. cap. 18. saith, Their prayers were thanksgivings to God for their glorie; or petitioneth not that their Saints might be augmented in glorie, but that their glorie might be augmented with us; or that their glorie might be more known unto the world; or they were petitions for some accidental glorie of their bodie at the resurrection. And whereas it is commonly said, He doth wrong unto a Martyr, who prayeth for a Martyr: Bellarmine saith, it is to be meant of them only, who pray for remission of their sins, or for essential glorie unto a Martyr, which is not lawfull, saith he. Thus we see, they are contrarie one to another concerning prayers for them who are in blessedness; and albeit Augustine calleth it a tradition of the Fathers, and saith that it was observed by the whole Church; yet none of them can shew that it is a Tradition, or that it was observed by the Church, in the time of the Prophets or Apostles, nor some hundred years after them. As for the souls damned in Hell, Epiphanius loc. cit. saith, We remember sinners, and seek mercie for them, and our praiers are helpfull unto them, although they take not away all the blot. Chrysostom, homil. 22. ad pop. Antioch. saith, Read the Scriptures of our Saviour, and learn, for none can help us when we depart hence into that place; a brother cannot redeem a brother out of those endless torments; nor one friend another; nor the Parents their children; nor the children their Parents. But you will say, where is the proof of that? Behold him who was thrust out from the marriage, and none interceding for him; consider the five Virgins that were excluded, and their neighbours not praying for them, and Christ calling them fools. Ye have heard, how that the rich man had no pitie on Lazarus; and when he was tormented, he craved a drop of water, and how Abraham could not ease his torment: and on 1 Cor. 16. hom. 41. he biddeth rejoyce, that the sins of the wicked, are by their death come to an end, lest their punishment were increased; yet, saith he, strive so far as ye can to help them, not with tears, but with prayers, supplications, alms and oblations. So is he contrarie to himself, and which is especially to be marked; in the first place he gives reasons of his doctrine, and none for his exhortation; save only, that Job offered sacrifice for his children: But we find not, that Job offered for them when they were dead, but while they were alive in their bodies. Likewise Augustine (a little before) said, that duties of pietie are bestowed on such in vain: but in Enchir. cap. 68. he saith, prayers for the damned, if they be no ease unto the dead, yet they are comfortable to the living; but he shews not what manner of comfort. Pope Gregorie the I. prayed for the soul of Trajan, an heathen Emperour: and Bellarmine loc. cit. saith, this was an ungodly praier, unless we will hold, that it was a particular motion of the spirit. So he will neither approve, nor condemn the Pope, but he condemneth the like praier. But Augustine had a by-way of his own, concerning a third sort of souls, that were not reprobates, and yet in pain; he had been a Platonick, and retains so much of the Etilian fields, and thought that praiers for such souls, is a propitiation to God for their relief, as followeth. But after the 600. year, this opinion was received by many; especially by the authoritie of Pope Gregorie the I. that praiers and oblations should be offered for the dead; to the end, their torments in Purgatorie may be eased or ceased. Now if we compare the practice of the Fathers in the preceding 400. years, with the opinion of Gregorie, and of the Roman Church after him, we find that both sorts praied for the dead, but with great difference. The Greeks thought that the elect souls were not in Heaven (yet, or any of them in pain) and therefore they would pray for increase of their blessedness; but the Latines believe they are all in Heaven, and gave thanks for them; and praied for the increase of their glorie, by the resurrection of their bodies, and so forth, as is said (except only Augustine, who thought that some of the elect may be in torment.) And of them Fra. Junius, in his Notes on Bellarm. de Purgat. lib. 1. cap. 10. observeth, That the former ages sought only an increase of good things; but the latter ages do pray for relief or ease of torments: the first opinion (saith he) is tolerable, and the other is contrarie unto veritie, and to the vertue of Christ's death: For as Augustine de verb. dom. ser. 37. saith, In thy two evils, one is a fault, and the other is punishment; the fault is, thou art unjust; and the punishment is, thou art mortal: But he [Christ Jesus] that he might be thy neighbour, took on him thy punishment, but not thy fault; and if he took it, he took it to abolish, and not to commit it; and by taking on him the punishment, and not the fault, he hath abolished both the fault and punishment. And de temp. ser. 66. Now is the time of forgiveness, to them who repent; but the time of vindication, to them who have neglected to confess their sins. But after this age arose another difference; for Pope Innocentius the III. being asked, what his judgment was in this matter? he answered, Some be verie good, they need no prayer of the living; some are verie bad, they cannot be helped; some are mid-way good, to them prayers are profitable for expiration; and some are mid-way bad, to them prayers are profitable for propitiation, Bellarm. de Purg. lib. 2. c. 18.

will not approve this judgement of his ghostly father; he gives assent unto the first three parts of that distinction, and he makes a gloss on the last part, saying, I suspect that Innocentius hath forgot himself; when he thinks that Augustin's division hath four parts, which hath only three; for they who are mid-way good, are the same who are mid-way bad. And in the beginning of that 4. chapter, he saith, It is certain, the prayers of the Church are profitable neither unto the blessed, nor the damned; but onlie unto them who are in Purgatorie. Augustin's division is in Enchir. cap. 110. Prayers avail not unto all who are departed; and why not, but for the difference of life, which everie one hath made in the bodie? Therefore when the sacrifices of the Altar, or of Alms, are offered for all them who were baptized, and are defunct; for the verie good, they are thanksgivings; for the not verie bad, they are propitiations; for the verie bad, although they do not help the dead, yet they are comfortable to the living: but to whom they avail, they avail to this end, either that there may be a full remission; or that their damnation may be the more tolerable; and because we know not what is their estate, we should pray alike for all, that our benefit may be superfluous rather then deficient. To conclude this point, seeing praier for the dead, as it was used in the second age of the Church, is now condemned by the Romish Church; and such prayers as are now used in the Romish Church, are a branch of the opinion of Purgatorie (which the Ancients knew not) their prayers now for the dead are but a noveltie; and (as we may say) a plant of that third age, and unknown unto the Church of Rome in this seventh Centurie: For in the Synod at Toledo, an. 627. (when were assembled 62. Bishops) it was ordained that the dead should be conveyed to the graves, with the voices of men singing Psalms, onlie in hope of the resurrection; they forbid all mourning, and they will have no word of prayers for them; which they would not have omitted in such a place, if they had thought upon any necessity or utilitie thereof. Conc. Toleta. 3. cap. 22. But the Romanists say, These oblations are comfortable to the living. It is true, the Priests and Monks receive no small gain for them; but the other people are handsomlie cheated.

the dead,

5. A third question of this age and nature is, Whether living Christians may lawfullie pray unto the departed Saints? The Council at Trent hath discerned, That they think wickedlie, who denie that Saints should be invocated, Sess. 25. cap. 2. Therefore it ought to be inquired, when, and how this honour was given unto the Saints? Here we may borrow some help from the Jesuits. Salmeron on 1 Tim. 2. disp. 8. answereth, it was not the custom of the Old-Testament, nor was so great honour due unto them. Ibid. disp. 2. Nothing is found of this matter in the Epistles of Paul, or Canonical or Catholick books of others. But possible somewhat hereof is found in the Evangelists or Revelation. No, saith he, Ibid. disp. 7. It is not expressed under the New-Testament in the Scriptures, but by tradition; for in the primitive Church it had been hard to command such a thing unto the Jews; and occasion had been given to the Gentiles, to think, that instead of manie Gods whom they had left, they had received manie other Gods: yet, saith he, without doubt the Apostles delivered this Doctrine unto the Churches. But he telleth not, unto what Churches, whether Jews or Gentils, or if there be a third. Bellarmin. de beat. Sanct. lib. 1. cap. 19. saith, Before the coming of Christ, the Saints entered not into Heaven; neither saw they God, nor ordinarilie could they know the prayers of them, who did invoke them: therefore it was not the custom of the Old-Testament, to say, Holie Abraham, pray for me: but the men of these times praied onlie unto God. I will not quarrell with him, that some of his words seem contrarie. Io. Eckius in Enchir. loco. comm. saith more, The ininvocation of Saints was not commanded in the Gospel, lest the converted Gentiles would believe, that according to their former custom, they should worship the Saints not as Patrons, but as Gods; as the Lycaonians would have sacrificed unto Paul and Barnabas; and if the Apostles and Evangelists, had taught that Saints should be worshipped, it might have been judged their arrogancie, as if they had craved such glorie after their death: Wherefore the holy Spirit would, not by expresse Scriptures, teach the invocation of Saints. We see then by the testimonie of Papists, that praier to the departed Saints, hath no warrant in Scripture, but is grounded on tradition onlie. If this tradition was first revealed by the Apostles, how was the scandal of Jews and Gentiles taken away by the tradition? If it were concealed, induring the more general conversion of the Jews and Gentiles, then it was not in use for a long time in the Church; whereunto the practice of the Reformed Church is agreeable. How began it then? Eusebius hist. lib. 4. cap. 15. hath a large Epistle of the Church of Smirna, concerning the martyrdom of Polycarpus, neer the end they say, The envious and malicious enemie of just men, seeing the glorie of this Martyr so great, procured that his bodie should perish from among us; for there were manie that indeavoured, and fully purposed, to have been partakers of his blessed bodie by burial: many pricked forwards Nicetes, the father of Herod, and his brother Dalces, to move the Proconsul, not to deliver unto the Christians his bodie; lest that (say they) they leaving Christ, fall to worship him: This they said, when the Jews egged and urged them forward, which continuallie watched us, lest we snatched him out of the fire; being ignorant of this, that we cannot forsake Christ, ἡ ὑμεῖς πάντες ὁσμοὶ τῷ ὡζομένην ζωῆς παύσαντα [the Translator omitteth τῷ ὡζομένην, and should have translated thus] who suffered for the salvation of the whole world of them who are saved, that we can worship none other; for we worship Christ as the Son of God; the Martyrs we love as his Disciples, and followers of the Lord, and that worthilie for their invincible good love they bear to their King, ὡς ἡμεῖς ἀλλήλους ἀγαπᾶμεν ὡς ἑαυτοὺς, that is, and we wish, we may be their companions, or communicate with them. Out of this Epistle we see, Christians did worship Christ, and could not worship any other man. Origenes contra Celsum lib. 5. holdeth, that Saints that are in blessedness, do pray for the Church on earth; yet (saith he) we pray not unto them, for God willeth it not; and he refuteth the similitude taken from the example of Kings Courtiers. Cyprian, unto Cornelius Bishop of Rome, saith, If any of us two depart before the other, by the mercies of God, let our love continue, and let not our praier cease with God, and the mercie of the Father, for our brethren and sisters. But in Cyprian, was no praier unto Cornelius when he was dead, nor to any other that was defunct: nevertheless, this opinion of Cyprian, made way unto the invocation of Saints afterwards. Georgius Trapezuntius, the Translatour of Eusebius, once made me believe, that Eusebius, and the Church in his time, did worship the Saints: for in lib. 13. de prepar. Evang. cap. 7. he translateth thus, We honour all those who have lived well, howsoever they died; we do this dailie, honouring the servants of true godlines, as the friends of God; we go also unto their graves, and make praier unto them, as to holie men; by whose intercession we hope to be helped with God: but the original words are, τὰς εὐχὰς πρὸς θεὸν ποιῶμεν, καὶ πρὸς τὰς μακαρίας αὐτῶν ψυχὰς, that is, we pray besides their graves, and honour their blessed souls. Where Eusebius hath nothing for praier to Saints: and in lib. 4. cap. 5. he saith, We are taught to worship religiousie God onlie; and cap. 10. he saith, Worshipping him onlie, adoring him onlie; in these places, Trapezuntius hath omitted the particie onlie. The first Authours of any note, whom the worshippers of Saints can alledge true, were about an. 370. for then some, as Basilus, Nissen and Nazianzen, did pour forth prayers unto the Saints; but with this addition, ἐς πρὸς αἰδομένης, and ἐν δὲ πρὸς ἐμῇ καὶ τῇ ἡμετέρῳ ἐστὶ λόγος, that is, if you have any feeling, and if thou hast any regard of me and mine. And at the same time, sundrie other Fathers did not onlie abstain from, but did impugn this novation. Chrysostom in Pf. 4. saith, At all time thou maiest pray unto God, neither needest Porters to bring thee in, nor Prædictors nor friends; but when thou comest by thy self, then especially doth he hear thee: we do not so well please him, when we request by others, as we may by our selves; for when he awaits our love, he doth all things that may make us trust in him; for when he seeth that we come by our selves, he granteth most, &c. Epiphanius condemneth this errour in the Collyridians and the Antidicomarionites. It were long to recite particular Authours, we have their testimonies being assembled in Councils, at the Council of Laodicea in Syria an. 368. in cap. 35. the worship of Angels and Saints is forbidden, as idolatry and forsaking of Christ: Caranza in translating, hath put angulos for Angels: But Theodoret on the Epistle to Coloss. cap. 30. saith expressly, the Laodiceans, in that Synod, forbid the worshipping of Angels. And the third Council at Carthage cap. 23. saith, When it is stood at the Altar, let prayers be alwaies made unto God. And in that which is called the fourth Council at Carthage, cap. 14. Altars are commanded to be cast down, that were erected to the memorie of Martyrs, under the pretence of their apparitions: and the furiousness of the people is hinted at in that place, when they add, If it may be done; but if it be not permitted by the tumults of the people, let the people be admonished that they haunt not those places. Whence it is clear, that the Fathers were forced to tolerate some things that they could not amend. But what need I to bring the orthodox against these doubting Fathers? seeing even they do (upon other occasions) condemn that practice. Basilus in Moral. reg. 80. cap. 22. saith, Seeing whatsoever is without the Scriptures, is not of faith, it is sin: and Nazianzen in Orat. in Basil. saith, Seeing I am a creature, I cannot adore any creature; and although Ambrose called unto his brother Satyrus for help, yet in all that Oration, he speaketh but passionately and rhetorically; as appeareth clearly, by these (and other) words, Give me leave, and permit unto my sorrow, that I may speak a little more largely of him, with whom now I may not speak. But behold what he saith without passion, de fide ad Gratian. lib. 1. cap. 7. Paul forbiddeth me to serve any creature, but commandeth me to serve Christ; Christ therefore is not a creature; the good servant, who acknowledgeth the Lord, even he forbiddeth us to serve a creature: how then would he have served Christ the Lord, if he had thought that Christ was but a creature? And in comm. in Rom. cap. 1. saith, They being confounded with shame do use a miserable excuse, saying, they go unto God by creatures, as we are wont to go unto a King by his Courtiers. When he calleth this a miserable excuse: he declares, that the practice did not please him; but he continueth refuting that excuse, saying, We go unto a King by his Courtiers, because he is a man, and knoweth not to whom he may concredit the Common-Wealth; but to procure Gods favour (who surely knows all our works, and nothing is hid from him) we need not any Intercessour, but only a devote mind. Bellarm. de Sanctor. beat. lib. 1. cap. 20. replieth, The first part of these words is to be understood of them, who give the proper honour of God unto the Saints; and the last part meaneth, God hath no need of information, but we have need, saith he. This is (to use the words of Ambrose) a miserable excuse; for he speaks of our need of an Intercessour, and hesaith, We need not an Intercessour, but a devote mind; because God is not ignorant, who comes unto him; as a King knoweth not, till he be informed by his Courtiers. Here it is to be observed, that Ambrose speaks there against the Heathens, who would have excused their idolatrie; but his words serve no less against all prayers unto any meer creature. Another great preparative to the invocation of Saints, was made by sundrie solemnities, which may be thought to have been done in no ill mind, but with a bad success; as the building of Churches, and keeping of daies in remembrance of particular Saints, whereupon followed the nomination of Mercates, &c. When such things began, some Fathers did not perceive what inconveniences were following (for some were bickering against the heresies, concerning the Trinitie and person of Christ; some against the Pelagians, and some were not so zealous; others did rejoice that the Heathens could be turned from gentilism) and others foresaw the danger, but saw the people so headstrong in their presumptions, that they durst not freely rebuke the people, for eschewing the offence of some good persons, and of some who were turbulent; as Augustine confesseth of himself in Ep. 119. ad Ianuar. Untill the daies of Gregorie no such thing was found in the Liturgies, but only remembrance of the Saints names; and men prayed only unto God, that he would give them grace to follow their examples; and when the form of Gregorie began, the invocation was not yet brought into the Liturgie; in his works are found (and very rarely) proper to Saints, but not any one to the Virgin Maria; which we may think, he would not have omitted, if he had believed, that she is a Saviorefs or a Mediatrix. But after him are few found, who speak against the invocation of Saints; in so far, that an. 755. in a Synod at Constantinople, it was confirmed by authoritie of a Canon, even by them who at the same time condemned the worship of images; and yet the invocation that was allowed then, was but a blot, in respect of the impietie whereinto the Church of Rome did thereafter degenerate. For they say not, Pray for us, if you have sence of our miseries: but sometimes they direct their prayers unto the Saints, that they help them in their miseries, and grant their petitions; as to the Virgin Marie they say, Marie mother of grace, mother of mercie, defend us from the enemy, and accept us in the hour of death; Offic. beat. Mariae pag. 54. which was allowed by Pope Pius the V. an. 1571. and ib. fol. 226. in the hymn of the Apostles they say, Ye unto whose commandment the health and sickness of all men is subject, heal the sick in manners, and restore vertue unto us. Sometimes they pray unto God to hear them for the merits of the Saints, as ib. fol. 38. Let the Lord grant us salvation and peace, for the Virgin mothers sake; and fol. 46. O Lord, protect thy people who trust in the patrocinie of the Apostles Peter and Paul, and of other thy Apostles; preserve us continually, we beseech thee, O Lord, let all thy Saints help us everie where, that when we think on their mercies, we may find their patrocinie. And fol. 228. in Natal. S. Martyris, nec virginis, nec martyris, O most gracious God, for her sake forgive us our sins, and spare our iniquities: hereafter we will find more such blasphemous prayers. Thirdly, in imitation of the old Heathens, they divide the government of things below unto several Saints: the Patron of Spain, is Saint James; of France, Saint Dennis; of Germanie, Saint Martine; of England, Saint George: Towns have their particular Patrons, Rome hath Saint Peter, Venice hath Saint Mark, &c. yea Janus hath given the keys of Heaven unto Peter; Jupiter Pluvius hath given the Rain unto Genivieve; instead of Æolus, Seamen call upon Saint Nicolas; Ceres hath given over the Corns unto John and Paul; Esculapius gives Medicine unto Saint Cosm; Bacchus the Vines unto Saint Urban; Mercurius the Oxen to Pelagius, and a thousand more such toies they have. And as if all this were not abomination enough, they give the same worship unto the Creatour and creature: Bellarmine in the end of his Books, saith, Praise to God, and to the Virgin Marie; and in the end of the Book, de cultu Sanctior. Printed Lugduni an. 1596. Praise to God, and to the Virgin-mother Marie; and also to God Jesus Christ, the eternal Son of the eternal Father, be praise and glorie; where he preferreth the Virgin before Christ. So doth Gregorie Valentia, in the end of his Book de Missa, and de Purgator. Praise to God, and to the blessed Virgin Marie, and to Jesus Christ. Viega is plain in his Comment on Revel. 12. sect. 2. num. 31. saying, She is set above the creatures; and whosoever boweth his knee to Jesus, doth also humble himself unto his mother: and I think (saith he) the glorie of the Son with the Mother, to be not so much common, as the verie same. These particulars are blasphemous without exception, so that I have seen an Edition of Bellarmine, where the above-named Doxologie is omitted. And before him Lud. Vives, in his Note on August. de civ. Dei. lib. 3. cap. ult. complaineth, saying, Many Christians do sin often in good things, that they do worship he-Gods and Goddeses; no otherwise than they do God; nor see I in many what difference is, betwixt their opinion concerning the Saints, and what the Heathens thought of their Gods. And Pol. Verg. de invent. rer. lib. 6. cap. 23. saith, The multitude have more trust in images, then they do in Christ; but if they trust so unto images, they will trust no less in Saints, whose images they are. These practices of the Romish Church, are clear unto all who are acquainted with their books, or who behold their fopperies in their Churches. So that Agrippa de vanit. Scient. cap. 57. after he hath related a great number of their tricks, he derideth their pretences; as if Jupiter had imparted his power unto the lesser Gods: and concludeth thus, he is superstitious and ungodly, who instead of miracles, turneth prodigious lies, as it were sporting fooleries, into a Historie; and gives them unto the simple people to be believed instead of Oracles; and they are fools who believe such tales. Hereby certainly he understandeth their Legenda aurea, or the History of the Saints Lives and Miracles, which are publickly read on the Feast-days.

The worship of Images.

6. In this Centurie, the worshipping of Images came into question: but first see what the more ancient Christians thought thereof. Origenes contra Cels. lib. 7. saith, Christians and Jews, when they hear [the Law of God] Thou shalt not make to thy self any graven image, nor---not only refuse these Temples, Altars, and Images of Gods; but indeed, chuse rather to die. And then speaking of the Images of the true God, he saith, Neither do we regard images, for we frame no Image of God, because he is invisible and incorporeal. Lactantius Instit. lib. 2. cap. 19. saith, There can be no true religion, where there is an image. Epiphanius hath an Epistle unto John, Bishop of Jerusalem, which is translated by Hierom, and is extant in both their works; there he saith, I hear that some do grumble against me, because when I was going to the holy place called Bethel, and saw in the Village Anablatha a lamp burning, and having asked what place that was, I was informed that it was a Church; and going to pray, I found at the entrance a dyed and painted cloath, having the Image, as it were, of Christ or some Saint (for I remember not well, whose image it was; but I saw the image of a man) hanging in a Church of Christ, contrarie to the authority of Scripture; I did cut it, and did advise the keepers of the place to wrap a poor dead body in it: and they grumbling said, If he will tear it, he might have given another vail, and changed it: which when I heard, I did promise to send another shortly unto them. But now I pray you, command that no such vails, as are contrary to our religion, be hung hereafter in a Church of Christ; for it becomes your fatherhood hood rather to have care of banishing such superstition, unfit for Christ's Church and the people concredited unto you. But from gathering many testimonies, Pol. Verg. de invent. rer. lib. 2. cap. 23. spareth our travel, saying, To the end the memory might be continued of the defunct, or of them who are severed in place (as none doubteth) were images devised; but seeing God is every where, nothing was thought more foolish from the beginning, than to represent him. Only I add that of the Council at Eliberis cap. 36. It pleaseth to forbid images in Churches, that it be not painted on walls, which is worshipped. This Council was held in the daies of Constantine the Great. Bellarmine de imagin. Sanct. cap. 9. bringeth many answers of his own sort, to clude this authoritie, and rejects them: amongst others, he reporteth the answer of Nic. Sanderus, That that Council forbad images for that present time; because then it was feared, the heathens might believe that we worship stocks and stones. This is a good answer, saith he, and yet he hath another, The Council forbad not images on Boards or Vails, but on Walls; because images on Walls are most spoiled. But the Fathers made no difference of the matter; for generally (as Pol. Verg. de invent. rer. lib. 6. cap. 13. saith) all the old Fathers almost [he might have truly omitted this, almost] did condemn the worship of images for fear of idolatry; then which, is no sin more execrable. Moles repeateth nothing so oft (as is manifest in Exodus and Leviticus) as that the people worship not any thing made with hands. And the Prophet saith, Let them be confounded who worship graven images, and glory in images. Then he addeth, how Serenus, Bishop of Marsilia, did not only take Images out of a Church, when he saw the people worship them, but broke them in pieces, and burned them. Observe, this takes away Bellarmine's answer, seeing he burned the Images, and not the Church Walls. And upon this occasion Pope Gregorie the I. writ unto him, Ep. 119. lib. 7. saying, Verily we commend thy zeal, that thou wouldest have no man to worship that which was made with hands; but we think, thou oughtest not to have broken those images; for the Pictures are set up in the Church, to this end, that the unlearned by seeing and beholding them, may at least behold on the Walls, what they cannot read in Books. Out of Ep. 9. lib. 4. it is clear, that Serenus did maintain both the breaking, and the worshipping of images; and therefore Gregory chideth him, as affecting singularity; and yet he addeth, If any man will make images, forbid him not; but by all means stop the worship of images. In this Epistle it appeareth, that at that time images were in many other Churches, and that in former times also; but only for ornament or for instructing the ignorant, as he saith. But certainly no image was in a Christian Church, before the Emperour Constantine's time; and after that, many did oppose them altogether; and they who had them, did pretend historical use, but with a bad success: for Gregory lib. 7. Ep. 53. professeth that he did prostrate himself before the image of Christ; and from worship at the image, is the ready way to worship the image; as Pol. Vergil. complaineth in the fore-named place, The first establishing of images, saith he, was in the daies of Pope Agatho; and it were to be wished, that Priests would instruct their people more diligently, how they should regard images; which because they do not, and it is commonly thought, that they are silent for their own commodity; therefore men are come to this madness, that this part of pietie differeth little from impietie; for almost all the rude and ignorant people worship the images of stone, or wood, or bras, or painted on walls in sundry colours; not as signs, but as if they had sense; and they trust in them more than in Christ or the Saints, to which they are dedicated: whence it is, that they add foolishness to foolishness, and they offer unto them gold, silver, rings: which error hath so waxed, that we think, Religion consisteth in riches, &c. The same saith Agrippa, de vanit. scient. cap. 57. where having spoken of images amongst the Heathens, he subjoineth, Which corrupt custome and false religion of the Heathens, after they were brought to the faith of Christ, did infect our religion also, and brought images and statues into our Churches; whereas there was no such thing amongst the primitive and true Christians: neither can it be told how great superstition, I will not say idolatry, is fostered amongst the rude people; and the Priests wink at these things, because they do reap no small gain thereby. We should learn not from the forbidden books of images; but from the Word of God, the book of Scriptures: he who will know God, should not seek knowledge from images or statues; but let him search the Scriptures, which testify of him; and Christ saith, My sheep hear my voice. And then Agrippa, as fearing to be censured for his boldness, makes some shew of recanting; but anon falleth afresh to it, saying, Covetous Priests and greedy men, seeking matter of their avarice not by wood and stones only, but by the bones of the dead also, and reliques of Martyrs, have found means of covetousness; they open the graves of the Confessours; they take out the reliques of Saints, and do sell a touch or a kiss of them; they busk up their images, and adorn their feasts with great pomp; they call them Saints, and proclaim their praises, whose life they will not follow, &c. And to the end we may see the worship of images, is not the error of the ignorant only. Thomas Aquin. in Sum. pag. 3. quest. 25. arg. 3. saith, The same reverence should be given to the Image of Christ, which is given to Christ himself.

Of Reliques. 7. Concerning what Agrippa speaks of the reliques of the Saints in his time, it is observable, how Gregory the 1. writ unto the Empress Constantia, lib. 3. Ep. 30. The Majesty of your piety, who are famous for study of religion, and love of holiness, hath commanded, that I should send the head of Saint Paul, or some part of his body, for that Church which is builded in the Palace, to the honour of the same Saint Paul, the Apostle: and while I was desirous that these things might be commanded unto me, in which I giving most ready obedience, might have the more abundantly provoked your favour toward me, the greater sadness hath overtaken me; because you command that which I neither can, nor dare do. And he addeth examples of some, who had attempted to remove the bodies of some Saints, and were smitten with sudden death; and others were affrighted and dispersed with the fear of Thunder; and therefore he saith, Let my most gracious Lady know, that it is not the custom of the Romans, when they give the reliques of Saints, that they presume to touch any part of the body; but only a band is sent in a box, and that is layed by the holy bodies of the Saints; and that is taken up again, and sent unto the Church which is to be dedicated. Whether these examples be true or not, believe Gregory they who will. But if other stories can be believed, many bodies of Martyrs, and Confessours, were carried from place to place, before his time and after it, and in many places of the earth. Nor can it be denied, that the removing of their bodies, which in the fury of persecution had been buried in obscure corners, was commendable; if restless minds had not turned charitable offices into excessive superstition. And sundry Ancients do record, that miracles were wrought in these places, where they were buried, as Augustine de civit. Dei lib. 22. cap. 8. and Chrysostom in his Book against the Heathens. And no less certain is it, That Satan took occasion upon their esteem they had of dead bodies, to deceive many, and that many waies. Augustine in Confess. lib. 6. cap. 2. sheweth, how his mother Monica, when she came to Millain, would have brought her portage, bread bread and wine into the Churches [or, as he calleth them, Memorials] of the Saints, as was the custom of Affrica; the door-keeper did hinder her, because the Bishop of the place had forbidden it; and he did admire, how his mother, so soon, did rather condemn her former custom, than call into question the countermand; because the custom was like unto the superstition of the Gentiles. Jerom to. 2. Ep. 2. against Vigilantius telleth, how he said, Why shouldest thou with so great honour, not only honour, but adore also, I know not what thou worshippest in a little vessel that thou carriest about? Why doest thou with adoring kisse dust covered in a cloath? we see a custom of the Heathens brought almost into the Church, under pretext of religion; that whilest the Sun shineth, heaps of wax-torches are kindled, and they kisse and adore every where a little, I know not what, dust in a small vessel covered with a precious cloath: These men give (forsooth!) great honour unto the most blest Martyrs, whom they think to make glorious by their silly Torches; when the Lamb, who is on the midst of the Throne, glorifieth them with the splendour of his Majesty. Jerom writeth very bitterly against Vigilantius for writing so, and denieth the fact, saying, O mad head! who ever did adore Martyrs? who thinketh man to be a God? &c. There he saith, Constantine had caused to transport the bodies of Andrew, Luke and Timothy to Constantinople; and the Emperour Arcadius, had brought the body of the Prophet Samuel from Judea unto Thracia; and some Bishops had transported other bodies, but none did adore the bodies. Hence appears his judgement, and the practice of the Churches where he did live, or which he knew; but it seems he knew not what was done where Vigilantius did live: of whom I add here the words of Erasmus, in the Argument before that Epistle, Vigilantius by nation a Gall, and Presbyter of the Church at Barcelona in Spain, writ that book, wherein he did teach, that Reliques of Martyrs should not be adored, neither should there be Vigiles at their graves; which at that time, was done in great religiousness; and so against this man falleth Jerom a scolding with reproaches, that I wish he had been more moderate: as for the night Vigiles they did not please the Church-men, as is clear enough, that by their authority they are taken away, the name only remaining; and of that custom is Affrica and other places. Augustine de civit. Dei lib. 8. cap. ult. saith, We do not erect Churches, Priesthoods, Holy things and Sacrifices unto the Martyrs; because not they, but their God is our God; we do honour the remembrance of them, as of the holy men of God, who have for the truth foughten unto the death of their bodies; to the end, the true religion may be known, all false and feigned religions being convinced. But what faithfull man ever heard a Priest, standing at an Altar, builded upon the holy body of a Martyr, for the honour and worship of God, say in his prayers, Peter, or Paul, or Cyprian, I offer a sacrifice unto thee; when at the memory of them, it is offered unto God, who made them both Men and Martyrs; and hath joined them, with his Holy Angels, in heavenly honour; to the end, that by that solemnity we may both give thanks unto God for their victory; and by calling upon him for help, we may exhort our selves to the imitation of their Crowns and Palms, in the renewing of their remembrance? Therefore whatsoever obsequies of religiousness are performed in the places of Martyrs, are ornaments of their memorials, and not holy things or sacrifices of the dead as Gods: and whosoever bringeth meat thither, which truly is not done by the better Christians, and in most part of the earth is no such custom; nevertheless whosoever doth it, when they have layed it down, they pray, and take it away again, that they may eat it, or give a part thereof unto the indigent; they desire to have it hallowed there, by the merits of the Martyrs, in the name of the Lord of Martyrs : That these are not sacrifices of the Martyrs, he knows, who knows this one thing, that the sacrifice of Christians is there offered unto God ; and so we worship not the Martyrs, neither with divine honours, nor with human crimes. So far he. On these last words, Lud. Vives hath this Annotation, concerning the practice of his own time, Many Christians do often sin in a good thing, that they worship [divos, divasque] their gods and goddesses, no otherwise than God himself; neither do I see in many, what difference is betwixt their opinion concerning the Saints, and that which the Heathens thought of their Gods : Impious was the opinion of Vigilantius, who deprived the Martyrs of all honour [if he did so :] Foolish was that of Eunomius, who would not enter into the Churches of Martyrs, lest he were compelled to adore the dead ; Martyrs are to be revered, and not adored as God, as Jerom writeth against Vigilantius. And in his next Annotation he saith, But now the fashion is, when religion is solemnized unto Christ, who delivered mankind by his death, to shew plaies unto the people, nothing differing from the old scenical plaies; although I say no more, he will think it fitly enough who shall hear it, sports are made of a most serious purpose : He continueth shewing their abominable sports. Hither may be referred another History in Chrysostom to. 1. in his book against the Heathens, The Apostate Emperour Julian, went to the Temple of Apollo at Daphne; and with great instance did ask a response, concerning a purpose intended by him : and it was answered, This place of Daphne is full of dead bodies, which hath averred the Oracle : whereupon Julian commandeth to take away the body of Babylas. There Chrysostom argueth against the Emperour, that Babylas were mightier then Julian's God. But the good man did not conceive the policy of the Devil, by subtilly instilling into the minds of imprudent men a superstitious fancy, concerning the reliques of the dead and their power, as Bellarmine de cultu Sanctor. lib. 2. cap. 2. would prove from the same example, that the reliques should be adored. And whereas he alledgeth, that the miracles that were done at the graves of the Martyrs, were done, to the end these reliques should be worshipped : Augustine de civit. Dei lib. 22. cap. 9. saith contrarily, Unto what faith did these miracles attest, save unto that, where Christ is preached to have risen in the flesh, and to have ascended into Heaven in the flesh? for even the Martyrs, were Martyrs, that is, witnesses of this faith; they giving testimony unto this faith, did indure the enmitie of the world and did overcome them, not by fighting, but by dying; for this faith they died, who may obtain these things from the Lord, for whose name they were killed; for this faith their wondrous patience hath gone before, that in these miracles so great power might follow; for if the resurrection of the flesh eternally, hath not gone before in Christ, or shall not be, as is fore-told by Christ; or was fore-told by the Prophets, who had also prophesied of Christ; why can the Martyrs do so great things, who were killed for that faith, by which the resurrection is preached? For whether God worketh by himself in a wondrous way, whereby the eternal worketh temporarie things, or if he doth those things by his servants; and the same things that he doth by his servants; whether he doth some of them by the spirits of the Martyrs, as by men that are as yet in the bodie; or all these by his Angels, whom he commandeth invisibly and without bodies; so that what things are said to be done by Martyrs, are done by them praying and obtaining, and not working; or whether these things be done some one way, and some another, which can no way be comprehended by mortals; nevertheless they give testimonie unto that faith, which preacheth the resurrection of the flesh for ever. So far he. Hence we see, that Augustine will not say definitively, that the miracles were done by the Saints; and that he holdeth, that they were for confirmation of the faith which the Martyrs did believe and preach, and for no other faith. But most certain it is, not any Martyr did ever teach, or believe, that Saints or their reliques should be worshipped. Add the testimonie of Ge. Cassander in Consult. art. 21. We read (saith he) that of old they made vows, and undertook pilgrimages unto places, famous for the reliques of Martyrs; which then was profitable, while the memorie of the Martyrs was yet fresh and certain; and while God, by undoubted miracles, did shew that their souls do live, whose bodies were dead; thereby confirming the faith, which they did profess. But abuses did by little and little creep in, for Basil did complain that in his daies this custom was corrupt; and in the time of Augustine, the custom of bearing meat unto the graves of Martyrs, was forbidden by Ambrose; as is clear in Augustine Confess. lib. 6. cap. 2. and in latter times, too much hath been given to the reliques and memories of Saints, when wicked men began to put false confidence in foolish worship: which abuse is condemned by the Council at Cabilon, Cap. 45. and other corruptions were added; to wit, for gain, false reliques were daily suggested, and feigned miracles were reported; superstition was thereby fostered, and by illusion of the Diuel, new reliques were invented; which abuse is condemned by a Council at Lions; at this day the world seems to be full of reliques; so that it may be feared, that upon due examination most detestable impostures may be manifested, as in some places it is made manifest: as of old it hapned unto Saint Martine, who did find under the famous name of a Martyr, the monument not of a Martyr, but of a wicked Robber. Wherefore it seems good to abstain from all ostentation of reliques, and to stir up the people to reverence the true reliques; that is, to follow the examples of their godliness and vertues that are extant, written by them, or of them. Thus Cassander hath observed two corruptions, to wit, superstitious confidence in the worship of true reliques; and a sacrilegious forging of false reliques. But now the superstitious custom of Rome, is come to such height, that Jesuit Vasques is licentiated to send in publick, That the very worms may be worshipped with a good intention and sincere faith; as if the worms, consumers of the holy reliques, were filled with some vertue; yet not to be worshipped publickly. Vasq. lib. 3. adorat. cap. 8. num. 114. and Bel-larm. li. cit. cap. 4. saith, The reliques of Saints, to wit, their bones, ashes, cloaths, &c. are to be adored, although not with the same kind of adoration, as the spirits of the Saints, yet with more than human or civil worship; to wit, with religious supplication, kissing, circumgession, thurification, lighting of Tapers, &c.

8. In former times many were desirous to see Jerusalem, but others did dissuade them; as Jerom to. 1. Ep. ad Paulin. saith, It is laudable, not to have been in Jerusalem, but to have lived well in Jerusalem; for that Citie is to be sought, which killed not the Prophets, nor shed the blood of Christ; but which maketh the currents of the flood glad; which being on a mountain cannot be hid, which the Apostle calleth the mother of the Saints; in which he rejoiceth that he had freedom with the righteous. Neither in saying so, do I reprove my self of inconstancie, or condemn what I do; that I seem in vain, after the example of Abraham, to have forsaken my kindred and countrie; but I dare not inclose the omnipotencie of God in narrow bounds, and restrain him in a little part of the earth, whom the Heaven cannot comprehend: Every one of the believers are weighed, not according to the diversitie of places; but by excellencie of faith; and true worshippers do adore the Father, neither at Jerusalem, nor on mount Garizim; because God is a Spirit, and his worshippers must worship him in spirit and truth: the spirit bloweth where he pleaseth; the earth is the Lords; and the fulness thereof: since the Fleece of Judea is dried up, and all the World is wet with the dew of Heaven; and many comming from the East and West are set down in the bosom of Abraham; God hath ceased to be known in Juda only, and his name to be great in Israel; but the sound of the Apostles hath gone thorow all the World, and their words unto the ends of the earth. Our Saviour, being in the Temple, said unto his Disciples, Arise, let us go hence; and unto the Jews, Your house shall be left desolate: seeing Heaven and Earth shall pass away, certainly all earthly things shall pass away; therefore the places of the Cross and Resurrection, are profitable unto them who bear their Cross; and they rise with Christ daily, who shew themselves of so great habitation. Moreover they say, The Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lord, let them hear from the Apostle, Ye are the Temple of the Lord, and the Holy Ghost dwelleth in you: both from Jerusalem, and from Brittan, is the gate of Heaven equally patent; Antonius and all the multitude of Monks of Egypt, Mesopotamia, Pontus, Cappadocia and Armenia have not seen Jerusalem, and without this Citie the gate of Paradise is patent unto them: Blessed Hilarion, although he was born and lived in Palestina, saw Jerusalem but one day only, that he might not seem to despise the holy places for their vicinitie, nor yet include the Lord in one place. You will say, Why go I so far off? To the end thou shouldest know, that nothing is deficient to thy faith, though thou hast not seen Jerusalem; and that thou think not us the better, that we enjoy the habitation of this place; but whether here, or there, thou shalt have alike reward according to thy works. Augustine also, in his book de morib. eccl. cathol. cap. 34. complaineth, that many did adore graves and pictures; and some did drink upon the dead, and luxuriously burie themselves upon the buried; which abuses the Church indeavoureth daily to amend. Agreeable unto this complaint, is that passage in Gregorie lib. 9. Ep. 71. Whereas the English were wont to sacrifice Oxen to their Gods, and on that day they did feast and make merrie: Gregorie adviseth Augustine, to turn that Divelish solemnitie into a feast of dedication, or birth-day of some Martyr; and then to kill the Oxen not to the Divel, but to praise God when they did eat; to the end, that the hard-hearted people be not discouraged, for want of a merrie day, to forsake their idolatrie; and because they who will climb high, must go by degrees. And lib. 12. Ep. 31. speaking of the English, he saith, according to the Apostle, who saith, I gave you milk to drink, and not strong food, I have yeilded now these things unto them; but not to be held, or continued, in after-times; lest the good which is lately planted, and yet but of a tender root, be pulled up; but rather being begun, may be strengthened and carried to more perfection: Truly, if those things that we have done, be otherwise then we should have done; know thou, that it was not done for the thing it self, but by commiseration. Whence it appears, that not only these feasts at the graves, but many other rites, came into the Church by condescending unto the rudeness of the Gentiles: and they who at first did indulge them, did not simply allow these rites; but would by degrees bring the people unto the Christian faith; and they would not have used them, if the rude people would have imbraced the puritie of God's worship. But afterwards, especially in the Western Churches, religion did consist, for the most part, in such rites; and if people would observe these, little care was to inform them in the faith. Then, as in the preceding 200. years, people had affection towards Jerusalem; so when the Bishop of Rome, was called the Universal Bishop, people forgot Jerusalem for a space, and looked towards Rome, and would go thither to confess their sins, as we will find more particularly; and yet even then many did reprove it, as followeth; for the present, I will add but one testimonie of Bernard in Ep. 113. ad Lelbert. Abbat.

Way was given unto rites for a time.

S. Michae, saying, This your son having forsaken, by my counsel, his peregrination, though he undertook it by your licence, hath returned; for when we knew that he had attempted it in levitie, and you had yeelded because of his importunitie; we reprov'd him sharply (as he was worthy) and perswaded him to return, repenting (so far as we could guess) of his levitie and improbitie, and promising amendment hereafter; we judging righteously, that howsoever one be guiltie, he should exerce repentance in his own Monasterie, rather then by going from Province to Province; for the purpose of Monks, is not to seek the earthly, but heavenly Jerusalem; and that not by walking on foot, but by amending in affections: thus Bernard. And when the worship of Saints and reliques was once received, it was easie for Priests to perswade pilgrimages unto this or that monument; either for penance, or some special remedie to be found there, more than in another place, Bellarmin. de cult. Sanct. lib. 1. cap. 20. Of this hear Pol. Vergil. saying, We read not go to any part of the earth to seek God, who is everie where; but some have no such intention, but rather go to behold the image of some Saint, never thinking (in all their journey) of God; far contrarie to the worship that was prescribed by the Fathers, Against such men may well be applied that of Persius, O souls prone to the earth, and void of Heaven! Why should we use such rites in our Churches? and in the way they feed themselves delicatelie; and lest they wax sad, they have with them some Pleasant (I will not say their Whores or Mistresses) to cause them to laugh; and tell them merrie sports, as it were, to refresh their wearied minds: O vain travel! we should sojourn, that being sequestred from domestick cares (which divert us from thinking upon the other life) to dart the bodie; and cause it to do service unto reason, and give unto the poor, as Christ commandeth. Vergil. in Interpret. Orat. Dom.

9. Out of what is said, may be partlie seen, what was the estate of the Western Church in the daies of Pope Gregorie the 1. and that after him a thicker mist arose out of the Sea; as indeed puritie of Doctrine perished more and more, and the Church was wondrously darkened with mens Traditions; apparitions of spirits were frequent: which when the Bishops and Priests did receive, they were deceived, and made no small Apostasie from the true faith, into the confidence of merits and mens satisfactions. So that Iohn de Molin in Specul. Carmel. cap. 6. hath truly observed, that from the time of the Emperour Heraclius, unto his own time, The day declined to the evening, and the Church hath suffered an Eclipse, yea and almost made defection, Io. Bal. cent. 1. 74. appr. 2. About these times (saith another) men were (as it were) made for barbaritie; and many of the Ancients, in whose books was the doctrine and acts of antiquitie, being forsaken through negligence, did suffer another and worse death. In all which following calamities, the Monks were not the least Agents; for when the Monkish life was had in admiration, the Popes thought them the fitter instruments in prosecuting their pleasure. Before that time they had not authoritie to preach the word, nor administer the Sacraments: as may be seen at length in Gratian. caus. 16. especially qu. 1. cap. Adi-cimus, there is an ordinance of Pope Leo I. that none but the Priests of the Lord should preach the word; whether he were a Monk or Laick, whatsoever measure of knowledge he had: and Cap. hinc est etiam, it is said, The Ecclesiastical historie testifieth, that untill the daies of Eusebius, Lofinius and Siricius, Monks were only Monks, and not Clergie. And Gregorie lib. 4. Ep. 1. No man can serve in the Office of a Church-man, and continue in a Monkish rule ordinarily. And they all were Laicks, except the Abbott, saith Bellarmin. de Monac. lib. 2. cap. 4. and Spalatens. de Rep. Eccles. lib. 2. cap. 12. proveth it at length, but they were subject unto the Priests of the Parish, in receiving the

Of Monks.

Sacrament; or if they were many they had their own Priest; as Epiphanius ordained Paulinian, Priest of Saint Jerom's Monasterie. Bellarmin. de not. Eccles. lib. 4. cap. 10. But Pope Boniface the IV. gave them libertie to preach, and his successors gave them power of binding and loosing; and although they had not charge of souls, they made them equal in power, everie where, with the Priests in their own Parishes, Gratian. caus. 16. qu. 1. Sunt tamen. They did cloak their idleness with profession of povertie, according to the order of Saint Basil, Augustine and other fathers: which rules of the late Monks, were so far from the institution of the Fathers, that they never had dreamed any such thing could follow: saith Pol. Vergil. de invent. rer. lib. 7. cap. 3. for according to the institutions, Monks had nothing of their own, neither did live chargeably unto others; but upon the works of their hands, and they gave their works unto their Decanus: saith August. de mori. Eccles. Cathol. lib. 1. cap. 31. and in Reg. 2. tradita Fratrib. cap. 2. he commandeth them to read some hours, to pray some hours, and to work some hours. Chrysost. hom. 59. ad pop. Antioch. saith, They know not begging: and Bellarmin. de monast. lib. 2. cap. 43. and Dura contr. Whitak. fol. 387. out of Jerom, Epiphanius, and others, shew that all the Monks in old times did work, as the Apostle had commanded, except one Monasterie of Saint Martin: so writeth Basil in exercit. ser. 4. But in the seventh Centurie they had fair Cloisters, Princely Abbies, rich Revenues, and what did they not purchase? But no work at all amongst the most part of them: so that Bernard crieth in Apolog. ad Guil. abbat. O how far different are we from the Monks in the daies of Antonius! And in Epist. 42. he saith, Work, dark places, voluntarie povertie, these do nobilitate Monks; but your eies behold everie thing; your feet tread in everie market; your tongues are heard in all Counsels; your hands do pull unto you everie patrimonie: As they were not sloathfull in their own affairs, so when the Popes and Bishops began to have more care of policie, preferment, and such earthly things; and each one to strive against the usurpation of another, more then they did study the Scriptures: Then the Benedictines (and afterwards other sorts of hypocrites) were sent under colour of preaching Christ; but indeed to deceive the world, and to perswade men to submit themselves unto the See of Rome. The Monks propined the cup of fornication to all nations; they perswade Kings to subject their Crowns unto the High priest; and they were the sowers of his superstitious rites, and other errors: as may be seen at length in the Historie of the Council at Trent, in the Congregations of the 4. and 5. Sessions, where the Bishops and Rulers, sought to take these liberties from Monks; but the Romish Courtiers would not. The Bishops of Spain and Galicia in the 4. Council at Toledo, did espie this hypocrisie, and Cap. 52. did ordain, That Bishops should restrain all Religious persons (so did the Monks call themselves, as if there were no religion in others) who were not of the number of the Clergie, and went from place to place: And each Bishop should compell them within his Diocie, to return into some Monasterie, or take them to a Parish; unless they were dismissed for age or sickness. This Act could not stand, for the mystrie of iniquitie must go on. So that justly doth I. Hooper, Bishop of Glocester, and Martyr an. 1555. call the Monks the pale horse, saying, This pale horse, is the time wherein hypocrites and dissemblers entred into the Church, under pretence of true religion; they killed more souls with heresies and superstition; then all the Tyrants that ever were, did kill bodies with fire, sword, or banishment; as it appears by his name who sitteth upon the horse, that is, Death: for all souls who leave Christ, and trust to these hypocrites, live unto the Divil in everlasting pain; these pretenced and false hypocrites, have stirred the Earthquakes, that is, the Princes of the World against Christ's Church. Letters of Saints and Martyrs, Printed an. 1564. pag. 116. By their Sermons they did commend the primacie of the Pope everie where: and Boniface the V. and then other Popes, gave them so many Prerogatives, that they who had the greatest desire of libertie, became Monks, Erasmus in Vita Hieron. Yea and Kings forsaking their Scepter, be- took them to a Monkish life, as Bambas King of the Goths in Spain; and some retaining their Crowns, professed themselves of the Order of Monks by dispensation: With provision, that they give Revenue to one Abbey or more; and the Church (that is, the Popes and their Members, the Monks) suffer no loss; or in a word, that Monasteries may be enriched. At first out of the Monasteries (as Colledges) were chosen Presbyters, who were esteem- ed of an higher degree, August. Epist. 76. ad Aurel. and Pelagius the I. Bi- shop of Rome, writing to Antonia and Decia, saith, I wish that those who are nourished by us in this habit, and in Monasteries, may when they shall be of ripe age and approved life, be promoted not unto the Office of contention, but of Priesthood, Gratian. caus. 16. qu. 1. cap. de presentium. And Pol. Vergil de invent. rer. lib. 7. saith, If any did repent him of his profession, he had libertie to return unto his former life; yet not without the note of levitic (saith he) but they were not tied under the bond of vow. By means of these priviledges, and by opinion that donations to Cloisters, were meritorious before God; the Monks at that time received Palaces of ease, instead of Wil- dernesses in former times; plentie for povertie; fasting for fasting; frequent Convents for solitariness; robes for rags, Erasm. Epist. ad Granveld. dat. 15. cal. Januar. an. 1520. and Spalatens. de Rep. Christ. lib. 2. cap. 12. sect. 77. They were so managed, that let any one chuse what sort of life he pleaseth, he shall find contentment in one Abbey or other; or he shall find a Convent of the same profession, Bellarmin. de mon. lib. 2. cap. 3. and so when they profess to have no- thing, they enjoy all things: And it may well be said to them, which he ibid. lib. 1. cap. 1. citeth out of Hieron. Epist. ad Paulin. Expound the word Monachus, which is thy name; What doest thou in a Town who shouldest live alone? Or if ye hear that strange etymologie (and not so strange in Gram- mar, as in practice, in respect of them) which he approveth; Monachi have their name from the word, μόνος i. e. unitie; because they lay aside all world- ly things, and they studie to please unitie i. e. God. Then take also his note of inference, Whereof it followeth, saith he, that properly these are Monks, who give themselves to contemplative life, as the Cassinenses, &c. Upon the same ground Thomas Aquin. and other Scholasticks, would not give this name of Monks, unto the Dominicans and Franciscans; because they are not only given to contemplation, but &c. Seeing then Monks went over all, ha- ving no certain Parish; yet preaching, and exercising the Office of a Priest, wheresoever they pleased, or could be received; surely according to both these reasons of their name, about that time Monks were no Monks, and a great noveltie crept into the Church. And seeing their doctrine was principal- ly, for erecting primacie and power unto the Pope; they may justly be called ὑποδούλοι καὶ δοῦλοι, servants and souldiers, as the ancient Greeks called them; but not the servants and souldiers of God, but of the Pope, as will be more clear hereafter.

10. Into this Centurie, Bellarmine casteth the first acceptation of the Latine Translation of the Bible, by the Church universally; which Translation is called Jerom's. In lib. 2. de verb. Dei cap. 8. he sheweth, that another Trans- lation, which was called Itala or Vetus Latina, was in use in the Churches, before this of Jerom; and in the daies of Gregorie the I. the Church of Rome did use them both, [as Gregorie testifieth, in the end of his Epistle to Leander,

*The Latine Translation

before his Morals.] And after that (saith Bellarmine) all Latine Translations went out of use, save this which is called Verus Latina. And in Cap. 9. he saith, That some Books or Chapters of the old common Translation; especially the Psalms, and some books of Jerom's Translation, which is now in use in the Roman Church: and in the next Chapter saith, this is of authentical authoritie, as if all the Churches had used it only; all Preachers have expounded it only; and Councils have determined all controversies from it only: but he bringeth no proof of his so bold assertion, except a verie imperfect induction. In the contrarie it is certain, 1. Though all were supposed, which he saith of that Translation; yet before Jerom it was not, and before Pope Gregorie the I. it was not authentical; and therefore it was but a Novation, when it was taken to be authentical. 2. No other Church but the Romish did ever call it authentical, not the Greeks, &c. 3. Jerom did not call it authentical; for in his preface before the Books of Moses, he saith, to them who were emulous, Why dost thou fret with envie? Why stirrest thou the affections of the unlearned against me? Ask the Hebrews, advise the Masters of sundrie Towns, what they have of Christ, thy books have not: it is another thing, if the testimonies used afterwards by the Apostles prove against them; and the Latine copies are falsere then the Greek, and the Greek than the Hebrew. It is true many editions of that preface have, Emendatiora sunt exemplaria Latina quam Græca, & Græca quam Hebræa; and so did Nicolaus de Lyra, and others in his time read the words. But so, that sentence is contrary to his purpose; and therefore many of the School-men, and Erasmus, have been puzzled in reconciling that sentence with the preceding words. But I have had by me, these 50. years, an Edition of Paris in the year 1523. by John Prevèl, which hath, Emendatiora sunt exemplaria Latina, &c. And this one Edition, in this particular, is of more credit than a thousand other Editions; because it agrees with the preceding words, and with the truth: And with the same, Jerom in an Epistle to Damasus before the four Evangelists, saying, If the truth is to be sought out of many Translations, why go we not to the Greek original, and amend the things that have been ill translated by vitious Interpreters; or have been amended by unlearned presumptuous men. Let that be the true interpretation, which the Apostles have approved; I speak (saith he) of the New-Testament, which without doubt is Greek. And tom. 1. Epist. ad Lutin. he saith, As the credit of the old books, are to be examined by the Hebrew books; so the credit of the new, requireth the rule of the Greek language. If we confer altogether, what is more clear, then that Jerom did prefer the Hebrew in the Old-Testament; and the Greek in the New, above all Translations whatsoever; yea and above his own. 4. Neither was any Latine Translation accounted authentical, before the Council at Trent; for all the Interpreters, have in many Texts forsaken it; as is clear by their Commentaries, as Nicolaus de Lyra, Paulus Brugensis, Armachanus, Card. Cajetanus, and Bellarmine himself departeth from it in the Psalms; and Erasmus Rotterodamus, Xantes Pagninus, Francis Vatablus, and Arias Montanus, were approved for sitting forth other Translations. Pope Leo the X. did approve by his Seal the Translation of Erasmus, and gave him thanks for his travel in translating the New-Testament, Erasmus in Epist. Thoma Card. Eborac. dat. Louan. cal. Febr. an. 1519. 5. In the Council at Trent, that Translation was called into question, for Frier Aloisius Cataneus spake against it, and did confirm what he said, by the authoritie of Card. Cajetanus and Jerom, and by good reason; and was seconded by Isidorus Clacus, a Benedictine Abbot; so that (as the Writer of the Historie saith, lib. 2.) there was great contention concerning the Latine Translation: and in the end they did

conclude, that it is to be approved as authentical; yet so, that they who are more diligent, should not be forbidden to quench their thirst out of the Hebrew and Greek Fountains. And after that Council, two other Editions were published by Pope Sixtus the V. and Clemens the VIII. with infinite alterations, as followeth in the 16. Century.

11. The Popes did endeavour to take libertie of marriage from the Clergie; and where they could prevail, adulterie and murder of babes was multiplied, as is touched. In sundrie Nations great opposition was made, for Arnulph Bishop of Metensis, was the father of Anchises, the father of Pipin: Britain would not receive this bondage. In Crete John a Priest had a wife, and therefore was reproved by Pope Vitalian. What may I speak of one Greek? The Greeks are, for the most part, married untill this day. In the fourth Council at Toledo, Cap. 43. Marriage was approved, and Fornication prohibited. More of this hereafter.

The single life of Church men is opposed.

12. Divers Nations then received the faith, the Gothi and Suevi in Spain, forsook Arianism by authoritie of their King Reccared. Ghent brake down the Altar of Mercurius, whom they had served; and began to serve the true God, by the preaching of Amand, a French-man, an. 613. who was exiled for reproving King Dagobert of luxurie and veneric. Other Flandrians were converted by his Countrie man Agidius, an. 649. The sound of the word had been through the world, but the Nations persevered not; and being instructed but in few persons, Paganism continued; and the Barbarians disturbing the Realms, did also disturb the estate of religion.

13. In that Centurie lived sundrie Divines, although not equal to their forefathers; John Bishop of Alexandria, called the Almons, an. 610. who for his rare example of hospitalitie and bountifulness to the poor; is no less worthy to have place amongst good men, than he is followed of few. He was wont, at all occasions, to propound unto the people, questions out of the Scriptures; because multitude of heresies were then on foot, and he exhorted the people to propound their doubts unto him. If any did presumptuously move curious questions, he could cunningly turn to another more profitable. When any of the unlearned moved trivial doubts, he accepted them calmly; and commanded that thereafter such persons should not be admitted; to the end, others seeing such men checked, should be the more wary. In the daies of Boniface the IV. John Bishop of Gerunden, a Spaniard, was instructed at Constantinople, in the languages and reading of Scriptures; thence he returning into his Countrie, did with dexteritie, refute the heresie of Arrius; and therefore was exiled to Barchinona: but after the death of the Arrian King Lemungild, he returned, and wrote many books. Of the same country was Euphrasius, Bishop of Valentia, worthy of remembrance for godliness of life, and sinceritie of faith. Then also lived Hldefonsus, Bishop of Toledo, who (as another Augustine) is called the Hammer of Hereticks. France did never want famous witnesses of the Gospel: at that time was the fore-named Arnulph, Bishop of Metensis; Projectus a Martyr in Aquitania, an. 610. Eustathius Abb. Luxovien, the Disciple of Columban, an. 624. Modoald Bishop of Trevers; Renald the successour of the above-named Amand; we have heard of Serenus, Bishop of Marsilia, where succeeded Projectus, who is said to have suffered martyrdom in agro Cameracen. an. 678. Eustasius a Preacher in Bavie, an. 640. Lambert Bishop of Tungri, was put to death, an. 658. because he rebuked Pipin for marrying another wife, the first being yet alive; Dodo the brother of the second wife, was the Executioner, and shortly thereafter died of vermine. Ulfranius Bishop of Senonen, hath been a diligent labourer in the Lord's harvest in Frisia, an. 660. Leodagarius Bishop of Augustodunen, suffered death at the command of Theorick, King of France, because he oft reproved him of tyrannie. Victor Bishop of Carthage, an. 646. writing to Pope Theodore, retains the old Titles, saying, Unto the most blest and honourable Lord, his holy brother Theodore, Pope; the works of your most blessed brother-hood are acceptable unto God, &c. There he affirmeth, that all the Apostles were of equal authoritie and honour.

Isidor. Hist. palen.

14. Isidorus Bishop of Hispala (called the latter) did write many books of the Christian faith, and the History from Adam untill his own time, 624. he hath many errors, but in many things is sound. In his book de summo bono cap. 28. he saith, In the holy Scriptures, as on high mountains, both the learned find sublimities of knowledge, whereunto as Harts, they may lift up the steps of their contemplation; and the simple men, as lesse Wights, may find mean things for their capacitie; to which, they may humbly have refuge; the holy Scripture seems unto the babes of understanding, to be base in words, in respect of the historie; but it wadeth more deeply with the more learned, opening unto them the mysteries thereof; and it remains common to the learned and unlearned. Lib. 7. etymolog. cap. 9. Peter received his name from the Rock, which is Christ, on whom the Church is built; the Rock hath not the name from Peter; but Peter from the Rock: therefore the Lord saith, Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock, which thou hast confessed, will I build my Church; for the Rock was Christ, upon which Peter himself was built. Lib. 8. cap. 5. he noteth it as a fault in the old Catharists, that they did glorie in their merits; and that they denied forgiveness of sins to the penitent. Lib. 6. cap. 19. The Sacraments are baptism and chrism, the bodie and blood of Christ. Here he nameth but two, because the custom was then, to anoint them who were baptized. De offic. lib. 1. cap. 18. Bread, because it strengthneth the bodie, is therefore called Christ's bodie: and Wine, because it worketh blood in the flesh, therefore it hath relation to Christ's blood: these two are sensible, but being sanctified by the Holy Spirit, are changed into the Sacrament of the Lord's body. The Papists now in our daies, would gather out of these words Transubstantiation; but hereafter (God willing) it shall appear, that neither word, nor thing, was thought upon, in 500. years after that time: and Isidore saith, Transseunt in Sacramentum. And de doctrin. & fide art. 33. saith, That marriage is evil, or to be compared with fornication; and to believe that meat is evil, or the cause of evil unto the eaters, is not Christian; but properly Manichean or Encratitish.

Agrestin.

15. Agrestin was Clark to King Theodorick, and then entred the Abbey Lexovien with all his Wealth; he became wearied of the superstitious rites, and left the Abbey. Then he went to Aquileia (which for that time was not under the yoke of the Romish Pope) and from thence he writ unto Abbas Bobiensis, against the rites of the Monks; and unto Eustasius, Abbot of Lexovien, exhorting him to leave those rites. Eustasius and his Convent, exclude him out of their society. He had his refuge to Apellin, Bishop of Genua, who with some others, drew King Lotharius to their side. For removing of this controversie, was assembled the 4. Councel at Matiscon in Burgundy: there Agrestin accuseth Eustasius of many superstitious ceremonies, contrary to Canonical institution; for example, They did use to lick a Cockle marked with a cross; they use hallowings when they went in or out of a house; they multiplied prayers and collects in the Masse; they ridiculously cut off their hair, and abstained from the company of men. Eustasius replieth, The sign of the Cross, was able to put away the plague of the enemy; for it is written, The Lord will keep thy coming in, and thy going out, from henceforth and for ever: as for prayers, Christ and his Apostles, have commanded to pray continually : the Bishops did condemn Agrestin. Hence we see, that many did not allow the rites creeping in, and the inventers of them were but private persons; and the abettors were pleased with the least shadow of reason. Catol. test. ver. lib. 7. ex vna Eustas. abb.

16. About that time the number of Patriarchs were augmented; unto the former five that were authorized at Nice and Ephesus, were numbred the Sees of Thessalonica, Ephesus, Trimatus, Creta, which are so named in the sixth general Council; and in the West Ravenna, Caralis, Aquileia, Gradus, Millain, Toledo, Canterbury, York, &c. The Bishops of all these places were named Patriarchs, great High-priests, Primats, Arch-priests, &c. They had under them some more, and some fewer Bishops, and the world was possessed with ambition. Among them all, two only were called Universal Bishops, with great emulation; to wit, Rome and Constantinople, for they and their followers did entitle them so; but neither of the two would give it unto his Competitour; Spalatens. de Rep. Christ. lib. 3. cap. 10. Sectio. 16.

More Patriarchs.

17. When the Bishops of Rome were exalting themselves in the West, and the heresie of the Monothelites spreading in the East, and ambition waxing in both; the Empire of the Mahumetans began in Asia. The Ancients (as Epiphanius in Panar. cap. 1. and Jerom in Ezek. 25.) call them Sarazens; Suidas and some others, derive the name from Sarraca, a City in Arabia, where they lived; others derive it from the Hebrew word Sarac, which in Ier. 2. 23. is translated, Travelling; because they did live by robbery. They themselves deduce the name from Sarah, and called themselves the seed of the promise, and heirs of the world: they were people of Arabia, and first brought into a Monarchy by Mahumet. Writers do vary of what Parents he was; he was bold and publick, and enriched by marriage; his Kingdom began, and after him was increased by dissension of Princes, as the particular Histories declare. The first occasion of their rising was, they had foughten with Heraclius, against the Persians, and after the peace they sought their arrears. One of the Emperours Treasurers said, We have it not to pay the Roman and Greek souldiers, and this kennel of dogs are most impudent. They were so wrathfull at these words, that immediately they invade Syria, and took Damascus, Phoenicia and Mesopotamia; they exercised great cruelty against the Christians, and fought, by all means, to extinguish the very name: Heraclius fought divers times against them, and might have destroyed them; but he thought it enough to disperse them. Left diversity of religion, might occasion sedition among them, Mahumet with advice of Sergius, a Monk (who was banished from Constantinople for Nestorianism;) and of John, an Arrian Priest; and of Selas, a Jewish Astrologer; and Barras a Persian, patched a new religion amongst all these Sects, and pleasant to natural men; that so he might the more easily draw many unto him, and hold them together. The sum of his Alcoran (that is, the book of his religion) is, he continueth the doctrine of the forgiveness of sin in the blood of Christ; he denieth the two natures of Christ, and that his sufferings was a ransom for our sin; he despiseth the Mediation of Christ; he acknowledgeth Christ a Law-giver, but very silly and unmeet for government; he calleth himself the great Prophet sent from God, and sufficiently powerfull (not by miracles, as Christ and Moses, but) by sword to hold men under obedience of his worship and doctrine; he retains some Precepts of the law; to wit, the general and natural principles; he holdeth Circumcision, to confirm his people in the promise made to Abraham, as belonging unto them; he permitteth to eat all sorts of flesh, except Swines flesh, and what is strangled; he teacheth to offer sacrifices, but for the most part votive; that is, in sickness or danger to vow a lamb or bullock, according to the diversity of the person's estate; neither should these sacrifices be burned as the Jews did; but when the beast is killed, the skin, head, feet and fourth part of the flesh is given to the Priest; another fourth part is given to the poor; a third quarter is sent to the neighbours; and the offerer keepeth the last quarter to himself and his companions. Bart. Georgieviz an Hungarian, de origin. Imper. Turcici. saith, They keep the Friday holy, for difference from Jews and Christians; they have prayers five times daily, 1. Before the Sun-rising. 2. At the Rising. 3. At Noon. 4. Before Sun-setting. 5. Two hours thereafter. Unto all who observe his religion, he promiseth victory and wealth in this life; and then pleasures, with all delights in meats, drink and venery in Paradise: in a word, he gathered all heresies into one; he damneth wine with Severus; he contemneth the Sacraments with the Messalians; he denieth the immortality of the soul without the body with the Ambians; he maintaineth the deliverance of the most wicked with Origenes; and the imaginary suffering of Christ with Basilides; he believeth not the Trinity with Saturninus; he permitteth polygamy, and divorcement, upon any occasion, with the Jews: he derideth the Gospel, because it compelleth not to obedience, and forbiddeth revenge; to which his religion directeth by all means. He saith, The Monarchy of the World is promised to his Nation, as descending from Sarah; and therefore all others are to be compelled to accept Mahumetism, or abide in perpetual bondage. He promiseth, That they who fight courageously in Bartel, should be blessed, and their souls go straight with their bodies into Paradise; where they shall not be wearied with heat or cold, but cloathed with fine Vestures; and have the company of women, and daintiest food, &c. By such promises he tieth Souldiers to their Captains, and maketh them to despise all dangers. He commandeth strictly Discipline in Wars, that none dare plunder without permission; or if any do, he is punished without mercy. He appointed ordinary attendants on such things as may fall amongst the Souldiers in their march, that none of them durst take an Apple, without the licence of the owner, upon pain of death. The people, being bewitched with such fair inducements, did submit unto him as their Prince, Doctour, and Law-giver. He deceived some by words, and compelled others, with the sword, unto subjection. The Persians (as is touched) were easily brought to his obedience. When they prevailed over Christians, they dealt with them without mercy; in Jerusalem they shewed more then beastly cruelty; in a Church of Cæsarea, they massacred above 7000. Christians; they made Cyprus once without one Christian; about the year 700. they slew in Iuverna 150000. and kept 7000. captives. At that time Homar, their Prince, excused all this cruelty with pretext, that he did only pursue the worshippers of images; for about that time images were frequent in Christian Churches, and the Sarazens could not look on an image for religion. We may say then, Homar was the rod of God, correcting the idolatry and will worship of Christians; and the same images did give great advantage to this common enemy, by dissention of Christians, as followeth in the next Century. About the same time, arose two several Kingdoms of the Sarazens; the first in Asia, whereof the chief City was builded by the ruines of Babylon, and was called Baldac, or Baldacut, an. 630. after two years Mahumet was poisoned by Albunar, one of his Disciples; to the end he might have experience of his Prophecies; for Mahumet had said, that within three daies after his death, he would rise again: But when Albunar had waited 12. daies, he found his body torn by dogs; and gathered his bones, or what was remaining, and buried them in a Pitcher at Macha

in Persia. He delivered other Prophecies, but his followers have not as yet found the truth of them. Not many years after the erection of this Kingdom, the Egyptians were wearied of the Roman Empire, and sent for the Sarazens unto their aid, but it was to their greater woe. For the Sarazens made a prey of them, and erected another Kingdom in Affrick, whose Seat was Alcair or Babylon in Egypt. In both Kingdomes the Supream Governour, both in Policy and Religion, was called Calipha; and they ruled the Provinces by Presidents, whom they called Sultans or Soldans, who were also High-Priests.

CHAP. IV.

Of BRITAIN.

1. THe Papishes do brag, that the Roman Church is the Mother of all Churches; and that all Countries who ever believed in Christ, were first converted to her faith; by such as were precisely sent, or at least had their authority from the Pope, who lived in the time in which they were converted. This (say they) is so openly set down, in the History of the first conversion of every Country; as no Protestant, were he never so impudent, can without blushing deny it. So speaketh Thomas Hill, a Doctour of Doway, in his 4. reason Of his Catholick Religion. If the like lies were not frequent amongst them, it may seem a wonder how men can be so impudent, if they but read the Acts of the Apostles, where we have a conversion of Nations, without the mention of a Church at Rome: And the like may be said, if they had read the Recognitions of Clemens, whom some call the first Bishop of Rome; and some call him the second, and some the third; all these Books are concerning the conversion of Nations; and yet in them, is little or nothing of a Church in Rome, till he came to the last book; and neither is there one word of sending Teachers from Rome into other Nations: so that many Nations were converted, before any Christian Church was at Rome. Other Nations can shew, by whom the light of the Gospel came unto them. But for Britan (say they, it is clear, That Gregory the I. sent Augustine, who is called, The Apostle of the English. And was not the Christian faith in Britan before that time? Read the second Apology of Athanasius, and in the first page you shall find, that in Constantius time, some from Britan were at the great Council in Sardis: and in the former chapter sect. 8. we have heard the testimony of Jerom, That from Jerusalem and from Britan, the Gate of Heaven is equally patent; and in other places he mentioneth them: and 200. years before him, Tertullian against the Jews sheweth, That the places of Britan, which were unaccessible unto the Romans, were subject unto Christ. And what places these were, Baronius in Annal. ad an. 186. sect. 6. teacheth, That it is certain that the Romans did possess the South part of Britan; and Adrian caused a Wall to be made betwixt Cart-den and Dumbarton, to be a partition between them and the Scots: But (saith Baronius) the Britans, who did possess what was on the North-side of the Wall, did often pass over, and provoke the Romans unto Battel. In the time of Eleutherius, Bishop of Rome, Lucius King of South Britan, was a Christian; and Baronius cannot deny, but long before that, the Gospel of Christ had been brought into Britan; as (saith he) Testatur Gilda sapiens. And at the same time Donald, King of Scotland, was a Christian: and in the daies of Dioclesian, when the persecution was hot in the South part, many Christians took their refuge into the North part, where the King Crathilint received them; and for safety sent many of them into the Isle of Man, and there builded a Church unto them, that they might serve God freely. It is true, the South part did change their Inhabitants; for division falling amongst them, the one party sent for the Saxons for their aid; and these were Heathens, and subdued all the country (except that which is now called South and North Wales) and that for their prophaneness and contempt of Religion; as Gildas testifieth in a little book de excidio Britannico, which is in Bibliotheca Patr. de la Bigne tom. 5. About the year 600. Ethelbert had married Bertha (Gregory the 1. lib. 9. Epist. 59. calleth her Aldiberga) a Christian, who brought with her Lethard, a Preacher, Beda hist. lib. 1. cap. 25. calleth him a Bishop; he preached in a Church at Canterbury, called Saint Martin's, that had been long time before. When Augustine was sent by Gregory, and came thither; he stayed in the Isle of Teneet, untill he knew the King's will. Beda ibid. By means of Bertha licence was granted, and he preached before the King. After his conversion, Augustine had intelligence of the Britans, and sent unto them, and craved a meeting with them: three of them came unto him; he did speak at first fairly, and desired them to join with him in conversion of the Heathens. They answered, We have our own Bishops, without their knowledge we may do nothing. Then by authority and procurement of the King, he inviteth them to a Synod, at a place (which from him, was called Austin-oke or Austin-gate) an. 602. Seven Bishops, and one Arch-Bishop prepared to go: On the way, they came to a certain Anchorite, and did ask his counsel, whether they should leave their traditions, as they heard that Augustine did require? He answered, If he be a man of God, follow him. They say, How may we know whether he be a man of God? He answered, The Lord saith, Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, that I am humble, and meek, and lowly in heart; therefore if the man be meek, and humble in heart; it is credible, that he beareth the yoke of Christ, and offereth it to be born of others; but if he be proud, it is certain, that he is not of God, nor should we hear his words. They ask again, how they should know whether he was proud, or not? He answered, Procure you, that he, and his company, be in the place of the Synod before you; and if, when ye approach, he ariseth unto you, then ye may know, he is a servant of Christ, and hear him obediently: But if he despise you, and will not arise at your coming, who are more in number, let him be despised of you. And as this Anchorite did advise, so did they; for when they came into the place, Augustine was there, and did sit in his chair, but did not move from his place. When they saw it so, they did think of his pride; and were resolved to resist whatsoever he should propose. The sum of his Oration is, In the name of Gregory, Bishop of Rome, he chargeth them, that they should preach the Word of God unto the Saxons; that they should acknowledge him as their Arch-Bishop; keep Easter, and administer Baptism, according to the custom of the Roman Church; and although in other things, ye do contrary unto our custom (said he) yet if ye will obey in these three things, we will willingly bear with other things. The Britans answer, We will do none of those things which thou requirest; nor will we acknowledge thee for our Arch-Bishop. Beda hist. lib. 2. cap. 2. Especially Dinot, an Abbot, said, They were not obliged to preach unto their enemies, seeing the Saxons had spoiled them of their lands; and did still continue to prey upon them. For the celebration of Easter, and administration of Baptism, they defend themselves by the authority of the Eastern Church, and their own continual practice by Joseph of Arimathea; which they do judge of no less authority, then that of the Roman Church was, which Augustine did barely object. Beda. loc. cit. If we consider the proposition of the one, and the answer of the other, we may see the points of difference were many; whereof four are expressed, and the rest are couched, in generality; of the particulars let the Reader judge; but the greatest was the matter of subjection. So before that time, they knew of no such thing, as the subjection of their Church unto the Roman Church. Then did he menace them, that if they would not submit, they should feel the force of enemies: Beda expoundeth this, as proceeding from the spirit of prophecy: But the Authour of Catal. test. ver. lib. 6. sheweth (from Galfrid a Cardinal, who about the year 1150. did write Histor. Britan.) when Edelbert King of Kent, saw that the Britans refused subjection unto Augustine, and disdained to preach unto them, he took it very ill; and did stir up Edilfrid King of Northumberland, and the other little Kings of the Saxons, to raise an Army, and to cut off Dinot and those Presbyters who had despised them. They followed his counsel, and when they had levied a great Army, they entred into the Province of the Britans; came unto Leicester, where Bremael, Mayor of the City, was waiting on them; innumerable Monks and Eremites did come to that City from sundry Provinces of the Britans; namely from the City Bangor, that they might pray for the safety of their own people: There Edelfrid fought with Bremael, who had the least number, yet made great havoc on the enemy, but at last fled. Then Edelfrid entred the City, and knowing for what end they were gathered there, he commandeth to put them to the edge of the sword; so on that day 1200. of them were honoured with martyrdom (saith he) and obtained place in the Kingdom of Heaven. When that Saxon Tyrant was going against Bangor, his madness being made known, he was rencountred by these Dukes of the Britans, Blederic of Cornubia, Margadud of Demeti, and Caduan of Venedoti; in the fight they wound him, and cause him to take the flight; and of his Army they slue 10066. and on the Britans side Blederic was slain, who was Commander in chief. B. Parker in Antiquit. Britan. cap. 18. sheweth out of Aman. Xerxes, a Friar Minorite, that this War was raised for their disobedience to Augustine; and the Saxons, who were converted, would have them to obey him. And hence it is gathered to be false, which some alledge, that Augustine was dead before the War. See Morton in his Protestants Appeal, lib. 1. cap. 4. & 9. It remains to inquire what other things were those, among the Britans, contrary to Rome, and which of the two were erroneous. We can find the particulars expressed nowhere; but of the general, the Romish Authours of the Catholick Apology (as they call it) give us sufficient proof; for in their Text they say, It is undoubted that our neighbours, the Britans of Wales, received the faith, by the Preaching of the Apostles, and held that faith at Augustin's coming; not being (in the mean time) altered or corrupted by the Roman Church. And in the margine they have added out of sundry Authours, affirming (say they) truly, that the Britans were converted by Joseph of Arimathea; whereof his Sepulchre yet in Glassenbury, and his Epitaph affixed thereunto, and sundry ancient monuments of that Monastery, are a sufficient proof, neither should we doubt thereof; and that the Britans, after the receiving of the faith, never forsook it for any manner of false preaching of others, nor for torments; and that this Land did never receive the doctrine and ceremonies of the Latine Church, before the coming of the Saxons; and when Augustine came hither, they were not subject to the Romish yoke; neither would acknowledge Augustine to be their Apostle. So far they. Baronius specifieth the year 35. to have been the year of the conversion of the Britans; ex M. Sc. Histor. Angl. in the Vatican Bibliothek; and Gildas loc. cit. saith, in the daies of Tiberius Cæsar. Hence it is clear, 1. That the Roman Church was not their Mother-Church. 2. By the sentence of these Romish Apologists, the Britans were not corrupted in the faith, nor subjected to the Bishop of Rome. And therefore seeing Augustine said that they were contrary to Rome in many things; it must follow, that the Romans were corrupt in many things; and especially, that they did not acknowledge the Bishop of Rome for their Patriarch. These Apologists say also (and it is likely, others do use the same deceit also) that in the end of that Synod, the Britan Bishops confessed, that it was the right way of justice and righteousness which Augustine taught. But it is clear from Beda, that the Britans did oppose all that he spoke; and they who said so, were at the first meeting, when Augustine had not discovered himself. Likewise out of the Interrogatories that Augustine sent unto Gregory the I. and are, with the answers, in the end of Gregory's works; it is easie to be seen, that the first Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, was no learned Clark, but very superstitious; and especially, in the eighth answer, that he was ambitious, in that he did aim to have the Bishop of France subject unto him. After the death of Augustine, Laurence (who did come from Rome with him) took his charge; he did invite the Scots, dwelling in the same Island, unto a Synod, and thought to have found them (meliores, saith Beda lib. 2. cap. 4.) readier to his mind than the Britans were; but he found no less opposition by them, for the Scots differed nothing from the Britans; Dagan and Columban did refuse all communion with him, and would not lodge in the same Inn where any Romish Bishop was. If we compare all these premises, we may see the cause why our Writers have spoken so diversly of Augustine; some calling the English conversion, a perversion and inebriation; and othersterming it a gracious conversion; to wit, when they consider, how Pagans, by the light of the Gospel, were brought unto the faith, though tainted with some errors; they do, with the Angels of Heaven, rejoice in remembrance of that English happiness; but when they consider, that the old Professours of the ancient faith, were by the importunity and ambition of Augustine and his successors, intralld in multitude of new inventions, and in an unjust subjection; yea and that so many were martyred by means (at least by suggestion) of Augustine, justly have they termed this work of Augustine, a perversion of the faith; so giving this twofold censure in the spirit of discretion, and not of contradiction; even as Christ knew and approved the works of Ephesus, but he had some things against her.

Difference
for Easter.

2. The difference in observing Easter was thus: The Romans in remembrance of Christ's resurrection, did observe the first Sunday, after the full Moon of March; and the Eastern Church, as also the Britans kept the fourteenth day of the Moon, on whatever day of the week it fell. For this matter was no small debate between the Greek and Latine Churches long before; as also in Britain about the year 657. betwixt Finnan a Scot, and Bishop of Lindsarn; and Ronan another Scot, and coming lately from Rome: Finnan was so revered by the Romish faction, that nothing was altered in his daies; and he writ a book Pro veteri Paschatis ritu, Beda hist. lib. 3. cap. 25. This jar was renewed about the year 670. by Wilfrid, Bishop of York, who had been at Rome. Colman a Scot, and Successour of Finnan; and Cedda (who afterwards was Bishop of York) defend the old custom; alledging (as is before) that this Island had received their rites from Asia, and had kept them, from the beginning of their conversion, untill this time. Wilfrid, and Agilbert a Bishop, and Agatho a Priest, and James a Deacon, said, Rome should be preferred above Asia; because the bones of Peter were at Rome: Colman answereth, that Anatolius, and Eusebius Pamphili, do

evidently declare what were the rites of Asia, and the same were received from John the Evangelist; and were followed by Columba, whom they could not deny to have been a good and devote man. Wilfrid replieth, The authority of Peter is greater; for Christ said to him, Thou art Peter---and to thee will I give the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven. Then another question was propounded, concerning the shaving of the Clergy mens heads, which the Scots did refuse: But Beda hath not recorded the dispute. In the end, King Oswin said, Seeing these rites were received by Saint Peter, and now he is Porter of Heaven, I will follow him, lest he thrust me back when I come thither. Beda loc. cit. When Colman saw that the authority of a rude Prince did overweigh, he would stay no longer; but excluded his Bishoprick with Eata Abbot of Melrose; and thereafter he carried a Convent of Monks into one of the Isles Hebrides, where they lived by the works of their hands, Beda ibid. cap. 26. Wilfrid after that contest, was accused of pride and misdemeanours; but refused to answer, and fled. Then Theodore, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, set another in his place: thus the controversy for Easter, was ended in England. And to end it altogether, after other contests about the year 716, Ecbert or Bereft (as some call him) an English man, did so prevail amongst the Scots, that Easter was kept in the Isle Hu, after the Romish manner the 24. of April, but he died suddenly. The suddenness of his death, Beda lib. 5. cap. 23. calleth a confirmation of his doctrine. He might as well have said, The Lord did approve the fact of Lot's wife.

3. About the year 600. Brude King of Peichts (though a Christian) had conjunct Wars with Ethelfrid King of Northumberland, against Aidan King of Scots, and Malgo a Duke of the Britans. The Scots did prevail with great loss. The report is (saith Buchan. hist. Scot. lib. 5.) that Columba (Boetius calleth him Colm) Abbot of the Monastery in Colmkill or Jona, did assure his fellows of the victory the same hour of the fight. After some years Ethelfrid renewing his forces, came against the Scots: Aidan waited for the Britans in vain, and was put to flight with great slaughter on both sides. After that fight Columba died for grief; and Aidan was so commoved for the unlucky success, and for the want of good Columba; and for fear of the apparent danger of Christians from that cruel Pagan; that within few weeks he died. Not long after Ethelfrid was killed by the Britans, as is said before. Edwin succeedeth him, and thereafter was settled in the general government of the Saxons. Then the friends of Ethelfrid (amongst whom were his seven sons and one daughter) fearing cruelty, fled into Scotland. King Eugenius the 4. son of Aidan, not regarding the hostility of their fathers, accepted them, and caused them to be instructed in the Christian faith. Edwin was slain in Battel an. 633. by Penda King of Mercia, and Kedwalla King of the Britans; there was never a more cruel Battel in this Island; for Penda pursued the new converted Christians, and Kedwalla would destroy the Saxons; wherefore their rage did spare neither age nor sex, Buchan. hist. Then Northumberland was divided into two Kingdomes, Osfrich cousin german of King Edwin, was King of Deira; and Eanfrid, or Andefrid, the eldest son of Ethelfrid, was King of Bervici or North part; they were both Christians, the one instructed by Paulin, Bishop of York; and the other in Scotland, but they both made apostasie, in the first year, and were slain by Kedwalla. Beda hist. lib. 3. cap. 1. Oswald the second son of Ethelfrid, succeeded unto them, and overthrew Kedwalla. Oswald did hold nothing so dear, as to promote the Christian religion; and sent unto Donal the 4. King of Scots, for Preachers, when Segenius was Abbot of Colmkill; because the Scots language was not understood by his Saxons: Oswald would often expound sentences or passages of their Sermons; for in the time of his exile he had learned that language. Amongst these Preachers, the worthiest was Aidan, the first Bishop of Lindsarn; he had no care of earthly things: what was given him by the King, or Potent men, he was wont to part it amongst the poor at the first occasion. He ceased not to go from town to town, and from house to house; not on horse, but on foot, alwaies catechizing whether he met with rich or poor; if they were Pagans, he taught them; if they were Christians, he confirmed them in the faith; and exhorted unto the works of piety and charity; especially, to read the Scriptures diligently: he died an. 651. Beda lib. 3. cap. 4 & 5. From Northumberland the Word of God was spread among many others of the Saxon Kingdoms. Pope Honorius sent Byrinus unto the West Saxons. Ibid. cap. 7. Last of all Suffex, or the South Saxons, and the Isle of Wight were converted. Fox in Atk. & moni. Siebert King of Essex, had learned the Christian faith in France; and opened the first School in Cambridge, an. 636. Paul. Iovius in Angl. reg. Chron. He was perswaded by his Monks to enter into a Cloister; as if it had been a shame or sin, to reign with David; his end was lamentable, for when he had given over his Kingdom to his cousin Egrik; the fore-named Penda entred his Kingdom with an army; his Subjects forced him to go into the fields, where both he and Egrik were slain, an. 652. His son Penda was baptized by Finnan, and accepted as a Bishop and Presbyter from him, for instructing his Subjects. Beda lib. 3. cap. 21.

4. Ferchard II. King of the Scots, was odious to all his Subjects, for his impiety against God, cruelty against men, for covetousness and drunkenness; he spared not the life of his own wife, and defiled his two daughters. Herefore he was separated from the Communion of the Church; and the Nobility did speak of putting him to death; or to do unto him, as they had done to Ferchard the I. But the fore-named Colman stayed them, and assured them before him, that God would shortly punish him. Within few daies, as he was hunting, a Wolf did bite him; and he became aguish, and then vermin did consume his body. Then he with tears did confess that he had deserved all these things for vilipending the admonitions of Colman. Who said, he should be of good courage, and trust in God, whose mercy is greater to a penitent sinner, then any sin of man can let him. To shew his repentance, Ferchard caused to cover his bed with course coverlets, and carry him abroad where he might make publick confession of his sins; he died an. 664. Boet. hist. lib. 9. cap. 21.

of Britain.*

5. From Colmkill, as a most famous Seminary of learning, at that time sprang forth, not only who did resist the beginnings of Antichristian pride at home, and in our neighbour country, but they sowed the seed of the Gospel in other Nations. Such was that famous Rumold, about the year 600. who was called Mechliniensis Apostolus. Gallus brought Helvetia from Paganism, and (as Pappus in hisor. convers. gent. witnesseth) built sundry Monasteries there. Columban a man of excellent holiness and learning (saith Trithemius) lived sometime in Bangor in Ireland, and thence went into Burgundy, where he began the Monastery Luxovien; and taught the Monks of his own Country, especially to live by the works of their own hands, Bernard in Vita Malachie cap. 5. Afterwards because he rebuked Theodorick for his leacherous life, he was forced to flee, and visited sundry parts of Germany; thence he went into Italy, and began another Abbey on the Apennin Hills beside Bobium in Tuscany. Platin. in Bonifac. 4. Levin was industrious for the name of Christ; about the year 630. he turned many to the faith about Ghent and Esca; but some hardned person killed him; he was held in such

reverence, that 200. years after his death, his body, as a holy monument, was carried from Church to Church; and at last an. 1007. it was layed in the Church of Saint Bavo in Ghent. Furseus and his brother Fullan, with two Presbyters Gobban and Dicul, obtained land from Sigebert King of Essex; and built the Abbey of Cnobsherburch; then bewailing the oppression of that country by Penda; he commendeth the charge of that Monastery unto his brother; and passing into France, he began the Abbey at Latiniac, where he died. He was famous for his piety, and Beda lib. 3. cap. 19. speaks of his visions and miracles. Diuma was ordained first Bishop of Mercior, where he converted many unto the faith, in the reign of the Christian Penda; and for rare gifts the Bishoprick of Middlesex was committed to his charge, ib. cap. 21. unto whom succeeded Cella a Scot. Also Florentius went to Argentine or Strawsburg, and was the first Bishop thereof; he opened the first School in Alsacia about the year 669. he is said by his prayers to have restored Rathildis, the daughter of Dagobert King of France, unto her sight and tongue, whereas she had been both blind and dumb. Chilian or Kilian the first Bishop of Herbiopolis or Wortsburg, did first instruct the people of East France (saith Bale, or high Germany, as Io. Pappus speaketh) in the Christian faith an. 668. because he rebuked Goibert, Prince of Herbiopolis, first privately, but in vain; then publickly for having his brothers wife Geilana, she caused him to be slain; Colonat a Priest, and Thetnat a Deacon, followed him in all his travels, and were put to death with him. Burcard or Rurcard succeeded after him, to whom Pipin gave a Dukedom; and from hence among all the Bishops of Germany, only the Bishop of Herbiopolis, carrieth a Sword and Priest's Gown in his badge, Hen. Olaus in Nomencl. Unto these Scots, Io. Pappus joineth some Britans, as Willibrod Reformer of Frisia; and two brethren Evaldi, the one surnamed the Black; and the other, the White. D. Morton in his Appeal, seems to doubt what doctrine they did teach; because of the diverse opinions concerning them (they lived about the year 689.) yet Io. Pappus saith plainly, They converted the Westphalians to the Christian faith, and suffered martyrdom near Brema. Io. Bale sheweth their death, the barbarous people slue the younger with the edge of the sword; and they tormented the elder with a lingering death, and pulled in sunder his members; and at last threw them both into the River.

6. Pope Agatho sent John (the arch-chanter of Saint Peters in Rome) into England, to compose the difference betwixt Honorius and Wilfrid, the two Arch Bishops; and withall, to deliver them the Acts of Pope Martin the I. and to teach them to sing the Liturgy, according to the custom of Rome, Beda lib. 4. cap. 18. Upon this occasion, Sir Henry Spelman, sheweth out of an old Manuscript, a Catalogue of twelve or thirteen Liturgies, that were then used; and others have other forms that he hath not. Behold Novations are multiplied. Novations.

7. Benedictus Biscopius, a Noble-man of England, was famous for his journey to Rome in the service of the Church; and for bringing many books into the Monasteries of Tinnmouth and Wirmouth. The first glass in this Island is said to be his gift.

8. Here it is to be marked, what Beda in hist. lib. 3. cap. 26. relateth of the manners in this time. In these daies (saith he) they never came into a Church, but only for hearing the word and prayer [no word of the Mass;] the King would come with five or six, and he stayed till the prayer was ended. All the care of these Doctours was to serve God, and not the world; to feed souls, and not their own bodies; wherefore in these daies, a religious habit was much revered; so that wheresoever a Clark or Monk did come, he was accepted as a servant of God; and if he were seen journeying, they were glad to be signed with his hand, or blessed with his mouth; and they gave good heed unto the words of his exhortation: and on the Lord's day, they came in flocks unto the Church or Monasteries, not to refresh their bodies [not to hear Masses] but to hear the word; and if any Priest entered into a Village, incontinently all the people would assemble, being desirous to hear the word of life; for neither did the Priests go into Villages, upon any other occasion, except to preach, or visit the sick; or in a word, to feed souls. These Clarks did so abhor the filthy pest of Covetousness, that they would not accept any lands or possessions for building Monasteries, unless they had been compelled with secular power. Out of this, Io. Bale Cent. 14. appr. 21. hath marked, that whereas Beda was wont, before this time, to call the Preachers, Presbyters; now he calleth them Priests, when they had but lately received shaven crowns as the mark of the Beast. At that time also (saith he) the Clergy, and Monks, in England had liberty to marry; he nameth some, and then saith, and others without number.

OF COUNCELS.

*Synodes were
Kings.*

1. OF all the Councils in this Century (excepting these at Rome) it is said generally, that they were called by the authority of Princes within their Dominions; as is plain out of the first words of each of them almost (but never any syllable to the contrary) where it is read, By command, or at the calling of the King; or, The King commanding. Of the General Council at Constantinople (in this point) is spoken before. Concerning France, we see in Gregory the I. lib. 9. Ep. 52, 53, 54. the Bishop calleth not a Council; but beseecheth the King to call one: his words are, Iterata vos pro vestra magna mercede ahortatione pulsamus, ut congregati Synodum jubetis. In England a Synod, An. 694. beginneth thus, Withred the glorious King of Kent, with the reverend Arch Bishop Brithwald, hath commanded the Synod to be assembled in the place called Bacancelot; the most gracious King of Kent Withred preceding [Nota] in the same Synod; and the same reverend Primate of Britan; and also Tobias, Bishop of Rochester, with Abbots, Abbotteses, Presbyters, Deacons, Dukes and Counts; together considering of the affairs of the Churches of God in England, &c. Sir Henry Spelman in Concil. & constitut. pag. 191. This is to be marked against the Papists who hold now, that a Synod cannot be convened, but by the authority of the Pope. Bellarmin. de conc. lib. 1. cap. 12.

Bracara.*

2. About the year 610. was the second Council, at Bracara or Braga in Portugal. 1. Out of the Greek Councils many Acts were read and ratified. Ca. 2. If any Bishop exercise not his calling, in the Church committed unto him, he ought to be excommunicated; and if afterwards, through compulsion, he will obey, let the Synod use their discretion concerning him. Ca. 19. A Bishop, being called unto a Synod, should not contemn, but go; and if he can, he should teach things profitable to the good of the Church, and of others; or he should hear, if he be ignorant; but if he will not go, he should be guilty of censure by the Synod. Ca. 45. It shall not be lawfull to read or sing from the Pulpit, but to them who are approved by the Church. Ca. 84. If any man enter into a Church, and hear the word; and then withdraw himself from the Sacrament, let him be excommunicated, till he shew the fruits of repentance.

3. The

3. The Authour of Catalog. test. verit. sheweth out of Aventi. Annal. lib. 3. Synod in Bo-that under Lotharius was a Synod in Bojaria, against the new ceremonies of Jaria.
Columban and Gallus; but he declareth not what they were. But we have seen, that these two were Scots, and did not agree with Augustine nor Lawrence, and did oppose their Ceremonies.

4. An. 618. Was the IV. Council (called the Universal) at Toledo, of The IV. Synod
70. Bishops. Ca. 2. It pleaseth all the Priests who embrace the unity of the at Toledo.
Catholic faith, that from henceforth we have no variety nor contrariety of rites in the Church; lest any difference amongst us, seem unto strangers and carnal men, to favour of error, and give occasion of scandal to any; therefore let one order of praying and singing be kept thorough all Spain and Galicia, and no more diversity; because we are in one faith, and one Kingdom; although the old Canons heretofore, ordained each Province to keep their own rites. Ca. 6. Some Parishes are noted, who have no preaching on the Friday before Easter; now it is decreed, to preach of Christ's passion that day; that people may be the better prepared to receive the Sacrament of Christ's Body and Blood, on the Feast of the resurrection. Ca. 7. Because the Universal Church passeth that whole day in sorrow and abstinence for the Lord's passion; whosoever on that day, except little ones, and old or sick persons, should interrupt the Fast until the Church service be done, let him be debarred from the joy of Easter; and not be admitted to the Sacrament of the Lord's Body and Blood. Ca. 9. Because some Priests in Spain do omit to say the Lord's prayer, except on Sunday in publick service; therefore it is decreed, that every day both in publick and private worship, none of the Clergy omit the Lord's prayer; under pain of Deposition: seeing Christ hath prescribed this, saying, When ye pray, say, Our Father----and it is called the daily prayer, by the Doctours and Fathers. Ca. 16. The book of Revelation should be read yearly in the Church, between Easter and Whitsunday. Ca. 18. A pernicious custom should not be kept; contempt of ancient statutes hath perturbed all the order of the Church; while some by ambition, and others by gifts, do usurp Priesthoods and Bishopricks; and some prophane men and souldiers, unworthy of such honour, have been admitted into the holy order; they should be removed: But lest great scandal arise in the Church (what hath been done is past) it is expedient to prescribe, who shall not hereafter be admitted into the Priesthood; that is, he who hath been convicted of any infamous crime; who by publick repentance hath confessed gross sins; who hath fallen into heresie; who hath been baptized in he-resie, or is known to be rebaptized; who hath married a second wife, or widow, or divorced, or corrupt woman; who hath concubines or whores; unknown men or young Scholars, who have been Souldiers or Courtiers; who are ignorant of Letters; who are not 30. years old; who ascendeth not by the degrees of the Church; who seeketh honour by ambition or gifts; who were chosen by their Predecessours; whom the People and Clergy of the City have not chosen, or the authority of the Metropolitan, and consent of the comprovincial Priests have not required. Whosoever is required unto the Office of a Priest, and is not found guilty in one of these, and his life and doctrine being approved, according to the Synodal Decrees; he should be consecrated by all the comprovincial Bishops, at least by three, upon a Sab-both day; and the rest sending their Letters of approbation; and especially by the authority, and presence, of the Metropolitan. A comprovincial Bishop should be consecrated, in the place where the Metropolitan should chuse him;
the Metropolitan should not be consecrated, but in his own See, when the Comprovincials were assembled. Ca. 24. Priests are commanded to read the Scriptures diligently, that all their doings might serve for instruction to the people, in knowledge of faith, and good example of life. Ca. 35. Every Bishop should visit his Diocē, once every year, in proper person; and if sickness or weightier business did hinder him, then by the most grave Priests. Ca. 46. At command of our Lord and King Sisenand, the holy Council ordaineth, That all Clerks for the service of Religion, should be exempt from all charges and labours of the Common-Wealth. Ca. 74. So great is the falshood of many Nations (as they report) that they keep not their Oath of fidelity unto their Kings; and in a word, they feign the profession of an oath, but retain in their minds the impiety of falshood; they swear unto their Kings, and transgress against their Oath, nor fear they the judgement of God against perjurers: What hope can such have when they War against their enemies? What faithfulness can other Nations expect in peace? What Covenant shall not be violated, since they keep not their Oaths unto their own Kings? If we will eschew the wrath of God, and if we desire him to turn his severity into clemency; let us keep religious duty, and fear God, and our promised fidelity to our Princes; let there be no ungodly subtleties of infidelity amongst us, as amongst some Nations; let none of us presumptuously usurp the Kingdom; let none raise seditions amongst the Subjects; let none attempt the murder of Kings, but when the King is departed in peace, let the Nobles of the Realm, with the Priests, in a Common-Council of the Kingdom, appoint a Successour; that when the unity of concord is kept by us, no dissension can arise by violence or ambition; and whosoever among us, or of all the people of Spain, by any conspiracy or design whatsoever, should violate the Sacrament of his promise, that he hath promised for the standing of his Country and Kingdom of Goths, or for safety of the King; or attempt to murder the King, or to deprive him of his Royal Power, or by presumptuous tyranny shall usurp the Kingdom; let him be accursed in the sight of God the Father, and of the Angels; and let him be debarred from the Holy Church, which he hath defiled with perjury, and let him be estranged from the assembly of Christians, with all the complices of his impiety; because they all should be subject in the same punishment, who are guilty of the same fault. Which we repeat, saying again, Whosoever among us, &c.

Synod at Altitudore.

5. About the year 616. was a Council at Altitudore or Auticum. Ca. 5. All vigils which were wont to be kept to the honour of God, are forbidden, as divinations. Ca. 18. It is not lawfull to baptize at any time, except at Easter; unless it be such that are neer unto death, who are called grabbata-ryj. Ca. 21. It is not lawfull for a Presbyter, after he hath received the blessing, to sleep in a bed by a Presbyteress. Here they ordain not to put away the wives, nor forbid they cohabitation; but sleeping together. Ca. 40. A Presbyter should not sing nor dance at a feast. In this Council 7 Abbots, and 34 Presbyters had decisive votes and subscribe.

The VIII. Synod at Toledo.

6. About the year 650. was the VIII. Council at Toledo, to the number of 52 Bishops; where first was recited, and approved a rule of faith (little differing from the Nicene Creed) as taught by the Apostles, allowed by the Orthodox Fathers, and approved by the Holy Councils; here is no mention of Christ's descending into Hell, and in the IV. Council at Toledo, that article was not omitted. In many of all these Spanish Councils, the sleeping of Presbyters with their wives, is condemned as sinfull and execrable; but some would maintain their liberty, and would not obey, as is manifest in the sixth and seventh chapters of this Council.

Synod at Cabilone.

7. In the year 655. was a Council of 45 Bishops at Cabella or Cabilone in Burgundy. Ca. 1. The fore-named Creed is approved. Ca. 10. When a Bishop

Bishop of any City dieth, another should be chosen, only by the Clergy and indwellers of the same Province, otherwise the election is nul. Ca. 17. if any shall move a tumult, or draw a weapon, in a Church, so giving scandal; let him be debarred from the Communion. Ca. 18. We not ordaining a new thing, but renewing the old, do ordain, That no manner of husbandry-work, be done on the Lords-day. Ca. 19. Many things fall out, that are lightly punished; it is known to be very unseemly, that unholy Feasts, women in tribes use to sing filthy songs; when they ought to be praying or hearing prayers; therefore Priests should abolish such things; and if such persons continue in their wickedness, let them be excommunicated.

8. About the year 673. was a Synod at Hertford or Herudford in England; Synod at Hertford. where it was decreed, 1. That Easter should be kept, thorow the Realm, on the Sunday, the 14. day of the Moon, in the first month. Hence it is clear, that then they did reckon March to be the first month, after the manner of the Jews; which was the custom in Scotland till the year 1603. and is still the custom of England; whereupon ariseth difference in computation of years. 2. No Bishop should meddle with the Diocy of another. 3. No Clark shall forsake his own Bishop, and go into another Diocy, without Letters of commendation from his own Bishop. 4. Provincial Synods should be observed, at least, once a year. 5. Let no Bishop prefer himself before another, but by priority of their consecration. 6. Let no man put away his wife, except (as the Gospel teacheth) it be for fornication; and if he put her away, let him remain unmarried. Beda hist. Angl. lib. 4. cap. 5.

9. In the year 682. was the general Council of 150. Bishops (or as some write 171.) at Constantinople, against the heresie of the Monothelites. The VI. general Council at Constantinople. Of this Council somewhat was spoken before. Here the Emperour Constantine was present, and President, propounding, questioning, commanding silence upon occasions, ruling, and dismissing in every Session; or in his absence, a Nobleman, whom he ordained. The Nobleman sate on his right hand; and on his left, were the Legates of Pope Agatho, George Bishop of Constantinople, Macarius Bishop of Antiochia; some Presbyters for the Bishops of Alexandria and Jerusalem (for then these two Cities were under the Sarazens) and the other Bishops. There they were accursed, who hold that there is but one Will in Christ; and a Confession was published against this errour, and they made no other Canons. George did confess his errour, and did receive the sentence of the Council; but Macarius, and his Predecessours Cyrus, Sergius, Pirthus, Paul and Peter, were accursed; and Theophanius, an Abbot in Sicily, was made Bishop of Antioch. Beda de 6. atat. In the 12. Session, the Epistle of Honorius, Bishop of old Rome, unto Sergius, Bishop of Constantinople, was examined; he was anathematized, and his Epistle was condemned to the fire: *this Council sate 2. years. Within 4. or 5. years, by authority of the Emperour Justinian, the same Bishops were assembled, and about 100. more; they sate in the Palace, and therefore it is called Trulliano, from Trullo the name of the Palace; also it is called πεντήκωτη, because it was neither fifth nor sixth, yet they set in form the constitutions of both. Bellarmin. de conc. lib. 1. cap. 7. In Gratian. decr. dist. cap. 16. Habeolibrum, Peter Bishop of Nicomedia testifieth, that they made 102. Canons, which are not extant, but some are preserved. Mart. Kemniti. in examin. Conc. Triden. pag. 3. citeth from Nilus, Bishop of Thessalonica, and the Greek Nomocanon; the thirteenth Canon in these words, Because we understand, that it is delivered in the Roman Church as a Canon, that they who are thought worthy of the Order of a Deacon or Presbyter, should profess, that they should not bed with their own wives thereafter, We following the ancient Canon of Apostolical, genuine, and orderly constitution, ordain, That the lawfull cohabitation of holy men, with their own wives, from this day, in time coming, should be valid, ratified, and firm; no way dissolving their conjunction with their own wives, or depriving them of conjugal society, which is in due time; and therefore he who is thought worthy the honour of a sub-Deacon, or Deacon, or a Presbyter, shall not be hindered from that degree, because he dwelleth with his lawfull wife; neither shall it be required of him at his ordination; or shall he be compelled to profess, that he shall or should abstain from lawfull copulation with his own wife; and yet they shall not have copulation with their own wives indifferently, but shall abstain in time of their course: and therefore if any shall presume, contrary to the Apostolical Canons, to deprive Deacons and Priests (after ordination) of society with their lawfull wives; let him be deposed; and also they who are ordained, if they put away their wives, under pretext of piety; let them be excommunicated. Hence it appeareth, that the Council did defend the marriage of Church-men to be Apostolical and orderly; and therefore the contrary constitution of the Roman Church, was not ancient, Apostolical nor orderly. And nevertheless the same Council saith, Ca. 3. Because the Roman See, in respect of the marriage of Priests, hath observed the highest rigour; and the Constantinopolitan Antinean meekness or gentleness, let us set a middle between the two, &c. And so they ordain, that who is twice married, or who hath married a widow, or a divorced, or a servant, or a whore, should not henceforth be admitted: and the liberty of Priests, which in Ca. 13. is called Apostolical; is denied unto Bishops in Ca. 12. and the wife of a Bishop, is ordained to go into a Monastery, Ca. 48. And Priests, Deacons and sub-Deacons, are forbidden to marry from thenceforth. When they say, from thenceforth; they declare that it was lawfull before. These Canons are also in Gratian's Decrees, with great alteration; but the known practice of the Greek Church, sheweth the reality of these Canons. Likewise in Ca. 55. they say, Because we have found, that some in the Roman Church, in time of Lent, do fast on the Sabbath daies, contrary to the received custom of the Church; it seemeth good unto this sacred Synod, that the Canon shall also bind, every way, the Roman Church: which [Canon] saith, If any Clerk should be found to fast on the Lord's day or Sabbath, except one Sabbath only; let him be deposed: and if he be a Laick; let him be excommunicated. The Papishes in these daies do glory, saying, That the Roman Church is the Mother-Church, Judge of all Churches, and can be judged of none: But behold! In this Synod a Bishop of Rome, is condemned in two particulars. And in Ca. 36. it is decreed, That the See of Constantinople hath (and should have) equal Priviledges with the See of Rome; and in Ecclesiastical matters be equally magnified Gratian, decr. dist. 23. Edit. Paris. an. 1585. where the gloss saith, that the Canon is amended from a manuscript in Greek.

*The XI. Synod
at Toledo.*

10. In the year 684. was the XI. Council at Toledo. There first Quiricus the Metropolitan, lamenteth the long omission of National Councils, and the X. was held an. 674. Ca. 2. So far as one excelleth another in honour of preferment; so far ought he to excel in godliness, by having continually in his mouth the sword of Truth; and in his hand the work of Light; for we should at all times be mindfull of the degree of order, and manner of conversation; seeing we have taken upon us the Office of preaching; and no care ought to distract us from reading the Scriptures: therefore who are advanced to eminent places, ought to take care that they who are within their charge, perish not by famine of the Word; also Metropolitans should watch over their neighbours, and others subject unto them, and each Prelate over his inferiours. Ca. 4. As every one who loveth his brother, is born of God; so every one who hateth his brother, is of the Devil. Now it is dilated unto us, that some Priests love not their brethren; nor the Sun-setting (as Paul exhorteth) bringeth them from wrath; neither the yearly course of time hath brought them to the grace of love; to wit, the Sun of righteousness hath gone from their hearts: therefore we ordain, that such Priests presume not to come nigh the Altar, to receive the grace of communion, untill they be knit together in true reconciliation. Ca. 15. It pleaseth to ordain, that according to the determination of our Fathers, we should be ready to assemble, once in the year, at the time the will of the King, or the Metropolitan shall appoint; and if any Bishop absent himself, except at inevitable necessity; let him be punished with excommunication for a year. There also it is decreed, that no Bishop, or other Clark, should meddle with the judgement of blood; under the punishment of perpetual excommunication: That they who are ordained Bishops, shall give their Oath, before they be received into their Episcopal seat, that they neither have given, nor shall give unto any man, any reward for purchasing their dignity. Here many abuses of discipline in the Roman Church are condemned.

between the Emperour
and the Bishop of Rome, both of them
mixing a good cause with an

PHILIPPICUS was crowned an. 712. He was eloquent and infortunate; in his time the Bulgarians wasted Thracia, and the Sarazens prevail mightily in Asia; he was a Monothelite; he deposed Cyrus Patriarch of Constantinople, and advanced John in his See. In a Synod he accurseth all the Bishops of the sixth general Council, and sent the Acts of this Synod unto Pope Constantine, willing him to subscribe them. Who refuseth, and set up all the pictures of those Bishops who had been in the Council, in the Gallery of Saint Peter. When Philippicus heard that, he caused thorow all the royal City to cast down all the images of those Bishops; and he commanded, that all images should be taken out of all the Churches throughout the Empire. Then Constantine assembled a Synod at Rome, and decreed, that images should be worshipped with great reverence; and brought the Emperour in contempt, calling him a Schismatick, a Monothelite, &c. And the people of Rome called him an Usurper, and not Emperour; and ordain, that no mention should be made of his name in publick or private Acts; and that no Medals should bear the name of that Heretick, either in brass, silver or lead, &c. Neither was his image brought into any Church, or his name mentioned in the Mass, Abb. Vrsperg. in Chron. Edda de sex atat. The Emperour contemneth this manner of proceeding, saying, It was contrary to the practice of David towards Saul, even when the Spirit had left him; and contrary to Christ, who refused not to pay Tribute to the heathen Cæsar; and to Peter, who exhorted Christians in Pontus (where were most cruel Kings) to fear the King. Philippicus reigned not above one year and six months; for (as Zonaras writes) when he had invited his Senatours unto a Feast; after dinner they laid hands on him, picked out his eyes, and cast him into Prison. Thus began the controversie of images, and untill that time the worship of images was not confirmed by Decree; and we may learn, that images at first

were put into Churches for history only; for who can imagine that they would set up the images of all these Bishops to be worshipped? Both the Emperor and the Pope did mix a good cause with a bad. All the Emperours following (except Theodosius) for the space of 160. years, did condemn the worship of images, and the error of the Monothelites.

2. ANASTASIUS Antemius was Secretary to Philippicus, and then elected by the Senators of Constantinople. He approved the Acts of the sixth Council, and writ to Pope Constantine that he was a follower of the Catholic faith. Bedaloc. cit. He deposed John, the Heretical Bishop of Constantinople, and did put Germanus in his place: he sent a great Army against the Sarazens in Ægypt, but his Army within few daies left the Siege of Alexandria, because he made John, a Priest, their General; they kill him, and salute Theodosius (a Treasurer) Emperour against his will. When they returned through Asia unto Constantinople, Anastasius met them; and after a fight at Nice, when he heard that the Constantinopolitans had given their keys unto Theodosius, he rendreth himself, and voweth to become a Monk, if they would do him no more harm: So he was sent into Thessalonica in the 15. month of his Empire. Zonar. & Mexia.

3. THEODOSIUS was unfit for government, and set up images in the Churches. In the second year, his souldiers proclaim Emperour Leo their General. Theodosius would not fight, but turned Monk; and so did his son Theodosius, after he had such assurance, as he gave to Anastasius.

4. LEO Isaurus received the Crown. An. 717. In the beginning of his reign the Sarazens, raised such a huge Navy of Ships and Souldiers, that it was thought the World would be a prey unto them: Leo durst not resist them; so they did overrun all Thracia; they pass thorow Greece into Bulgaria, only the Bulgarians prepared some resistance. The Sicilians despair of aid from Leo, and chuse a King Tiberius. When Leo had been in this perplexity three years, and the country had been plagued with famine and pestilence; then Leo and all they who had been imprisoned within the Walls of Constantinople, gave themselves unto continual and earnest prayers. God heard their cries, and within a short space, partly by the death of Amurathes, and dissension amongst the Sarazens about the election; partly by extreame famine and coldness on land; and partly by storms on Sea, that fearful enemy was brought to nought, Beda de sex atat. and Leo possesseth all that he had before in the Continent and Isles. The Mahumetans spake against nothing so much amongst the Christians, as against the worship of images; and therefore Leo would have taken them out of the Churches, but was obstructed by Germanus the Patriarch. Wherefore he assembleth a Council, an. 730. where the question was discussed, and images were condemned: Germanus would not subscribe, and renounceth his Bishoprick; the Synod placed Anastasius in his chair, Paul. Diacon. lib. 2. rerum Roman. Then Leo causeth the images and statues to be burned in the market streets; he did inhibit the worship of them; and sent unto Pope Gregory the II. to do the like at Rome, and through Italy; and shewed how he, in a Synod, had caused to be examined, the controversies against the worshipping of images; the intercession of Saints, and the keeping of relicks of the dead: he had found that intercession of Saints was a fable; the worship of images was idolatry, and contrary to God's Word; and the keeping of relicks is become superstitious. The Pope holdeth another Synod at Rome, and excommunicateth the Emperour, perswading the greatest part of Italy, that they should not acknowledge the Emperour; as amongst the Greeks writ Zonar. and some late Papists; but Paul. Diaconus (who did live not long thereafter) writ that all the people and souldiers of Ravenna and Venice, did resist the Emperours precept; so that the revolt of Italy began at the people and souldiers, and not in a Synod; and all do accord, that the Election of the Emperour was stayed at that time, by the Pope; and we find, that after that time, the Romans sought aid from the Emperour, as their Sovereign: and Sabell. Ennead. 8. lib. 7. addeth another reason, that Italy was vexed by the Lombards, without any help from the Greeks; so that sundry Cities in Italy then did chuse Dukes to themselves. The Pope did hinder the election of another Emperour, because he thought Leo would take to heart what was done and attempted, and would be better advised. Blond. lib. 10. dec. 1. Also another conspiracy was moved in Greece, by the worshippers of images; the chief were Agallian and Stephen, who levied an Army: the Imperialists rencountred them by the way, and burned their Ships; many souldiers were drowned; Agallian leaped into the Sea; Stephen and some others were taken, and beheaded at Constantinople, Zonaras and Bellarmin call them Martyrs, de imag. Sanct. lib. 2. cap. 6. In the mean time some call Leo a Tyrant. He answered, they were justly punished, who neither worshipped God, nor revered the Imperial Majesty; but did oppose themselves unto the laws. At that time John Damascenus, was a Patron of images in Syria; and he, with some Bishops and Monks, excommunicateth the Emperour. Nevertheless he continueth in his purpose, nothing afraid of their vain curses and opprobrious words; they call him εἰκονομαχ & ῥεῖσμα, a fighter against images and God. Then doth Luithprand, King of the Lombards, make conquest of Italy and besiege Rome. Gregory the III. seeing that Leo neither would nor could send aid (as the Emperours were wont to defend Rome) sent unto Charls the father of Carloman, and grand-father of Charls the Great; desiring him to defend the City from Luithprand. At the intercession of Charls, Luithprand left the siege. At that time were great Earthquakes in Bithinia and Thracia, wherein Nicomedia and Nice were sore ruined, and the Walls of Constantinople were shaken; wherefore the Emperour layeth a Tax for repairing the Walls. This gave occasion to the image-worshippers to call him covetous, and more given to lucre than government: he died of a dysentery, An. 741.

5. CONSTANTINE Copronymus succeeded his father both in Empire and religion: He made preparation of War against the Sarazens; when he was in Egypt, the worshippers of images gave out a report that he was dead (it is no new thing, that Hereticks do lie) and Artobastus was crowned Emperour, by Anastasius the Patriarch: therefore Constantine must return, he suppressed Artobastus, degraded Anastasius, and another Constantine was made Patriarch. At that time Aistulph, King of the Lombards, taketh up Arms against Rome. Pope Stephen sought to pacifie him with soft words; and when those had no place, he sent unto the Emperour, exhorting him to deliver his own Kingdom from Aistulph; who had taken the Exarchate of Ravenna, and was besieging Rome. The Emperour delayeth to send an Army, and sought to avert Aistulph by Ambassadors. The Pope thinking that the Emperour had little regard, gave himself (saith Bellarmin. de concil. lib. 2. cap. 8.) unto the patrociny of the French King; but Card. Cusanus in fascic. rer. expetend. saith, that the Emperour sent a Messenger unto Pope Stephen, and these two did obtain of Pipin, that he would comply with Aistulph to restore what he had taken from the Empire. Pipin did send, but prevailed not; thereafter he promised unto Stephen, that he would by force take those places from Aistulph, and give them to blessed Peter. When the Emperour's Ambassador heard this, he returned; whereby it is manifest

The Emperour loseth in Italy France prevailed there.

(saith Cusanus.) that Constantine gave not the Western Empire unto the Pope; and it is continually read, that the Emperour, as before, did with full power possess Rome, Ravenna, Marchia with other places; and this is proved by Gratian. dist. cap. 96. Bene quidam. The Emperour understanding what the Pope had done, and ere Pipin came the second time into Italy, sent unto Rome, promising to come unto their aid. But Pipin was then passing the Alps, and did compel Aistulph to render all the Cities that he had taken; and Pipin gave them (saith Bellarmin. de Ro. Pont. lib. 2. cap. 17.) to the Church of Rome, reserving the Princely authority over them, as followeth; and from that time (saith he) the French had Rome. Alb. Crantz. in Chron. Saxon. lib. 2. cap. 1. writing of this purpose saith, Some say that Constantine gave Italy, Germany, and I know not what other places unto the Church of Rome. It was Charls who did enrich the Roman Church, and long before the Goths in their time; and thereafter the Kings of the Lombards had given some things. The Emperour, at that time, had Wars with the Sarazens, and was like to be overthrown, if God had not stirred the Turks against the Sarazens. At that time Pipin conquered Ravenna, and called it Romandiolia, to extinguish the Republick and the name. Then the Emperour, by Ambassage, craved of Pipin to restore unto him Ravenna and other Cities, which the Lombards had taken from his Ancestours. Pipin answered, that he was Lievtenant of the Bishop of Rome; and all belonged unto Saint Peter that he had taken by Arms. So Pipin and the Pope, did joint to rob the Emperour. Thereafter Constantine set his heart to order Church-affairs; he calleth a Councel at Constantinople, where they condemn not only the worshipping, but the having of images in Churches; and then he caused them to be cast down every where, and perswaded the Christians to do the like in Armenia, Palestina, Syria, and in all other Provinces under his subjection. Immediately the Bulgarians molested the Emperour, but he forceth them to beg peace; which he granted, on condition that they would put all images out of their Churches. Then Pope Stephen, in a Synod at Rome, charged the Emperour of sundry crimes, and called him the slave of sin; let the impartial Reader consider the crimes. He misliketh the Monks, not so much for their profession, as for their hypocrisie; and therefore he calleth their habits, the garments of darknes. 2. He would not let the relicks of the dead be reserved; and called it an heathenish worship which is given unto the dead: he said also, that God would have the burial of Moses unknown unto the people; lest it might occasion idolatry amongst the Israelites. 3. He calleth intercession of Saints Fig-tree-leaves to cover idolatry. 4. He contemneth all images, and forbiddeth the worship of Mary, Zonar. But the Emperour was not afraid of the curses of Image-worshippers. Not long thereafter Desiderius, King of the Lombards, incoacheth again upon the lands of the Empire in Italy: wherefore Pope Hadrian the I. sent unto Charls the Great, then King of France, for aid; he sent also unto the Emperour. But the Emperour did so envy the Roman Bishop, and his ambition, that he was nothing sorrowfull for his grief; and when the Pope's Nuntio presented the Letters of supplication, he said, You have temporality, defend your selves; or restore unto us our lands, and we will defend you, as we are bound, Catal. test. ver. lib. 8. ex Chron. de Duc. Bavar. And because a certain Stephen, did speak in defence of the Pope, he caused him to lose his life. But Charls was glad of the occasion, and came quickly into Italy, and abolished the Kingdom of the Lombards; and confirmed the Donation of his father Pipin; and moreover, he gave other Lands and Isles unto the Church of Rome. So all Italy (except Magna Gracia, that is, Calabria, Pulia and Napels, which remained unto the Greek Emperours) was in subjection unto Charls; and from thenceforth he was called King of France and Lombardy, Patricius Romanus. The Emperour died an. 777.

6. LEO Charaza succeeded his father: he discharged from his Court James, Papias and Theophanes, because they had spoken in favour of the Image-worshippers: he took a Crown of Gold out of the Church of Saint Sophia, which was adorned with some stones of great value, and had been offered, by the Emperour Maurice, unto the image of Saint Mary; and Leo did set it upon his own head. Of these stones some were so cold, that (as Platina writeth in Adrian the I.) by coldness thereof he died shortly after, in the first year of his Reign.

7. CONSTANTINE was ten years of age, when his father died: his mother Irene governed the Empire 10. years, to the great prejudice of the Common-Wealth and Church; for the Sarazens made a great part of the Empire Tributary: she calleth a Council at Constantinople for restoring images, as followeth: she took up the body of her father-in-law, and burnt it, and cast the ashes into the Sea; because he had demolished images; she did cause the Souldiers to swear that they should not acknowledge her son, so long as she was in life; but the Armenian Band would not violate their Oath of Allegiance. The young man coming to age, caused her to renounce the government, and live without authority 7. years. He began to follow the steps of his father in demolishing images; wherefore Irene moveth a conspiracy to make his Uncle Emperour. The treason was discovered, the Traitors severely punished, and Nicephorus was banished, but he spareth his mother. Again she insnareth him, caused his eyes to be picked out, and scarcely spared his life. Then again, she alone had the Empire 4. years. Zonar. The Empire then was contained in Greece, Thracia, Magna Græcia, the Islands of Archipelagus, Sicily, Candia, and the Provinces of Asia the less.

CHAP. II.

Of P O P E S.

1. JOHN the VI. hath left little written of him, except that he repaired three Churches in three years. Platina saith, Some call him a Martyr, but he sheweth not for what nor under whom. Io. Baleus (out of Pe. Pramonstraten.) saith, he entred not lawfully, and therefore his name is not written amongst the Popes.

2. JOHN the VII. builded an Oratory unto Saint Mary, in Saint Peter's Church: he sate 2. years, and died an. 706.

3. SISINNIIUS or Zosimus. sate 20. daies.

4. CONSTANTINE was the first Pope, who had his foot kissed by an Emperour; and his Successours have been so bold as to ask it, as due unto them; which was done unto him not of self-accord only; but (as Pe. Mexia speaketh) with unmeasurable shew of humility and obedience. Hence it is, that the Pope accepteth the adorations, prostrations, and kissing of his foot; which an Angel would not accept from Saint John, saith Antonin. Bishop of Florence, Summ. Theolog. tit. 22. cap. 5. sect. 4. he giveth this reason, because the Pope is of more worth then an Angel; not indeed in nature (saith he) but in authority and representation of God; for God hath not assumed the nature of Angels, nor hath he given them the power of the keys.

But

But certainly Pope Constantine did neither require nor expect such reverence; yet having once received it, his heart was so lifted up, that he durst countermand and oppose the next Emperour. Onuphrius in his Annot. on Platin. saith expressly, that he was the first who durst withstand an Emperour to his face. Pol. Virgil. de invent. rer. lib. 4. cap. 13. marketh, that this practice was far from the mind of Saint Peter, who would not suffer the Centurion to fall down before him, Act. 10. O that many to day (saith he) would remember that they are men! Who because they have attained unto a Priesthood, do exhibit themselves the most imperious Lords, that are recorded of; neither are they common fathers, as they ought to be. Index Expurgatorius ordained to blot away these words, and not the words following immediately. And so it is come in use, that we kiss our Pope's foot; and I may say, that this is ordained by the High-Priests of Rome, that the old fashion of kissing amongst the worshippers of the Gods, should be usurped to true piety. So far he. In this Pope's time, was controversie between the Bishop of Millain, and the Bishop of Ticine for superiority. The Bishop of Millain alledged, that the other was his suffragan. The question is referred to Pope Constantine; he appointed that the Bishop of Ticine should be subject unto Saint Peter only: he late 7. years.

5. GREGORY the II. was busied in repairing of Churches, and establishing the worship of images, in despite of the Emperour Leo, as is touched. In Com. 3. Concil. is the Oath, that Boniface, Arch-Bishop of Ments, gave unto this Gregory, thus, I Boniface, Bishop by the grace of God, do promise unto you, blessed Peter, Prince of the Apostles; and to thy Vicar, blessed Peter, Gregory and his Successours, by the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, the inseparable Trinity, and this thy most holy body, That I shall shew all faithfulness and purity unto the holy Catholick faith, and continue in the unity (God working) of the same faith; in which the salvation of Christians is without doubt; that I shall for no mans perswasion, in any way, consent against the unity of the common and universal Church; but (as I said) shall exhibit my faithfulness, purity and concurrence in all things unto thee, and the utilities of thy Church; to whom the power of binding and loosing is given by the Lord God, and unto thy fore named Vicar and Successours: But if I do know, that High-Priests shall do things contrary to the ancient institutions of the holy fathers, then I will have no communion or society with them; but rather I will forbid them, if I may; or else I shall dilate it faithfully unto my Apostolical Lord: And if (which may be far from me) I shall attempt to do any thing, in any way, or upon any occasion, against the tenour of this promise, let me be found guilty of everlasting judgement, and incur the punishment of Ananias and Sapphira, who did presume to deceive even you in their own property, and to speak falsely. This tenour of Oath, I Boniface, a mean Bishop, have subscribed with my own hand, and this Oath being laid on thy most holy body have I made, God being witness and judge, which I do also promise to keep. The Author of Catal. rest. ver. lib. 8. within two pages after these words, sheweth out of Lib. Pontific. & Sabell. Ennead. That this Pope ordained 150. Bishops in several places, whom he did ingage with the same Oath. Here many particulars are remarkable, I will relate a few, 1. The Pope calleth himself not the Vicar of Christ, but of Peter; they were not as yet accustomed with that Title. 2. Though the Bishops swear by God, they are not ingaged unto God; but unto Peter and his Vicars, and the utilities of the Church; 3. The Church is not called God's Church, nor Christ's Church; but Thy Church, say they unto Peter. 4. They swear by the body of Peter, as by God. 5. They swear to continue in the purity of the ancient and holy faith, wherein they acknowledge the salvation of Christians to consist; and to maintain Peter and the utilities of his Church. But if that which they call Peter's Church, continue not in the ancient and holy faith, and only seek their own utilities; what should a Bishop do in this case? Certainly they should follow the holy faith, wherein the salvation of Christians doth consist: but this they did not; as all Histories shew. In his third Epistle unto the Clergy and People of Thuringia, he saith, We have given a command unto Boniface, that he promote not unto holy Orders, one who is bigamus twice married, or hath not married a Virgin, &c. And in his eighth Epistle, he expoundeth the word bigamus, not him who marrieth another, the former being dead; but him who having many wives together, when they are dead, will marry two other wives. Hence it appeareth, that polygamy was then amongst Christians, although contrary to the Word of Christ. He sate almost 17. years, and did die An. 731.

6. GREGORY the III. followed his Predecessour in multiplying and enriching Churches and Monasteries. In a Synod he did excommunicate all those who worship not images. Platina saith, he first brought into the Canon of the Mass, the clause for relicks, beginning, Whose solemnities too day in the sight, &c. as also the offering for the dead was established by him. In Catal. test. ver. lib. 3. is marked a forgery, in the book of Councils; to wit, Aventinus in Annal. relateth, that this Gregory in an Epistle unto the Bishops of Bavaria exhorteth, That at the command of Utilo their Duke, the Synod of Priests, Bishops, Nobles and of the Nation should be called; and their true Priests should be chosen by the accord of them all; and the wicked who have been convicted of any crime, should be deposed; the Synod should be held twice every year, for the good of the people, by the Danube, where he pleaseth. But in the third rome of Councils, the Epistle saith, In what place Boniface shall command you to convene in a Synod, whether by Danube, or in Augusta, or wheresoever he shall appoint; be ye ready to convene for the name of Christ; to the end, we may know of your meeting at his command, &c. Hence may be understood, what credit may be given unto their records that are lately written. In the same Annals is another Epistle unto Boniface, wherein Gregory ordereth to give the Communion of the Body and Blood of Christ unto the leaprous, if they be believing Christians; but not with them who are in health: He sate 10. years.

7. ZACHARIAS keepeth friendship with the Lombards, and received in gift from King Luithprand, the Territories of Sabineum, Narnia, Humana, the Valley of Sutirino; and all the lands that the King had taken from the Emperour about Emilia and Ravenna. Blond. decr. 1. lib. 10. His Predecessours had a rich Bishoprick, and he may be called the first Prince of all the Popes. At that time he called the Lombards, the Patrons of the Church; but when Aistulph would have reclaimed what was said to have been given unto the See of Rome, by his Ancestours; Zachary called the Lombards the children of the Devil, and unworthy the name of men, and he inciteth the French against Aistulph. As Pope Gregory the I. had forbidden the marriage of sisters-children; so the Epistle of Boniface unto Zachary, sheweth that Gregory the II. gave dispensation to a Noble-man in Germany, to marry his Uncle's wife; and the same woman, had married the same man's cousin-german, and had forsaken him; and in his life-time had married the other. Although this was authorized by the Pope, yet Boniface writeth to Zachary, that it was scandalous to his new converts; so that Zachary gave a command to divorce them, as his responsory Epistle beareth. Boniface complineth also of many disorders amongst the Priests; especially on New-years evening, they compass Saint Peter's Church after the same manner of the Heathens; and he complaineth of women using other Pagan rites; all which (saith he) were scandalous unto his people. Zachary resolved his scruples, not by God's Word, but by the Romish Canons; and he willett Boniface to be instant in Reformation according to these Canons, but not one word of Scripture; for he endeavourt to bring Subjects to the See of Rome, and not souls to Christ. His words are, I rejoyce of you, Beloved, that ye are converted with good affection unto him who affecteth you, a Magistrate appointed by God, and the blessed Prince of the Apostles; your faith and fame is laudable, because ye are wise, as ye should be wise; and now (God cooperating) your Holiness is gathered unto our society in one sheep-fold. Boniface did ask him, whether they might make oblations for the dead? His answer is, in Gratian. cap. 13. quest. 2. The Church holdeth that each one may offer for their dead, who were Christians, and the Priest may mention them. If this had been an Ordinance before, Boniface could not have been ignorant of it. 2. Observe that each one might offer for their dead, then the offering was not the proper work of the Priest; and till that time, sacrifice was not offered for the dead. In another Epistle unto Boniface is these words, As for these things whereof you demand, what should be received, and what refused; especially of Fowls, as Jaws, Crows and Storks, Christians should never eat of these; and far rather should they abstain from Hares, Bevers and wild Stags. Like a Manichean he speaketh against the Apostle 1 Tim. 4. In another Epistle he biddeth Boniface exact a Tribute of the Sclavi, lest sometime they challenge their own land; and by paying Tribute they may know, that their land hath a Superiour. Who gave him their land? he now will inroach. Nevertheless in another Epistle he saith, he did swoond, when he read in a Letter, that Boniface had sold Palls for money: He sate about 10. years, and died an. 752.

8. STEPHEN the I. died on the third day after his coronation. Some do not reckon him.

9. STEPHEN the II. was offended with Aistulph, who exacted Tribute from the Church-lands; and because it was refused, took up Arms. Stephen seeing no appearance of aid to come from the Emperour, did advise with the people, that some writings might be directed unto Pipin: The Letters began thus, Unto the most excellent Lords, Pipin, Charls and Carloman, three Kings and our Roman Patricij, and unto all Bishops, Abbots, Priests and Monks, and to the glorious Dukes and Counts, and unto the whole Army of the Kingdom of France: Stephen Pope, and all the Bishops, Priests and Deacons, Dukes, Counts, People and Army of the Romans, all being in anguish [Observe, this was not of the Pope only, nor of the Clergy only; but likewise of the Dukes and other people; and 2. the names of the Kings, is set before the Pope's name.] With how dolefull and bitter grief we are compassed on every side; with how great perplexity and doubtfulness we are distressed, and how many tears our eyes do shed; because of the continual troubles which are multiplied upon us, we think that the smallest parts of all the elements do declare; for who beholding our tribulations will not mourn? Who hearing our calamities will not howl? Therefore let us remember the words of good Susanna, Affliction is on every side, and we know not what to do. O ye most truly Christians, behold! The daies of trouble, the daies of mourning and bitterness are come upon us; seeing it is come, as we were fearing, from the Lombards; for we are afflicted, distressed, and on every side besieged, by their most ungodly King Aistulph, and that Nation; and with the Prophet we pray the Lord, saying, Help us, O Lord of our salvation, and for the honour of thy name deliver us; and again, Take the sword and the shield, and arise to help us: For behold! please to know, how the Covenant of peace is violated by the foresaid wicked Aistulph and his Nation; and we could obtain nothing that was capitulated and confirmed by bond of Sacrament: And now because no condition is kept unto us, and on the first day of January all the Army of the Lombards have made their rendezvous in Tuscya; and have camped at the Gates of Saint Peter and Saint Paul, and the Gate Portuen; and Aistulph himself with another Army have fixed their Tents at the Gate of Salaria and other Gates; and hath oft said unto us, Open unto me the Gate of Salaria, and I will enter into your City; and give me your High-Priest, and I will shew clemency unto you: If not, beware, lest when I have battered down your Walls, I kill you altogether with the sword; and let me see, who can deliver you out of my hands. Wherefore we could scarcely direct this Bearer by Sea with these Presents unto your Christianity; we have written them with many tears: Wherefore our Beloved, I beseech you, and as if I were present, I adjure by the mysteries before the true and living God, and before Saint Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, that with great speed you help us, lest we perish; seeing, under God, we have committed all our lives into your hands, forsake us not. Our Beloved, come forward and help us, who (under God) lie unto you; that when you have brought forth good fruit, may in the day of the future trial, say, Our Lord Peter, Prince of the Apostles, behold us thy clients; we perfecting our course, have kept the faith; the Church that was commended unto thee, we have defended and delivered from the hands of the oppressours; and we standing without spot before thee, do offer unto thee the children, which thou didst commit unto us, safe and sound from the hands of their enemies: Then both in this World, and that to come, ye shall receive the joys of heavenly rewards.

Another Letter in the name of Peter.

After this the Pope sent another Epistle, in the name of Saint Peter, as if it had been written from Heaven; it beginneth thus: Peter called an Apostle, Grace and Peace and Power, to deliver the holy Church of God, and the people of Rome, committed unto me, from the hands of their enemies, be fully given from the Lord our God, unto you most excellent men, Pipin, Charls and Carloman, three Kings; and to the most holy Bishops, Abbots, Presbyters and all religious Monks, and also to the Dukes, Counts, and all the general Armies and people of France: I Peter Apostle, whilst I am called by Christ, the Son of the living God, through the pleasure of the Supream clemency, and ordained by his power to be enlightner of all the World; the Lord himself, our God, confirming it with these words, Go, teach all Nations; and again, Receive ye the Holy Ghost, whose sins ye forgive--- Wherefore all who hear and fulfill my preaching, may truly believe, that in this World, at the command of God, their sins are loosed; and being pure and without spot they shall enter into that life. Therefore I Peter, the Apostle of God, who have you my adopted children, to defend from the enemies hands this Roman City, and the people, committed of God unto me; or to deliver the house (wherein I, according to the flesh do rest) from the prophanation of the Gentiles; provoking all your love do exhort, and protesting do admonish you to deliver the Church of God, which by Divine Power is commended unto me, seeing they suffer very great afflictions and oppressions, by the most wicked Nation of the Lombards; think not otherwise, but trust it for certain, that I my self am standing alive in the flesh before you. And our Lady, the Mother of God, the Virgin Mary, with us, doth adjure you with the greatest obligations, and protesteth, and admoni-

sheth, and commandeth, &c. Behold with what fooleries and impieties they would bewitch the World ! But Pipin nor his brethren, did not levy an Army, untill Pope Stephen came into France; when he took his journey, he commended himself unto Saint Mary, and his sheep unto Saint Peter. Lib. Pontific. Pipin hearing of his coming, sent his son Charls an hundred miles to meet him; and when he came within three leagues of Carisiac, Pipin went forth unto him, and returned on foot, and the Pope on horse. Then Pipin was crowned again, for the greater pomp, by the Pope. He went into Italy, and forceth Aistulph to give hostages, that he shall render unto the Pope all due right. So soon as Pipin was returned into France, Aistulph raiseth a greater Army, and did more harm unto Rome, then it had suffered in 300. years before. Then Pope Stephen writ another supplication unto Pipin, who made no delay, but forceth Aistulph to perform the former conditions, and gave unto the Pope the Exarchate of Ravenna. Within a year Aistulph dieth, then a division falleth between Rachis and Desiderius for the Kingdom; the people, for the most part, were for Rachis; and Desiderius agreeth with the Pope, to ratifie what the Kings had given; and to give more, if he would procure aid for him. Wherefore Pipin writ his fourth Epistle unto Pipin, giving him thanks for his aid; wishing many blessings unto him, and shewing that Aistulph was stricken by the hand of God, and drowned in the bottom of Hell; and that by the hands of Peter, Prince of the Apostles, and by thy most powerfull arm [speaking unto Pipin] Desiderius a most mild man was ordained King of the Lombards, who had sworn to restore unto Saint Peter, the Cities Faventia, Insubres and Ferraria, with all their Territories; and also Ausimo, Aucona, Humana, Bona with all their Territories; and he had sworn to keep peace with the Church of Saint Peter, and to be loyal unto the Crown of France; and intreated Pipin to approve the Coronation of Desiderius upon these conditions. Henceforth the Pope listeth up his head, and having large Territories given unto him, will not rest untill he be Monarch of the World. When Stephen had peace, he begun to repair the Churches, which Aistulph had caused to be thrown down, and died in the sixth year of his Papacy.

10. PAUL the I. succeeded his brother. He did write many Letters unto King Pipin. In the first, he speaketh of his brothers death, and ingageth himself to continue the League contracted by his brother and the King; and he craveth that Pipin would do so. In the 3. He giveth thanks unto Pipin, for his defence against their enemies; and promiseth to cause the Monks to learn the songs of Carloman. In the 4. He sheweth that he did suspect Marinus, a Priest of Rome, to consult with the Emperour's Legates; and to withdraw him, he had sent him unto the King, and craved that he would make him a Bishop there. In the 5. he sheweth, that his Nuntio was not returned from Constantinople. In the 6. he giveth thanks for his exalting the Church of Rome; and sheweth his confidence, under God, to consist in the arm of the most puissant King Pipin; and craved to send a Resident, by whom he might communicate the purposes and attempts of the Greeks. In the 8. he sheweth, That the Emperour is already in Arms, intending to recover Ravenna and Rome, and craved his aid against the Greeks. In the 9. he sheweth, that he will speak with Desiderius, and prepare what is needfull against the Greeks. In the 10. he purgeth himself, that he had never said, that Pipin could not help the Romans now in their distress; and he giveth him liberty to deal with Marinus, as he will. In the 12. he sheweth, that the Beneventans had taken some parts of Campany, and made them subject unto the Governour of Sicily; he admonished them once again to desist, and if they would not, he was resolved by the power of God, and help of Pipin, to send an Army against them, as the enemies of blessed Peter and Pipin; and he craved that the King would chide them by Letters, and if they will not obey, that he would consent unto the expedition. In the 13. he giveth thanks for his defence of the Church, and for the peace betwixt him and Desiderius; and craved that Pipin would send back the hostages; to the end he might have the City Imola. In the 14. he sendeth some treasonous Letters of Sergius, Bishop of Ravenna, and craved aid. In the 16. and 22. He speaketh of the Emperour's Legates residing in France, and giveth thanks that the King had so honourably accepted his Nuntio with the other, and had imparted unto him what he had done with the Emperour. In the 19. he giveth thanks for the safety of the holy Church; and craved the honour, to receive his lately born son from the holy Fount of Baptism. In the 21. he promiseth that no favour nor terror should divert him from the King's favour, in whom he hath the greatest confidence under God, and his Mother, and the Apostles. In the 26. he writeth much of the cruelty of the Lombards, and that he had not sought the return of the hostages; but that he might have free passage thorow Lombardy; and now he exhorteth and adjureth him fearfully to detain them; and to cause Desiderius to restore all the goods of blessed Peter, that in the coming of the Lord he might shine as a glorious sun. In one Epistle he saith, that blessed Peter had chosen Pipin, Charls, and Carloman, three Kings, and had consecrated them by his Vicar, that they may be defenders of the orthodox faith, and maintainers of his flock. In an Epistle unto the French Army, he calleth Peter Protectour of France. In another he writeth, that it is lawfull that the Bishop of Rome should reign as the Princes of the Nations do, and possess Kingdomes on earth and the glory thereof; and to undertake Wars, and to vindicate unto himself the emoluments of the Roman Empire. In an Epistle to Crodegangus Epist. Meten. he saith, Unto us albeir unworthy, in place of Saint Peter, is committed the Universal Church of all the World. In Catal. test. ver. lib. 8. many other of his Letters are mentioned. Those declare the rising of Peter's Vicar, though himself did never attempt or claim such things. Paul sate 10. years. After his death, Desiderius King of the Lombards, sought to have the friendship of a Pope towards him; wherefore his brother Toto, Duke of Neper, with some souldiers entred into Rome, and himself followed by the advice of the Emperor Constantine; and caused his own brother Constantine to be chosen, who in one day (saith Onuphr. in Indict.) was made a Deacon, a Priest and Pope; and Desiderius compelleth the people (who did favour Philippus) to swear unto Constantine. Nevertheless he could never obtain the favour of the Romans, because he was so nigh unto Desiderius, and a friend to the Emperour, and a hater of images. He sought the favour of King Pipin, and by his Letters promiseth to keep the amity begun betwixt him and his Predecessours. The Romans in a tumult kill Toto, and thrust Constantine into a Monastery, an. 768.

11. STEPHEN the III. would immediately assemble a Synod, and sent unto King Pipin, craving that he would send the most learned of his Bishops unto Rome for reformation of the Church. In the mean time Pipin dieth, and his sons Charls and Carloman governed both their own part of the Kingdom with small kindness; nevertheless they sent 12. Bishops out of France and Germany. Behold what a Reformation! He annulleth the election of Constantine; he causeth him to be whipped, and picked out his eyes; he annulleth all his Consecrations and other Acts; he censureth the Synod at Constantinople, and ordained that images should be worshipped by all Christians with great affection and honour; and he accursed the Greeks if they did not restore due honour unto images; because if Princes may set up their statues in Towns; and it be not lawfull to set up the images of God and his Saints; their condition were inferiour to Princes. After the Synod, he practiseth against the Emperour, as is touched. Many of his Epistles are extant, unto Charls and Carloman. In one he craveth to be witness of the Baptism of Carloman's son, as his Predecessours had been to King Pipin. In another, he dissuadeth Charls from alliance with the Lombards, as a faithless and base Nation; he adjureth him to obey his exhortation, and if he will not, he assureth him in the name of his Lord, blessed Peter, that he should be excommunicated; be separated from God, and be punished with everlasting fire: But if he will obey, he should deserve the reward of eternal joy, with the Saints of God: In all his Epistles is not any mention of Christ. By these Letters he perswadeth Charls to put away his wife Bertha, the sister of Desiderius, after they had cohabited one year; he did fear, if the alliance had continued, Desiderius might pull his wings: He sate 7. years.

12. HADRIAN or Adrian the I. would be more forward in maintaining images, and did write in defence of them, calling them Lay-mens books. In a Letter to Irene and Constantine, he saith, Ye will rest in, and imbrace, the tradition of the orthodox faith, of the Church of blessed Peter and Paul, Princes of the Apostles, as it hath been done by the former Emperours, who with all their hearts did love his Vicar: For they shall be defenders of your Kingdom, and make all barbarous Nations subject unto your feet; that wheresoever ye go, they shall make you victorious: Seeing they are Princes of the Apostles, who have begun the catholick and orthodox faith; have by their writings, as Enacted Laws, commanded their faith to be observed by all who were to succeed in their seats; and so our Church both worshippeth their holy figures, and our Temples are adorned with their worshipfull images untill this day. Observe 1. That Peter and Paul are conjoined and co-equal. 2. The Pope is the Vicar of Peter and Paul, and not of Christ. 3. He speaketh of the protection of Peter and Paul, and not of God. 4. He saith, the Apostles were the beginners of the Catholick faith, and he calleth it their faith; no word here of faith in God and Christ. 5. He saith, All who succeed in the seats of the Apostles, are commanded to observe their faith. But the Popes of following ages, have not observed the faith which Peter and Paul have left in their writings. Ro. Barns in Adrian the I. saith, All the care of the Popes then was on stones or in building Churches, or in making images, or in enriching the Church, or in excommunicating Princes, and in such toies; but in their own ministry they were seldom or never occupied. In Catal. test. ver. lib. 8. is made mention of 44. Epistles, written by him unto King Charls: In one he complaineth of Arechis, Duke of Benevento, that after Charls had returned from Capua, he had sent unto the Emperour, and had sought his aid, and the honour of *Patriciatu*s; and therefore he craved the King's aid for advancing the Church. In the 3. He thanketh him, that he had given Rosellæ, Populanium and Benevento unto Saint Peter; he complaineth of their untowardness, and of the enterprise of the Greeks; against whom, he craveth that Charls would have his Army in readines. In the 5. he intreateth his aid against the Venetians who had taken Ravenna. In the 8. he thanketh him for a Cross sent unto him; and sheweth, that he prayeth continually for him, and for his father of blessed memory; he intreateth him to cause them to restore the Territories of Rosellæ, Populonium and Benevento, and promiseth him reward from Saint Peter. Although Charls, when he had taken these Cities from the right owner, ner, gave them to the Pope; yet he quitteth not his superiority, as is manifest in the 23. Epistle, wherein Adrian sheweth, that the Greek Ambassadors had consulted with the Relict of Duke Arechis, to take the Dukedom of Benevento from Charls; and therefore he adviseth him to provide for his own security, and for the See of Rome. In the 9. he answereth unto a question propounded by Charls, What should be done to some Saxons who were relapse into Paganism? after long pittance they may be received. In the 11. he exhorteth Bishops and Priests to put on not temporal, but spiritual Armour; that is, they should wait on fasting and praying. Mark that as yet Bishops had not begun to fight Battels, but they perswaded Princes to fight for them; and at that time, when some Bishops would have taken Arms, the Pope did dissuade them. In the same Epistle he saith, the dream of John a Monk was false; wherein he was told, that the Church of Rome had erred from the faith. Note. In the 29, 30, and 31. he complaineth, that Leo, Bishop of Ravenna, would not perform due obedience unto Saint Peter; that under the name of Charls had taken sundry things from Saint Peter, and had attempted to take Pentapolis, which King Pipin had given to the See of Rome; he sheweth that Pope Stephen once deposed Sergius, Bishop of Ravenna, for his disobedience; and in the end, he intreateth him to cause Leo to give him obedience, and to make the Exarchate likewise subject. All the other Epistles are of this stamp, for enriching and advancing the Church, and to expel the Greeks with their adherents out of Italy; commending the worship of images, and setting up Peter in the room of Christ; for he expoundeth Peter, saying, Behold I am with you untill the end; and he calleth Peter the intercessour, the protestour, and rewarder; and he commandeth that prayers be made in the name of Peter. This Adrian, in an Epistle unto the Spaniards, calleth the Roman Church, Head of all Churches; and who separateth from her (saith he) separateth from the Christian faith. He is said to be Author of that Decree in Gratian. caus. 25. quest. 1. Generali, By a general Decree we ordain, that it shall be an execrable anathema, and he shall be guilty before God for ever, as a transgressor of the Catholick faith; whosoever, King, or Bishop, or Potentate, that shal from henceforth permit the censure of the Roman Bishops to be violated in any thing. He endeavoureth to have the Clergy free from the power of Princes. But in the year 773. Charls did appoint a Synod at Rome, where the Pope was with 153. Bishops and Abbots. Here Charls recovereth the right, which Constantine Pogonatus had let pass with Pope Benedict the 11. to wit, with common consent, the Judges and Doctors of Law, thorow the City, were ordained to search the ancient Laws and Customs of the Empire, how heresies and schisms may be prevented, concerning the Apostolical See, and the honour of *Patriciatu*s, and the Roman Empire. Then 1. All the people of Rome grant unto King Charls, and transfer into his person, and his Successours, all their right and power in the above-named particulars. 2. After their example, Adrian with all the Clergy and whole Synod, did give unto Charls their right and power of chusing their great High-Priest, and ordering the Apostolical See: and moreover, that all Arch-Bishops and Bishops, throughout every Province, should receive investiture from him. Theodor. a Nyem. Secretary to sundry Popes. And Gratian. dist. cap. 63. Adrianus saith more, That who should act against this Decree, the Synod would accurse; and unless he repent, would adjudge his goods unto the Royal Exchequer: For this cause many waited upon the Court of King Charls, hoping to have Bishopricks and advancement by him, Avent. Annal. lib. 4. as he did advance the Bishops of Breme, Manda, Padeburna, &c. Here is some restraint of the ambition of the the Popes for a time. Adrian did sit three and twenty years, ten months, and seven tien daies.

13. LEO the III. perceiveth the Romans aiming by all means unto a free government; and he feared that either the Popes should be brought under the government of the Senate, or they should be overthrown by the Greeks; he thinketh it fittest that Rome should be subject unto the Pope; and that the Pope should be sure of concurrence from France. Catal. test. ver. ex Regim. lib. 2. & Sigeber. ad an. 796. Wherefore without knowledge of the Senate he sent Angilbert Abbot of Saint Richarius, to advertise Charls of his election; and presenteth unto him, in token of loyalty, Saint Peter's keys, and the Ensign of the City, or the Eagle; and beseecheth him to send some of his Nobles, who might keep the people in obedience by their Oath or Sacrament, Ph. Morn. in Myster. ex Aimoin. lib. 9. cap. 89. So soon as the Romans (namely Paschasius and Campulus) heard of this message, they take the Pope and buffet him till they thought he was blind, and cast him into the Monastery of Saint Erasmus. Platin. But Continuator Eutropij saith, they beat out one of his eyes, and could not pick out the other, because the mercy of God had preserved him; and others say, both his eyes were stricken out, and restored again by miracle: But Zonar. saith, they who were sent, did spare him, and spoiled him not of his sight. Albinus did let him down by the Wall of the Monastery, and he fled unto Charls; he chargeth many of the Romans of usurpation; and he adviseth the King to exact on them an Oath of fidelity. Paschasius or Paschalis was there soon after him, and accused the Pope of adultery, &c. Charls dismisseth them both, and promiseth to be at Rome within few months. In Decemb. an. 800. Charls was received in Rome, with all shew of honour; within 8. daies he goeth into Saint Peter's Church, and in presence of all the people and clergy, he asketh, who had any thing to say against Pope Leo. Paschasius and Campulus had published the Pope's crimes by writ; but knowing the King's affection towards both parties, they appear not. The Bishops who were present, answer, The Apostolical seat is the Head of the Church, and ought to be judged of none, Platin. But Ph. Morn. in Myster. sheweth from Aimoin. That because none did qualifie these crimes, the Pope was absolved upon his Oath. Platina saith, his Oath was delayed till the next day; and then he sweareth by God, and the four Evangelists, that all these things were false, which they had layed to his charge. Whereupon the King declareth him innocent, and condemneth his accusers. Within few daies 300. of them were beheaded, in the Lateran field, for their presumption and affected liberty, on the 18. of December; and on the 25. day, Charls was proclaimed Emperour, as followeth; and from that time the French did altogether possess Rome and all Italy, saith Zonar. After that, Pope Leo could not live at Rome without trouble; therefore he sate at Mantua, and sometimes did abide with the Emperour. He is the first that Bellarmine can find to have canonized a Saint, de beat. sanct. lib. 1. cap. 8. He appointed the supplications of three daies, before the Feast of Christ's ascension; he first brought incense unto the Altars, to the imitation of Jews and Heathens. He sate 20. years, and died An. 816.

on of Bishops.

I. FEW Pastours of that Country were comparable unto the former, in doctrine, devotion or zeal (as we find in Catal. test. ver. lib. 8. from Aventin. lib. 3.) unworthy Priests were promoted, covetous, adulterous, drunkards, whose God was their belly; given to hunting and hawking; as also Pope Zachary complaineth in Epist. ad Bonifac. and we will see Acts of Synods against these vices. Nevertheless such men were advanced for bribes, or other by-respects. Likewise Bishops were more ambitious, than given to seek souls unto Christ. Monks were thought more religious, but their religion then (for the most part) did consist in superstitious ceremonies and rites; the people did admire them for their shew of austerity; and the Bishops bear with them, because they endeavour to draw all men under the obedience of the See of Rome. So whilst corruption waxeth in all these, Truth faileth; especially, the opinion of merit was not prattled in private, but openly proclaimed; and in the Synods they change the phrase, Men shall be judged according to their works; unto this, Men shall be judged for their works, or according to merits. Preachers did not plead so much the cause of God, as their own; they corrupt the truth with fables; as Gregory in his Epistle to Boniface testifieth; and for constitution of their errors, they alledge visions; as Io. Bale Cent. 1. cap. 91. sheweth how Egwin, Bishop of Vigornien, did swear before Pope Constantine, that in a Vision he was commanded to preach unto the people, that the image of Saint Mary should be worshipped; and he writ a Book of Apparitions, which the Pope approved with his Seals, and sent it unto Britwald, Primat of England, with express command to call a Synod at London; and by his authority, to recommend that book unto the people. So Constantine, Bishop of Cyprus, in the Nicene Synod sess. 4. said, a certain man, driving a nail into a Wall, pierced the head of Saint Peter's image, and immediately his head became sore; and when he was bidden to draw out the nail again, he did so, and became whole. Many such fables were then preached. Whatsoever was the zeal of King Charls, bad was the success of his putting the sword into the hands of Bishops; as Lullus, Bishop of Ments, was a Warriour unto Charls; Megengard Bishop of Herbiopolis, was called Duke of Franconia, and when he went to Mass, he had a drawn sword carried before him. Charls gave unto Herinbert, Bishop of Minden, a Guard of Souldiers against his enemies: Wherefore Alb. Crantz. in Metropol. proæm. saith, Charls (not God) gave to Bishops the sword to still and punish stubborn Rebels. Luder. Ep. Monaster. carried in his badge a sword and a Shepherds club. Anepos a Bishop, was Commander of the French Army, against Vilian in Suevia. Yea Bishops took up Arms against Bishops; as Calistus, Bishop of Aquileia, against Amator, Bishop of Friuli. Many Synodal Acts were made against this; and Pope Zachary writing to several of France and Germany, saith, Though we walk in the flesh, yet we should not walk according to the flesh; and the Weapons of our Warfare, are not carnal, but spiritual; and therefore it is not lawfull, that Priests or Pastours do bear Arms. And the same Pope, in another Epistle to Boniface, requireth him to depose all Bishops and Priests, who had defiled their bodies with blood, either of Pagans or Christians. Concil. rom. 2. And Carloman in his Laws, None who hath entred into Orders should bear Weapons: and in the Council held at his command, An. 742. We discharge all the Ministers of God from bearing Armour, from fighting, from going against an enemy, or into an Army.

2. Concerning the Election of Bishops, the words of Pol. Vergil. de invent. rer. lib. 4. cap. 2. are, From the beginning, the Election of Bishops, Priests and Deacons, was in the power of the Apostles; and then of the Priests of the Cities, not without the suffrage of the people and judgement of adjacent Bishops; as Cyprian testifieth in many places, especially in Epist. ad Felic. Presbyt. that this custom continued a long time. This creation of Bishops was turned into another form by Boniface the III. he decreed, That they should be chosen by the people, and society of the Priests, the Prince of the place not resisting; and the Roman High-Priest consenting with these words, We will and command: But this Decree went soon out of use, all these things declining to worse. So far he. Now for the Election in this Century, the words of Waltram, Bishop of Naumburg, about the year 1100. are remarkable, Gregory the I. writ unto Theodoric, Theodobert and Brunichild, King and Queen of Austria, that they should invest Bishops without simony. Long before the Decree of Pope Hadrian, the Kings who were anointed, and Majors of the King's house, had the authority of investing Bishops, as Dagobert, Sigebert, Theodoric, Childeric, Pipin invested these Bishops, Remaclus, Amandus, Audamarus, Antpert and others. The like is read of the Bishops of Spain, England, Hungary, how of an old custom, Bishops entred by their Kings, untill these daies, saith he, Ph. Morn. in Myster. Pope Zachary in an Ppistle to Boniface teacheth the same, that Priests and Monks received their places in Churches and Monasteries from Magister Aula in France; as is before in Adrian the I. neer the end. Also one having received a Bishoprick from King Charls, and coming before him, casteth himself off his horse, with nimble agility; to him said Charls, So far as I can see, thou art a good horse-man, leave thy benefice unto some weaker man, I have need of thee for another service. Gratian. is clear in this point, Dist. 63. is an Epistle of Pope Leo the IV. to the Emperours Lotharius and Lewis, saying, The Church of Reate for a long time hath been destitute of Pastoral care; it is expedient, that it be helped by the arm of your excellence; wherefore, the word of salutation being permitted, we intreat your meekness, that it would please you to give that Church unto Colonus an humble Deacon; that he, having your licence thereunto, we may consecrate him Bishop: But if it please you that another be sent thither, let it please your Majesty to give him Tusculum, which is also vacant. And a little before in the same Disti. Nicolaus Pope, unto Lotharius King, Undertand that it is reported unto us, that whosoever is advanced unto a Bishoprick in your Kingdom, ye let none be chosen, but who you please; therefore by Apostolical authority with obtestation of God's judgement we injoin thee, that thou suffer none to be chosen, untill our Apostleship be advertized. Here he is loftier then the former, yet he craveth to be acknowledged only in two Bishopricks, neither denieth the King's interest. But afterwards Pope Gregory the VII. ordained, That no Priest should take a Bishoprick from a Lay-man (as followeth) if he did, he should lose it, and be excommunicated, Gratian. cap. 17. qu. 7. can. Siquis deinceps, & cap. quoniam.

3. We have heard how busie Popes and Monks were, to draw all the world under the obedience of the Roman See; and now they boast of their supremacy throughout all ages. But it is certain, that the Title of Supremacy was not given unto the Bishop of Rome, before the year 606. It is true, when the Emperours left Rome, and did dwell at Millain, Ravenna, or Constantinople, the Bishop of Rome sought to exalt himself; but his pastoral honour was layed in the dust, when the Goths dwelt at Rome; then the Bishops of Ravenna and Constantinople strove for the first place, as if the Bishop of

Rome had been out of the World; but they were deceived. For Bishop Zosimus did claim more power, then any of his Predecessours had, or did claim. He sent Faustinus, Philippus and Asellus to the sixth Council at Carthage, in favour of Aparius a Priest, who fled to Rome for aid against Diocesan Urban, who had deposed him for lewdness. Amongst other things, Zosimus gave them in charge, to claim this prerogative, that if any Bishop were accused or deposed, and appealed unto Rome; the Bishop of Rome might either write to the next Province to determine the matter, or send one from his side, to represent his person, and sit in judgement with the Bishops there: and for proof, he citeth in writing under his hand, a Canon of the Council at Nice. The Bishops assembling out of all Affrick, to the number of 217. and finding no such Canon in their books Greek nor Latine; direct their answer to Bishop Boniface the I. refusing to restore Apianus; and concerning Appeals to Rome, they would suffer that to be silent for a while, till they could get the Canons of the Nicene Council. And they did write unto the Patriarchs of Alexandria, Constantinople and Antioch, for true Copies of the Nicene Council; which when they had received, and seeing their own Copies agree word for word with them; first by their Decree they deny all Appeals to Rome; and then by their Letters, they charge the Bishop of Rome with ambition and forgery; writing thus: Our due salutations remembered, we intreat and earnestly pray you, that hereafter you would not so lightly give audience, to those that come from hence unto you; neither receive any more, such to the communion, whom we excommunicate; because your Reverence shall easily perceive that order taken by the Nicene Council: For if there appear a proviso for inferiour Clerks and Lay-men, how much more ought the Synod to have the same observed in Bishops, who being excommunicated in their own Province, they should not be suddenly or unduly restored to the communion by your Holiness? And likewise your Holiness must repel all wicked refuges of Priests and other Clergy-men, as becometh you; for by determination of the Fathers, is this derogated from the Churches of Affrica; also the Nicene Canons do most evidently commit, both inferiour Clergy-men, and the Bishops themselves, to their own Metropolitans: No doubt they most wisely and rightly provide, that all matters should be ended in the places where they first did arise; nor shall the grace of the Holy Ghost be wanting to any Province, by which equity may be gravely weighed, and stoutly followed, by the Presbyters of Christ; especially whereas every man hath liberty (if he mislike the judgement of those that hear his cause) to the Councils of his own Province, or to a general Council. Or how shall the judgement over the Sea [meaning at Rome] be good, where to the necessary persons of the witnesses either for sex or age, or several other impediments cannot be brought? For that any should be sent from your Holiness side, we find decreed by no Synod of the Fathers. That which you send hither by Faustin, as a part of the Nicene Council; in the truer Copies which we have received from holy Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria, and reverend Atticus, Bishop of Constantinople, taken out of the Originals themselves, which also we sent unto Boniface your Predecessour; in them we say, we could find no such thing: and as for your Agents or Messengers send them not, grant them not at every ones request; lest we seem to bring the smoky pride of the World into the Church of Christ, which proposeth the light of simplicity and humility unto those that desire to see God, &c. Here many waies do they withstand the Bishop of Rome; the Appeals which Zosimus claimed by the Council at Nice, they confute by the same Council, and with other pithy reasons; the Legates à latere, they reject, as never spoken of

in any Council : Running to Rome , they call a wicked refuge ; and sending Messengers from Rome , they call a smoky pride of the World ; the corrupting the of Nicene Canons , they disprove by true and authentick copies ; and Apiarius whom the Bishop of Rome had restored twice unto the Communion , they utterly banished from the Church of Christ ; and not content therewith they set down a rule , that if thereafter any Priest shall appeal to Rome , no man in Affrica should receive him to the Communion. Each one may judge what these would have done , if Zosimus had claimed to be the head of the Universal Church , or Vicar general of Christ , supream and infallible judge of all men and matters Ecclesiastical , and that not by consent of a Synod , but by grant from Christ. After this Eulalius , Bishop of Carthage , did submit himself unto Boniface the II. but he was the first and last , condemning all his Predecessours , and he had no Successour therein , who would submit. Lib. Pontific. in Leo the II. sheweth , that the Affrican Church was called ἀνισκέφαλοι , or heads to themselves. Then who ever heard that the Abylines , or Church of South Affrica , was under the Bishop of Rome ? Thracia and the Greeks would never acknowledge the Church of Rome , in way of superiority , except a short time , when the Latines were Lords of Constantinople. When the Pope conspired with France against their Emperour , the Greeks did write unto Pope Leo , Because you have withdrawn your selves , therefore we withdraw our selves from you. And this withdrawing was not from subjection but from unity , as is manifest by their mutual withdrawing. Catal. 1057. ver. lib. 8. ex Ranulp. polychro. lib. 5. cap. 28. Only the Emperour Michael did submit his Kingdom unto Pope Adrian ; and the same Michael did again cast off the same Adrian , and expelled all the Latine Priests out of his Dominions ; Platin. in Adrian the II. Armenia , Palestina , and Syria , were never subject unto any forraign Bishop , untill Godifred conquered Jerusalem , an. 1099. And many other Provinces of Asia did never submit unto the Pope ; and till this day are many Christians in Asia , who though they be subject unto the Turk and other Princes , yet continue in the same faith or doctrine ; and for the most part , have succession of Bishops from their first Reformation , and were never subject to any forraign man in spiritual things. As for the Western part (as it was called) of Europe , something hath been spoken ; and moreover Egila , a Spanish Bishop , sent Saranus a Deacon , and Victorine a Clark , unto Pope Adrian the I. to ask his counsel in some questions. The Pope returned answer , That he was willing to correspond , if he would submit unto the See of Rome ; and especially , if he would oppose those who did despise the fasting on Friday and Saturday ; as appeareth (saith Catal. 1057. ver. lib. 3.) by the Epistle of Adrian to Egila. But he would not accept these conditions ; therefore in another Epistle unto the Bishops in Spain , the Pope did accuse Egila that he followed the errors of Vincentius , and was contrary unto the Catholick discipline. Neither in all the Councils that were in these Centuries within Spain , is any mention of dependance upon the Pope. Behold then Spain was not subject in these daies , unto the See of Rome. And generally what was the estate of Europe , at that time and afterwards , is most plain from the Oration of Arnulph , Bishop of Orleance , in the Council at Rhemes , An. 992. as followeth in the own place. Also Blondus de restaurat. Roma lib. 3. speaking of the jurisdiction of Rome in his time , could say , Almost all Europe sendeth greater , or at least as great Tribute unto Rome , now as of old : where his boast is bounded within Europe , and with an almost. And Bellarmin de Ro. Pont. lib. 3. cap. 21. saith , When Antichrist , as ye will [speaking of the Pope unto the Protestants] began to reign , the See of Rome lost almost all Affrick , the greatest part of Asia, and all Greece; and in our time (saith he) wherein ye cry that Antichrist rageth most, all things have fallen so prosperously, that he hath lost the greatest part of Germany, all Sweden, Gothland, Norway, Denmark, a good part of England, France, Swisserland, Bohemia and Hungary; and therefore (saith he) it so wax prosperously be a note of the Antichrist, the Pope cannot be called Antichrist, seeing he wanteth so many Provinces. I answer, in the first part Bellarmine saith, that the Pope hath lost what he never had; and in the latter part, he hath lost more; for he might have added Scotland, Ireland, a great part of Poland, Prussia, &c. But all these had given their power and Kingdom unto the Beast, untill the word of God was fulfilled; and they do now hate the Whore, and have made her naked; as it is said, Rev. 17. But it is nowhere written in Scripture, nor do Protestants say, that the Beast, or Antichrist, had or shall have dominion over all the earth, although he make such a claim falsely; yea the fourth part of the earth was never subject to the See of Rome at once, or at one and the same time.

The Pope had

4. As the Papishes do glory (in vain) of the Pope's Supremacy over the Church; so they pretend his power over all the Kingdomes of the earth; this they do hold, but with some difference amongst themselves; for the Canonists (as they are called) hold, that all the Kingdomes of the earth do directly belong unto the Pope; and the Jesuits say, not directly, but indirectly; and these two sects write against one another in this matter, as for life and death. But whether directly or indirectly, both do agree that the Pope may give any Kingdom of the earth to whom he pleaseth. Satan did once say so. And in the 9. Century Pope Nicolaus did not say so, as followeth. Let them shew any such practice before this eighth Century. Did all the Bishops of Rome [before this time] give Kingdomes to whom they would? Or were they ignorant of their power? But say they, at that time, Pope Zachary gave the Kingdom of France unto Pipin and his line. So unto this place belongeth that controversie which Bellarmine hath de Ro. Pont. lib. 2. cap. 17. & lib. 5. cap. 8. By what means, and by what persons Pipin obtained the Kingdom of France, Gratian. caus. 15. quest. 6. cap. Alius, saith, Zachary deposed Childeric, King of France, and placed Pipin in his room. And the gloss saith, Deposuit, id est, deponentibus consensit, he consented unto them who deposed him. Platina in Zachary saith, By his authority the Kingdom of France was adjudged unto Pipin. The Jesuit Dion. Petavius in Rationar. temp. par. 1. lib. 8. saith, Pipin, by the authority of Pope Zachary, and by consent of the French Peers, did add a new Title of King unto his Royal Power, which he had not before. If we look to the more ancient Writers, the story is thus: About the year 663, Clotharius, King of France, gave himself to the lusts of the flesh, and committed the government unto Ebroin, Master of the Palace (or, as others call him, Constable.) This example turneth into a custom, and An. 694: Pipin, Duke of Austrasia, attained this charge under Clodoveus, or Clovis the III. as to. Serres calleth him, and he keepeth it in the daies of King Childebert the II. and his son Dagobert; so that then there was the Title of a King, and all the power was in the hand of the Constable. Abb. Vissberg. in Chron. pag. 170. Edit. An. 1538. The King was seen once in the year publicly; to wit, the first day of May, then he received and gave gifts, without any other discharge of Royal power; and all affairs of State were managed by the Constable. After Pipin was great contention for so honourable a place; his son Charls Martel prevailleth, who in the daies of Theodoric or Therric the II. enlargeth the Kingdom of France: and as the fore-named Petavius ex Gest. Franc. Epit. lib. 1. sheweth, he overthroweth Raginfred (his Competi-tour, or as he saith, who was chosen Mayor) and Eudo, Duke of Aquitania, An. 718. then he subdued the Saxons, Alamans, Bavarians, and Aquitans. Eudo hath his refuge unto the Sarazens in Spain, and perswadeth their King Abdirama to invade France. Charls did slay in one Battell 375000. Sarazens, with the loss of 1500. French, at Towns, Fascic. temp. fol. 45. Edit. Venet. An. 1484. and Jo. Serres and others. Thereafter he did take in Burgundy and Lions, An. 727. and the next year, Eudo being dead, he possessed Aquitania peaceably. In the year 731. the Sarazens did come again into France. Charls overthrew them, and did gain Avenion and Narbon from them. Therefore by a more honourable Title, he was called Duke and Prince of France; and under that name he governed the Kingdom 19. years, and died An. 741. Platin. in Gregor. 11. He had four sons, Carloman, Pipin, Egidius and Grypho; some say, Grypho was the son of his first wife, a daughter of Bojaria. Pipin made Egidius Bishop of Rotomayum, and left his government unto Carloman and Pipin; and they two divide the Kingdom, and govern either his own part, under the Title of their father, as is apparent by the first words of the Council under Carloman, In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, I Carloman, Duke and Prince of the French, in the year 742. from the Incarnation of Christ on the 11. of the Calends of March, by the advice of the servants of God, and of my Nobles, I have assembled the Bishops in my Kingdom, &c. Note these words, and see what power he had. Within 7. years after this Synod, he laid aside his Princely authority (saith Bellarmin. loc. cit.) and entred into a Cloister at Soraſte; and then all the authority was in Pipin alone. Grypho rebelled against Carloman; but at last Pipin took him in Italy, and caused him to be beheaded, An. 753. Pipin having the government alone (and wanting no occasion) did aim at a higher Title. The Sarazens in Spain were preparing to make new Wars against France; but Pipin did prevent the storm, he seized on the passages of the Pyrene hills, and forced those redoubted enemies to receive Laws from him. Then he did help the Cities that had been spoiled; he disburthened others of publick charges, and established justice; and dealt so valiantly and discreetly both in Wars and Peace, that he gained the hearts of all the countries; also it did not a little add unto his esteem what he had done against the Lombards, and in other parts of Italy. Blondus dec. 1. lib. 10. saith, I find in Alcuinus, Paulus and several others, who have written the Acts of the French, that the Nobility and Commonalty of that Nation, duly considering the worthiness of Pipin, and fortitude of Childeric; consulted with Zachary, Bishop of Rome, whether they should tolerate so foolish a King any longer, and defraud Pipin of his deserved Princely honour: And when the Bishop made answer, That he was best worthy to be King, who could best discharge the Office of a King; the French, with the publick consent of the whole Nation, did pronounce Pipin for their King; and Childeric was shaved and made a Monk. And Aventin. in Annal. saith, When Volarad a Bishop, and Burchard Abbot of Saint Dionis at Paris, were sent to understand the Pope's judgement; his answer was, I find in the sacred story of Divine Scriptures, that the people fell away from their wretched and lascivious King, who despised the counsel of the wise men; and created a sufficient man, one of themselves, King, God himself allowing their doings; all power and rule belong unto God, Princes are his Ministers in their Kingdoms; and rulers are chosen for the people, that they should follow the will of God, the chief ruler, in all things, and not to do what they list; he is a true King, that guideth the people committed to his charge, according to the prescript and line of God's Law; all that he hath, as power, glory, riches, honour and dignity, he receiveth of the people; the people create their King, and the people may (when the cause so requireth) forsake their King: It is lawfull therefore for the French and Germans, to refuse this unkind Monster, and to chuse one who may be able, in War and Peace, by his wisdom, to protect and keep in safety their wives, children, parents, goods and lives. So Pope Zachary giveth his advice, and pretendeth not any interest into the matter. Then he writ unto Boniface, Bishop of Mentz, that he might anoint Pipin King of France, and declare all his Subjects free from their Oath of Allegiance unto their lazy Sovereign. And now the Reader may judge, what Pipin did receive from Pope Zachary. This was the work of many years, and so ended An. 752. Here observe that Pipin was anointed; but anointing of Kings was not in custom amongst Christians in the daies of Laſtantius, who in Institut. lib. 4. cap. 7. speaking of Christ's name, saith, It was commanded unto the Jews, to make an holy oil, wherewith those were anointed who were called unto the Priesthood or Kingdom; and now among the Romans, the Robe of Purple is the sign of their royal assumed power; so unto them, the anointing with oil gave the name and royal power. And Augustine on Psal. 45. saith, It was the custom only of the Jewish Nation, to anoint Kings and Priests; whereby was taught, that among none other but the Jewish people, was the King and Priest of the world to be born. Anastasius Patriarch of Constantinople, did anoint Emperour Leo the I. and thereafter that came into custom, to shew, that the Emperour was a true Christian and free from heresie. They want no colours for bringing into the Christian Church Jewish or Heathenish rites.

Kings is late,

5. John Damascen (who was called Chryſoras, for distinction from another of that name, who lived about the year 300.) had been amongst the Sarazens; and for fear of death, did make profession of Mahumetism; but being escaped did write in defence of the Orthodox faith, and began the first systeme of Divinity amongst the Greeks; as afterwards Pe. Lombard among the Latines; he was a maintainer of images; but in many other things, was an adversary to the present doctrine of Rome. Lib. 1. de Orthod. fide, cap. 1. he saith, All that is given unto us by the Law and Prophets, Apostles and Evangelists, we embrace, acknowledge and reverence, seeking no further. God therefore being ignorant of nothing, and providing whatsoever is profitable for us to know, hath revealed it; but he hath hid in silence those things, whereof we could not indure the weight; therefore let us love these things, and abide in them; neither should we pass beyond the bounds appointed by his eternal will, nor transgress the Divine Tradition any way. Lib. 3. Cap. 17. The Lord's flesh is enriched with Divine Efficacy, because of the hypostatical union; neither doth it fall, or hath it exceeded its proper nature, nor its natural properties. And Cap. 18. he saith, The communication of Omnipotency unto Christ-man, or his Man-hood, may be declared two waies; First, That this man Christ is almighty by communication of properties: Next, The proper works of God are given to the flesh, as the instrument of the Deity. And Lib. 4. Cap. 18. After he hath at length recommended the reading of the Scriptures, he reckoneth the Books of the Old-Testament according to the Hebrew; and then he saith, The Wisdom of Solomon, and of Jesus son of Sirach, are pleasant and good; but are not numbered among the Prophetical books, nor were put into the Ark. And in Cap. 25. he commendeth Virginitie; and then he addeth, this we say, not derogating from marriage: God forbid! for we know, that God blessed marriage by his presence; and it is said, Marriage is honourable amongst all men. In Cap. 14. he saith, By invocation, and by working of the Holy Ghost, the Bread and Wine and Water, are supernaturally changed into the Body and Blood of Christ.

Christ. The Papishes make use of this testimony for their Transubstantiation; but there is also a supernatural change of the Water in Baptism, and yet no Transubstantiation; neither do the Greeks believe it to this day, but only a mystical change in regard of the use and effect.

6. In the Epistles of Pope Zachary to Boniface, it is evident, that divers Bishops and Priests, contemned the pretended Apostolical authority, and his excommunications. In the Epistle of Pope Adrian, it appeareth, that Leo Patriarch of Ravenna, with-held many things from the See of Rome; and that he despised the Judges whom the Pope sent thither; and that he opened the Letters that were sent, by some of his Diocly, unto the Pope. Also Regimbald, and other Bishops of Lombardy, did allow their Clergy to marry against the Decree of Rome, Ex Epist. Adrian. ad Carol. When Maurice, Bishop of Istria, professed himself to be the faithful servant of Saint Peter, and required Pensions there unto him; the people pulled out his eyes, and said, their land was the Territory of Charls, and not of the Pope. Catal. test. ver. lib. 8. Paulin Bishop of Aquileia, in his book against Felix and Eliphand, Bishops of Urgelita and Teleco, commendeth the Holy Scriptures; and condemneth all opinions whatsoever, that cannot be proved out of them; he saith, The Church is built upon the Rock Christ; and it may be shaken by Hereticks, but cannot be drowned; because it is strengthened by the right hand of Christ: he saith, Teachers and every Christian, should fight against heretical opinions, and refute them; for a Souldier of Christ should not be basely afraid for the force of approaching Battel; nor by straying seek the lurking holes of harmles escaping: but being girded with the weapons of their own Warfare, should courageously pierce the hearts of their enemies, with spiritual darts out of the Bow of the Scriptures.

Many in Italy and Spain, did oppose the Popes.

7. Aponius a French man then writ several books, in Cant. lib. 1. he saith, The Lord hath given his fiery word unto this World, in the figure of a coal, in the Tongs of the two Testaments; which being lifted from the Altar, did purge the lips of the Prophet Esay, who by the only union of the flesh was free, and lived mixt with the dead; and He [the Lord] by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, causeth that all souls who (like dead coals having their understanding darkned with ungodliness) were not kindled; but now are inflamed with vicinity thereof: now that they are kindled with the flame of the love of their Spouse, it is the proper gift of the grace of God's Word. Lib. 3. Christ is made the meat and drink of his Church, by the Sacrament of his body and blood. Lib. 6. Whatsoever a Teacher or Pastour of souls teacheth, unless he shew it proceedeth from the Almighty God, in the Old and New-Testament, he is a murderer of souls. And again, The words and examples of them, from whom the milk of doctrine is poured into the hearts of the hearers, should alwaies feed on the flowers, not of the lower writings of worldly men, but of the higher Apostolical Mountains. Ib. lib. 1. Because the power of our will is not able to climb so high as we must ascend, running after God; therefore the Church crieth, Draw me after thee. Lib. 4. Whosoever would escape from the enemy whose power is in the air, let him keep the right faith, and enter into the holes of the Rock, which blessed Paul demonstrateth.

Aponius?

8. About the year 780. the old controversies, concerning God's Predelination, and man's free-will, were renewed in Spain: Some saying, that Predelination unto life or death is in the power of God, and not in man's power: Others asking, Why should we endeavour to live holily, if it be in the power of God? And others asking, Why should we pray unto God that we be not overcome in temptation, if it be in our power or liberty of will? At that time Pope Adrian did write unto the Spanish Bishops, and propounded unto their consideration, what (upon the like occasion) Fulgentius Epist. Ruspen. about the year 455. had written unto Eugypsius, against a Sermon of a Pelagian. The words of the Pelagian were; They who affirm that some are destinated unto life, and others unto death, do trample grace in themselves damnably, while they admit it for them reprehensively only: Behold with what knots of impiety they do tie themselves! If I be predestinated unto good, it is needles that I resist evil; but if I be born unto evil, it availeth me not to do good: And so on both sides the desire of praise and godliness being stopped, one becometh secure, and another desperate; and thereby all exercise of righteousness is made void, prayer ceaseth, and working fainteth: But it is not so, and therefore let us pray uncestantly; because the Lord saith, Pray without intermission, lest ye enter into temptation: And let us strive against all sin, not only by prayer, but with diligence also; because the Lord witnesseth, that each one shall receive according to their own work. The answer of Fulgentius, which Pope Adrian did approve and send, was thus: God hath prepared his works of mercy and righteousness, in his unchangeable eternity; and as he was never ignorant of his future works, so he was never improvident in the preparation of those works; therefore he hath prepared good works for them who were to be justified, and to the same who were to be glorified, he hath prepared rewards; but unto the wicked, he hath not prepared evil wills or evil works, but he hath prepared for them just and everlasting punishments: This is the eternal predestination of the future works of God, which as we know to be continually insinuated unto us by the doctrine of the Apostles, so we preach confidently; for blessed Paul both evidently and often teacheth us, the predestination of them whom God saveth freely; for he saith of God, whom he foreknew, them he predestinated; and whom he predestinated, them also he calleth: Certainly not others, but whom he hath predestinated, them doth he call and justify; nothing in the works is uncertain, because nothing in his predestination faileth; therefore God beginneth the works of his predestination, by vocation; and consummates them by glorification: And yet not in them all whom he calleth, but unto them who love God, all things work together for good unto them, who are called according to his purpose: Therefore let all believers keep the truth of predestination, because whosoever believeth not the counsel of God in this predestination, shall not attain unto the glorious effect of the same predestination; but whosoever is not predestinated unto glory, is without doubt found to be appointed unto punishment, which is known to be predestinated in God's preparation, that thereby infidelity and impiety may be punished. Wherefore the blessed Apostle Jude saith, Certain men are crept in unawares, who of old were fore-ordained to this judgement of our God; but the Doctrine of the Holy Ghost saith warily, that the wicked were ordained not unto sin, but unto judgement; that is, not unto impiety, but unto punishment; for they were not predestinate unto this wicked impiety which they commit, but unto the punishment which they receive in Divine equity. Wherefore whereas the Authour of that sermon, saith, Let us pray uncestantly; because the Lord saith, Pray without ceasing; and then, Let us wrestle against all sin, not only by prayer, but with diligence; let us humbly seek Grace from God, that we may have it continually working with us; by which God would both keep us in diligence, and when the work is done, bring us unto the reward, &c. This Epistle of Pope Adrian, is amongst the Epistles of the Popes, which Charls the Great did cause to be collected into one volumn, An. 791.

9. At that time was great contention for receiving the Mass of Pope Gregory into the Churches, first by authority of Pope Adrian, and then of King Charls; some Churches had one Directory, and some another who would not change. When the Pope saw so great opposition (and it may be understood, that it was not small, when the Pope was put to such a shift) he said, he would refer it unto the Will of God, whether he would, by any visible sign, approve the Mass of Gregory or of Ambrose: so these two books were layed together upon the Altar in Saint Peter's Church, and he called upon God to shew which of the two he approved. The doors were shut all night, and the next morning when they returned into the Church, the book of Ambrose was found lying, as it was laid down; and the other, was all torn and dispersed thorow the Church. The Pope maketh the Comment (if we will believe Jacob. de Voragine in vita Gregor.) that the Mass of Ambrose should lie untouched; and the Mass of Gregory should be used thorow the World; and to he did authorize and command that it should be used in all Churches and Chappels. But many did expound that sign the contrary way, and would not receive it, till Charls did command all Bishops and Priests to use it thorow his Dominions; he caused the Mass of Ambrose to be burned, and threw many Priests into prison, who refused to accept the new Mass. The Church of Millain would not change: Walafrid Strabo (who lived about the year 900.) testifieth in his book de Exordis rer. cap. 25. that in his time the Roman Mass was not universally in all Churches; but almost (saith he) in all the Churches of the Latines, and no Benedictine Monk did read it. In the sixth tom. of Biblioth. Patr. de la Bigne, are many books of several Authours, explaining (at that time) the signification of the Ceremonies enjoined in that Mass: Their Dedicatory Epistles and Prefaces, shew that they were put upon that work, by the authority of the King, and some time-serving Bishops; and the great number of those books, is an evident proof of great opposition against that Mass and the rites thereof; although the books of the Adversaries have been kept down by the prevailing party. Hereunto serveth what Antoninus de Voltolina, a Dominican, said in the Council at Trent (as is written hist. lib. 6.) It is clear by Histories, that of old every Church had their own Rituals of the Mass, brought in day by day, rather of custom than by judgement or constitution; and that the lesser Churches did follow their Metropolitan, or their neighbour greater Churches; but the rite of the Roman Church, was received in many Provinces, for gatisfying the Pope; and nevertheless there be yet many Churches, whose rites differ very much from the Roman: Even in Italy remaineth the rite of Millain, differing from the other in the principal parts thereof; and that the same Roman hath suffered many changes, is clear unto any who readeth the old book, called Ordo Romanus: Neither in ancient time only, but within these few ages, certainly before 300. years, the rites of Rome were not the same, which the Priests observe now in the City of Rome; but which the Order of the Dominicans do retain: Moreover (said he) the Vestments, Vessels and other Ornaments, both of the Ministers and of the Altars, which are now in use, are so new and transchanged (as is easie to be observed by looking on the Books and Pictures) that if the old things were brought into the World again, none would know them: Wherefore if the Fathers will bind themselves, to approve the only rites of the Roman Church, they cannot want reproof; as by prejudice condemning antiquity, and the rites of all other Churches, and so expose themselves unto the sinistrous interpretations of men; wherefore it were better to set upon those things which concern the essence of the Mass, without any mention of the rites. And in declaring the differences betwixt the then-present sent custom of the Romans, and that which was called Ordo Romanus; he nameth especially, that in this the Communion was given under both the species unto the people. Some were offended at his freedom of speech; and the Bishop of Quinqueclesiensis, did openly profess, that the Frier had spoken truly; neither could any, who loveth truth, be offended with him. Hence it appeareth clearly, that the Church of Rome hath been subject to novations from time to time; and the Missal now, is not the old book of Pope Gregory the I. More of the Mass followeth in the next Century.

10. In the sixth tom. of the fore-named Biblioth. Patr. is a remarkable piece of Amalaricus Fortunatus (Trithemius calleth him Hamularius, a very learned man in the Latine and Greek languages) a Monk of Luxovia: In the Preface he sheweth, that he had written another book of Divine Service; and thereafter he went to Rome, to enquire of the reasons of the rites different there from other Churches; and so he did write four other books, wherein he describeth what he had heard, and what he thought himself on the contrary; yet in a mild and moderate way, whether for fear to offend, or in hope to prevail with fair information, it is uncertain. He saith, In all that I write, I hang on the judgement of godly men and holy fathers; and withall, I say what I think. What things are done in the celebration of the Mass, are done in the Sacrament of the Lord's Passion; as he commanded, saying, How oft ye do this, do it in remembrance of me: Therefore the Priest in offering Bread and Wine and Water in the Sacrament, representeth Christ; the Bread and Wine in the Sacrament, do represent his Body and Blood; Sacraments should have a similitude of those things whereof they are a Sacrament; wherefore let the Priest be like unto Christ, so the offering of the Priest upon the Altar, is like unto that of Christ on the Cross; that which is offered in resemblance of Christ, the Priest commendeth it unto God the Father. Let the judicious hearer consider, for whom are the prayers that the Priest saith after the Communion; and he shall find that they sound for them who are refreshed with the heavenly bread. [No prayer for the dead.] Lib. 3. in prof. It is sufficient, that the Bishop or Priest, do only bless the Bread and Wine, whereby people may be refreshed; as in ancient times it was done by the Apostles. Lib. 1. Cap. 14. he saith, No creature do I, by reverencing, adore but God; all substance which is not God, is a creature, and a creature is not God; the Cross of Christ may be set before me, but in my mind I hold Christ as hanging on it. The very words of the prayer declare whom we adore, we say, We adore thy Cross, O Lord, and we commend and glorifie thy holy resurrection: Here are no words of praying, but of shewing the adorable Cross, and the commendable resurrection of our Lord. And in another place we say, God who by the precious blood of thy only begotten Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, hast been pleased to redeem us; grant graciously, that who come to adore the life-giving Cross, may be freed from the bonds of their sins; to whom I pray, him I adore; I am cast down in body before the Cross, but in my soul before God; I reverence the Cross by which I was redeemed, but I pray unto him who hath redeemed me. Then he hath a story of Oswald, King of England, whom he calleth faithfull and most Christian; how he being in danger of his enemies, caused a Cross to be set up (on a Tree that came first unto his hand) in the Field; and said unto his Army, Let us all bow our knees, and all pray together unto the Almighty, living and true God, that he, of his mercy, would defend us from our proud and fierce enemy; for he knoweth, that we have undertaken Wars for the safety of our Nation. They all did as he commanded, and in the dawning they obtained Victory according to their faith. Here Amalaricus gathereth no conclusion; but ye may see, that Oswald did not worship the wooden Cross, and that no such Cross is to be adored; but that he set his mind on the suffering of Christ, by which Cross or Suffering he did believe to be saved. In the same Chapter he saith, The Apostle saith not in vain, Death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them which had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of him who was to come. This figure of him who was to come, I do so understand; as the first Adam was the cause of our death, even unto us who did not eat of the forbidden Tree; so is Christ the cause of eternal life. As the Tree of the knowledge of good and evil, through its own nature had not death; so the Tree whereby eternal life is granted unto us, hath not this vertue of itself; but of his vertue, who although he was infirm for us, liveth by the power of God; which power can never, and in no respect, be resisted. [This is against the hymns of the Cross, and the resistibility of God's grace.] In Cap. 17. he heweth, that the Romans had then candles and lamps of Wax, and what signification they gave unto them [he had not seen them before; neither is there any record of them before that time] and then saith, By every thing should we bring Christ unto our mind, as Augustine writeth to Januarius; but foolish men who will not be amended, should not think that these candles are to be adored, because by them some similitude of Divine mysteries is figured, seeing from every creature we may bring a similitude. Doth he not here condemn all the devised rites of men? Lib. 2. cap. 5. he speaketh against the keeping of Lent, and denieth that the Authour thereof can be shewed. And Cap. 25. The Office of a Bishop and a Priest, is almost the same; but because they differ in name and honour, they are distinguished by variety of slippers or pantofles. He hath many such rites, and the meaning of them (as seemeth) by way of derision. Lib. 3. Cap. 24. Christ took bread-- and also the cup; whereof Cyprian saith to Cæcilius, We find, that we observe not what Christ hath commanded, unless we do also the same things which the Lord did, and so mixing the cup, we depart not from the Divine instruction. Although he [Cyprian] hath concluded this of mixing the wine and water; yet he may understand that it is to be done of the whole institution, wherein consisteth the command of the Lord and of his Apostles. So saith he, and so do the Reformed Churches practice; but the Roman Church doth not so. Afterward Amalarius became Bishop of Trevers, and was sent by Charls the Great, unto the Emperour Michael; and as Trithemius writeth, from the Records of Trevers, by his wonderfull industry and eloquence, he did establish peace and amity between the two Emperours. He died An. 813.

11. In the last part of this Century, arose the great men in the service of the Pope; to wit, Johannis Diaconus, surnamed Digitorum, and Riculph Bishop of Mentz. John did forge the Bull of Constantine's donation; wherein he would perswade the world, that Constantine had given unto Bishop Sylvester, and his Successours for ever, the City of Rome, with other Cities and parts of Italy. Io. Bodin. de Repub. lib. 1. cap. 9. ex Actis Varica. The fallhood of this feigned donation, was known unto the World by every History; but at that time who did dare to controule it? The Bishops and Clergy thought that it was for their advantage, and there was no established Prince in Italy; yet under pretence thereof, the Pope did enlarge their power; even although many did convince that donation of fallhood. Then Hincmar, Bishop of Rhemes, in his book against the Bishop of Laudun, testifieth, that Riculph in the daies of Charls the Great, gathered together some forged Epistles of the old Bishops of Rome, and brought them from Spain into France; and binding them with the foresaid Donation, gave them forth in the name of Hidore. Of the authority of these Epistles Gratian hath written Dist. 20. cap. de libellis, there is an Epistle of Pope Leo the IV. directed unto the Bishops of Britan: In the Epistle Leo taketh all the authority from the decretal Epistles, and other Writs of Popes; except Sylvester, Siricius, Innocentius, Zosimus, Coelestine, Leo, Hilarius, Gelasius, Ormisda and Gregory: These (saith he) are all and only, by whom the Bishops do judge, and by whom the Bishops and Clergy are judged; if any doubt cannot be determined by them, nor by Augustine, Jerom, Isidore and other holy Doctours, it should be brought unto the Apostolical See. But all others that were before these, with one dash he contemneth; that is, he renounceth all the writings of the Bishops of Rome, who lived the first 300. years, as suppositions. The Authour of Catal. test. ver. lib. 8. is very large in describing the usurpations and many policies of the Popes, for enlarging their power, and inroaching upon Bishops in severall Nations; as also their insipite rites that were then devised.

Some Provinces in Germany and Hungary receive the faith.

12. In the daies of Dagobert, King of France, Rudbert was Bishop of Worms, a singular good man, and very learned; and Theoto was Duke of Bavaria, an Heathen, yet hearing of the good fame of Rudbert, he sent and intreated him to come into his Country. The good man went, and was received by the Duke in Ratisbon with great liking, and did teach him the Christian religion; and then did inform others both noble and ignoble, all along the Danube; thence he went unto Vualarium and Juvavia, where the Christian faith had been taught long before; there were some Churches, but were decayed, as Rudbert understood by report; therefore he sought leave from Theoto to go thither to reform these parts; so finding many people willing to be informed, he returned into Worms, and brought other twelve Teachers into these places with him; and having established Churches, did return in his old age, and died in Worms. At the same time Samo, Duke of Slavi, an Heathen, did kill severall Merchants coming from France, for to trade in hisland, and took their goods; therefore Dagobert sent an Army against Samo, and brought him into subjection. Not long thereafter the Hunni did oppress that land; and their Duke Boruth sent for aid unto the Bavarians, who did overthrow the Huns; and for keeping the Slavi under better obedience of the King, they would have hostages, Boruth granted to give his son Cacatius, and his brothers son Chetumar, and did desire to have them informed in the Christian faith. When Boruth died, Dagobert sent back Cacatius being now a Christian; and after three years he dying, Pipin sent Chetumar, who was diligent to have Preachers, and to instruct the people in the faith; he did invite Virgilius, Bishop of Juvavien, who would not go, but sent Modestus, Wato, Regimbert, Latinus, Gontharius Presbyters, and Richard a Deacon, with others, upon severall occasions of sedition amongst the people. When Chetumar was dead, so great was the sedition there, that no Presbyter did abide; untill Walinch, being Duke, sent again unto Virgilius, who sent Hiemo and Reginbald Presbyters, and Majoran a Deacon, with others; and in the year 794. Charls sent Erick to be their Duke, who expelled a great number of the Huns; and then that land of Pannonia Inferiour, continued under obedience of the King, and the Christian faith was embraced by the people. Catal. test. ver. lib. 9. In all these is no mention offending to, or from, Rome for their Reformation.

Turks became Mahumetans.

13. In this Century the Turks came out of Scithia or Tartary into the Province of Alami, thence into Colchis, out of that into Armenia, and then into Asia the less, An. 755. Histories do vary concerning their original; but the most probable opinion is, that they are descended of the Tatars; because Pompon. Mela (who lived in the daies of the Emperour Claudius) reckoneth Turcx among the Scythians Lib. 1. Cap. Chalybes: and (as Io. Lampadius after Mechovius witnesseth) the Turks and Tartars have the same manner of Apparel, one manner of Riding, one manner of Bows and Arrows, and in Language they differ only in dialect, as the Italian and Spaniard. At that time the Turks hindered the Sarazens from conquering in Asia and Europe (God raising up one wicked enemy against another, that his Church might have breathing) except that they prevailed in the Mediterrane Isles and Peloponnesus. In the end these two did agree upon conditions 1. That the Turks should be called Sarazens and imbrace Mahumetism. 2. They should have the Province of Hircana or Sogdiana. 3. They should be subject unto the Calipha of Babylon. They continued living by Pastorage, without a Prince of their own, untill Civil Wars among the Sarazens about the year 1050: and therefore I speak no more of them untill the 11. Century.

OF BRITAIN.

1. BEda a Presbyter in the Monastery at Weermouth neer Durham, for Beda Venerable, and his doctrines. his godliness and modesty was called Venerable, and is still accounted worthy of that Title. He was credulous in believing of false miracles, and slipped into some corruptions of the times, as confession and chrism; yet even in these he differeth from the latter times: for on Jam. 5. at these words, Let them pray, anointing: he saith, We read in the Gospel that the Apostles did so, and the custom of the Church holdeth, that the weak should be anointed with oil by the Presbyters, and prayer being conjoined, be healed; nor only by the Presbyters, but as Pope Innocentius writeth, even any Christian may anoint in his own necessity or of others. Here he speaketh of anointing, as a means of healing, and not a Sacrament for the dying. And on the words, Confess your sins one to another, and pray one for another that ye may be healed; he saith, In this sentence should be that discretion, that we should confess to one another, daily and light sins, and beleeve to be healed by their daily prayer: And moreover, the uncleanness of more grievous leprosie, let us (according to the Law) confess unto the Priest, and have a care to be cleansed at his will, how, and how long time he shall command. He seeth in these words no warrant, that any should confess unto a Priest, but one to another mutually; and as he saith cōqualiter, and that to the end they may be healed; and what he would have done unto the Priest, he borroweth it from the Law of Moses. And on Mar. chap. 3. when he hath spoken of the miracles that were done by the Apostles, he saith, Now when the number of Believers is multiplied, many within the holy Church have the life or conversation of vertue, but have not the signs or miracles of vertue; because miracle is in vain shewed outwardly, if it fail that should work inwardly; for according to the saying of the Apostle of the Gentils, Tongues are a sign not to believers, but to unbelievers. Here he sheweth that miracles were not necessary, when the Gospel is confirmed and received. As for the articles of positive doctrine, he is clear. Of the perfection of the Scriptures, on 1 Pet. 4. at these words, If any speak as the words of God, he saith; Fearing lest any man speak or command any thing but the will of God, or but what is evidently commanded in the Holy Scriptures, and be found as a false witness of God, or sacrilegious, or introducing any thing different from the Lord's doctrine, or leaving or passing-by any of these things which are pleasant unto God, seeing He most manifestly commandeth Preachers concerning those whom they shall teach, saying, Teaching them to observe whatsoever I have commanded you : For he commandeth to deliver those things to be observed by their hearers, which he hath commanded, and no other things ; and those things not in part only, but all. And on the 2 Pet. 1. near the end, Who giving heed unto the words of the Prophets do well, that thereby they may have the light of knowledge; these should first know that none of the holy Prophets did preach unto the people through their interpretation, but what they had learned from the Lord, that did they commend to be done by their hearers ; and what heavenly mysteries they had perceived in secret, these simply either by word or writ, did they deliver unto the people of God ; and not as the Diviners of the Gentils, who what they had forged out of their own hearts, these things did they deliver unto the deceived people, as the Oracles of God : Therefore as the Prophets did write, not their own, but God's words, so the reader of these should not follow his own interpretation, lest he stray from the true sense ; but by all means he should attend this, how he who writ would have his words understood. So far he. And how the right sense may be had, he teacheth in Philip. 1. from Augustine, saying ; When words make the Scripture ambiguous, first we must see that we distinguish or pronounce them not wrong ; and when after such diligence we find it uncertain, how to distinguish or to pronounce them, look to the rule of faith which we have from plainer places of the Scripture, and from the authority of the Church : But if both, or all, or more parts be dubious, then we should consult the Text it self by the following and preceding parts, where the ambiguity is ; to the end we may see, unto which of these many senses it will give suffrage, and suffer it self to be conjoined. Concerning the person and natures of Christ, on 2 Pet. 2. he saith, Arius who said that our Redeemer is, in respect of divinity, inferiour unto the Father ; and Photinus, who said that Christ is Man, and not God ; and Manichæus, who said Christ is God only, and not a very man ; and Hebron, who said Christ was not before Mary, and took his original from her ; and Apollinaris, who said Christ is God and flesh only, and never assumed a reasonable soul ; and Pelagius, who said Christ is not the redeemer of infants, because they are conceived without iniquity, and born of their mother without sin, and have no sin to be forgiven them, and so Christ is not the Saviour of all the Elect ; and also other Hereticks, who deny the Lord who bought them with the price of his blood, because they preach him not, as truth sheweth him, but as they have feigned ; and therefore are become strangers from the Redeemer ; they do expect nothing, certainly, but the pit of perdition. He writ three Books on the Song of Songs, whereof the first is only in refutation of another book written by Julian, his Epistle to Celenen, in Campania, a Pelagian ; for a tast, behold what he saith in the 1. page ; Julian teacheth that we, by arbitrement of free-will, may do good things what we will ; albeit, by the help of God's grace, we may perfect them the more easily ; as Travellers may walk on foot, but with less turmoil (without doubt) if they ride on a horse : He hath no mind of the Apostle's admonition, saying ; Work out your salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God who worketh in you, both to will and to do : And which is more weighty, he is an adversary to him who saith, not, Without me ye can do some little thing ; but saith he, Without me ye can do nothing : And he teacheth, that those only can behold the hid mysteries of the Law, whom instruction and piety hath made wise ; forgetting the grace of God, which revealeth the hid things of Scripture, even to the unlearned and Idiots ; as the Evangelist

faith, Then he opened unto them their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures: And the Evangelist witnesseth that they were unlearned, when he saith, They seeing the constancy of Peter and John, and knowing that they were without letters and idiots, did admire. And he saith, that holy and generous love ingratt in us, from the very beginning of light, by the gift of nature, and unto our last old age leaning to the power of the mind, may continue without any loss of its vigour: Certainly he beleeveeth not the Lord's word, Without me ye can do nothing: Nor what the Apostle saith, In many things we all offend. In these words Beda confuteth both the Pelagians and Semipelagians. Of justification he saith, on Luke 1, The wisdom of the just is not to presume of righteousness by the works of the law, but to seek salvation by faith; that although they being under the works of the law, yet they should understand, that they are saved, by the grace of God, through Christ; for the just shall live by faith; and Peter saith of the yoke of the law, that neither we nor our fathers were able to bear it; but we beleeve to be saved by the grace of Christ, even as they. And on 1 Pet. 4. God is honoured by our works; when all that we do well, or according to his will, we give it not all unto our merits, but to his grace; and on the other side, what evil we do, we depute it only unto our ignorance and wickedness. Of the Church he saith, on Cant. lib. 5. cap. 6. The Church is called Catholick, because it is built through all the parts of the World in one peace, and one fear of God, and is filled with one and the same consort of the Spirit; from which unity of the Spirit, she is called a Dove; and she is called perfect, not because she only is filled with the people of the righteous; but also is perfected by receiving all divine graces and virtues. Here is no mention of restraining or subjecting the Church unto the Bishop of Rome. And de Tabernac. lib. 2. cap. 2. It was said unto Peter metaphorically, Upon this Rock, that is, on our Saviour whom he had confessed, will I build my Church: And on Revel. 21, when it is said, Foundations, in the plural number, the teachers or graces are meant; when Foundation, in the singular number, he is meant, who is foundation of foundations: Here is no Prerogative of Peter above the other Apostles. Of Prayer, on Prov. chap. 2. he saith, We should invoke [or pray unto] none but God. Of Christ's redemption, on 1 John chap. 2. at these words, And not for ours only; he saith, The Lord is a propitiation not for them only, unto whom living then in the flesh John did write; but also for all the Church which is dispersed in the breadth of the World, even from the first elect, unto the last who shall be born untill the end of the World. This he writeth expressly against the Donatists; but when he speaketh of the Church throughout the World, he condemneth the restriction thereof unto Rome or any other particular place; and when he limiteth the propitiation unto the Elect, he condemneth the opinion of the universality of Christ's death for the Reprobates. And in the same place he saith, Behold how John observeth that humility which he teacheth: Certainly he was a just and great man, who had drunk the secrets of mysteries from the Lord's breast; and nevertheless he saith not, Ye have me your Advocate with the Father; but, We have an Advocate; and he said, We have, and not Ye have; he would rather put himself in the number of sinners, that he might have Christ to be his Advocate; than put himself an Advocate for Christ, and be found among the proud which shall be damned. For all doth the Head make request, of whom it is written, Who is at the right hand of the Father, and intercedeth for us: The Lord intercedeth for us not by words, but by miseration; and he addeth, The Just, because the just Advocate will not plead unjust causes: How shall not the just one defend us in judgement, if now we acknowledge and accuse our selves unjust? Why shall he not be just, who now by tears is earnest [ſeruit] againſt his own unrightcouſneſs? Here he ſpeaketh expreſſly of interceſſion, and he acknowledgeth no interceſſour in Heaven, but the Head for all who mourn for their ſins. Of perfeverance he ſaith, on Col. 4. at the end, where the Apoſtle ſaith, I give thanks unto God; being confident that he who hath begun the good work in you, he will perfect it untill---- What elſe doth he promiſe but perfeverance till the end through the mercy of God? And when the Apoſtle Jude ſaith, Unto him who is able to keep you without offence, doth he very clearly ſhew, that perfeverance in good until the end is the gift of God? In the firſt place Beda ſheweth the certainty of perfeverance, as a thing promiſed; and in the other, he teacheth that it is not the work of man by himſelf alone, even though the man be renewed, but it is the gift of God. And on Rom. 8. he ſaith, We ſhould ſtand the Calling whereby they are elected; not who are elected becauſe they ſhall beleeve; but who are elected that they may beleeve; for the Lord himſelf declarſh this, when he ſaith, Ye have not choſen me, but I have choſen you; for if they were therefore choſen, becauſe they did beleeve; they did firſt chuſe him by believing in him, that they may deſerve to be choſen: But he takes this away altogether, who ſaid, Ye have not choſen me, but I have choſen you: And certainly they did chuſe him, when they did beleeve in him; therefore for no other cauſe, ſaith he, Ye have not choſen me, but I have choſen you; except becauſe they did not chuſe, that he ſhould chuſe them; but he did chuſe them, that they might chuſe him; becauſe the mercy of God did prevent them with grace, and not according to debt: This is the immovable truth of predeſtination and grace. In the ſame place he addeth, God hath predeſtinated us ere we were; he called us when we were averſe; he juſtified us when we were ſinners; he glorified us when we were mortal: If God be thus with us, who ſhall be againſt us? He who will be againſt them who are predeſtinated by God, againſt them who are called, juſtified and glorified; let him prepare himſelf to fight againſt God, if he can: For when we hear, If God be with us, who can be againſt us? None can harm us, but he who overcometh God. Beda is large on this purpoſe there out of Auguſtine. Of the Bread and Wine in the Sacrament, he ſaith, on Luk. 22. He breaketh the bread which he giveth, that he might ſhew that the breaking of his body was not without his own accord: when he ſaith, Do this in remembrance of me; the Apoſtle expoundeth it, when he ſaith, How oft ye eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ſhew forth the Lord's death till he come; becauſe bread ſtrengthneth fleſh, and wine worketh blood in the fleſh; the one is referred unto his body myſtically, and the other unto his blood. And on 1 Cor. 10. at the words, The cup of bleſſing, which we bleſs; he ſaith, What ye ſee is bread and a cup, which even your eys declare unto you; but what ſaith requireth to be taught, the bread is the body of Chriſt, and the cup his blood. This is ſpoken briefly, which poſſibly may ſuffice ſaith; but ſaith requireth inſtruction: he took up his body into the Heaven, whence he will come again to judge the quick and the dead, there he is now ſitting at the right hand of the Father: How then is the Bread his Body? And the Cup, or what is contained in the cup, how is it his blood? Brethren, theſe things are Sacraments, for in them one thing is ſeen, and another thing is underſtood, &c. When he ſaith, The Lord breaketh the bread, and the bread ſtrengthneth fleſh, and it is referred unto the body myſtically; and even our eys declare it to be bread, &c. Certainly he thought not upon Tranſubſtantiation. Beda did tranſlate the Goſpel of John, the Pſalms, and ſome other parts of the Scripture into the Saxons language; and he writ an Epiſtle unto Ecbert, Biſhop shop of Lindsarn, wherein he admonisheth him of negligence in his calling, and exhorteth him to translate some books of Scripture into the Saxon language, that people may read them; he telleth him he ought to admonish the King, and correct false Monks and the builders of Monasteries, if they respect their own ease more then solid vertue. Ecbert returneth him answer, thanking him for his Christian admonition; and thereafter did translate some books of the Bible into the vulgar language; as appeareth by the book of Will. Butler against the common Translation. In Hist. Angl. lib. 1. cap. 1. he testifieth, that at that time the Island of Britan, did with five several languages confess one and the same knowledge of the highest truth, and of true sublimity; to wit, the English, Britans, Scots, Pichts and Latines, which [last] by meditation of the Scriptures is become common unto them all. Here he acknowledgeth, that the faith of all the four Nations in the Island, was one and the same. Nevertheless he did observe and deplore the waxing corruption of the Church; for in that Epistle to Ecbert he did not approve the specious and spacious buildings of Monasteries; and in Samu. lib. 4. cap. 2. he saith, Let the Reader behold with tears, a thing worthy of tears, how far the Church slideth daily into a worse, or to speak moderately, unto a weaker estate. He did write many books, as Io. Bale in Cent. 2. testifieth; he lived 72. years, and died An. 734.

2. In the year 724. Jua King of the West-Saxons, was perswaded by his wife Erhelburga to go unto Rome in a Monkish habit; and first did grant, that a penny should be payed unto the Pope out of every fire-house of his Kingdom, which was called Peter's pence; and was ever almost payed until the year 1533, when King Henry the VIII. shook off the Pope. Ethelbert, King of the East-Saxons, went to marry the daughter of Offa, King of Merceland; and Offa did perfidiously cause him to be murdered. Thereafter his pride was turned into so great repentance, that he gave the tenth part of all that he had unto the Church, and several lands to the Church of Hereford; and then he went to Rome, and gave unto the Pope a yearly penny (as Jua had done) An. 793. Henry Spelman in Concil. reporteth out of a book De Vita Offa, pag. 171. This penny was given not as a Tribute unto Saint Peter, but as an alms for the help of an English Colledge at Rome; and it was called Peter's pence, because it was ordained to be payed on Peter's day; yet certainly thereafter it was called Peter's tribute.

3. About the year 786. Charls the Great, King of France, made a league with Archaius, King of Scots, which hath continued inviolate untill our time. The Saxons and others had spoiled off France by incursions; and Charls did seek to adorn his Kingdom with Letters as well as Arms; therefore he sought the favour of the Scots, and did intreat King Archaius to send unto him Professours of the Greek and Latine languages, and of other learning, for his University of Paris; amongst whom Archaius did send Albinus or Alcuine, John Meilrosius (so named from the Abbey Melrose) Claudius, Clemens, Antoninus; Florent. reckoneth them amongst Hereticks, who followed the Greek Church, because they did oppose the Romish Rites. John Meilrosius became Abbot of the Augustinians at Ticino, and Claudius was Bishop of Alstifodore or Auxerre. They both writ several works, as Io. Bale sheweth in Cent. 14.

4. We have mentioned Boniface, Bishop of Ments, he was an English man, and called Winifrid; he had boldly reprov'd Ethelbald, King of Merceland, for Adultery and Tyranny, therefore the King sought his life; he fled unto Rome, where Pope Gregory the II. did regard him for his liberty, and sent him into Germany for conversion of the Saxons; then of a bold reprovcr of Kings, he became a shameless flatterer of Popes; for he is said to have first moved the decree in Gratian. dist. 40. cap. Si quis; if a Pope carry with him innumerable souls into Hell, no man ought to say unto him, What doest thou? He spoke so, and afterwards the Popes did aim at exemption from censure, untill they did attain it: he had from Rome a power Legantine in Germany; neither preached he only unto the Heathens, but did corrupt several Provinces where Christ had been preached, as Thuringia, Argentina, &c. with Roman Manicheism condemning some meats; forbidding marriage of Priests, and permitting to have Nuns or Whores; urging the worship of images: in a word his care was not so much for Christianity as for Papism; for he writ unto Pope Zachary, saying; How few soever Disciples God giveth me in this my charge, I cease not to incline them to the obedience of the Apostolick Sec. He caused the Monastery of Eulda to be built in favour of English men, and was killed at Borna, being suspected of a conspiracy.

5. Many did preach and write against him and his superstitions; as Adelbert, a French Bishop; and Sidonius, an Arch-Bishop of Bavaria; Samson a Scot, Bishop of Auxerre; and Virgilius an Irish man, Bishop of Juvavia; as Naucerus and Aventine do record. Boniface dilateth them unto Pope Zachary; and as Bern. Lutzenburg. in Catal. writeth, the Pope in a Synod at Rome condemneth them, depriveth them of their Priesthood, and excommunicateth them before they were heard; and when they sought to be heard, and plead their cause in a Synod, Boniface denied access unto them, and said; Excommunicated men should not be admitted into a Synod, nor have the benefit of the Law. So partly by tyranny of the Pope, and partly by authority of Pipin, Boniface did oppress all his adversaries. Catal. test. ver. ex vita Bonifac. Particularly one Clemens did reprove Boniface, 1. That he did so advance the authority of the Roman Bishop, seeing all Teachers are equally successors of the Apostles. 2. That he condemned the marriage of Priests. 3. That he did speak too much for the Monkish life. 4. That he had anointed the King of France, contrary to the undoubted right of the Merovei. 5. That he appointed Masses for the dead, and other new Rites unknown in the Church heretofore, Aventin. Annal. lib. 3. & Epist. Zachar. ad Bonif. in tom. 2. Concil.

6. Albine or Alcwin had good knowledge of the Latine and Greek languages: Charls the Great calleth him his Master, in an Epistle written unto him, desepuages. & sexages. Biblioth. de la Bigne tom. 3. where are some of his works. On Ps. 51. he writeth thus; It is said unto the Father, Then wilt thou accept the sacrifice of righteousness, that is, the most glorious passion of the Son who offered himself a sacrifice for all men, that they might attain salvation which the world did not deserve by their works. Ibid. When I look on my self, I find nothing in me but sin; thy righteousness must deliver me; it is thy mercy, and not my merits, that saveth me; we are quickened by the mercy of God in the name of our Saviour, and not by our merits: In his works he often useth the word merite; but here we may see in what sence he and others do understand it. On the fourth psalm. Ps. I could defile my self, but I cannot cleanse my self, unless thou, Lord Jesu, do cleanse me by sprinkling thy holy blood. No good can be in us, unless it be thy working grace who hast made us. On Ps. 118. Thou hast made me to be desirous of thy Commandments, make me also able to do: help, that I may do what thou commandest, and give what thou commandest. And in another place, Free-will abideth as yet in men by nature; that in whom God willeth, he may be pleased to make free by grace, that they have not an evil will; for since the first man man by free-will was sold under sin, the freedom of man is evil; because the goodness of the will is taken away from the free-will; which [goodness] none can have of himself, unless he have it being helped by the grace of God's mercy; without whose help free-will can neither turn unto God, nor make any progress unto God. He hath the like words in lib. 2. de Trinit. cap. 8. On Eccles. cap. 1. The Sun Christ inlightneth all things with the splendour and vertue of his spiritual grace, in whose punishment is our salvation; he ariseth to them who believe in him, and he goeth down to every unbeliever. Ibid. cap. 3. We should rejoice in this spiritual pleasure of meat and drink; not only in the Sacrament, but in reading the Holy Scriptures also, where we may eat and drink of the Tree of life. Ibid. cap. 7. Let us consider the works of God how great and wondrous they are; and how in his free mercy he hath chosen one, and in his just judgement he despiseth another; as it is written of the Twins, I have loved Jacob, and hated Esau. In Prefa. lib. 1. de Trinit. We should all pray, that the Catholick faith, which only quickneth mankind, and only doth sanctifie, may be truly fixed in the hearts of all men by one confession. Ca. 1. Although we be thrown down from the joy of blessed felicity, into the miserable blindness of this exile, for the just punishment of original sin; yet we are not so cut off, that even in this changable and temporary estate, we know not to seek and desire eternity, truth and blessedness; which is clear in that we have not a will to die, nor be deceived, nor be miserable; whence is this natural instinct, that all men would be blessed, although this appetite is diversly in the minds of particular persons; some think to be blessed in riches. The whole divine Scriptures exhort us to be lifted up from earthly unto heavenly things, where is true and eternal blessedness; unto which it is most certain, that none can attain but by the faith of the Catholick peace. In Prefa. lib. 2. All the authority of the holy books serve unto us, to make us believe rightly of God, and to love him with all our heart; but the sight of man's mind is not able to behold the most excellent light of God's Majesty, unless it be inlightned by the brightness of the righteousness of faith and love, through the gift of God's grace; therefore we should pray for the grace of God, that the ey of our heart may be cleansed, to see how properly the Trinity is the one and only and true God; and how rightly the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit is said, understood and beleeved to be one and the same substance. Lib. 3. cap. 1. What did the human nature in the man Christ deserve, that it should be assumed into the unity of the person of the only Son of God? what good will, what desire of good purpose, what good works did precede, whereby that man did deserve to be one person with God, yea to be very God? To wit, God himself, even he by whom man began, began not to be another then the Son of God, and that the only, the only begotten, and properly, and for the Word of God, who was made flesh, verily God; that as every man is one person, even a reasonable soul and flesh; so Christ is one person, the word and flesh: Whence is so great glory unto human nature? by no preceding merits, without doubt by the free and gracious gift; but only here the great and only grace of God, is evidently shewed unto them who consider faithfully and soberly; to the end men may understand, that they are justified from their sins by the same free grace; by which it was that the man Christ could have no sin. Ibid. cap. 12. Certainly no man can have peace with God, but by the Mediatour Christ Jesus, who is in two natures very God, and very man, one Christ, both Priest and sacrifice; he came unto us, to offer for us what he had assumed of us, that he might take away from us, that which he found in us, that is, our sins. Ibid. cap. 21. The Apostle saith of the fire of the day of judgement, What each mans work is, the fire shall declare. It is not to be doubted that he speaketh of a Purgatory fire; which fire the ungodly shall feel one way, and the godly another way, and the righteous another way; seeing the ungodly shall from the torment of the fire be thrown into everlasting flames; but the godly who shall rise in their bodies without all blot of sin, and who have built gold, silver and precious stones upon the foundation which is Christ; they shall escape that fire with so great facility, as with integrity of faith, and love of Christ, they have kept the commands in this life; and that fire of Doomsday shall be unto them, as the Fornace of Babylon was unto the three children, who without all harm of that fire, shall call upon the beauty of all the creatures unto the praises of God: But some just men are subject to some small sins, because upon the Foundation, which is Christ, they have built stones, hay and straw, which are cleansed by the heat of that fire; from which they being cleansed shall be made partakers of everlasting glory: And so by that transitory fire, and the whole judgement of that day being completed, two congregations of the godly and the ungodly shall be severed; the one of Christ, and the other of the Devil: So he expoundeth not that Text of a Purgatory before the day of Judgement. On the Psalms of degrees, at the words of Psal. 130. If thou, Lord, wilt mark iniquity; he saith, He expoundeth out of what depth he did cry, that is, from the gulf of his sins, which as a deluge had gone over his head; understanding that all his life was full of tentations: Therefore he saith, Who can stand? If thou judge only righteousness unto us, and shew not mercy, none can stand; for we are all the children of wrath; but we have more hope of thy mercy, but not of our merits. On John chap. 6. This is to eat his flesh, and to drink his blood; even to abide in Christ, and to have him abiding in us; and therefore who abideth not in Christ, certainly, he eateth not his flesh spiritually, although carnally and visibly he do press the Sacrament of his body and blood; but rather, he eateth the Sacrament of so great a thing for damnation to himself; because he being unclean presumeth to come unto the Sacraments of Christ, which none taketh worthily but who is clean; as it is written, Blessed are the pure in heart, for-----Contra Felic. Virgil. lib. 2. Shew us any Nation or Town or Church, either Roman (which is the head of Churches) or Constantinopolitan, or of Jerusalem (which was dedicated by the presence of the Lord himself) or of Antiochia, where first the name of Christianity is read to have been, or of Alexandria, or of any other Church either in Italy or Germany, or in France, or in Aquitania, or in Britan which agreeth with you in your assertion. Here he acknowledgeth all these to be true Churches at that time, and distinguisheth them one from another; and where he calleth the Roman the Head of Churches, certainly he understandeth not that other Churches had their original from Rome; seeing he saith, the Church of Jerusalem was dedicated by the presence of the Lord himself; and Christians had their first name at Antioch; both which were before there was any mention of a Church at Rome. When Felix came to a Synod at Regensburg, where were Priests from all parts of the Christian Empire (as Alewin speaketh contra Elipant. lib. 1.) his errour was accursed; and nevertheless he continued in his errour, till at the command of Charls the Great, Alewin writ these books; and then he became zealous for the truth, and did write a recantation unto the Presbyters and Deacons of his Church; that as he had been a scandal unto them, so by his means they may be brought again from error unto the truth; as he himself writeth, and this recantation is printed among the Works of Alewin. But Elipant, Arch-Bishop of Toledo, having read these seven books of Alewin, writ very bitterly for maintaining the same errour: He professeth to believe that Christ is but one person in two natures; in one, eternal and equal with the Father, and the same unity of his person remaining inseparably, is also the son of man in respect of his flesh; and in respect of his divine nature, the Father and He are one [unum]; and in respect of his form of a servant, he came not to do his own will, but the will of him who sent him: But as in respect of the Divine nature, He is the natural Son of the Father; so in respect of his flesh, he is the Son of God adoptive and nuncupative. It is to be marked by the way, that Felix had said, Christ in respect of his flesh was the old man, and had need of regeneration; but Elipant did not write so. For proof of this his last point, he alledgeth several testimonies of Scripture, of Augustine and other fathers, and of the Spanish Missal. Against this Epistle of Elipant, Alwin writ four books, wherein he sheweth, that Elipant held the same heresie with Nestorius, who had spoken the same way, and yet was judged to have spoken inconsistibly with the unity of Christ's person. He retorteth all the testimonies of Scripture; and from them proveth, that Christ is never called a nuncupative God, nor adoptive son; but even whilst the Scripture speaketh of his manhood, or of him as man, calleth him the only begotten of the Father. Thirdly, he sheweth that Elipant did corrupt the testimonies of the Fathers, and did add the words Nuncupative and Adoptive, where they were not; and on the contrary, he produceth their testimonies, where they do expressly deny that Christ is the Son of God by adoption; and in this respect distinguish Christ's son-ship and the son-ship of the Elect. As for the testimonies of the Spanish Missal, he toucheth them not, as if that Missal were nothing. Nevertheless hence we see, that the Spanish Church, at that time, had a proper Missal, and were not subject unto the Roman Church. It is also worth the marking, that whereas Elipant had alledged a testimony of the son of Sirach, Alwin lib. 1. saith, When the testimonies of God's Prophets have failed unto thy perverseness, thou feignest a new Prophet speaking according to thy error. In Jesus the son of Sirach is that sentence, which book blessed Jerom and Isidore do witness, that without doubt it is reckoned amongst the Apocrypha, that is, dubious witness; and it was not in the time of the Prophets, but of the Priests, when Ptolemæus Evergetes was King. In lib. 2. neer the end, he saith, Holy Father, raze, raze quickly this opinion out of the Closet of thy heart; lest the Lord, who hath appointed thee to give Wheat unto his family, find that written in the Table of thy heart, and say unto thee, I acknowledge not these Letters, these words were not taught thee by the men to whom I said, Go, teach all Nations. If we join these two testimonies, we see that Alwin did not acknowledge any book for Scripture, nor any doctrine for truth, which had not a warrant from the Prophets and Apostles. In lib. 4. The original of these evils, which begets the occasion of all impieties, is this; While the wisdom of the heavenly Teachers is weighed through the fault of miss-thinking men in their temerarious pride; not according to the propriety of their meaning, but is turned into other meanings after the will and pleasure of the reader, and otherwise then the respect of truth carrieth; and it is easie unto any who understandeth the Scripture rightly, to find this by the Comments of all Hereticks, that they are not afraid, in their ungodly temerity and froward blindness, to draw the most holy words of the Divine books into the similitude of their error: which kind of impiety and misery, if thou, Father Elipant, hadst considered with a prudent mind and humble searching, thou hadst never fallen from the unity of the Catholick peace, into the pit of this error. In his book De virtut. & vitis, which he writ at the intreaty of Wido a Count, he exhorteth him to read the Scriptures diligently; Ca. 5. saying, The reading of the Holy Scriptures is the knowledge of divine blessedness; for in them, as in a glass, a man may know himself, what he is, and whither he goeth: Continual reading purifieth the soul, breedeth fear of Hell, and stirreth up the heart of the reader unto Heavenly joies: He who desireth to be with God for ever, should frequently read and pray; for when we pray, we speak with God; and when we read, God speaks with us: The reading of the Holy Scriptures bringeth a twofold benefit, because it instructeth the understanding, and brinketh a man from the vanities of the World to the love of God: Honest is the labour of reading, and conduceth much to the purifying of the soul; for as the body is nourished by fleshly meat, so the inward man is nourished and fed by God's word; as the Psalmist saith, How sweet unto my tast are thy words, O Lord, even more then the honey and the honey-comb unto my mouth: But he is blessed who reading the Holy Scriptures, turneth the words into works: Certainly all the Holy Scripture is written for our salvation; to the end we may by them grow in the knowledge of the truth: A blind man stumbleth oftner then he who seeth; so he who knoweth not the Law of God, sinneth, through ignorance, oftner then he who knoweth it. Certainly this man would not have consented unto that Canon of the Council of Trent, which forbiddeth people to read the Scriptures. But to the end, that all should not be thought to be his, which goeth under his name; it is to be marked, that in Par. II. is an Homily in festo omnium Sanctor. which Quercitanus hath marked to be amongst the Sermons of Augustine, but he had found it in a manuscript under the name of Albin; but it can not be either Augustin's nor Albin's; seeing that feast was afterwards appointed by Pope Gregory the IV. These books de Trinitate are written so clearly, that Sixtus Senens. in prefat. Biblioth. saith, They were written by John Calvin, and published in the name of Alevine: But Doctor James, in The Corruption of the Fathers, par. 4. pag. 50. testifieth, that antient copies thereof were in the Prince's Library at Saint James, and they were Printed at Lions, An. 1525. when Calvin had not begun to write. Rich. Hoveden, in The Continuation of Beda, writeth, That Charls the Great sent over into England, the Acts of a Synod sent him from Constantinople, for the adoration of images, the which the Church of God utterly detesteth: Against this adoration (saith he) Albinus writ an Epistle marvellously grounded on divine Scriptures; and carried it, with some Synodical Acts in name of the English Bishops and Princes, unto the King of France.

6. Ecbert King of the West-Saxons, vanquished Merceland, Kent, Essex and Northumberland; and then he commanded that land to be called Anglia, and the inhabitants Angles or English men. Tho. Cooper ad An. 796.

CHAP. V.

A Synod in France.

1. FEW Councils were assembled in the beginning of this Century. In France, Carloman assembleth one, which beginneth thus: In the Name of our Lord Jesus Christ, I Carloman, Duke and Prince of France, with the advice of the Servants of God and my Nobles, in the fear of Christ, have assembled, An. 742. Febr. 19. the Bishops which are in my Kingdom, with the Priests, into a Council and Synod; these are, Boniface Arch-Bishop of Mentz, Burchard Bishop of Wirtzburg, Reginfrid, Guntharius and the rest of the Bishops, with their Priests, That they should give me counsel, how the

the Law of God, and religion of the Church many be restored: [Nota] which in the daies of former Princes hath been shattered and fallen; and how Christian people may attain the salvation of their souls, and not perish, being deceived by false Priests: And by the advice of my Priests and Nobles, We have ordained Bishops thorow Cities, and set over them the Arch-Bishop Boniface, who is the Legate of Saint Peter: And we have ordained, that Synods should be called every year, that in Our presence, the Decrees of Canons, Rites and Laws of the Church may be restored; and We restore unto the Churches the monies which hath been taken from them. We have also discharged all the Servants of God from hunting and wandring in woods with Dogs, and that they have no Hawks nor Falcons: We have also Decreed, according to the holy Canons, that each Presbyter dwelling in a Parish, be subject unto the Bishop in whose Parish he dwelleth; and alwaies in Lent that he shew and give account of their Ministry, whether of Baptism, or Catholick Faith, and Prayers and order of Masses. Then he forbiddeth sacrifice to the dead, and other prophane rites of Heathens; he appointeth punishment against the fornications and adulteries of Monks: In the end it is Decreed, that Monks and Nuns should live within their Abbeys and Alms-houses, according to the rule of their Father, Benedict. Concil. tom. 2. edit. Græc. Behold how little mention is here of the Bishop of Rome.

2. In the year 747. at Clonesho in England was a frequent Synod, where it was Decreed, 1. That Bishops should be more diligent in taking heed to their charge, and admonishing people of their faults. 2. They should maintain the devotion of true peace and love, and serve God in the same faith, hope and love, praying for one another mutually. 3. That once in the year each Bishop should visit all the Parishes of his Diocye, and restrain the Heathenish observations which as yet were amongst the people. 4. That none should be admitted into Orders, till his life and conversation and literature were examined. 7. That Bishops and Abbots should diligently take heed, that all under them be diligent in reading for instruction of souls: for it is to be lamented (say they) that so few are found to be ravished with the love of holy knowledge; but are rather mis-carried with vanities and love of idle glory, and trace not the study of holy Scriptures. 10. That Presbyters should learn to know all the duties of their Office; especially, they should learn to interpret in their own language the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the words that are said in the Mass and in Baptism; and they should study to know what the words signifie spiritually. 8. That the Fast of the fourth, seventh and the tenth months should be observed. King Ælfwald and Offa were present, and they two, with many Dukes and Counts, confirm the Decrees with their subscriptions. Spelman ad An. 747.

At Clonesho.

3. Constantine Copronymus assembled a Council at Constantinople, of 338. Bishops, out of Asia and Europe, An. 755. this they called the seventh General Council: Here was Theodore Bishop of Ephesus, Basil Bishop of Pisidia, Pastiles Bishop of Pergamenum, John of Nicomedia, Cosmas of Epiphania in Apamea, &c. The controversie of Images was discussed; Germanus Patriarch of Constantinople, Gregory Bishop of Cyprus, and John Damascene, Patrons of Images, were accursed; and Constantine Bishop of Salæum was made Patriarch. Images of Christ, of Mary, and of the Apostles were condemned; as having no warrant from Christ, nor the Apostles, nor the Fathers. And if any would say, that the Images of Christ only were condemned, because they cannot represent his two natures; but the Apostles had two natures, and therefore they may be tolerated. The Synod answereth, it is the subtilty of divelish men following the errors of the Gentils; but it is said in the Scriptures, God is a Spirit, and will be worshipped in spirit and truth: No man hath seen God at any time, but ye heard his voice; and, Blessed are they who have not seen, and believe, &c. Then they alledge many testimonies of the Fathers against Images. They conclude, Let none of whatsoever estate, henceforth follow so wicked and impure institution; who dare from henceforth make any image, or worship, or set up any image in a Church or private house, or have it privily; if he be a Bishop or Deacon, let him be deposed; if he be a Laick, let him be accursed, and subject to the Emperour's censure; because he fighteth against the Scriptures, nor observeth the traditions, &c. Lastly follow the Canons, accusing particularly all them who have images of the Trinity, or of Christ, as he is God, or as he is man, or as he is both God and Man in the hypostatical union; or as if he were two persons, to paint on the one side the son of God, and on the other, the son of Mary. And they accurse all who have an image of any Saint.

4. In the year 787. by perswasion of Tharasius Patriarch, Irene called a Council at Constantinople: Here were Pe. Vicedon a Priest, and Pe. Hegumen a Monk, Legates of Pope Adrian, John Patriarch of Antiochia, Thomas of Alexandria, &c. Augustus made disputation of the worship of Images, it was scanned on both sides; Tharasius and other Bishops and Monks were for them; against them was Basilus Bishop of Ancyra, Theodore Bishop of Myri, Theodosius Bishop of Amorio, with many more Bishops, and a great number of Teachers and Lay-men. The Patriarch could not prevail by number, and went about to exclude the better part from the Synod or disputation; whereupon a tumult was like to arise, for the people could not be content that so great a part should be debarred: when the Patriarch saw that he could not prevail, the Synod was dissolved. The Image-worshippers report this story, as if their adversaries had dealt only by faction, and not by reason: But thus writeth Pa. Diacon. lib. 23. rer. Roman. Irene retaineth the Legates of Rome, and by their advice banished a great number of them whom they called Iconomachi or fighters against Images. Then she assembled another Synod at Nice, in Septemb. An. 788. where the matter was quickly dispatched, as Adrian and Tharasius would, when there was no great opposition; to wit, as it is declared in Act. 3. they Decree, that Images should be had, embraced, saluted, kissed and adored; but that which is called Latria, they reserved unto the Trinity only. Their chief pretence is, because αγκαλιῶν signifieth to embrace and to love; and the preposition πρός, addeth unto the signification, as in αγκαλιῶν & αγκαλιῶν; and what a man loveth or embraceth, that doth he αγκαλιῶν, as David did Jonathan; and Christ saith, the Pharisees love the first places at Bankers, and salutations in the Market-places. Also the fore-named Basil, Theodore and Theodosius, with the Bishops Hippatius of Neece, Leo of Rhodos, Gregory of Pisidia, Gregory of Pessinus, Leo of Iconium, Nicolaus of Hierapolis, and Leo of Carpathe were perswaded to profess repentance, and confess an error in the former Synod. So Images were set up and worshipped both in the East and West, saith Pa. Diacon. loc. cit. and Zonar. lib. 3. Not long after, Constantine did annull the Acts of this Convent (Platin.) which they call the seventh General Council. Baronius in Annal. ad An. 794. sheweth that many learned men, and of great esteem in those daies, as Jonas Aurelianen. Walfrid, Hincmarus and others, writ against the worship of Images, and directly did contradict that Council, although it was confirmed by the Pope. Yea and

ford.

5. In the year 792. Charls the Great summoned a Council at Frankford, which he did moderate and govern, although the Romish Legates were present. Besides the Bishops of France and Germany, he called the Bishops of Italy,

Italy, Spain and England; not to seek any furtherance to his authority (said he) but for maintenance and defence of the Truth. Here was condemned the heresie of Felix Bishop of Urgelitan, and Elipand of Toledo; who held that Christ is the Son of God, only by adoption of his human nature: This was the one cause of assembling the Council. 2. Theophylact and Stephen, the Pope's Legates, did present the Acts of the Synod at Nice to be confirmed and subscribed. The Fathers did refuse, and did compare the Act of the Council under Copronymus, with the late Acts at Nice. The former had condemned the worship and having of Images, either privately or publickly; the other had authorized the adoration of Images with cloaths, incense, candles, bowing of knees, &c. They would keep a middle course, that it is not altogether unlawfull to have Images in private houses nor Churches; but to worship them is contrary to Christian faith, and smelleth of Paganism. Therefore they discern the Synod of Nice to have been wicked, and deserves not the name of Universal nor seventh Council; and they writ some books against the worship of Images, wherein they refute particularly all the pretended arguments of them at Nice; these books went abroad in the name of Charls. Afterwards the worshippers of Images did what they could, that no memory should be of the proceedings of this Synod, and those books; except that they say, Charls did somewhat concerning Images. But as Chemnitius hath marked in Exam. Conc. Trident. par. 4. that many old Historians, as Egmar, Regino, Adon; and some later, as Antoninus, Blondus, Aventine have written, that this Synod did condemn the worship of Images, and the Iconolatrous Synod of the Greeks; and did Ordain, that it should be called neither seventh nor Universal, but a Pseudo Synod: Cassander in Consult. 21. faith, in his time was a copy of those books of Charls, in the Vatican Bibliothethe: And after the Council at Trent, Tilius a French Bishop, caused them to be published in Print. The Papists in the Cathol. apolo. tract. 2. sect. 7. say, The book is forged under the name of Charls the Great. But were all these Authours Protestants who testify of them; and what can they say unto Hincmarus Rhemen. whose testimony followeth in Cent. 9. It is to be marked, that all the Councils in the time of Charls the Great, do shew in the first words, that they were assembled at the command of Charls, or Charls commanding and injoining; the Council at Rome not being excepted, as Crotian recordeth dist. 63. cap. Adrianus, saying, Charls returning to Rome did appoint a Synod with Pope Adrian, in the Patriarchate of Lateran, in the Church of Saint Salvator, &c. Bellarmin. de Eccles. lib. 4. cap. 5. asketh, What Council ever condemned the Church of Rome or their Popes? We have now seen the Pope of Rome condemned in the sixth General Council; and their Doctrine condemned in that other at Constantinople, and in the famous synod at Franckford; and in the next Century, we shall find another Council at Constantinople, and more in other places and ages, contradicting and expressly condemning the Popes of Rome. And for continuation of this matter, here by anticipation, I add the Council held at Paris, An. 825. where the Epistle of Pope Adrian, and the Act of the second Council at Nice, was read and censured; as is manifest by the decretal Epistle directed unto Lewis and Lotharius; of which (not far from the beginning) these are the words; We have caused to be read before us, first the Epistle of Do. Adrian, Pope, which he, at the request of the Emperour Constantine, and his mother Irene, sent over sea; and so far as our parvity understandeth, as he justly reproveth them who did rashly presume to break down and abolish Images in these parts; so is known to have written imprudently, that he would have images to be superstitiously worshipped; for which cause, he also gave order also that a Synod should be assembled; and by his authority, under an Oath, did judge that Images should be set up and worshipped, and be called holy; where as it is lawfull to set them up, but it is wickedness or unlawfull to worship them. Baron. ad An. 825. § 5.

At Calchuth. 6. Hen. Spelman in Concil. ad An. 787. hath a Synod held at Calchuth in England, wherein some things are remarkable. Gregory Bishop of Ostien. and Theophylact Bishop of Tudert. did write unto Pope Adrian the Acts of that Synod in their own name, as their work which they had recommended unto the Synod, and the Synod had accepted. In the Preface they shew, it was done in two Kingdomes at several times; the one Bishop had gone to the one Kingdom, and the other to the other Kingdom: Gregory went to York, and the Bishop of the place sent unto the King Oswald, who then was farther North, and hearing of the Legate did indict the Synod, and [Nota] did convene with his Lords both Ecclesiastical and Secular. There they say, No Roman Priest was sent hither, after Augustine, till now. Ca. 1. They admonish to keep the faith of the six General Councils. 2. That Baptism should be administred at set times, and no other times, unless for great necessity; and they who answer for the infant, should be obliged to teach him, at ripe years, the Lord's Prayer, and Creed. 3. Each Bishop should hold a Synod twice every year, and visit his Diocye once a year. Ca. 11. Their speech was unto the King and Lords, that they should not judge Priests, seeing they are Angels. Ca. 12. Kings should be chosen by the Priests and Elders of the people, and none should be chosen who had been begotten in adultery or incest. It seemeth, this was the first Act of a Synod in this kind; and it may be questioned, whether Popish Princes will now consent unto it. There they add, that none should meddle with the murther of a King; and if any did attempt or adhere unto such a crime, if he be a Bishop or of Priestly degree, let him be deposed, and deprived of the Heavenly inheritance, as Judas from his place; and whosoever shall assent unto such a sacrilege, he shall be burned with everlasting fire. It may be doubted, whether Bishops and Jesuits will consent unto this part of the Canon. Unto these Acts did subscribe the King, Bishops, Dukes and Abbots. And in the other Kingdom and Synod, Lambert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, subscribed before King Offa, and then the Bishops, Abbots, Dukes and Counts.

CHAP. I.
Of EMPEROURS.

It is said before, that Irene did govern the Empire of Constantinople, which was still termed the Roman Empire, and that Charls the Great was made Roman Emperour; but because the Empire of Charls was after the 800. years, I have deferred his Coronation unto this place. The Romanists do boast, that the Pope did give the Empire of the West unto King Charls; and many, not examining the truth, but following the sway of Papal flatterers, have written no less; and therefore have called the transferring of the Empire, an usurpation of Antichrist. But the Pope had not as yet come to that height to pretend it, and the right of Charls came another way; for before he came to Rome, An. 800. he had all France under his government, together with Franconia and Aufrasia; he had taken a great part of Spain, unto the River Iber, from the Sarazens; he had subdued Saxony, Westphalia, Dacia, Hungary, Istria, Dalmatia; he had subdued all Italy, except Magna Græcia; and therefore he was intituled, Charls, by the Grace of God, King of the Frenches, Emperour of the Lombards, and Patricius of the Romans. So doth he name himself in his Epistle unto Alcwin, which is in Biblioth. de la Bigne tom. 3. and Alcwin in his Epistle de Ratione septuages. calleth him, The Glorious Emperour [Galliarum] of France, and Rektor & Defensor Ecclesie: Both these Epistles are in the second part of Alcwin's works. I pass over what he did at his coming into the City, because I have spoken of it in the former Century. Platina in Leo the III. and Blond. decad. 3. lib. 10. say, His Coronation was by the decree and prayers of the Roman people. Sigebert. in Chron. sheweth the time and cause saying, The Romans, who in heart were long before fallen from the Emperour of Constantinople; taking the opportunity, that a woman who had picked out the eyes of her own son the Emperour, had gotten the Dominion, with one and general consent, to proclaim King Charls for their Emperour, and Crown him by the hand of the Pope. Ane. Sylvius (who was Pope Pius II.) in his book De auctoritate Rom. Imper. cap. 9. saith, At last the Greek Princes neglecting Rome, and leaving it to the spoil of the Barbarians and others; the people of Rome who with their blood had purchased so great an Empire, and with their valour had founded the Monarchy of the World; saluted Charls, King of the Germans, for their Emperour, not without the consent of the Bishop of Rome. And Sigonius de regno Ital. lib. 4. saith, that Charls had sought this Title in the daies of Adrian, and then he brought an infinite multitude of people to see this spectacle. Whereupon the same Author accuseth the Writers, which say, that Charls knew not of this purpose. Possibly the Senate and the Pope, had agreed to accomplish their design on that day, whereof Charls was either ignorant or unwilling; but the purpose was his own desire. So on Decemb. 25. An. 800. they crowned him by the hands of Pope Leo, as the Emperour was wont to be crowned by the Bishop of Constantinople; and the people cried thrice, Carolo Augusto, à Deo Coronato, Magno & Pacifico Imperatori, Vita & Victoria: And the Pope anointed him and his son Pipin, whom by a solemn decree he declared King of Italy. 10. Naucler. vol. 2. gener. 27. The Pope knowing the dangers which had often befallen his Predecessours and himself, did crave of the Emperour that he would be Protector of the Church of Rome, and he gave publick faith. If it be demanded then, Who hath transferred the Empire from Greece to France? Antonin. Florent. in Summ. Theol. par. 3. tit. 22. cap. 4. answereth for the general, The authority of transferring the Imperial Seat, is from the people of Rome. As for this particular, we see it clearly, the King of France attained the Empire, at that time, partly by inheritance, partly by the sword, partly by dedition; and the Title was given by the people and Bishop of Rome; (see Cent. 8. chap. 2. sect. 12. neer the end) and nothing was proper unto the Bishop but the Coronation and other Ceremonies; which he did, in name of the people, after the custom at Constantinople: As for Lands, no History of credit saith, that the Pope gave any unto the Emperour at any time; as we may hear more hereafter, in Cent. 12. chap. 1. §. 3. and without doubt the Pope had a great stroke in this change, and did act effectually amongst the Citizens for their own advancement; but this change was not pretended to be by the power of the keys, nor as yet was any of them the disposer of Empire or Kingdom. At the same time also it was agreed, that all the Head-men of the City, as well Ecclesiastical as Secular, should give their Oath of Fidelity unto the Emperour. 2. That his Missus should dwell in the Palace of Saint Peter to decide Pleas amongst them; unto whose entertainment was allotted a part of the former Emperour's Patrimony. 3. If any man's cause was perverted by the ordinary Judges, and that man did implore the aid of the Missus, or Emperour's Commissioner, for justice; and the Missus did adjure the Princes of Rome, saying; By the faith ye owe unto my Lord the Emperour, do this man justice; then none should dare to decline unto the right hand or left, although the wrong were done by any of the Pope's kinsmen. 4. That the muls which were exacted of any guilty person, should be equally divided betwixt the Emperour's Missus, and the Pope's Missus. 5. If any goods fell under escheit, they should appertain unto the Church, without an expresse gift of the Emperour. Continuato Eutrop. Catalo. test. ver. lib. 8. And all this right was not sufficient unto King Charls, nor did he enjoy it without contradiction; for Crantz. in Saxon. lib. 2. cap. 8. saith, The envy of this assumed name (the Emperour of Constantinople not disssembling it) did Charls overcome with much money; and he did prevail against their contumacy by his magnanimity, wherein he did excel the Greeks not a little; and he sent many Embassadors unto them, saith Baron. ad An. 800. §. 7. especially he sent unto Irene not only to treat for peace, but sought her marriage, that so he might confirm his Title: She did admire the man's fortune, and was willing, saith Zonar. But before his Embassadors came the second time into Constantinople, the people (when Irene was lying sick) did Crown Nicephorus, on the first day of Novemb. An. 802. and he compelled her to renounce the government, and shut her into a Monastery. Then (saith Bergomas ad An. 796.) he renewed the League that Irene had made before with him. Sigonius saith, They agreed on a League, with expresse condition, that Venice should be free betwixt the two Empires. In the mean time Nicephorus was molested by the Sarazens, and was forced to agree with them upon hard conditions; and also was troubled by the Bulgarians, over whom he had once great Victory; but when he refused all conditions of peace, they gathered together to fight for life and land, and killed him, An. 812. Zonar. and his son Stauratius was wounded in the fight, and escaped into Adrianople, where he was declared Emperour; but after three months Michael Rangabis, his brother-in-law, shut him into a Monastery. Then were mutual Embassadors betwixt the two Emperours, and a perpetual peace was concluded, An. 813. as was touched in Century 8. in Amalarius. All these particulars shew evidently, that the power of transferring the Empire did not appertain unto the Bishop of Rome: and seeing now we have Emperours nearer us, they shall be the subject of this History, so that some mention shall be of the Eastern Empire.

2. CHARLES the Great was crowned Emperour, An. 800. in the 33. year of his reign, and the 58 year of his age; he did fight many battels, and was alwaies victorious: he had Wars with the Heathenish Saxons for the space of 30 years; he did oft times overcome them, and granted them liberty, upon condition they would imbrace the Christian faith; but on every occasion their Duke Wedekind cut off both Loyalty and Christianity. At several times when Charls had obtained a Victory, he erected a new Bishoprick; he founded seven Bishop-Cities in that Province, giving them Princely power, because he did judge that the fierce people might be tamed by religion, rather than by Arms; these were, Breme, Verda, Minda, Padeburn, Osnaburg, Hildesem, Halberstad. Crantz. in Saxon. lib. 2. cap. 23. and in cap. 22. he saith, Although Charls gave unto the High-Priests power of governing, yet the Nobles did not altogether lose their administration; whence it came to pass, that when the War was ended, the Secular power beyond Visurg, or the river Vesper, was acknowledged by them all to belong unto him. At last, because they had revolted, he removed ten thousand of them with their wives and children into Brabant and Flanders, and set some French into that Province; and left his son Charls there with an Army to keep them in obedience. Charls understood that the Latine Translation of the Bible was much corrupted through the negligence of Writers, and gave it in charge unto Alcwin to amend the Translation, who did correct both the Old and New-Testament; so doth Baron. tom. 9. ad An. 908. testifie, as also that he had an ancient Copy in Biblioth. Valitella. carrying Alcwin's name; and Alcwin in his Epistle before his sixth book on John, speaketh of that his work at the command of the King. He laboured much for conversion of the Pagans in Germany, and erected publick Schools at Paris, Ticine and Osnaburg, and furnished them with store of books; he received gifts from the Calipha of Egypt; his sons Pipin and Charls died before him. In the year 813. when he was grown unable to govern, he sent for his son Lewes, and for Bernard son of Pipin; and in presence of his Peers, said unto Lewes; Come, Lewes, Charls the Great had care of Religion.

He caused the Latine Translation of the Bible to be amended.

and with joy put this Crown upon thy head, not for ornament of dignity; but for safety of Our Kingdoms and Christian-Commonwealth; and henceforth govern thou the Empire with happy success; and the Peers did swear fidelity unto him. Nor did Lewes look unto the Pope for coronation or anointing, untill Pope Stephen fled for refuge unto him, as followeth; and then he was Crowned again at Aken. Charles died in February, An. 814. He began a Grammar of the German language, but ended it not; he changed the names of the Winds and Months from the heathenish manner: He writ many books; In the Epistle to Alcuin before his books De Divinis Officiis, he saith, When Christ was at Supper with his Disciples, he broke the bread, and gave the cup to them in figure of his body and blood, and left a great Sacrament, which is profitable unto us. Lib. 1. cap. 15. The mercy of our Mediatour is above the Legal and Evangelical Precepts; through which mercy we are saved, not by our works which we have done, nor by our willing or running, but by his mercy. Lib. 3. cap. 25. The miracles, which they say, have appeared in images, if they did not appear truly (as no authenticall History sheweth) were but lies; if by some imaginary overshadowing they did appear to deceive mens minds; it is most dangerous, lest that old enemy by his subtile art, by shew of wonders, perswade deceitfully to do unlawfull things: But if these things did verily appear, (which cannot be proved by any certain warrant) we should understand, that when many and wondrous things are done at the pleasure of God by some creatures, or in whatsoever creatures they be done; yet these things are not to be worshipped, by which, or in which, these wonders are made; because the Almighty God, who sheweth many signs unto men by visible and palpable things, to mollifie the hardness of mens hearts by these visible things, doth not work these signs, to confirm the worship of any creature; for he hath commanded to worship and adore him alone: Because God spoke out of a bush unto Moses, should the bush therefore be worshipped? Because a woman was healed by touching the hem of Christ's garment, should hem therefore be worshipped? Lib. 4. Cap. 2. The Holy and Catholick Church professeth to serve God not by images, nor by men, nor aethereal powers, but by Christ our Lord, Catal. test. ver. lib. 8. Charls made many Laws and Ecclesiastical Constitutions, which Ansegisus or Angisus, Abbot of Lobien. and then Arch-Bishop of Senonen. gathered together with the Constitutions of Lewes, and divided them into seven books: Sinderus testifieth, that they were in the Abbey of Saint Gallus, and were Printed lately at Paris. In the Preface he saith, he had appointed these Constitutions with advice of his Priests and Counsellors; and that he had followed the example of King Josias, who indeavoured to bring the Kingdom which God had given him, unto the worship of the true God. Lib. 1. He commanded to try the learning and conversation of Intrantes; he did forbid private Masses, and appealed to the See of Rome, but indirectly. Ca. 10. He forbiddeth confusion of Diocies, or that no Bishop should medle with any Parish of another Diocy; he forbiddeth any books to be read publickly, but what were approved by the Councel at Chalcedon, cap. 20. And cap. 42. he forbiddeth to worship Saints: Cap. 82. He commandeth that Bishops suffer not the Priests to teach the people other things then are contained in, or according to the Holy Scriptures. Lib. 2. cap. 3. Although the authority of the Ecclesiastical Ministry, may seem to stand in our person; yet by the authority of God, and ordinance of man, it is known to be so divided, that every one of you, in his own place and order, hath his own place and ministry; hence it is manifest, that I should admonish you all, and ye all should further and help us. Ca. 4. He admonisheth Bishops, especially, to teach teach their people both by life and doctrine; both by themselves and them who are under them; as they will answer in their accounts at the great day.

Can. 17. The Bishop of the first See should not be called the Prince of Priests, or the highest Priest, or any such title; but only, the Bishop of the first See.

Can. 45. None can lay another foundation, save that which is layed, which is Christ Jesus; whosoever therefore in the love of God, and of his neighbour, keepeth the certainty of faith which is in Christ Jesus; he hath laid the same Jesus Christ, the Son of God and Man, to be his foundation; it is to be hoped therefore, that where Christ is the foundation, the edifice of good works will follow: In a word, if his meddling with Italy, and his advancing the Pope, for confirming that which he had taken, can be excused; he was unto all Princes a pattern of magnificence, zeal in religion, learning, eloquence, temperance, prudence, moderation, &c. Alcwin contra Elipant. lib. 1. faith, Charls was a Catholick in faith, a King in power, a High-Priest in preaching, a Judge in equity, a Philosopher in liberal studies, famous in manners, and excellent in all honesty; he was never served at Table with more then four dishes at once; his exercise was hunting, and reading of Histories, Pet. Mexia. In the year 813. Crunus, Duke of Bulgaria, pursued his Victory, and fought once with Michael Rangabis, a worshipper of Images; and at the second alarm he did renounce his Crown; and Leo Armenius, General of the Army, was declared Emperour; he slue Crunus in Battel, and returned home with Triumph. Thereafter he had peace; he threw down Images, and banished the Patriarch Nicephorus, a worshipper of Images, and many more. Zornar.

3. LEWES the Godly, confirmeth the peace with Leo Armenius, and had Wars in Datia; whence he was necessitated to return, to redress some accidents at home, and he easily calmed them, by means of his Nephew Bernard. In the year 818. the same Bernard rebelled against his Uncle, and claimed the Crown of France, because he was the son of the eldest brother; but he was soon taken captive, his eys were picked out, he was sent Prisoner into France, and his Kingdom was given to Lotharius, the Emperour's son. At that time Lewes confirmed the Donation of King Pipin and of Charls, unto the Church of Rome, without making mention of any former right; as may be seen in the words of the Donation, in Volaterran and Gratian. Yet he gave not over the City of Rome; for Platina in Serg. 2. sheweth, that Rome was allotted unto Lotharius, when the Empire was divided again: and Ibegan chorepi. Trevir. writing of the same Lewes saith, It was appointed, that according to former custom, some should be sent from the Emperour to Rome, who having the authority of Judges, should do justice to all the people; and accordingly, Legates were sent to Rome to judge Pope Paschalis, who was challenged of murder. Io. Lampad. in Mellis. Lewes caused the Bible to be translated into the Saxon language. Though he was religious and studious of peace, yet he was not free from conspiracy; he had advanced many persons unto high honours; and (as Crantz. in Saxon. lib. 2. cap. 25.) for their wickedness which he had certainly tried, he cast them down again; they therefore did devise many things against him, and drew his own sons, Lotharius, Pipin and Lewes, on their side; under pretext, that the Emperour did affect his youngest son, by his present wife, more then them. They did so prevail, that the Emperour was deposed, and Lotharius was declared Emperour, who shut his father into a Monastery, and his young son Charls. Many who were loyal, would have taken Arms for his relief, but he did forbid them. Hugobert Bishop of Lions, and Bernard Bishop of Vienna, and many other Bishops took part with the sons, because

he would have restrained their pomp and pride; but they made pretence; that he had married Judith within degrees forbidden by the Pope. Also Pope Gregory the IV. hateth him because he was an enemy of Images; nevertheless, he came into France, under pretence to appease the troubles: But (as Morn. in Myster. ex Chronic. Dionys. and others testifie) to kindle the coals; he fought that both parties would submit unto his arbitrement. They who were on the Emperour's side, were suspicious of deceit, and would not submit; but said to the Pope, If thou come to excommunicate us, thou shalt return excommunicated. Vsser. de Eccles. stat. cap. 1. Crantz. loc. cit. saith,

His restoration.

When the sons had examined the cause of this stir, they found the innocency of their father, and restored him unto his Empire; and he, being the meekest of all mortals, did readily forgive them, and made Lotharius partner of the Empire with him; but he dealt more severely with the Bishops: they fled into Italy, nor could the authority of the Pope help them; only who did most humbly confess their offence, were pardoned. About that time, a huge multitude of Sarazens entred into Italy, took Rome, and made Saint Peter's Church a stable for their horses; and wasted all Thuscia, burning Houses and Churches; when they heard of the Lombards coming against them, they made hast away with much Spoil, with infinite number of Captives; as also they spoiled Sicily. Michael the Stutterer, conspired against Leo Armenius in his 7 year, and killed him; he slew some Bishops, and banished others who worshipped images. His son Theophylus was answerable to his name; he punisheth not only the worshippers, but the makers of Images. In the year 824. he sent unto Lewes, desiring the determination of the French Church, concerning Images; and intreating that he would interpose his authority, with the Pope, in that matter. The Emperour called a Synod at Paris, of which is mention in the end of Century 8. and he sent Jeremia Bishop of Senone, and Jonas Bishop of Orleance, unto Pope Eugenius; who did ask, By what place of Scripture he could prove it lawfull to worship images? He answereth, They are arrogant who dare ask such questions, Ph. Morn. in Myster. ex Synod. Parsi. sub Ludo. & Lothar. Pe. Mexia. writeth, that these three most famous heads of Europe, died within the space of four daies, Theophylus, Lewes, and Pope Gregory the IV. An. 840. Lewes, before his death, divided his Kingdomes, and sought not the consent of the Pope.

The Empire is divided and weakened.

4. LOTHARIUS the eldest son of Lewes, succeeded unto his father, with common consent; except of his brethren Charls and Lewes, for they took it ill, that he should have both France and Italy; and they be inclosed in Bojaria and Aquitania: so they force their brother unto a new division. Lewes became King of Germany, and had Hungary, Bohemia, Saxony, Moravia, Frisia, Bojaria, &c. Charls was King of France, except Provence or Narbone and Lorain, and a part of Burgundy, which with Italy, and the Title of Emperour, appertaineth to Lotharius, Platin. in Serg. Sigonius de reg. Ital. lib. 5. addeth, As much as was taken from the power of France, so much the more waxed the power and liberty of the Italians; that is, the Popes. For before Lotharius was crowned, the people and clergy of Rome did chuse and consecrate Pope Sergius the II. not respecting the consent of the Emperour; and some Cities in Italy were talking that they would be no more in subjection unto French blood. Then Lotharius designeth his son Lewes for his successeur, and went together unto Rome. On the way he exerceth security on some Cities who had made shew of Rebellion; when he approached unto Rome, the Citizens came forth to meet him; after them came the Priests with their Crucifixes, and sing, Blessed

Blessed is he who cometh in the name of the Lord, Hosanna in the most high; and they convoy him unto the steps of Saint Peter, where Pope Sergius was waiting; they kissed each other. Naclerus and Platina say no more of their courtesie; Sigonius saith, Lotharius kissed his holy foot; but this is falsely added: for Baronius would not have omitted that particular, who saith ad An. 844. ex Anastas. They embraced one another, and the King held the Pope's right hand; they went together unto the Silver-gate. Then said Sergius, If thou comest in peace, and for the utility of the Christian Commonwealth, and not for rapine, come in; but if thou be otherwise minded, remember that thou hast above thee a revenger of all wickedness, Platin. The Emperor biddeth him to be of good courage, and so they went forward. They fate down on their knees, and gave thanks unto God and Saint Peter that no harm was; for they were afraid, that the Emperour would have done there, as he had done by the way. After eight daies Sergius declared Lotharius King of Italy, anointed him, and put the Crown upon his head. The Sarazens were glad that the Empire was divided; and entring into Italy, they took Barri and other Cities, which they kept 30. years. Lotharius had no Martial spirit, and being weary of government, he divided the Empire again. To his second son Lotharius he gave that part of France, which from his name was called Lotharingia or Lorain; to his youngest son Charls, he gave Provence and Languedoc; and to his eldest son Lewes, he gave Italy, with the Title of Emperour; together with this charge, that because the discipline of the Church, which was so well prescribed by his father and grand-father, was now failed; therefore so soon as he could have peace, he should assemble the Nobility and Clergy, and by his authority restore the same unto its former integrity, Io. Lampad. in Mellis. and he did impute his infelicity unto his own iniquity; and with sorrow did remember his attempts against his father: he entred into a Monastery, and died An. 855. Pet. Mexia. Theodora, the Widow of Theophilus, governed the Eastern Empire 14. years; she set up Images, and restored the Bishops and others whom her husband had banished or imprisoned. Her son Michael coming to age closed her in a Monastery, Zonar. He threatened the Pope, that he would come and cast down Rome, if he did not cast Images out of the Churches: he was the only Prince that durst give Battel unto the Sarazens in Italy; but his Captain was overthrown by them. After this Battel, they raised a greater Army, and had made a prey of Italy; if God had not by a stormy wind drowned their Navy, except a few ships which returned to Affrick. They repaired their forces, and return the third time, they wast Italy, and besiege Rome, till Pope Leo gave them Battel, as followeth. After Michael succeeded his Uncle, Michael Bardas.

the Church.*

5. LEWES the II. had only the Kingdom of Italy, with the Title of Emperour, and had his manure now at Pavia, then at Millan, but ofttest at Rome in the Palace of Saint Peter; and the Pope lodged at S. Apostolos. Continuatur Eutropij (who lived at that time) addeth; Because this Emperour dwelt in Italy, he exercised the more authority; having in the City prudent men who knew the priviledges of the old Emperours, and did intimate unto him, that he should recover the ancient authority. He entred with Arms into the lands of Benevento, and sought to bring all the bounds of Italy under his command; he expelled the Sarazens out of Barri. When he returned to Rome, the Pope gave him to understand, that he did not sufficiently account of his Supremacy. The Emperour sent him answer, that he should not trouble himself; seeing according to ancient Canons, no Prelate can excommunicate a Bishop, without consent of a Synod; and the calling of

Synodsis in the power of the Emperour, and not of the Pope. When the Pope heard such an answer, he went into Saint Peters, and intreated the Emperour gently; thenceforth they were more familiar, and the Emperour's Court continued at Rome untill his death. Lotharius, King of Lorain, died without succession, An. 876. Basilus a man of mean birth, but advanced by the Emperour Michael Bardas, even to be partner of the Empire, slue his Master, and became Emperour alone. His entring did not look well, yet he relieved the Subjects of some Taxes; he drove the Sarazens out of Slavonia and Dalmatia, with the help of the Venetians; and also out of Candy by his Captain, and vexed them in Asia.

the Empire.*

6. CHARLES the Bald, King of France; and Lewes, King of Germany, strove for the Empire; the one for his age, and the other for his place, seeing the Empire had been annexed to the Crown of France. They went towards Rome, Charls preveneth his brother, and having agreed with Pope John the IX. was crowned. Lewes made many vows that he would take both Empire and Kingdom from him, but was arrested with sickness at Frankford. There he divided his Kingdom amongst his three sons: to Lewes he gave Saxony, Turingia, Frisia, and the Provinces within them; with the Title, King of East-France. To Carloman he gave Bojaria, Austria, Bohem and Moravia; with the Title of King of Bavaria. To the third son Charls, he gave Suevia, Franconia, with some parts of Lorain (which he had taken after the death of Lotharius) with the Title of King of Germany. The Emperour thought to have caught advantage by this division, and made speed against them; but the brethren held together, and caused him to return with shame. The Sarazens entred again into Italy, and besieged Capua; Pope John adviseth the Emperour, and he expelleth them. In the mean time his Nephews prepare against him, and he returning to meet them, was poisoned by a Jew his Physician; and died at Mantua in the third year of his reign.

test for it.*

7. CHARLES the Fat, King of Germany, strove for the Empire, and was crowned by the Romans. Pope John would not consent, and therefore was imprisoned; he escaping goeth into France, and confirmed Lewes the Stutterer, son to Charls the Bald. Nevertheless, because Charls did oppose the Moors in Italy, Pope John returned, and confirmed the first coronation, and declared the other to be of none effect. Pet. Mexia. Shortly thereafter Lewes dieth, leaving behind him two bastard sons, and his wife with child, whereupon followed great troubles in France. The two brethren of Charls died also. The Normans and Danes overrun France with great hostility. The Peers were constrained to seek aid from the Emperour, who came and received the Crown of France. So all that had appertained unto Charls the Great, was united in his person again; except the Kingdom of Bavaria. His grandure continued not long, for the Hungars came out of Scythia, and sate down in Pannonia; the Normans passe the river Sequana, take Rouan; and by excursions trouble both France and Germany. Charls did once again send his Armies against them, but with loss of his Souldiers. Then the Normans became more confident, they besiege Paris, they burn Towns and Churches, slay Bishops and Priests, spare neither age nor sex. Charls bought their peace, and gave them Neustria, which keepeth their name till this day. Charls became more unable both in body and courage; he assembled a Diete at Triburia, and began to talk of the Empire. The Princes took occasion to accuse him as lunatick and unfit for government; they deprive him, and set up Arnulph, King of Bavaria. Charls dieth in sorrow in Jan. An. 888. All this time Leo, son of Basilus, was Emp. of the East.

8. ARNULPH was received Emperor by the States on this side of the Alps; but Pope Adrian the III. had caused a Constitution to be enacted, that if Charls died without succession, the Kingdom of Italy, and Title of Emperour, should return unto the Italians. And now Italy was divided; for Albert Marques of Tuscia, Berengarius a Roman by birth, and Duke of Friuli, and Wido Governour of Spoleto strove for it; Berengarius was crowned King of Italy, by Anselm bishop of Millan. Wido raiseth a great Army, and with little difficulty possesseth all Lombardy. Berengarius runneth to Arnulph holding a Diete at Worms; and with earnest prayers besought his aid against Wido as a common enemy. He was once restored, and expelled again by Lambert son of Wido, and was brought in again by the power of Arnulph. Arnulph then goeth to Rome, and besiegeth it. The Romans shew themselves such Lions, that when a Hare, hearing the noise of the Host, ran towards the City, for very fear they desperately threw themselves over the Walls; and Arnulph scaling the Walls, with little danger took the City. He restoreth Pope Formosus from his adversaries, and beheadeth them. The Pope to gratifie his redeemer, blesseth and crowneth him. Nevertheless the Italians will not continue under his obedience; for Lambert kept still the name of King, untill he was slain in hunting, and left the Kingdom peaceable to Berengarius. Then a jar hapned betwixt him and his son-in law Albert, Marques of Eporredia; who sent for Lewes, son of Charls, King of Provence (of whom before) and offered him the Kingdom. The estate of Italy was then miserable, for the Sarazens lay in the Dutchy of Benevento, and suffered none to go to Rome unspoiled; at last they were expelled by Adelgisus, Duke of Benevento. Lewes now entred into Italy, and was crowned; but new troubles arose in Lombardy, untill Lewes was taken, his eys were pulled out, and he renounced the Kingdom. In the mean time Arnulph was busied with the Hungarians, and expelled them out of France, Bavier, Suevia, and Saxony. Odo ruled France under the name of Tutor, and was the Authour of the three Lillies in France; at last Charls, the simple son of Lewes the Stutterer, received that Crown. Arnulph died of vermin An. 900. The fore-named Leo had continual Wars with the Infidels in Asia; and in the end obtained a notable Victory. Alexander his brother, reigned 13. months; and then Constantine, son of Leo, partly under Tutor, and partly alone, did reign 54 years.

OF POPES.

1. STEPHEN the IV. was set in the Papal Chair, without the knowledge of the Emperour; wherefore he hastned into France to excuse the fact, and to crave confirmation; and at Rhemes he crowned the Emperour, with a Crown brought from Rome; he returned bearing a Cross, not like Christ, but of gold, which the Emperour gave to Saint Peter. When he saw that the Emperour had so lightly forgiven the election, he said at Rome, The sence of the Decree of Pope Leo, was not that the election should chiefly belong unto the Emperour, but that they might well make their own election; and then only seek confirmation from the Emperour, or his Legate. He sought pardon for them who were banished under Charls, Platin. he died in the 7 month, An. 817.

the Pope.

2. PASCALIS the I. was chosen without the knowledge of the Emperour; wherefore incontinently, he sent a Nuntio with gifts unto Lewes, laying the fault on the people, who had forced him to accept Consecration. The Emperour admitteth the excuse, and sent word unto the People and Clergy of Rome, that the custom and ordinance of their Predecessours should be kept; and therefore they should not trespass against him any more. Platin. Gratian. dist. 63. cap. ego Ludovicus, alledgeth that Lewes gave free liberty unto the Clergy and People to chuse the Pope. But the following practice of Gregory the IV. confirmeth the testimony of Platin. and others. Paschalis was one of the most superstitious worshippers of dead bodies, if Platina speaketh truly of him; who also sheweth that he was accused for murdering Theodorus Primicerius, and Leo Nomenclator, because they had maintained a privilege of the Emperour, nor could he be pardoned, untill he had cleansed himself by Oath in an assembly of Bishops, and then the Emperour forgave him. The next year Lotharius son of Lewes, and designed Emperour, came to Rome, and found the estate thereof depraved, and the wickedness of some Bishops. Therefore it was enacted, that one should be sent from the Emperour to administer Justice, Morn. in Myster. ex Autore vii. Ludo. Paschalis sate 7 years.

3. EUGENIUS the II. was chosen, when Lotharius was in the City. Of his idolatry and pride is spoken before. Diodorus in Altar. Damasc. pag. 421. ex Choppin. de sacr. polit. lib. 2. reporteth, that he did first appoint Bishops to have Prisons for restraint of the vices of the Clergy. He did sit 4 years.

Pride of the Pope.

4. VALENTINE the I. of a Deacon was made Pope, for his singular diligence and gravity in his youth; but he wanted not pride, for at his election he gave his foot to be kissed by the Senatours, which was never done before. Helmold. in Histor. Sclavo. lib. 1. and after him Ph. Morn. in Myster. have marked the cause; The liberality of Lewes had made them earthly Princes, who should have been guides to heaven by feeding souls. His pride was soon laid low, for he died within 40. daies.

Bishops.

5. GREGORY the IV. would not sit in his Chair, till he was confirmed by the Emperor. Platina saith, The Emperour did so not out of pride (for he was very mild and courtecous) but he would not lose his Imperial right; and although he gave them wealth, he would not quit his authority. This Pope ordained the Feast of All-Saints to be kept Novemb. 1. Naucler. Pol. Vergil. de invent. rer. lib. 6. cap. 8. & Fasci. temp. and the French and German Churches began first to observe it. He was not slow in transporting dead bodies. The Papishees talk much of an Epistle of a Greek Monk unto this Gregory, to prove the Primacy of the Pope, because he calleth him equal unto the Angels, the Apostolical Father, the highest light, &c. But they will not shew, that he writ that Epistle in despite of his Patriarch, who had censured him for worshipping Images; nor will they tell, how the same Monk calleth the Bishop of Alexandria the great light, the first Prince of Bishops, and Apostolical Father; and in another Epistle, he calleth the Bishop of Jerusalem the first of the Patriarchs, though thou (saith he) be called the fifth; for where the Bishop of our souls, and High-Priest of all was born, wrought all his miracles, suffered, was buried, rose again, lived, and whence he ascended, there undoubtedly is the highest dignity of all. It may then be doubted, who was the first in that man's opinion. Ph. Morn. in Myster. pag. 157. Gregory sate 16 (or, as some say, 18) years.

6. SERGIUS the II. was crowned by the Clergy and People, not regarding the Emperour's consent, because of the emulation amongst the brethren.

thren. Continuator Eutropij writeth, that Lotharius and his son Lewes being anointed, did great harm unto the Romans for this their trespass; and caused them to give their Oath of fidelity, and then did confirm the Pope. Ph. Morn. in Myster. pag. 159. This Pope's name was Osporci, and being ashamed of it, he (first of all Popes) did change his name, after his investiture, Platin. After his example it became a custom, saith Pol. Vergil. de invent. rer. lib. 4. cap. 10. that if any who was chosen had not an honest name, he did change it; for example (saith he) and let it not be spoken without laughter; if he be a wicked doer, he is called Bonifacius; if timorous, Leo; if a Clown, Urbanus; if fierce, Clemens; if of ill report, Benedictus. . . . and they say this is done in imitation of Christ, who gave the name of Peter unto Simon. Serepus did first ordain that a Bishop should not be judged under 72 witnesses. The fore-named Continuator writeth, that in his time was great simony; and he professed openly to sell Bishopricks, and who gave most, should speed best. The Authour of Catal. test. ver. from an old manuscript, and Henr. de Erford. lib. 10. sheweth, that none was found, who for the glory of God, would forbid this vice; and therefore God sent the Sarazens amongst them, who slue great numbers of them, and carried away great spoil. But Ph. Morn. ex Anastas. Biblioth. writeth, These Bishops Drogo of Metens, Gregory of Ravenna, Angilbert of Millan, Joseph of Eporredia, Aginus of Verona, Almaricus of Cuma, Norchard of Vercelles, the Bishops of Luca, Pisa, Volaterr. together with others, that is, the chiefest Bishops of Italy; and the Counts Boio, Adalgisus, John, &c. had contention with him daily for his pride and usurpation; and Agilbert made separation from the Church of Rome, whereas his Predecessours had submitted unto the Pope the space of 60 years, he nor his Successours would not subject themselves for the space of 209 years, as followeth. Also Theodore, Abbot of Fulda, in an Epistle testifieth, that the Church of Millan did then respect the writings of Ambrose, and his Liturgy was in use there. Ph. Morn. in Myster. Sergius sate 3 years.

7. LEO the IV. was chosen the same day that Sergius died, and he was consecrated without the consent of the Emperour; and therefore (as Anastassius and Ph. Mornay say) the Romans fearing that Lewes would return and censure them for that deed, sent their excuse that they were in danger of the Sarazens, and had need of the Pope's present help. For the Infidels were lying about Rome, and had wasted a great part of Italy, untill Pope Leo gave them battell at Ostia; where (by the providence of God, after publick prayer in audience of the Army) many of the enemies were slain, others were taken captive, and the residue fled unto their ships. And then Leo writ unto the Emperour (as is in Gratian. dist. 10. Cap. de Capitalis) thus: Concerning your Imperial Precepts, and the Precepts of your High-Priests, our Predecessours, to be kept irresistibly so far as we could or now may, we profess to keep constantly both now and for ever: As for the time past, he protested that he was compelled thereunto, and not of his own motive, nor in contempt of the Emperour; and he subjoined, If any hath said, or shall say otherwise, ye may certainly understand he is a liar. In another Epistle, (when he was accused that he and Gratian Magister Militum had plotted to reduce the Empire unto Greece, Platin.) he writ more submissly, saying, If we have done any thing amiss, and have not kept the path of just laws, wherein we are subject, we will amend at the sight of your Majesty, or of your Missi. . . . and we desire not only that these things be exactly tried by your Missi, but whether they shall be found less or greater, let all things be founded by them, that nothing remain thereafter undiscussed or undecided.

A Pope is a Warriour,

Here it appeareth clearly, what authority the Emperour had then above the Pope. This Leo bestowed six years in repairing the City, for the Sarazens had weakned a great part of it, and all Italy did contribute unto the reparation; also the Emperour and his two brethren sent a great sum of money for the work, saith Naclerus. He did add much unto the City, and that part was called Leonina: he ordained that a Crofs of Gold all set with precious stones should be carried before him, contrary to an Act in a Council under Gregory the IV. The Authour of Catol. test. ver. lib. 10. hath a story, which he saith was never in Print before, ex Luthprand, how Leo observing many things done impudently against God and the salvation of Christian souls, did assemble a Synod of 67 Bishops at Rome, by the advice of Lotharius and Lewes, and setteth down 42 Canons, which he hath particularly. In them he urgeth not plurality of Masses, but that Bishops should attend their flocks, and teach their people wholesom doctrine; no Intrantes shall receive Consecration unless they be sought by the Clergy and People; Actuels should not be absent from their charge any long space without the leave of their Prince and Metropolitan; they should not use Dice, Cards, Hunting, Hawking, &c. In this Synod he excommunicated Anastasius, a Priest, for being five years absent from his Parish: he writ an Epistle to Lotharius, intreating his clemency to present a friend of his, Colonus, unto one of the two Bishopricks; as is touched in Cent. 8. cap. 2. for this custom was then, that the King did place men in Bishopricks, saith Crantz. in Saxon. lib. 2. cap. 27. Leo sate 9 years.

Pope.

8. JOHN the VIII. the Whore both spiritually and bodily sate next; she dissembled her sex handsomly, and by her singular civility and learning, did procure that she was chosen Pope with full consent; and after 2 years she was delivered of a child in the midst of the Procession, and died in the street. Platin. Agrippa de van. scient. Cap. 62. writeth so, Among the High-Priests of Rome we read of many Schismatics and Reprobates, and also Hereticks, and once that a woman did ascend to the top of so great dignity, who was called John the VIII, and ruled the Apostolick See, being commended of all men . . . and which is not lawfull unto women, she exerced all the Offices of an High-Priest; nor were her Acts annulled, because common error makes a Law. Onuphrius and after him Bellarmin and other Papists, go about to blot her name out of the roul of Popes, but with foolish reasons. First they say, Anastasius (who at the same time was Bibliothecarius) hath her not. Ans. Though he have her not, others have not omitted her; no argument holdeth negatively from the testimony of any one man. 2. Behold ignorance, say they, she was an English of Mentz; is Mentz in England, and not in Germany? Ans. Who knows not that Boniface, the first Bishop of Mentz, was an Englishman, and built the Abbey at Fulda in favour of Englishmen? Marianus Scotus (who lived about the year 1050.) calleth her John, surnamed English. 3. To what end went she to Athens? to learn? but there was no learning in Athens. Ans. Epiphanius in hares. 64. saith, Origen was a Disciple in Athens; Gregory Nazianzen and Basil were Students there, as it is in Vita Basilii written by Nazianzen; Bellarmin de Ro. Pont. lib. 3. cap. 24. testifieth, that Michael, the son of Theophilus, restored the Schools of learning; and John Erigena, surnamed Scotus, at the very same time was brought up at Athens, as followeth; also Histories shew, that at Athens was still an University, till it was destroyed by the Turk for envy of learning, An. 1453. 4. Here twolices, saith Onuphrius, one that he professed Letters in the City; another, that within two years she came to the Papal Seat; seeing there was no profession then in Rome, neither came any

to the Papal Chair, unless he had been a Priest or a Deacon. Ans. Is not a Priest ashamed to say or hear this? Was ever Pia Roma without a Professor? Where was all the Clerks of Rome? As for the other, Platina saith it not; and whosoever hath said it, how many Monks and Laicks have been Popes? See Onuphr. in Indic. ad schism. 9 & 10. Platina and Naclerus have two evidences of this She-Pope; one, that the Popes go not in the high and straightest way at their Processions, for detestation of her deed; another, the new elected Pope is set in a bored chair, where he letteth down his privities, to be touched by the last Deacon Cardinal, lest they fell again into the like error: which Agrippa de van. scient. cap. 63. expresseth in these terms, because among the Egyptians, who were the first authors of religions, it was not lawfull that any should be a Priest, who was not entred into the order of Priapus; so it is received in our Church, saith he, that he who wanteth the stones cannot be Pope. Onuphrius saith, The Popes go not that way, because it is not the nearest nor broadest way. But why then, saith Platina, that the Popes go out of the way for detestation of the fact? Naclerus saith, it was betwixt the Church of Saint Clemens and Colosseum, and the Pope declines that way, when he goeth into the Lateran Of the chair, Onuphrins saith nothing: Bellarmin saith, The Pope is set in a slight chair at the first, and sitteth in it a space, to teach him, that he is advanced from a low place to an eminent. But if you ask wherefore is the chair bored? and why crieth the Deacon Masculus ~~est~~? they have nothing to say. Lastly, Onuphrius imputes the first mention of this She-Pope, unto Marinus Polonus, who lived about the year 1320; and he read it in Chron. Sigeberti, who lived An. 1330, and he is corrupted, saith he. But what History may not be denied? Marianus Scotus, who lived before them, hath the same. He is also corrupted, saith Bellar. loc. cit. Who did corrupt them? Laonicus Chalcondilas lib. 6. de reb. Turc. speaks of this sitting of the Pope, saith, Nam constat; for it is certain, that a woman was advanced unto the Papacy; her sex was not known, because the Italians all almost do raze their faces. Otho Epist. Frisingen. Annal. Augustani, Volaterran, Sabellicus, Bergomas, Palmerius, Trithemius in vit. Luthprandi, Stella in vit. 230 Pontif. Alb. Cranz. 10. Naclerus Fascic. tempor. pag. 49. edit. Venet. An. 1484. and many others of sundry Nations, and famous among the learned, have written of her. The testimonies are particularly set down in Catal. test. ver. lib. 10. to them I adjoin the words of Baptista Matuan, who lived in the 15 Century, and speaking of Hell, saith,

Hic pendebat adhuc sexum mentita virilem
Femina, cui triplici Phrygiam diademate mitram Extollebat apex, & Pontificalis adulter.

So that as Platina saith, they seem too stubborn and obstinate who omit her, of whom all men almost do affirm: let us erre with the multitude, although it appear that these things, which I have said, be of that sort, as are thought possible. This Whore sate in the year 855 and 856.

9. BENEDICT the III was chosen without knowledge of the Emperour. At that time was a schism, for many of the chiefeft Romans were for Anastasius. After a year a Missus came from the Emperour, and then the people and clergy were convened to a new election; and the same Benedict was chosen again, the Missus not only assisting, but commanding, saith Anastasius and Ph. Morn. in Myster. Naclerus saith, the Emperour Lewis's Legate did confirm the election; and the next day he was consecrated in Saint Peter's. He adorned Churches with silver and gold; and is said to have first ordained, that prayers should be made for the dead, whereas before it was only by practice. He sate 3 years.

10. NICOLAUS the I, surnamed the great, was chosen by the Romans. Before he was chosen, the Emperour Lewis knowing how expedient it was for him to preserve the right of his Ancestours in the election, made haste to Rome; but the Romans purposely prevented him with the election. Nicolaus thought to debar the Emperour from the consecration, but he could not hinder that. He had a mouth that spoke great things, by his decree he equalled Papal decrees unto the holy Scriptures; he ordained that no secular Prince nor Emperour, should be present in the Synods, unless it were in matter of faith, Gratian. dist. cap. Vbinam; to wit, Princes should put to death them which are condemned of heresie. He ordained that all publick prayers should be in Latine (as Pope Vitalian had ordained before, but was not obeyed;) that no Laick should judge a Church-man; that the Pope should be judged of none, because Constantine the great, called the Bishop of Rome a God, Grat. dist. 96. cap. Salis. At this time Michael Bardas put away his wife, and married her daughter; for this cause Ignatius the Patriarch, denied him the Communion. Bardas assembleth a Synod, and causeth Ignatius to be deposed, and setteth up Photius. Here ariseth a sedition, some favouring the good cause, and others swaying with authority. In the end, Nicolaus was intreated to take away the schism. The Pope was well pleased, and sent his Legates, Rodual Bishop of Portuen, and Zachary Bishop of Ananien, giving them a Commission to restore Ignatius, if he would promise to restore the worship of Images. Zonaras saith, Bardas perswadeth the Legates to approve what he had done. When they return, Nicolaus excommunicateth them, and deposeth them as transgressours of his commands. Ph. Morn. in Myster. p. 177. At that time Nicolaus writ the Epistle, which is in the 3. tome of Councils, and contains swelling presumption, in some points contrary to ancient histories; yet in other points contrary to the doctrine of his successours. There he saith, none of the Eastern Emperours had acknowledged the authority of the Bishops of Rome. This he saith expressly, but in an upbraiding manner, as if the Emperours had omitted their duty. Speaking of Ignatius, he saith, the Judges should not be suspected; this he confirms by reason, and by many examples; and from Pope Gelasius he saith, Should the same persons be enemies, Judges and witnesses? even earthly matters should not be committed to such judgement. Doth he not then maintain the lawfull excuses of John Husse and Martine Luther, who for the same causes were unwilling to be judged by the Popes their enemies? Then Nicolaus alledgeth, that Pope Celestin was President in the general Council at Ephesus; but the words of that Council shew that Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria, was President. And to prove that they should not have judged the Patriarch, he brings the example of David, who would not smite his Master Saul; but he observes not that Saul was King; and therefore, neither should his successours have kicked against their Sovereign Emperours. He addeth, a little number hindreth not, where truth abounds; neither avails multitude, where ungodliness reigneth, nor should any man boast of a multitude, &c. What is more contradictory to the doctrine of the Romish Church in following ages, which holds multitude to be an infallible note of the true Church? After a little, he commendeth the worship of Images; and will have all Councils to be estimate by the approbation of the Pope. Whereas the Bishops of Rome were wont to term the Emperour our Lord and Defender; this is the first that calls the Emperour his son, and his successours sometimes, will not honour him with the title of their servant. He said, Before the coming of Christ, some were typically both Priests and Kings; but when the type is come to the true King and High-Priest, in one person, the Emperour should no more take to him the right of the Priesthood; nor hath the High-Priest taken unto him the name of the Emperour; because the one Mediator between God and Man, even the Man Christ Jesus, hath so discerned the offices of both powers, their dignities and actions being distinguished, that both Emperours have need of High-Priests in spiritual things; and the High-Priests have need of the Imperial laws for temporal things, and so spiritual actions may be free from carnal oppressions; and therefore the souldier of God should not be intangled with worldly affairs; neither should he rule divine things who is wrapped in worldly matters, and so both powers may be helped. Gratian hath registred these words dist. 96. cap. Cum ad verum. He speaks so, to exclude the Emperour from judging Ecclesiastical causes; but neither he, nor Gratian did foresee how the same words would condemn the succeeding Popes, who have usurped both Swords and two Robes; nor how Bellarmin, de Ro. Pont. lib. 5. cap. 3. gathereth out of these words, that the Dominion of the World belongeth not to the Pope, and reasoneth thus; Seeing whatsoever the Pope hath, he hath it from Christ, as Pope Nicolaus saith, then the Pope may take all power from the Emperours and Kings, or he may not take it; if he may take it, then he is greater then Christ; if he may not take it, then he hath not Princely power. Again cap. 8. he saith, Christ for conserving humility would distinguish these two offices, and gave only the Priesthood to Peter, and left the Empire to Tiberius. According to this consequence it may be justly inferred, the Pope now doth contrary to the tenet of the ancient Bishops, and is the Antichrist; exalting himself, contrary to Christ's order, above all that is called God. This Nicolaus did ordain, that no man should receive the Sacrament from any Priest who had a concubine or wife. He sate 7 years, 9 months; his See after him was vacant 8 years, 7 months, Platin. Who was head of the Church, on earth, at that time? Or was it headless?

10. H A D R I A N the II, the son of a Bishop Talarus, was chosen in a tumult of the people without consent of the Emperour, wherefore his Legates were not a little offended, yet were appeased by the Romans, alledging that the multitude could not be ruled; and they intreated the Legates, that they would confirm the good man, which the clergy and people had named. Platin. The Legates yeeld, although they clearly perceive, that the clergy and people would usurp all the authority of the election; and perhaps (saith he) that the liberty of the Church-men may increase. At that time Basilius slue the Eastern Emperour, as is said, and when he came to the Sacrament, Photius the Patriarch, rejects him as unworthy of Communion, who with his own hand had slain his Sovereign. Basilius dissembling his anger, calleth a Synod for deposition of Photius, and restitution of Ignatius; and to this end, he desireth Hadrian to send his Legates. Hadrian dealeth as Boniface the 3. did with Phocas; as by dispensing with, or rather authorizing parricide, they began their supremacy; by the same means they increase it. He renewed the Commission of Pope Nicolaus his Legates; and in his Epistle to Basilius, he saith, He who hath all right of Kingdoms, and power of all things, hath raised up, in these daies, thy Kingdom, which is protected from above; by which the Apostolical Seat may perfect a godly work, begun by your authority, for the Church of Constantinople. . . . Thou art another Salomon, for thou hast heard the words of thy father, nor hast thou forsaken the instruction of thy mother. Ambition drives him to write so flatteringly; for they had covenanted, that first the Pope's Legates should be Presidents in this Synod, which the Pope could never obtain before. 2. The Emperour should admit none into the Synod, but such who, by subscription, did acknowledge the supremacy of the Pope. 3. Images should be restored. 4. None dare write or speak against the Bishop of old Rome, by occasion of Photius and Dioscorus, who were deposed for their crimes; and if any man (saith the 21 Canon of this Synod, according to the election of Caranza) be so bold, he shall incur the like sentence with Photius and Dioscorus. 5. If any general Council shall be assembled, or any question or controversie fall out concerning old Rome, they may with due reverence inquire of it, and hear determination; but say nothing boldly against the High-Priests of old Rome. They called this the eighth œcumenical Council, so saith Bellarmin. de Conc. lib. 1. cap. 5. but neither with consent of all the present Bishops, as Anastasius (who was one of the Legates) testifieth, and after him Ph. Morn. in Myster. nor maketh Zonaras mention thereof, although an Image-worshipper; neither did the Greek Church consent thereunto, as appeareth plainly: First, When Ignatius was dead, the same Basilus assembled another Synod, annulled all the Acts of the former, and restored Photius. 2. The Greeks agreed with Pope Eugenius and his Bishops, that the Council of Florence, An. 1439. should be called the eighth œcumenical Council. It is here to be marked, that this Council was called in the name of Basilus, although the Legates of the Pope were Presidents. At that time it was agreed, that the Bishops of Rome and Constantinople, should both be called Universal; the one, Universal Pope; and the other, Universal Patriarch; not that the Patriarch did take unto him the right of other Bishops, but that he should have the next place after the Pope, saith Onuphrius in Annotat. on Platin. in Boniface the III; and in this manner the Pope had some authority, in the East, for a space. Neither was Adrian less carefull in the West, for he blowed sedition among the posterity of Charls; and where he heard of any Bishop of action or esteem, he catcheth him with his bait of a Palle, or Bishop's Robe, or with some higher Title; and if that could not insnare them, he could set one mortal foe against another; he set up Aſtard (who had not entered into orders) against Hincmarus, a worthy Bishop of Burdeaux, for maintaining the liberty of his Nation, although he had once given him a Palle, and had written unto him, thus; The report of thy Holiness comes never to my ears, but with praise, &c. But then he pursueth him to the uttermost. Ph. Morn. in Myster. ex Adriani Epist. ad Synod. Trecent. ad Aſtard; and another ad Hincmar. Also at that time Hincmar, Bishop of Laudun, gave some of his Church lands to Charls the Bald; and the King gave the same to a Captain Nortman; thereafter the Bishop desireth these lands to be restored, and because Nortman would give them to none but the King, from whom he had them, the Bishop assembled a Synod at Veruina, accused and condemned him. Nortman appealeth to Rome; the Synod rejects his appellation; and because he would not obey their Decree, another greater Synod was assembled at Atiniac, where Nortman was condemned again, and promised to obey the King's will, and of Hincmar, Bishop of Rhemes, who was Uncle to the other Hincmar. Ph. Morn. in Myster. In this Synod the Bishop of Laudun was accused of disobedience unto his Metropolitan; and that for some personal wrongs he had excommunicated all the Priests of his Diocly, and had hindred them from exercising their function. He confesseth his errors, and was deposed. Then Nortman, and this deprived Bishop conspire together, and informed Pope Adrian of all. He advocates the cause to Rome, and summoned the Bishop of Laudun, and all his accusers to appear; and so soon as he heard that the King would not consent, he sent other Letters unto the King, calling him a tyrant, perjured, false, a Church-robber, &c. In his Letters both to the King, and Bishop of Rhemes, he saith, opposed.

West by craft.

We will, and by our Apostolical authority we command Hincmar, Bishop of Laudun, and his accusers to compare personally at the Church of the Saints, before our clemency, that his cause may be judged. Behold yet more. In the mean time died Lotharius, King of Lorain: Charls the Bald, and Charls the Fat strove for Lorain. Adrian interpones his authority in favour of the Emperour Lewis the II, and menacing after a more thundring manner than all his Predecessours; he writes to the King, and to the Bishops and Barons of France, and namely to Hincmar Bishop of Rhemes, thus: Let no mortal be so bold, as to invade the Kingdom of deceased Lotharius, which by right of inheritance appertains to the Emperour Lewis, our spiritual son; if any presume to do, not only by the ministry of our authority shall it be annulled, but he shall be fettered with the chains of our curse; and he being deprived of the name of a Christian, shall be surely ranked with the Devil; and if any Bishop, either by suppressing the authour of so villainous hardiness, or by not resisting shall consent, let him know, that he shall be judged not a Bishop, but an hireling. Nevertheless Charls the Bald, entrench into Lorain; he is received by the Barons and Prelates, and crowned by the Bishop of Rhemes. Adrian then charged Charls, under pain of his curse, to leave off that enterprize; and he commanded Hincmar, Bishop of Rhemes, to execute his censures against the King, to forsake him, and not to bid him God speed. The King's answer is large, and the answer of Hincmar may suffice for both. First concerning the Bishop of Laudun, he saith, Let your authority know, that I have no power to send Hincmar, nor any other Bishop of the Diocly of Rhemes, and far less a Bishop of any other Province, unto Rome or any other part, except my Lord the King command them; neither dare I my self go without the bounds of the Realm without his leave. Then concerning his curses against the King, after he hath bitterly expostulated for his menacing, and declared that he had sent his Letters unto the Peers and Prelates of the Kingdom, and had read them openly in an assembly of the Bishops of France and Lorain, at Atinac; and had shewed his Bull unto Lewis, King of Germany, whereby he was commanded, by authority of the Pope, to accurse them all, who intermeddle with the Kingdom of Lorain; he saith, I have heard that the like Letters as have been directed to our Lord Charls, and to the Peers and Bishops of his Kingdom, have been also sent unto my Lord Lewis, the glorious King, and to the Bishops and Nobility of his Kingdom. . . . Then he gives him to understand that he had heard it reported by many, that the two Kings had agreed to divide the Kingdom, which if it be not done, sedition shall kindle among the people: wherefore since he saw that either the authority of the Pope must be contemned, or the agreement of the Kings be violated, whence might arise fear of wars; he thinks it more expedient to omit so Imperious commands, and surcease altogether from attempting any thing therein; neither is it my duty (saith he) to debar any man from the Communion, except one who hath willingly confessed his fault, or who is convict in judgement; unless I would condemn the Canon of the Apostles, the practice of the Church, and the authority of Augustin, Gelasius, Boniface, &c. Whereas the Pope had accused him, that by silence and cessation he may seem not partner, but authour of the usurpation; he biddeth him remember what is written, The cause which I knew not, I searched diligently; and that God (as is marked by Gregory) to whose eyes all things are open, said in the cause of the Sodomite, I will go down and see; whereby we should learn to try and see the evil, before we beleieve it; and not punish till it be notoriously known. Whereas he would have him abstain from the company of the King, and not bid him God speed, it seems very hard (said he) since very many good men, both of Ecclesiastical and Secular sort, who occasionally have come to Rhemes, have openly professed, that they had never heard the like practice from any of his Predecessours; although in their own times they had seen seditions and wars, not among Kings who were united by oath and league, but also among brethren, yea between father and children. And therefore he acknowledgeth this his contempt to be for his other sins, since in this he had dealt lovingly with his fellow-brethren, of whom, some had invited King Charls into the Kingdom of Lorain. Moreover that the States of the Kingdom affirm plainly, that Kingdoms are not conquered by curses of Priests or Bishops; and that they have learned from the Holy Scriptures, Kingdoms appertain unto God, by whom Kings do reign, and he giveth them to whom he willeth: wherefore since the High-Priest cannot be both a King and a Bishop, he should leave the care of distributing Kingdoms; which as his Predecessours did not attempt against the schismatical, nor heretical, nor tyrannous Emperours in their times; so neither can they now bear it, who know it to be written in the Holy Scripture, We should strive, even to death, for liberty and inheritance; neither are they ignorant, if a Bishop excommunicate a Christian without reason, that the power of binding may be taken from him; but eternal life can be taken from no man, unless his own sins do demerit; neither can any man be spoiled of the name of a Christian for taking or conquering an earthly Kingdom; or can he be ranked with the Diavel, whom Christ came to redeem, with his blood, from the Diavel's power: and therefore if the Pope would have peace, let him so seek it, that he move no strife; for the people think not, that they cannot come to the Kingdom of Heaven, except they imbrace such an earthly King as the Pope recommendeth: as for the Oath (said he) and falshood, and tyranny whereof you write, the Peers of the Nation say unto us, that ye command not such things as concern your authority; yea they have not spared from menacings against you, which for the present I will not repeat; and I know, as they threatned with deliberation, so (if God suffer them) without retreating they will shew it indeed; and I know by experience, that without regard of admonition or sword of man's tongue (unless some other stay arise) our King and Nobility of this Realm will not fail to do accordingly, to their power, and follow forth what they have begun. He concludes, that Bishops, and himself especially, should take heed of their behaviour towards the King; since it is the Apostles doctrine, that all souls be subject unto Superiour powers. And with these Letters in the name of Hincmar, were other Letters written by common advice of the Bishops of France, being assembled at Rhemes, and sent unto Pope Adrian, who died in the fifth year of his pride, and so that strife ceased. Ph. Morn. in Mysser. ex Aimoin. lib. 5. and out of others. Baronius in Annal. ad An. 870. §. 38. saith, Hincmar did forge many excuses, and by shifting did escape the sentence of the Apostolick See till Pope Adrian died.

Emperour,

11. JOHN the IX succeeds An. 872, as Onuphrius saith, who reckoneth not the eight years between Nicolaus and Adrian; but others account his succession in the year 876. He hapned on the fittest occasion of ambition among them all; for after his inauguration began the contention between Charls of France, and Charls of Germany for the Empire. The King of France was always aiming at the Kingdom of Italy, and promised unto Pope John rich rewards, if he attained unto the Empire; he would defend the Church from all injury, and wholly quit the Territory of Rome. John did fear that the other would take his manure in Italy, and therefore desirous the Emperour were at a distance, rather than to sit in his eye, he invited the King of France to come unto Rome, and incontinently saluteth him Augustus; and by this means (saith Sigonius, and after him Ph. Morn. in Myster.) the Title Imperator Augustus, became the gift of the High-Priest wholly; and the years of their Empire, were reckoned from their consecration by the Pope. Continuator Eutropii saith more plainly, Charls the Bald, coming to Rome, made covenant with the Romans, and granted unto them the rights of the Kingdom, and revenues out of three Monasteries; that is, out of Saint Salvator's, Saint Mary in Sabinis, and Saint Andrew's on Mount Soracte, and the Imperial Patrimony out of many other Monasteries; he gave them also the Provinces of Samnio and Calabria, with all the Cities of Benevento, and the Dukedom of Spolero, and two Cities of Tuscia, Arisium and Clusium, which did belong unto the Duke; so that he who before was above the Romans in royalty, seems now inferiour unto them; he removed also from them the Embassadours of the Empire, and his interest in the Apostolical election; what more? saith he, he granted them all that they would, even as these things are easily given, that are not well conquered, nor are hoped to be possessed in time coming. And Otho 3. Emp. in diplom. said, Charls gave what he never had, and he gave them as he could; for he sought them sinistrously, nor had he hope to injoy them peaceably. And his brother, the King of Germany, and his son Charls despised this Coronation, and ceased not to invade both France and Italy. Here Sigonius de reg. Ital. lib. 4. observeth, that whatsoever other Emperours gave unto the Popes, they expressly did reserve the Principedom and dition of Rome, together with the election of the Bishop; both which now were renounced, and also the authority over the Church-lands, which his Successours sought to recover, and could not; for (as Continuator Eutropii saith) from this time none of the Kings, none of the Emperours, could recover the honourable privileges of the Princely dignity, because they wanted either courage or knowledge, and through the many contentions and continual divisions of the Kingdom. Moreover, hitherto the Empire went by succession from the father to the son, or nearest in kindred; and the consecration of the King of Lombardy by the Bishop of Milan, or of the Emperour, by the Bishop of Rome, was accounted but a solemn rite; but Pope John taking this advantage, changeth the words to a loftier stile; for in the Convention, after he had commended King Charls, as far as Pope Adrian had reviled him, he added: Therefore we have chosen and approved him, together with the wishes and desires of all our brethren and fellow Bishops, and other servants of the Holy Church of Rome, and of the honourable Senate, and of all the people of Rome, and of this gowned Nation; and according to the ancient custom, we have solemnly advanced him unto the Scepter of the Roman Empire, and we have honoured him with the name Augustus. Charls was no sooner returned into France, but behold! the Dukes of Tusculum (whose head was Albertus) conspired with Formosus, Bishop of Portuen, and some others against Pope John, because he had preferred a stranger above Albertus, and many Italians would have had the Empire restored to their Nation. They did so vex him, that he was forced to send unto Charls for aid, craving that he would deliver Italy from the Sarazens, and himself from the Tusculans. In the mean time Charls had summoned a Council in France, by advice of John Tuscanensis, and John Aretin, and Angelisus Senen, but by Apostolical authority, and his own confirmation. Thus begun the names of the Popes, to be prefixed with the names of Emperours and Kings, contrary to the ancient form. In this Synod, by vertue of an Epistle Decretal of Pope John, the Emperour did propound one day, and another, and the third day, to have Angelisus, the Pope's Legate, gate, Primat of France; to the end he might execute the will of the Pope in France; to wit, call Synods, declare and publish the Papal Decrees unto other Bishops; and also, if need be, report unto the Apostolick See their proceedings, and other intricate affairs might be dispatched, by his mediation, with the Apostolick See. So far was he besotted with the fatal cup. At that time the French Bishops clearly did perceive how great evils were imminent, and they would not condescend unto his temerity, but stood to their former liberty, Aimoin lib. 5. cap. 32. 33. Ph. Morn. in Mysser. This John was the first who gave pardons or indulgences, to them who would fight against the Sarazens. When he was demanded, by the Bishops of France, Whether they who were dead, or afterwards might die in that cause, should obtain forgiveness for their sins? We answer, said he, boldly with the godliness of Christ, who die in these Wars, with the godliness of the Catholick faith, shall receive the rest of eternal life. Ioha. Epist. 144. Ph. Morn. ib. pag. 195. As ready was he to accurse and account as Heathens, all them who give not obedience unto him; and so they were accounted Martyrs and Saints, who did bear Arms with him against whatsoever power. At that time Lakold, Duke of Cracove, being chosen King of Poland, would not acknowledge Lewis, King of Germany, as his lawfull Superiour; but sent unto Pope John, professing to hold the Crown from him, and made the Kingdom Tributary unto Saint Peter, by payment of money yearly, Crantz. in Vandal. lib. 3. cap. 2. Into the East also his ambition goeth, but by a way directly contrary unto his Predecessours. Ignatius being restored by Basilus (as we have mentioned) and Pope Adrian, he pleaseth neither of the two; not the Emperour, because he would not sway to all his fantasies; neither pleaseth he the Pope, because he would not quit the Church of Bulgaria; and therefore Pope John threatned him with his curse. When Ignatius was dead, Basilus would have Photius restored, and because he was deposed by authority of a Council, and the Pope, the Emperour dealt with Pope John that he might be set up again; and if John will consent, he saith, there would be more quietness in the Church, but otherwise the schism is like to continue; and he promised to prepare a Navy for the defence of the Coast of Latium and Hetruria against the Sarazens; and he will cause Photius to renounce the Church of Bulgaria unto the See of Rome. Ambition or (as Baronius ad An. 878. § 4. speaketh) worldly wisdom which is an enemy to God, so thrusteth Pope John headlong, that contrary to his Predecessours Nicolaus and Adrian; he restored Photius, who was so far from giving any sign of repentance, that in a manifest declaration of their eighth general Council, he set himself directly against it; for Photius was scarce set in his chair, but he persuaded the Emperour to assemble another Synod at Constantinople, where he produced the Letters of Pope John (whether true or false, it's uncertain; Baronius saith, they were feigned) declaring the late Council, which was called the eighth general, to be of no authority; and they gave that name unto this Council. Ph. Mornay saith, Zonaras described it under this name, with all the Acts and Sessions thereof. There were present three Legates of Pope John, to wit, two Bishops Paul and Eugenius, and Peter a Cardinal Priest; they were so basely intreated, as appears in Zonaras, that none before them were so contemned. It is marked first here were 380 Bishops, and in the former were 301. 2. Nicolaus and Adrian were condemned as authours of much mischief, but John was advanced above the skies with praise. There a Council condemning a Council, where the Pope's Legates were Presidents, and which was confirmed by the Pope. 3. The Church of Bulgaria was referred to the Emperour, since it was a question of marches and jurisdiction. 4. By an expresse Canon

it is provided, that whom the Pope shall excommunicate, the Patriarch shall not receive; and the Pope should not receive any, whom the Patriarch shall excommunicate. By this Canon all appellation from the Patriarch is taken away. Lastly, Photius keeps the place continually before the Roman Legates. Therefore Pope John accursed Photius again, and so the schism between the Greeks and Latines was renewed, and till this day was never taken away. John fate 10 years. and greater schism.

12. MARTIN the II came unto the Papacy by evil arts, and did nothing worthy of memory, because it pleased God, that Princedoms wickedly conquered, have not true glory, the only food of a good Prince. Platin. He fate 1 year.

13. HADRIAN the III perswaded the people, that they should not await the Emperour's authority, the election of the clergy and people being sufficient. Platina addeth, He was bold to do so, because the Emperour was fettered in wars against the Normans; and this was the first time that the Emperour was debarred from the election of the Pope, and a Decree was made, that the suffrages of the clergy and people is sufficient. But this Decree continued but a short space, as followeth; he made another Decree, if Charls do die without succession, the Empire shall return to the Italians. This he did in favour of Albert Marquess of Tuscya, who had advanced him unto the Papacy. He fate 1 year. The Emperour is debarred from the election.

14. STEPHEN the VI (but called the V) did nothing worthy of memory. He ordained that the Roman Canons should all, without exception, be necessarily received of all men, Grat. dist. 19. cap. Enim verò. He fate six years. After him was much strife, and within nine years were nine Popes.

15. FORMOSUS was set up against the mind of the people, who did strive for Sergius a Deacon; but Mars and money prevailed. He was one of those who conspired against Pope John, and when John was settled, he left his Bishoprick and fled into France. The Pope summoned him to return, and for not appearing he excommunicated him. At last he returned, and consented to his own degradation, and swore that he should never enter within the Gates of Rome, nor seek a Bishoprick, but abide a Secular; his Oath was written, and he subscribed it. Pope Martin released him of his Oath, and restored him to his Bishoprick; and now he attains the Papacy by bribery more than vertue, saith Platina. After his election question was for his consecration, some did object a Canon of Pope Martin, which now is in Grat. dist. 50. cap. Qui semel, Who once shall fall after his ordination, and be deposed, he may enjoy no degree of Priesthood; but Formosus had been Canonically deposed, and had subscribed it, and swore to continue a Secular. On the other side it was answered, he was absolved from his oath and deprivation, and received Canonically by the same Pope. It was so hot, that Formosus sent unto the Emperour Arnulph for aid, who came, as is touched. Of him and his Successours, saith Platina, I cannot know by what destiny it hapned, that the vertue and integrity of Popes failed, with the courage of the Emperours; these times were most unhappy, since according to the judgement of Plato, the people in a Common-Wealth are like to the Princes. Formosus fate 3 years, but some say 1 year. The other short lived Popes, I refer unto the next Century. A question for the consecration of this Pope.

1. THE Emperour Charls the Great, did his best for advancing Schools and learning; his indeavours were not in vain, for we find more learned men in this Century then in the eighth; but many of them who were highest in advancement, were given to pride, luxury, and worldly delights. As is touched before, Lewis the I, did observe and tax their pompous vestments, which are seldom joined with zeal and diligent watchfulness over God's flock. And they were so far from following wholsom admonition, that some of them conspired against him who was called the Godly. But I leave observations, and hasten unto the story.

2. Claudius Taurinens, or (as some call him) Bishop of Turin, was diffamed as an Heretick, by Theodomire an Abbot, who did delate him unto the Pope. He writ his own Apology, a part of it is in Catal. test. ver. lib. 9. That it may appear wherefore he was accused, and how godly men have been traduced from time to time, I have transcribed a part of his Apology, it beginneth thus; Thine Epistle, with some other Chapters, full of prating and foolishness, I have received... Wherein thou saiest, that thou art troubled, because the report hath gone of me from Italy, thorow all France into the uttermost parts of Spain, as if I taught a new Sect contrary unto the Catholick faith, which is altogether most false; but it is no wonder that the limbs of the Divil have spoken so of me, since they called our Head himself a deceiver, and Daimoniack; for I broach not a Sect, I proclaim and teach the truth; but so far as I can, I do beat down all Sects, Schisms and Heresies; and according to my ability, I shall not cease, with God's help, to fight against them... I destroy that which men do worship. For since it is said expressly, that no similitude should be made of any thing in Heaven above, or on earth, it is understood to be spoken not only of strange Gods, but of heavenly creatures also; it is not a little to be considered, that if the works of God should not be adored or worshipped, far less should the works of mans hand be worshipped and adored; neither are they for their honour whose similitude they are: Why castest thou thyself into the danger of death with a senceless image, which thou worshipping? Why fastest thou by it, and with it, in the condemnation of the dead?.... But these Worshippers of false religion and superstition say, For remembrance of our Saviour, we worship and adore the Cross, which is painted and framed unto his honour... God hath bid do one thing, and they do another; God hath commanded to bear the Cross, and they adore the Cross; they will adore it, because they will not bear it bodily nor spiritually: To worship God in this manner, is to depart from him; against them it is to be answered, if they will worship every tree made in form of the Cross, because Christ did hang on it, so did Christ many other things in the flesh; let all Virgins be worshipped, because he was born of a Virgin; let cribs also be worshipped... and old cloaths and Asses. These things are also ridiculous, and rather to be lamented then written; we are compelled to propound against these foolish men, and throw against these stony hearts not arrows or sentences of the Word, but stones.... Whereas thou saiest, that I forbid men to go unto Rome for pennance, thou speakest falsely. I will first ask thee, if thou knowest that to go unto Rome is to make pennance; why hast thou, in so long time, destroyed so many souls, which thou holdest within the Monastery, and took them into the Monastery for pennance, and hast not sent them unto Rome, but rather caustest them to serve thee?....

Rome.

We know, that the words of our Lord in the Gospel are not understood, when he said unto Peter, Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock.... Because of these words the ignorant sort of men, laying aside all spiritual understanding, will go to Rome to get life eternal... Let no man trust in the merit nor intercession of Saints, because unless they please God with the same faith, righteousness and truth which these held, they cannot be saved; hear this ye unwise amongst the people, and ye fools be sometime wise; ye who go to Rome to seek the intercession of the Apostle, hear what Saint Augustine saith against you, . . . truly he should not be called Apostolical, who sitteth in the Chair of the Apostle, but who fulfilleth the Office of an Apostle. Bellarmin de reliq. Sanct. lib. 1. cap. 1. reckoneth this Claudius among his Hereticks; so doth Gretser. de festis, because in Church-service he would not name the Saints, nor would keep the feasts, and called them a vain and unprofitable custom, and did despise them; lest we seem, by intercession of the Saints, to seek any thing from God. Jonas Bishop of Orleance, writ against this Apology, and his answer is in Biblioth. de la Bigne tom. 4. his opinion is in pag. 698. Whereas Claudius had cited the second command Exod. 20. Jonas answereth, This truth is our mind; it is true (I say) and most agreeable to the sound faith, that no image should be made of any thing in heaven or earth, whereunto worship or adoration, which is due unto God only, should be given any way; therefore since God is invisible and contains all, and is no where contained, we are forbidden to make an image of him, lest men might think that he is bodily: but consider whether thou, under the name of similitude, dost comprehend the images of the Saints; he quoteth the testimony of Augustine de Civ. Dei lib. 10. cap. 26. & ult. and Enarr. in Psal. 96. &c. and he commendeth the Epistle of Gregory to Seren, whereof mention is before in Century 7. chap. 3. And pag. 699 he saith, We account it impiety to adore a creature, or to give it any part of Divine service; and with a loud voice we proclaim that the doer of such a crime, should be detested and anathematized. And pag. 701. It is the crime of impiety, to worship any other but the Father, Son and Holy Ghost.

3. At the same time Agobard was Bishop of Lions, he took part with Lotharius against his father, and therefore was deposed; after the reconciliation he was restored, and being a man of wisdom and knowledge was imploied in the greatest affairs of the Kingdom. His works were Printed at Paris, An. 1605, from which impression these passages are extracted. Pag. 52. There is one immovable foundation, there is one rock of faith, which Peter confesseth, Thou art the son of the living God. Pag. 128. The uncleanness of our time deserves a fountain of tears; when so ungodly a custom is become so frequent, that there is none almost, aspiring to temporal honour, who hath not a Priest at home, not whom he obeyeth, but of whom he exacteth all manner of obedience uncessantly, not in divine things, but in worldly also; so that many of them do service at Table or mixeth Wine, and leadeth Dogs, feeds Horses, or attends Husbandry; neither regard they what manner of Clerks these be, but only that they may have Priests of their own, and so they leave Churches and Sermons, and publick service; it is clear that they seek them, not for honour of religion, because they have them not in honour, and speak disdainfully of them. Pag. 163. Why say ye, it is not true, that he who is truly humble, thinks not basely of himself, and believeth that he is a sinner? Since this is most openly manifest, that is the property of the Saints, and not of proud men?.... Also the Apostle James saith, in many things we all offend; which if any will say it is spoken of humility; let him know, that so he followeth Pelagius; and if he would be amended, let him read the books of

Chaplains.

Humility.

Augustine against the Pelagians; and let him know, that all the Saints did truly accuse themselves of their sins; so that they had need to say for themselves, Forgive us our debts. He is large against the worship of Images. Worship of Images. Pag. 237. One will say, I think not that there is any God-head in the Image which I adore, but I worship it for his sake whose Image it is. I answer, if the Image be not God, it should no way be worshipped; as it were to honour the Saints, who no way would admit divine honour to themselves. Pag. 251. Let God be adored, worshipped and revered by believers; let sacrifice be given to him only; . . . Let Angels and holy men be loved and honoured with love, and not with such service. Pag. 254. The Orthodox Fathers, for avoiding such superstition, did rightly ordain, that no Picture should be in a Church, lest that which is worshipped and adored, be painted on Walls. Bellarmin. de Scriptor. Eccles. sect. 9. speaking of Ionas Epist. Aurelia. saith, Jonas and other Bishops of France, in that age, were overtaken with Agobert's errour. By the Jesuits confession then, many Bishops of France, were against the present errors of Rome.

7. Angelom a Monk of Luxovia, and of much reading, at the intreaty of Drogo Epist. Meten. writ many books. In 3 Reg. cap. 19. he saith, As the body cannot live without nourishment; so neither can the soullive without the word of God. In lib. 1. cap. 2. None by his own strength is able to do good, nor resist the Devil; yea if he attempt to lift up himself against the Lord, he loseth the good which he seems to have. Ibid. cap. 25. As it is easie for a man to hold in his hand a few herbs that are knit together; so the power of our Lord and Saviour easily preserveth all the elect throughout the world, from the beginning to the end, that none of them by any means can perish; as he saith, I give them life eternal, and they shall not perish for ever, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. In 2. Reg. cap. 8. Our Lord Jesus by his secret dispensation from among unbelieving men, hath predestinated some unto eternal liberty, quickning them of his gracious mercy; but in his secret judgement he leaveth others in their wickedness, and hath condemned them unto everlasting death. In the Preface before 3 Reg. In all things we have need of aid from the Holy Spirit. In 4 Reg. cap. 19. Whosoever, by true faith, toucheth the death of Christ; and truly laith hope on him, shall without doubt be pertaker of his resurrection. Catal. test. ver. lib. 10.

8. Raban Magnentius, otherwise surnamed Maurus, was famous in the University of Paris for Poesie, Rhetorick, Astronomy, others Philosophy and Theology, unto whom neither Germany nor Italy brought forth an equal, saith Trithemius. He became Abbot of Fulda, where he was born, and there he writ Commentaries on all the Books of the Bible. His Monks were offended, that he did so study the Scriptures, and did not attend their Revenues, as Trithem. writeth; therefore after 24 years he gave place to their anger, and left the Abbey; but they besought him to return, and he would not, but did abide with the Emperour Lewis, untill Otgar, Bishop of Ments died, and Raban succeeded. Tho. walden in the daies of Pope Martin the V, reckoned him and Herebald or Reginbald, Bishop of Altisodor, amongst Hereticks, because they favoured Bertram. Out of some of his works I have picked out these passages. In Eccles. lib. 4. cap. 7, he saith, In meditating and reading the Holy Scriptures we should be wary, neither to add any thing to that which is written, nor take away from those things which are comprehended by the Authours of Divine Scriptures in those books; but we should thing of them with the highest veneration, and with all our strength fulfill the commandments thereof. Ibid. cap. 1, Man can now be saved no other way but by the death of Jesus Christ, who is our Redeemer. Ibid. lib. 5. cap. 5, The foundation

dation which the Apostle Paul hath laied is one, the Lord Jesus Christ; upon this foundation both firm and stable, and strong in it self, is the Church of Christ builded. In Ier. lib. 18. cap. 2. Left they would say, Our fathers were accepted for merits, and therefore did they receive great things from God; he adjoineth, this was not for their merits, but because it so pleased God, whose free gift it is, whatsoever he bestoweth. De modo satisfact. cap. 2. & 17. Whatsoever one remembreth that he hath done wickedly, let him declare it unto the Priest by confession; but if thou art ashamed to reveal thy sins before men, cease not with continual supplications to confess them unto him, from whom they cannot be hid; and say, Against thee only have I sinned: he useth to heal, not publishing thy shame; and to forgive sin, without upbraiding. De Eucharist. cap. 24. Behold what these two Sacraments do! by baptism we are regenerate in Christ, and by the Sacrament of the body and blood regeneration is proved to continue; not only by faith, but by unity of flesh and blood. Here he speaks but of two Sacraments, and so he calleth them expressly: But de Institut. Cleric. lib. 1. cap. 31. one may think that he speaks of more Sacraments; for he saith, Because we have spoken of more Sacraments, Baptism and Chrism; it remaineth that we speak of the other two, that is, of the body and blood of Christ. But when he calleth the body and blood of Christ two Sacraments, it is clear, that he calleth the two elements, two Sacraments, and that is improperly. And in cap. 28. of the forenamed book, When the baptized person ascends out of the Fount, immediately he is signed in the face, by the Presbyter, with holy chrism: here he speaketh not of extrem unction, as they now speak; but of an appendix of baptism, as they were wont in those daies; and this he calleth improperly another Sacrament: but in that chap. de Eucharist. he speaketh properly, and nameth two, baptism, and the body and blood of Christ. Ibid. cap. 41. And because he [Christ] according to the flesh, must pierce the heavens; to the end, those who by faith are renewed and born again in him, might more earnestly and confidently long after him; he hath left unto us this Sacrament as a visible figure and resemblance, a sign and seal of his body and blood, that by these things our minds and our bodies, by faith, may be more plentifully nourished, to partake of invisible and spiritual things; now it is the sign which we outwardly see and feel, but that which is inwardly received is all substance and truth, and no shadowing or resemblance; and therefore there is nothing but truth, and the Sacrament of the very flesh of Christ, which is manifested unto us; for the very flesh of Christ, which was crucified and buried, even the Sacrament of that true flesh it is; which by the Priest, upon the Altar, through the word of Christ, and power of the Holy Spirit, is consecrated and hallowed. See how Raban distinguishes that which is received outwardly and inwardly in the Sacrament; and he calleth the outward part a visible figure and representation, a sign and seal of the body and blood; and that which is received inwardly is no shadow or resemblance, but substance and truth, even the very body of Christ, which was crucified, and (as he saith in the first part of this testimony) which hath pierced the Heavens. De Institut. Cleric. lib. 2. cap. 30. Satisfaction is to exclude the occasions and suggestions of sin, or not to commit sin again: Reconciliation is that which is done after repentance; for as we are reconciled unto God, when we are converted first from gentilism; so we are reconciled, when after sin we return. Lib. 2. cap. 57. He hath the Confession that was professed at that time, saying;

9. This is next unto the Creed of the Apostles, the most certain faith, which our Teachers have given, That we should profess the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit of one essence, of one power and sempiternity; one invisible God, so that the propriety of persons being reserved unto each one, neither the Trinity should be divided substantially, nor confounded personally; to confess also that the Father is unbegotten, the Son is the only begotten, and the Holy Spirit is neither begotten nor unbegotten, but proceedeth from the Father and from the Son; that the Son proceedeth from the Father by generation; the Holy Spirit not begotten, but proceeding; also that the Son did assume of the Virgin perfect manhood without sin; that whom of his goodness only he had created, of his mercy he might restore after he was fallen; who verily was crucified, and rose again the third day, and with the same flesh being glorified, he ascended into Heaven; in the which flesh he is expected to come and judge the quick and the dead; and that Christ in one person, beareth both the divine and the human nature, being perfect in both, because neither the integrity of both natures did double his person, nor the unity of his person confoundeth his twofold nature; for by the one he excludes not the other, because each of them keepeth both with undefiled right; which the wholsom authority of the Old and New-Testament commendeth; that by prophecy, and this by history, being truly fulfilled; and that concerning God, and the creatures of this world, we should not agree with the Pagans nor Hereticks, when they disagree from the truth; but in both Testaments the Divine Oracles testifie, that not of necessity God made man and all things, neither is there any visible or invisible substance, which is not God, or the good creature of our God: But God is infinitely and immutably good, but the creature is less and mutably good; and that the beginning of the soul is uncertain; and that the natures of souls and Angels are not a part of God's substance, but the creature of God, and made of nothing; and therefore is not bodily, since it is created to the image of God. Concerning the godliness of manners, without which faith of the worship of God is idle and fainteth, and with which the integrity of Divine worship is perfected; that every one should love God for God, and his neighbour in God; that by increasing he may attain; that one cannot be defiled with the sin of another, where is not alike consent of wills: That lawfull marriages are not damnable, although in them posterity be procreated subject unto original sin; and that the integrity of faithfull virgins and continent persons, is to be preferred above them. Let not the one baptism of the Trinity be iterated, (which is not lawfull) neither let it be thought profitable to each man according to the diversity of the Minister; but that by singular power it is given of him, of whom we hear it to be said, Upon whom thou shalt see the Holy Ghost descending and abiding upon him, that is he which baptiseth with the Holy Ghost, and I saw and bear witness that he is the Son of God. Let us not think we have no need of the remedies of repentance for the daily excesses of human frailty, without which we cannot be in this life; so that in the fruitfull remorse of repentance, we confess that all our sins are blotted away; as it is written, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered: blessed is the man to whom the Lord imputes not iniquity. And that no man by his own strength, but by the only grace of God, is united unto the Head Christ, and made solid in the unity of his Church, by unseparable perseverance of peace. Neither should any good thing be imputed to the liberty of man's will. Also that the temporal goods that are common to the good men and bad, are created by God, and according to his dispensation are given or denied to every one; of which goods, in every one that beleeveth, not the having, but the use or abuse is commended or condemned; but the godly only can attain unto the certain and eternal goods in the World to come; and we believe now that the Church hath received a pledge of these things, having the first fruits of the Spirit here, and perfection hereafter; here she is upholden with hope, hereafter is nourished in very deed; here seeing through a glass darkly, and hereafter face to face, when from faith she shall be brought to sight; which when it shall be perfected, as we shall enjoy the most perfect gifts of the most high God, so shall we not harm our neighbours. That we have also that hope of the resurrection, in the same order, and in the same form as our Lord arose from the dead; we believe also that we shall rise again, in the same time wherein we are and live, not changing our nature nor sex, but only laying off our frailty and vices. That Satan with his Angels and servants shall be condemned into everlasting fire; neither according to the sacrilegious dispensation of some men, shall he be restored into his first, that is, Angelical dignity, from which he fell by his own wickedness. This is the integrity of the faith of Catholick tradition, of which if any one article be denied, all the belief of faith is lost. So far hath Raban there. Now if this Confession be conferred with the Confession which was published and enjoined by Pope Pius the IV, in the year 1564, we may find many additions in the Church of Rome, which were not known in the daies of Raban; and if he were now alive, and professed to believe no otherwise then the Church did at that time, he could not be a Bishop, although Trithem. calleth him a matchless one.

10. And to the end we may see how far the Church, in that time, differed from the primitive Church, in the celebration of the Lord's Supper, and what hath been added unto it since that time; let us hear the same Raban, shewing the form of it in his daies, in Lib. 1. de Institut. Cleric. Cap. 32 & 33; and therewith, on the margine, we shall shew the original of every novation by correspondent figures; and he beginneth thus:

Of the Mass.

The Lord first ordained the Sacraments (1) of his body and blood, with blessing and thanksgiving, and so delivered it unto his Apostles; and they followed the same manner, and taught their Successours to do so, which all the Churches, generally through all the World now keepeth. In the beginning was not the custom of tooning, which now is in the Church before the sacrifice; but the Epistles were read and the holy Evangelists (2.) But since we are begun to speak of the sacrifice (3,) we will declare to what end all this order was institute. First then in the celebrati-

1. Note how he calleth the elements Sacraments, as it was usual then, and it hath been observed in others. 2. Platina in Sixto. 1. and Pol. Vergil. de invent. rer. lib. 5. cap. 10. say, These things were done simply at the first; for when Peter did consecrate he used the prayer, Our Father, which art... and others have augmented them. Platin. in Celestin. 1. faith, When the Epistle was read and the Gospel, the sacrifice was ended. Which is so to be understood, that they, at first, had not a set or prescribed form of prayer, but only the Lord's Prayer, which they did use; and the on Apostles and other Ministers in every Church, when believers were assembled, made their prayers unto God, as the Spirit gave them utterance. Chrysostom on Rom. 8. hom. 14. faith, With other gifts they had also the gift of prayer, which was also called The Spirit; and he who had this gift, did pray for the whole multitude; for because they were ignorant of expedient things, and we pray for things which are not profitable, the gift of prayer came upon one; who being set in place of them all, did pray for what was expedient unto the Church; and also did instruct others to pray. So here the Spirit is called that gift of prayer, which then was given, and it is the soul which did pray unto God and sigh; for he who was honoured red with this gift, did stand, and with much compunction and many groans, supplicating unto God according to the earnestness of his mind, did pray for those things which were expedient unto all. And Tertullian in Apologet. mentioning the same custom in his time, saith, We looking up to Heaven, with our hands stretched forth, as being innocent; and bareheaded as not ashamed, make our prayers Sive Monitore, without a Directory, as coming from the free motion of our own hearts. And by that testimony of Platina in Celestin 1. (who lived about the year 423.) what other parts of the Mass, besides the Gospel and the Epistles, are fathered upon others, and are of later standing, and were not in use in the Roman Church before Celestine. Iustin in Apolo. 2. fully sheweth the manner of Christian Service in his time, The ancient Christians (saith he) had their meetings on the Sunday; they began with prayers for the Church, especially for the inlightned which were to be baptized. Then the Writings of the Prophets and Apostles are read, as time permits. When the Reader causeth ὁ πρεσβυτέρως, he who hath the charge hath a Sermon unto the people, and exhorts them all unto the imitation of the best things; then all do rise up, and pour forth prayers again. When the prayers are ended, Bread and Wine being mixed with Water is brought forth, which being taken, he who hath the charge goeth before the people, with an earnest voice in praising God and thanksgiving; and the people do answer with a loud voice, Amen. Then the Deacons divide the holy signs unto all them which are present, and carry the same unto the absent. This food we call Εὐχαριστία, Thanksgiving; whereof none may partake, unless he beleve the true doctrine, and be washed in the laver unto regeneration and remission of sins, and live so as Christ hath directed; and the ordinance of Christ is thus observed; after this is a gathering of Alms. That Father which lived in the second Century, hath no more of the Christian Liturgy, unless ye will add, that in another place he saith, After the prayer they did kiss one another, and of that some words do follow. Geo. Cassander in Liturgica saith, At the first the Mass was said otherwise then now.... and it is not done more holily then it was before; when it was hallowed with the only words of the Lord, and with the Lord's prayer. And from Walafrid Strabo he saith, All which is now done with a multitude of prayers, lessons, songs and consecrations, the Apostles and those who next followed them, did (as is thought) with prayers and remembrance of the Lord's sufferings, even as He commanded. In the same Chapter he saith, In the next times when the Epistle and the Gospel was read, the Mass was done; and other things were added, at diverse times, by the Popes Gelasius and Gregorius. 3. When the Sacrament began to be termed a Sacrifice, it is uncertain; but this is certain, it was not called properly a Sacrifice by the purest primitive Church, especially in the time of Justine Martyr, Lactantius Firmian and Augustine. For in the daies of Justine the Pagans did revile the Christians, and called them Atheists; because they offered not sacrifice nor incense unto their God. Justine in Apolog. 2. answereth, They do offer such sacrifices, as they knew were acceptable unto him; to wit, the sacrifices of prayer and thanksgiving: as for the creatures which God hath appointed for the sustentation of man, we keep them for the use and necessity of the poor, but we burn them not with fire. Lactantius had the same occasion in Institut. lib. 6. cap. 24 & 25, and so Augustine de Civit. Dei lib. 10. cap. 4. but neither of the two hath any syllable of the sacrifice of the Mass, or of the Lord's body on the Altar. Nevertheless Augustine in Enchirid. cap. 110. and elsewhere, and Cyprian have called the Sacrament, a Sacrifice; yet not properly, or but figuratively, to wit, because it is a memorial and remembrance of that true and only Sacrifice, which was once offered offered by Christ; Cyprian. Epist. 63. ordin. Pammel. So speaketh the Gloss on Gratian; for where it is said, de consecr. lib. 2. cap. Quid sit, out of Gregory the great, Though Christ living immortally, dieth not now; yet in this Sacrament he dieth, and his flesh suffereth for the salvation of the people: the Gloss addeth, that is, His death and passion is represented. So doth Chrysostom in Heb. hom. 17. and Augustin de Verb. Dom. ser. 28. speak, and many others, saying; We offer the same sacrifice which Christ did offer; or rather, we offer the remembrance of that sacrifice. So also teacheth Lombard. lib. 4. cap. 12. B. G. Christ died once on the Cross, and there he was offered; but he is offered daily in the Sacrament, because in the Sacrament is a remembrance of that which was once done; and because it is a memorial representation and remembrance of that true sacrifice, and holy oblation on the Altar of the Cross. At some times also the Ancients call the Sacrament, a Sacrifice; because of the offerings which the people brought, when they came to the Sacrament; Cyprian de oper. & elemos. saith, Thou who art rich, comest into the Church without a sacrifice, and takest a part of the sacrifice which the poorer hath offered. Bellarmin de Eucharist. lib. 1. cap. 27. hath the like words from Irenaus lib. 1. cap. 32. acknowledging that those Fathers spoke so of the bread and wine which the people offered. And Alcwin de divin. offic. at the words Sursum corda, saith, The Priest exhorts the people, as if he said, Now when ye are sufficiently instructed and confirmed, by the Apostolical and Evangelical Precepts, direct your hearts from earthly cares upward unto the Lord, that I may be able to offer worthily the sacrifice, which ye have offered unto me, to be offered unto God. So whereas the Ancients did most usually abstain from the name of Altar and Sacrifice, terming those Tables and Eucharist; afterwards the Church being established in the truth of doctrine, the Pastours did adventure upon a greater liberty of words, not doubting to be soundly understood by Catholick hearers. But because the degenerating ages have wrested these words to a proper signification, clean contrary to the first intention; it should not be thought amiss in them, who contain themselves now within the more ancient restraints, and are content with the first terms, since the other have occasioned that intollerable error of the real sacrifice in the Mass. To the end this may be more evident, I shall repeat the custom of this matter from the beginning. Chrysostom on 1 Cor. 11. hom. 27. saith, As in the three thousand, who at first did beleieve, they did all eat together, and they did possess all things in common; so also it was when the Apostle writ this, yet not so certainly, but that some doubting of the communion were remaining, and descending unto posterity; and when it came to pass that some were poor, and some were rich, they did not give all things in community; but they made the common Tables on the appointed daies, as was decent; and the collection being done, after the communication of the Sacrament, they all came to a common feast, and the dishes were carried by the honest poor ones; and they who had nothing, were invited by them, and they sate down all together: but in progress of time this custom went away; for by this division it came, that some did adjoin themselves in one company, and some in another; and they said, I am his, and I am his; as the Apostle amending this, saith in the beginning of the Epistle. Justin near the end of his greater Apology, saith; Let the rich men, if they please, every one bestow as they will; and let that which is brought be laid down beside the Bishop [ἐπισκόπου] To wit, when the first custom was left off, they brought a quantity of Bread and Wine, or of the first Corns, or Raisins; whereof so much was taken as did serve for the elements of the Sacrament, and the rest was eaten, by the Believers, as in a feast; and some was sent unto sick persons, or distributed among the poor. When the Church had more liberty, and became more wealthy (as in the daies of Constantine) the oblations were richer, and a part thereof was appointed for maintenance of the Preachers; according to that of Jerom, They who serve at the Altar, are sustained by the offerings at the Altar: Then the voluntary offerings were called Sacrifices, after the manner of the law of Moses; and the Presbyters did consecrate them by prayer, as is manifest by the Liturgies, where they say, O Lord, we thy servants, and also thy holy people, being mindfull of the blessed suffering and resurrection, and the glorious ascension of Christ thy Son, our Lord God; do offer unto thy most excellent Majesty, out of thy gifts, this pure sacrifice. upon which things it may please thee to look with a favourable and gracious eye, and to accept them, as it pleased thee to accept the gifts of thy righteous servant Abel, and the sacrifice of our Patriarch Abraham. These words did still (untill the Reformation) remain in the Canon of the Mass. And on Paul's day the words of the Secretum were read, We beseech thee, O Lord, sanctifie the gifts of the people, by the prayers of thy blessed Apostle Paul; that those things which are acceptable unto thee by thy institution, may be more acceptable by the patrociny of him praying. These and many other prayers of the Mass, cannot otherwise be understood without blasphemy: Then of the gifts of the people, Cassander in Liturgic. cap. 27. hath these words, from Expositio Ordinis Romani, All the people coming into the Church should sacrifice; and ex Decretis Fabiani, We ordain, that on every Lord's day, the oblation of the Altar be made, by all the men and women, both of Bread and Wine. Again, at first they were wont to communicate daily: Cyprian de Orat. Domi. at the 4 petition saith, We receive the Eucharist daily. On these words Pammelius hath marked, that the same custom continued at Rome, and in Spain, till the daies of Jerom; and at Millan till Ambrose; but had failed sooner in the East Church, Augustine in his 118 Epistle, sheweth the different custom of communicating, in some places oft, and in others more seldom. It may be thought that when Christians had place, zeal did decrease, and the people did not communicate so oft, and so the offerings were the fewer. Then the Fathers did complain of the rarity of Communicants, and exhorted the people to communicate at least every Lord's day; and did absolutely inveigh against their rarity, as absurd and zeal-less; and said, that when they came it was not for thirst of grace, or remorse of sin, but for solemnity, Chrysost. on 1 Cor. 11. hom. 28. These exhortations and reproofs prevailed not, therefore an Act was made binding the people to communicate each Lord's day, Gratian. de consecr. dist. 2. cap. Quotidie. Neither was this order obeyed, therefore was another, that they should communicate thrice yearly, at the Feasts of Christ's Nativity, Resurrection, and the Pentecost, Ibid. cap. Saculares. For all this, the people would not communicate so oft, therefore a Law was made that all the people should communicate at Pasch. And then daily communion was forgot amongst the people. When the Priests saw that Laws would not move the people to communicate oft, and to bring their offerings, they devised another damnable means; they taught the people, that the Lord's Supper is not only a Sacrament, and so profitable to them only; but it is a Sacrifice to God, and profitable to all the beholders of it, and by their offerings they may find mercy and grace: Yea lastly, not to the offerers and beholders only, but to all for whom the Priest offereth it, as well absent as present, whether alive or dead; and at last, both to the soul, and all other necessities. They were the more bold to teach so, because the Fathers had improperly, and dangerously, called the Sacrament a Sacrifice. And upon this doctrine was multiplied the riches and wealth of the Church, by donations of prebendaries, chanouries, lands, yearly revenues, as is to be seen in their Charters, I offer unto God the things contained in this clanker for the remission of my sins, and of my Parents sins, to maintain the service of God in sacrifices and Masses. They who have seen the Rights or Writs of Church lands or revenues, know this. This doctrine took deep root, for it was gainfull unto the Priests, and easie unto the people; for what can be thought more easie? Men wallowing in sin, hear a Mass, and bring an offering to a Priest, and get remission; no searching of the heart, nor mortification required; this was not the straight way, and who was not able to do it? Nor can it be shewed, that such doctrine was heard in the Church before the seventh Century; to wit, they give heed to lies and apparitions of deceiving spirits, or deceitfull and feigned apparitions, and so lost the truth. All that is spoken of this purpose declares, that at first the action of offering was not the action of the Priest, but of the people; and the thing offered was not the Sacrament, nor the Son of God, but the gifts of the people, as is manifest; for in the daies of Pope Gregory the I, the words, a little from the beginning of the Canon, are not, Which we offer unto thee; but, Which each of them offer unto thee. Afterwards the Priests turn them to their action, and their action was called the sacrifice; and all their prayers, which before were in dedication of their offerings, the Priests turn to the consecration of the Bread and Wine, which the Priest, and one with him, do take. This change is manifest by the Canon of the Mass, whereof I have touched some words; and namely, Accept the gifts, as thou didst accept the gifts of Abel, Abraham and Melchisedek... command that these things be carried, by the hands of thy Angel, unto the Altar above. And when it was generally so called a Sacrifice, Raban sheweth in what sense the best sort understand it, De Institut. Cleric. lib. 1. cap. 31. Sacrificium dictum quasi sacrum factum... that is, a sacrifice is an holy action; because, by mystical prayer, it is consecrated in remembrance of the Lord's passion. And Thomas Aquin. part. 3. qu. 83. art. 1. The celebration of this Sacrament is called a Sacrifice, for two causes; first, because (as Augustin. ad Simpli.) Images are called by the names of things whereof they are Images; as looking to a Picture, we say, This is Cicero: But the celebration of this Sacrament, is a representative Image of the Passion of Christ, who is the true Sacrifice: Hence Ambrose on Hebr. cap. 10. By Christ was the Sacrifice once offered, &c. What therefore do we? we do therefore every day offer in remembrance of his death. Another way in respect of the effect of Christ's passion; to wit, because by this Sacrament we are made partakers of the fruit of the Lord's suffering; and therefore in a secret Dominical Prayer it is said, How oft the commemoration of this Sacrifice is celebrated, the work of our redemption is exerced. And therefore (saith he) in respect of the first way, it may be said, that Christ was offered even in the figures of the Old-Testament; as it is said Apoc. 13. the Lamb slain from the beginning of the World; but in respect of the other way, it is proper unto this Sacrament, because Christ is offered in celebration thereof. So far he. If he and many others who have written the like, had beleaved that the Sacrament is properly a Sacrifice, or else the same Sacrifice with Christ's suffering, or an iteration of it, why did they not teach so in expresse words? Therefore we may conclude, that for 1300 years they thought not the Sacrament to be a Sacrifice properly; but did call it so improperly, or in remembrance, or in representation.

Missa.

4. The Romanists say, their Mass is from the institution of Christ, and yet they cannot find the name of it in any Ecclesiastical Writer before Pope Leo, who lived An. 460; and in what signification it was taken at that time, it may be learned out of Augustine, if these be his Sermons: Ser. 237. de temp. he saith, Post Sermonem fit Missa catechuminis, after the Sermon or preaching, they which are but learning their catechism, are sent away. So Missa is a dismissal, or a charge to depart. And Ser. 251, is this word thrice, for all that is done in the meetings of the Church; he saith, Some, especially the potent men of this World, when they come to the Church, are not devout in the praises of God, but compel the Presbyter to shorten the Missa, and sing at their pleasure; neither will they let him keep the use of the Church. And Raban in the beginning of the same Chapter, gives the former reason of the name, saying; The Levite crieth, If any Catechumenus be here as yet, let him be gone. They give other reasons of the name, which were tedious to repeat. But hence we may see that the word signifieth not a Sacrifice; although Popish men would have others believe, that where that word is found, a Sacrifice is signified. As for the original of the word, some would bring it from Deut. 16. 10: But Bellarmin. de Missa lib. 1. cap. 1. saith, That cannot be; because then it should be found among the Greeks, since all the Hebrew words, which are among the Latines, are come unto us by the hands of the Greeks; as Amen, Hallelujah, Osanna, &c. Neither can they agree on the deprivation of it. 5. Priesthood, and Sacrifice, and Altars are correlatives; and so Priesthood properly taken, hath relation to a Sacrifice and an Altar properly taken, saith Bellarmin. ibid. cap. 2. & 14. But the Christians in the primitive times (saith he, de cultu sanct. lib. 3. cap. 4.) did purposely abstain from the words of Temple and Priest untill the daies of Tertullian; not (as he saith there) lest they had seemed to retain some Jewish ceremonies, or Temples of Heathenish Idols; for so they should have abstained from the words of worship and prayer, which terms were used both by Jews and Heathens: But rather lest the new Converts might by the name of Temple, Priest and Altar, conceive some corporal sacrifice to be offered by men, for expiation of offences. Tables agree better unto a Supper, and the Sacrament is called a Table, 1 Cor. 10. So speaketh the Council at Nice, At the Table of the Lord we should not look basely upon the Bread and Wine, which is set before us; but we should lift up our hearts, &c. Lactant. lib. 6. cap. 25, and August. de Civ. Dei lib. 10. cap. 4. did not acknowledge any Altars in their times, but the Altar of our hearts. And at the same time, by the allusion unto the Law, the Elders were called Priests, and Church-Tables were called Altars: but since such allusions have given, unto their posterity, occasion to conceive such errors, it is safer to use the moderation of the first times. And since it is not lawfull among the Papists to consecrate the Sacrament, but upon of the Mass, (4) at the coming in of the Priest (5) unto the Altar, (5) the antiphona (6) is sung (7) by the Clark, that a sound may be heard; when he entrench into the Sanctuary before the Lord; as in the Old-Testament, the entring of the High-Priest was known by the sound of the Bells; wherefore the singing of God's praise is heard for just cause, that the holy harmony of the Ministers, may go before the mysteries of the holy celebration; and the Sacrifice of worthy praise, may go before the venerable Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ: for the Queere (8) is the multitude assembled unto the holy service; and is so called, because in the beginning, they stood like a Crown about the Altar. on a consecrate Altar; and Bellarmin saith, It is certain, Pope Sylvester was the Authour of consecrating Altars, De verbo Dei lib. 4. cap. 3; it is manifest, that the primitive Church had not Altars, and now the having of them is a novelty. 6. Antiphona and Introitus are both one, saith Platina in Gregor. I. and left any ornament or content be lacking in time of Sacrifice, he appointed that the Antiphona should be chanted. Again in Celestin. I. (who lived An. 423.) Platin. saith, Celestine ordained, that the Psalms should be chanted antiphonativè, and this custom was not in use before. I know not whether Platina's memory had failed him; or whether he meaneth, as Poly. Virg. de invent. rer. lib. 5. cap. 10. saith, Antiphona which is called Introitus, was ordained by Gregory; and that which is called Tractus, by Celestine. But Raban de Institut. Cler. lib. 2. cap. 50. saith, The Greeks first made the Antiphonæ, two Quers singing by turns; and among the Latines blessed Ambrose ordained them, following the example of the Greeks. But sure it is, as Lindan de opi. genere Interpretat. lib. 3. cap. 3. saith, Agobert, Bishop of Lions, did complain, that there were many superfluous things in them; and saith Lindan, If Agobert were now living, and saw the Antiphona's and the Missals, O everlasting God, with what name would he decipher them! Where not only many things are from the Apocrypha Gospel of Nicodemus, and other trifles; but secret prayers, and filthy, yea and feigned by Hereticks. 7. Pope Damasus in Epist. ad Hieronim. saith, The Church of Rome was not acquainted with singing, and he biddeth him to send him a copy of the Greek Psalter. Augustine in Confess. lib. 9. cap. 7. sheweth, that the Latine Church had not singing, till Ambrose was expelled out of Millan by the Arrian Empress Justina; and in his absence the people did begin to follow the example of the Eastern Churches, and others follow Millan; and the singing in Alexandria was liker unto grave reading, then unto Musical chanting. And Raban loc. cit. cap. 48. doth forbid Musical gestures, and Theatral singing; and admitteth only such as may move compunction, and may be clearly understood by the hearers. Poly. Vergil. de invent. rer. lib. 6. cap. 2. saith, Now the Chanters make a noise in the Church, and nothing is heard there but a voice; and others who are present, are content with the consent of the cries, no way regarding the meaning of the words; and so it is, that among the multitude, all the esteem of Divine Worship seems to rely upon the Chanters; although generally no sort of men are lighter or more wicked. The Spanish Index Expurgator. pag. 72. ordained these words to be left out in following Impressions. 8. Poly. Vergil. loc. cit. speaking of the Chorus, saith, I may say that these are, for the most part, brought into our Ceremonies from the old Heathens, who were wont to sacrifice with symphony; as witnesseth Livius lib. 9.

The Quors.

Priest's coming in, the Letanies (9) are said by the Clerks, that the Common-Prayer may go before the particular prayer of the Priest. Then followeth the Priest's prayer, (10) who when he hath saluted the people with peace, (11) receiveth the answer of peace from them; that true concord, and charity, and pure devotion may the easier obtain their Petitions, from him who looketh into the heart, and judgeth inwardly. Then the Reader readeth a part of the Canon, (12) that

9. These have not one father. Gratian. de consecr. dist. 1. cap. Iacobus, giveth some of them unto James the Lord's brother, and some to Basiliius Cæsarian. Platina gives some to Damasus P. An. 370, some to Symmachus P. An. 510; and in Gregory the I, he saith, Gregory did ordain the Supplications, which the Greeks call Letanies. They are of several sorts. Poly. Verg. lip. cit. cap. 11. saith, Mamecus Bishop of Vienna, in the daies of Pope Leo the I, because of an Earth-quake, did ordain first the Supplications, which the Greeks call Letanies or Processions, that they should go two and two in long order, passing from one place to another, and praying with a loud voice: and these are called the lesser Letanies, which not long after Pope Agobert did first ordain to be each Lord's day in the Churches, or about the Church, which now is done every where. Some would rather have them called Processions, because the sacrificial pomp proceeds publickly. Thereafter Pope Gregory ordained the greater ones, when the people of all sorts going by seven in rank, should sing by turns; because at that time the people were smitten with a kind of swelling in their loins, whereby many were killed. Gregory commanded that these Letanies should be observed every where; and now the Priests sing them for fear of imminent evils, a great number of people also following and praying: but in prosperity also they oft pray so publickly, that who for fear of evils had praied with supplications, thereafter obtaining our desires, and rejoicing in security, we should give thanks unto God. Which the Pagans did also, as Virgil saith of Dido, rejoicing for the unexpected coming of the Trojans, Sic memorat, simul Eneam in regia ducit Testa, simul Divum templis induci honorem; that is, as Servius saith, She commanded Supplications. So did the Romans, and almost all other Nations, from whom, without doubt, such rites are come unto us; for in the pomp of our supplications, some ridiculous things do precede, &c. He sheweth the manner of them conform to the old custom, in Dionys. lib. 7. and Cato, and Plautus, and Apuleius: In the end he saith, We keep these rites also, but I know not whether they be done well: I fear, I fear, I say, that in them we give more pleasure unto Heathen Gods, then unto Christ yea whatsoever shall be done unto us, herein we do contrary unto Christ's command; and to the end we may be the more ashamed of this, I shall name one example of 600, &c.

10. This prayer is collectæ, and there be many of them, and added by sundry Authours; as Cassander witnesseth in Liturgie. cap. 21. and they give sundry reasons of the name. 11. Poly. Vergil. de invent. rer. lib. 5. cap. 10. saith, Pope Innocent the I, did ordain, that the Priests should kiss one another, after the Canon; and Pope Leo the II ordained, that the kiss should go round amongst the people; but when Mass is said for the dead, it is not to be done; lest we seem to communicate with those, of whom we are not sure that they are in favour with God. But whosoever was the Authour, and whatsoever be signified by this rite, it is not now in use, because of abuses following thereupon; and this, with other such passages where the people are ordered to answer, doth shew that in the beginning the Service was done in a known language; or else how could the people understand what they should answer? Bellarmin. de verb. Dei lib. 2. cap. 16. confesseth, that in the primitive Church, both Eastern and Western, they did use the vulgar tongue;

that the mind of the hearers being prepared thereby, may be the more attentive to the rest. After this a Chanter singeth Responsorium, (13) so named, because when one resteth, another answereth. The same is also called Graduale, because it is sung upon the steps of the Pulpit. After it Hallelujah (14) is sung, to lift up the minds of the people unto Heavenly things, and raise them unto Divine contemplations. Then the Gospel is (15) read in audience of the people, by the Deacon, with great authority; that his doctrine may be heard, and his vertue be understood by the Gospel, the mystery of whose body is then celebrate. Then the offerings (16) are made by the people, and the Offertorium (17) is sung by the Clarks, which hath the name from the causes; as if one would say, The Song of the Offerers. And the

and so saith Origen contra Cels. lib. 8. Let all the Heathens know, that we who are Christians, do not use barbarous or unknown words; but the Greeks use Greek words, and the Romans use Romish, and all people pray in their own languages; and the Lord of all languages understandeth them speaking so diversly, as if they were all speaking in one voice. And Chrysost. on 1 Cor. 14. hom. 35., at these words, Thou givest thanks well, but another is not edified, saith, Behold he laith (as they speak) the stone to the square, requiring the edification of the Church in every thing; the unlearned, he called the common people; and he sheweth, it is not a little evil, that they cannot say Amen. What he saith is to this purpose, If thou givest thanks in a strange tongue, and either understands it not thy self, or doest not expound it unto others, a common man cannot answer with Amen. . . . and he who understandeth not, receiveth no benefit thereby, &c. Cassander in Liturgica cap. 28. hath this title, The Canonical Prayer, especially the consecration of the Body and Blood, the Ancients did read so, that the people might understand it, and say unto it, Amen. He proved this by the testimonies of Thomas par. 3. qu. 78. art. 1. Euseb. hist. lib. 7. cap. 9. Iustinian. Imper. in nov. constitut. 123. and the Liturgies of the Greeks, Æthiopians, Syrians, Armenians, &c. But now (saith Bellarmin.) the Council of Trent condemneth, with anathema, all them who require, that publick prayers, and especially the Mass, should be used in a vulgar language. And if any will ask, how and when this alteration came into the Western Church, since it is not in others? Erasmus in Comment. on 1 Cor. 14. answereth, It is a wonder how it came in. But certainly the Latine was used in the Western Churches from the beginning, because it was commonly understood by them all; but as the Roman Empire was diminished, and several Nations got power amongst themselves, the Latine language did turn to French, Spanish, Italian, &c. So the vulgar tongue was not denied unto the people, as Pope Vitalian did command the Latine in all Churches; and the Council of Trent accursed all other languages; but the Nations went out of use of it; and the Popes will have them use it, whether they understand it or not. 12. Here we see the Canon of the Mass hath several parts, and so it hath many Authours. Cassander loc. cit. saith, The Canon was not made by one, nor yet in the order as it is now. Io. Beletsh, a Doctor at Paris, about the year 1170, in his book de Divin. Offic. cap. 46, saith, The Canon is said with a low voice, because God hears the cry not of the mouth, but of the heart. . . . and yet we pronounce the words, lest we seem to be ignorant of the things which we ask, or which we should ask; or lest we fail in our voice by long speaking, if it were pronounced loudly; or thirdly, lest the words of so great a mystery becom vile by daily custom, and be used elsewhere in uncompetent places. . . . It is forbidden by a Decree, under a curse, that none should pronounce these words, but who is clothed with sacred vestures, and from a book upon a consecrated Altar. . . . and therein are many things, which are not lawfull for us to expound, but haply for the Priests only; therefore we will be silent of them. So far Beletsh. It seems this Decree, and these things which are to be kept in silence, were not in the daies of Raban; and therefore he speaks not of the Secreta. 13. Responsorium or Graduale is given by Platina unto Celestine the I; and by Poly. Vergil. unto Gelasius and Gregory. Raban Institut. lib. 2. cap. 51. saith, It was devised by the Italians a long space before the Antiphona, and then one said them; but now (saith he) sometimes one, sometimes two, and sometimes three, the Quire for the most part answering. 14. Platin in Sixt. 1. saith, Hallelujah is borrowed from the Church of Jerusalem; but he telleth not who borrowed it; and in Gregory the I. he saith, Gregory ordained it to be sung nine times. answer unto the Epistle of Damasus, adviseth after every Psalm to sing, Glory unto the Father, unto the Son, and the Holy Ghost, as it was in the beginning, now, and through all ages, Amen; to the end, the faith of the 318 Bishops, of the Nicene Council, may be declared by the consent of voice; and then put unto all the Psalms Hallelujah. 15. Platina in Sixt. 1. saith, Jerom first read the Epistle and the Gospel, in the Mass; and again he giveth them to Damasus. 16. It is spoken before, at note 3, of the offerings. It may be added, that when the Priests saw the charity or liberality of the people grow cold, a Decree was made to read the Catalogue of the offerers; and then of them for whom the offering was made, whether alive or dead. 17. This is the song of dedication, or (as Platin. speaks) for blessing the offerings; and saith he, Eutichian P. An. 275, was the deviser of the Offertorium. But Walaf. Strabo de init. & incremen. rer. Eccles. cap. 22. saith, the Authour thereof is not known, since we do verily believe, that the ancient and holy Fathers did offer in silence. Biel in exposit. Missæ lect. 16. saith, It is sung in the mean time while the people do present their gifts; and there he mentioneth three sorts of offerings, to wit, of their persons, their gifts, and of those things which are for the elements.

Holy Vestures.

17. Gratian. de consecr. dist. 1. cap. Consulto, sheweth, that even in the primitive Church was too great ostentation of the Corporale, which was of silken or scarlet cloath; therefore Pope Sylvester the I. ordained, that they should use only white linnen, because Christ's body was wrapped in linnen. Walaf. Strabo lip. cit. cap. 24. speaking of this linnen, adds that the Priestly vestures are also advanced to a great ornament; whereas at first they did celebrate in no other but their usual garments; as also is yet the custom of the Eastern Churches. Pope Stephen the I. did ordain, that Priests and Levites should not daily use their holy garments; and thereafter a distinction was made between the vestures of Bishops, and of others. 19. Gratian. loc. cit. cap. Vasa, sheweth, that in the primitive times they had only wooden vessels, untill Pope Zepherin, An. 216. appointed cups of glass; and because those were brittle, Pope Urban An. 230. brought in cups of silver: [But others say, The Church had no cups of gold nor silver, untill the Emperour Constantine gave them,] and then an Act was made, that no Priest should administer the Sacrament in wooden vessels, lest God be offended. Nevertheless it is recorded of Exuperius, Bishop of Tolouse, that he would not admit golden or silver vessels

Holy Vessels.

Pallium corporale (18) is laid upon the Altar, which signifieth the cloath wherein Christ's body is wrapped; it is of pure linnen, and not of silk or purple, nor of litted cloath, as we find to have been ordained by Pope Sylvester. Then are laid down the holy vessels, (19) (which are the Cup and the Platter) upon the Altar; these two somewhat resemble the Lord's burial, because as then Christ's body being anointed with odours, was laid in a new Tomb, by the obedience of the Saints; so now his mystical body being embalmed with holy prayer, is given in the holy vessels to be received by Believers in the ministry of the Priests. After all this the Mass (20) is sung by the Priest, who when he hath spoken of the lifting up the heart (21) unto the Lord, he exhorts the people to give thanks (22) unto the Lord; and he filling his mouth with praises, praith that the Almighty God the Father, to whom the Heavenly powers do serve, would of his grace command, that the professions of men may be conform to their voices. After this prayer, followeth a song, made of the songs of Angels and Men. (23) to wit, Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord God of Hosts, &c. Now is the consecration (24) of the Body (25) and Blood of the Lord, and earnest prayer unto God (26;) and in the mean time time the Lord's Prayer is tooned (27.) For when they come to communicate (28.) and receive (29) the body (30.) they give one to another the kiss of fels in his Diocy; but only mands of wands, or baskets for the bread, and glasses for the wine. Jerom commendeth him for this. It appears then, although some did delight in ostentation, yet others did not approve it. 20. Io. Belesb. li. cit. cap. 34. saith, It is all called the Mass, which is said from the beginning to the end... yet sometimes more especially the first part or the Introitus is so named, because an Angel is sent thither. But the Mass is divided into four parts, Obsecrations, Orations, Postulations and Thanksgivings. The first part is of the Catechumeni,... for they may abide no longer, no more than Jews or Heathens, because as yet they are not Members of the Church; for which cause the Deacon saith, from the Pulpit, with a loud voice, Let the Catechumeni go forth. Hence the first part is called Missæ, ab emittendo, because they are sent forth... But all the Office is called Missæ, which is from the Introitus, usque ad, Ite, Missæ est; although sometimes we call Missæ those words, whereby the body of the Lord is made. So far Belesb. But it seems Raban knew not that form of saying Mass; for he speaks afterwards of the consecration, and several things must be done, after the covering of the Altar, before the consecration. As for the dismissal of the Catechumeni, the Priest singeth not that; but the Deacon speaketh it with a loud voice. 21. Many of the Ancients repeat these words, Sursum Corda, lift up your hearts; whereby they did teach that the Service was not private, but one spoke unto the people: Corda. 2. That men should not look upon the elements, as if Christ's body were in them, or as if they were turned into Christ's body; but we should lift up our minds, by faith and meditation, unto Heaven, where only is Christ bodily, and we should seek and find him there. 22. In this Missal is now neither such exhortation, nor such a prayer, as followeth; and therefore I may say of Raban, as Corn. Lauriman in his Epist. nuncup. said of Io. Belesb. These things may argue his antiquity, which he writeth were done in the Church every where in his time; of which things a great part is so abolished and extinct, that no footstep thereof now appears; for which cause some have heretofore despised him, as if he had written false things; whereas he is for the same, the more to be commended, since hence we may learn what they did of old, and how much our times are different from antiquity. But neither doth Belesb. mention any exhortation to praise, nor such a prayer, so that those were abolished before his time; and in place thereof, he mentioneth Secreta and the Prefaces chap. 43; and in the next chap. Secreta is so called, because it is secretly pronounced. So the people may not hear nor know it; and chap. 45. he saith, the Prefaces are ten in number; and Lauriman addeth, in the margine, there are eleven of them. Walaf. Straboloc. cit. saith, Who made the Prefaces and the Actio (which the Romans call the Canon) it is unknown unto me; but that it is augmented not once, but often, we know by the parts which are added. So here are novations upon novations, and frequent changes from the Missal of Gregory. 23. Platina saith, Pope Sixtus the I, ordained that Sanctus should be sung. 24. The Scriptures have the word of Thanksgiving and Blessing, and not Consecration; nor is a word a material difference, if they understood no other thing but Thanksgiving or Blessing. But it is a dangerous word, since the old Heathens did use it, to signify the making of a God, Consecrare statuum; and now the Romanists do use it, for the lifting up of the elements, and blowing on them, and crossing them, I know not how often; the thwarting and lifting up of their Arms, the joining and unjoining of the Priest's thumb and fore-finger, with such other rites; which have no such foundation in, nor relation unto Christ's Institution, nor his Apostles doctrine or practice; and do smell of charming or heathenism, more then of true piety; and the rather is the word to be forsaken, because their Priests are not ashamed to say, Qui creavit me, dedit mihi creare se; qui creavit me sine me, creatur à me. 25. Raban speaks so, not that he meant eth the bread to be turned into the body of Christ; although Io. Eckius in tom. 4. homil. 31. doth cite his words unto that purpose: For Transubstantiation was not then hatched (as I shall shew God willing) and Raban was reckoned amongst Hereticks for the contrary doctrine, as is touched before; but because the Bread and Wine are the visible figures and resemblances, and seals of Christ's Body and Blood; and because with the signs the Believers receive the Body and Blood of Christ. Raban's words, which I have related in the former Section, do clearly shew his mind in these words; and so we may judge of many others writing in this manner, although their words have been wrested to another sense. 26. Observe, he saith, Prayer unto God. But in all this Institution, is not one word of praying unto the Bread. I know they do quote the Ancients for adoring the bread; and especially, they alledge Theodoret. dial. 2. But by one we may understand the meaning of all others: his words are these; The mystical signs after sanctification, do not depart from their nature; for they remain in their former substance, figure and form; and they may be both touched and seen, as they were before; but they are understood to be those things which they are made, and are beleaved to be; and they are adored as those things which they are beleaved to be; compare therefore the Image with the exemplar or pattern, for the figure should be like the truth. In these words Theodoret. denieth Transubstantiation and the bodily presence; and he calleth the Bread and Wine signs mystical, the Image of the exemplar, and figure of the truth; and thereby we may easily understand what kind of adoring or reverence he would have given unto the signs, and not that they should be adored as Christ himself. And to shew the impudency of the Romanists, I add another testimony, which they do object out of August. in Ps. 98. saying, No man eats it before he adore it. They object these words, as if Augustine were speaking of the bread. But his words are, Of the earth he [Christ] took earth, because flesh is of the earth; and of the flesh of Mary he took flesh, because he walked here in the same flesh, and did give us the same flesh unto salvation; and no man eats that flesh except he first adore it, &c. Here Augustine speaks not of the Sacrament, but of the flesh, which Christ took of the flesh of Mary: and who denieth that flesh should be adored? Some words after these, may be understood of the Sacrament, and they are clear; for he expoundeth the words of Christ, The words which I have spoken unto you, are spirit and life: as if the Lord had said, Understand ye spiritually, what I have spoken; ye shall not eat this body which ye see, nor drink this blood, which they shall shed who shall crucifie me: I have commanded unto you a certain Sacrament, which being spiritually understood, shall quicken you; and although it be necessary that the same be celebrate visibly, yet it must be understood invisibly. So August. Nothing can be spoken more plainly and directly, against the gross and carnal manner of the presence of Christ's body in the Sacrament. 27. It is certain, that our Saviour is the Authour of this Prayer; and who hath ordained it to be sung, I know not: But Io. Beletth cap. 47. testifieth, that in his time the people did stand when this prayer was said, if it were a Feast-day; and if it were not a Feast, the people were prostrate; and the Priest said it with a loud voice, except these words, But deliver us from evil: which the people did answer.

28. As Christ did ordain, that all Believers should eat in remembrance of him;

him; so in ancient times was an order, that all should communicate, who will not be excommunicate, Gratian. de consecr. dist. 2. cap. Peracta, & Comperimus. Where was then the private Mass, wherein the Priest alone consumeth the Sacrament? This order of communicating hath ceased through the sloth of Priests and people, saith Cochlaus de sacrif. Missæ, and Harding's answer to the first article of Bishop Juel's challenge. And for remedy, it was provided, that two Deacons should communicate with the Priest, Gratian. de consecr. dist. 1. cap. Hoc quoque, & Omnes. And Pope Sergius the II. ordained, that the Bread should be broken into three parts, according to the number of Communicants; which rite of breaking remaineth yet, although the Priest be alone, but they have drawn it to signifie a mystery. Lombard. lib. 4. dist. 12. F. saith, The part which is offered and cast into the Cup, signifieth the body of Christ which rose again; the part which is eaten, signifieth him walking on the earth; and the third part lying on the Altar till the end of the Mass, signifieth the body lying in the grave; for untill the end of this world, the bodies of the Saints shall continue in the graves. The Authour of Specul. Curator. saith, two parts are reserved, and the third is cast into the cup, to signifie that the sacrifice is profitable for three things; unto just men, for increase of grace; unto sinners, for taking away their sins; and unto those in Purgatory, for taking away their punishment. So uncertain are they in their errors. And in that direction of the Curats, it is specially provided, that only the Priest shall eat that part which is cast into the Cup. So that now the Communion is, for the most part, turned into a theatrical eating and drinking of the Priest alone. Cassander cannot wonder enough, how they have departed so far from the Institution; and how they dare so clearly violate the Acts of Councils, &c. Consult. art. 24. 29. Christ did not put the Sacrament into his Apostles mouths, but every one received the bread with his hand; and such was the custom of the Church untill the sixth Synod, saith Jesuit Salmeron on 1 Cor. 11. disp. 19. But this was altered, when the Roman Church ordained, that for reverence sake people should not touch it with their hands; but so oft as they communicate the Priest should put the bread into their mouths. Hence is arisen another novelty, that whereas the bread was wont to be broken, and distributed out of the same loaf, now they break not the bread, they say, for reverence; as if the Apostles and primitive Church had not been reverent, or Believers now cannot be reverent; and therefore lest people do break Christ's body with their teeth, they do provide Wafers, which may melt away in the mouth. Cassander in Liturg. saith, This is religion many waies despised. 30. He mentioneth the receiving of bread only; nevertheless it is certain, the distribution of the Cup also was ordained by Christ, and it continued in use: For Raban in the same book chap. 31. saith, The Lord would have the Sacraments of his body and blood taken by the mouth of Believers. Now this custom was not forbidden untill the Council at Constance, An. 1415, Cassand. Consul. art. 22; and again it was permitted unto the Bohemians, An. 1438. by the Council at Basil. Yea Pope Gelasius the I. made a Decree, that who would not communicate in both, should be excommunicated from both. This Decree stood in force about the year 1200, and is registred by Gratian. de consecr. cap. 2. Comperimus: his reason is, because the division of one and the same mystery, cannot be without great sacrilege. Upon these words the Gloss saith, This is understood of the Species. . . therefore it is taken under both kinds, as a Pupil must approve all which a Tutor doth, or refuse all; yet (saith he) a sick man who may not drink wine, or any other in necessity, may take the body without wine. When and by whom came this alteration? Jesuit Coster in Enchir.

tracta. de commun. sub utraque spe. saith, Not by commandment of Bishops, but it crept in by the practice of the people, the Bishops winking at it. It is likely, the communion of bread only, came by practice of Priests; after that Thomas Aquin. had devised concomitancy, lest any thing might seem superfluous.

Kiss.

31. This is the second time that the Priest saluteth the people. Biel in Expos. Miss. lect. 16. noteth three salutations with the particular reasons, as they may be. Io. Beletb cap. 48. saith, The Priest takes this kiss from the Eucharist, or as some think from the Altar, and gives it to the Deacon or sub-Deacon, that by them it may go unto others; but (saith he) with this caution, that men give it not unto women, lest some wantonness or carnality creep into the thoughts. The Rhemists would derive this custom of the Mass from Rom. 16. 16: but Paul did not kiss the bread nor the Altar, nor did he command it as a part or pendicle of the Mass. As it is a fashion among us, for men meeting or parting with friends to shake hands; so it was among the Jews, and some other Nations, as appears by many places in both Testaments, for men to kiss men, which custom Christians did also observe; and therefore the Apostle doth moderate that custom, that it should be with holiness; and as that secular custom did wear out of use, so it ceased also in the Church. 32. Beletb hath the words, Lamb of God, who takes away the sins of the world; and not the words following; but also saith, these be said thrice, to wit, twice with, Have mercy upon us; once with, Give us peace; but neither of the two when it is a Mass for the dead; but only with, Give them rest. Raban and others before him knew not this distinction. 33. The lawfull use of the Lord's Supper, is the remembrance of his death to the salvation of the believing receiver. But afterwards it was provided, that if any theft was committed in a Monastery, and the Monks were suspected; then the Abbot should say a Mass, and all the Monks should communicate, and thereby declare that they were innocent. Gratian. caus. 2. qu. 5. cap. Sape contingit, sheweth that Pope Nicolaus ordained these words to be said unto each one of them, The body of the Lord be unto thy trial. This Decree was abrogate by contrary Decrees of Popes; because the body of Christ should not be given unto him who is suspected of a crime: Tho. Aquin. pag. 3. qu. 80. ar. 6 ad 3. Nevertheless it is turned to worse, for in all their Treasons and Plots either against Nations or Church, they make the Sacrament to be the bond of their bloody intentions. 34. Beletb saith, this is the last part of the Mass, called The Thanksgiving; and beginneth at the Communion, which is also called Completo. But I find no words of Thanksgiving here; so thankfulness is worn out of use. 35. Some say, the blessing was ordained by Pope Leo the I; but it is more ancient to bless the people at their dismissal. 36. Poly. Virgil. de invent. rer. lib. 4. cap. 11. saith, The saying of Ite, Missa est, is from a custom of the Priests of Isis. 37. He hath no mention of what was done with the remainders of the elements. Bellarmin. de Euchar. lib. 4. cap. 4. sheweth out of Justine, that the Deacons were wont to carry the Eucharist unto the sick, or them who could not come to the publick meetings: And cap. 5. The reliques was given unto children to be eaten by them; because they thought not the element to be holy but in use. ration and pompous proceſſion, which cuſtom is contrary unto the Inſtitution, as Caffander proves by many teſtimonies in Liturgic. cap. 30. 11. This was the form of Gregory's Maſs, and all that was in the daies of Raban, far different from the firſt Inſtitution of the Lord's Supper; but ſince that time it is as far changed, even ſo far that if Raban were alive, and could ſay Maſs no better, he would be called an ignorant Curat. It hath indeed more ſhew and pomp now then before; but as a painted Image hath more accoutrement then the man hath, yet it hath no life in it; ſo the additions and changes make it more glorious to the eye of a natural man, but the livelineſs and ſpirituality of it is gone. For at firſt was but one ſort of celebrating, but now they have a publick form, and a private, and a ſolitary, one for Sundays, another for Week daies, another for Feaſt daies, another for Faſts, &c. 2. The people underſtood all, and had their part in praying and ſinging; but now the Prieſt doth all in an unknown language, except that a Deacon or Clark ſay ſome few words. 3. As ſome exhortations and prayers are now put away (whereof I have now noted ſome) ſo many other things are added: As firſt the Introitus muſt be ſung twice on ſome daies, and thrice on other daies. 2. There is a Tractus which muſt be ſung with long or ſlow pronounciation. 3. There be a number of Collects. 4. The Prieſt muſt turn ſometimes to the North, ſometimes to the Eaſt, and ſometimes his face towards the people, and ſometimes his back towards them; neither muſt his turning be in the ſame place, but ſometimes at the North end of the Altar, and ſometimes at the middle on the Weſt ſide; ſometimes he muſt ſtand ſtreight up, ſometimes bow or cringe, and ſometimes on his knees; ſometimes waſh his hands in time of the Maſs, he muſt have his Maſs cloaths. Poly, Virgil. de invent. rer. lib. 6. cap. 12. ſaith, Pope Stephen did firſt ordain them in imitation of the Jewiſh Prieſts; for from the beginning (ſaith he) Prieſts going about Divine Service did put nothing above their cloaths, but did ſtudy rather to deck themſelves with the virtues of the mind, and caſt off vices. But here they do exceed the Levitical Prieſts, ſince thoſe had but ſix ſeveral pieces, as we ſee in Exod. 28. 4; but now they have nine ſeveral pieces, and the Biſhops muſt have ſeven more. The Prieſt muſt ſtretch forth his hands and arms, ſometimes liſt up his hands and cymo Heaven; then he muſt join his hands, and ſometimes cauſe his thumb touch his fore-finger; ſometimes rub his fingers, and waſh his hands; he muſt ſalute the people ſeven times, to wit, five times when he turns unto them, and twice when he turns not; he muſt have his wax candles, and incenſe; he muſt be ſprinkled with incenſe by the Deacon, and the Acolyte muſt beſprinkle the Chorifters, beginning at the Rector. The Prieſt muſt kiſs the Altar, the Platter, and the Book, and caſt Incenſe on the Sacrifice. Anſelm in his Treatiſe unto Waltram, ſheweth diversity of croſſing the elements at that time, ſome croſſing them one way, and ſome another way. Thom. Aquin. par. 3. qu. 83. art. 5 ad 3. ſheweth, that the Prieſt muſt make 29 croſſes, to wit, three when he ſaith, Hec dona, hæc munera, hæc ſancta; three when he ſaith, benedictam, aſcriptam, ratam; two when he ſaith, ut nobis corpus & ſanguis; one when the bread is conſecrated; another when the wine is conſecrated, at the word benedixit; five when he ſaith, hoſtiam puram, hoſtiam ſanctam, hoſtiam immaculatam, panem ſanctum, & calicem ſalutis; three when he ſaith, corpus & ſanguinem ſumpſerimus; three when he ſaith, ſanctificas, vivificas, benedixis; three when he ſaith, per ipſum, cum ipſo & in ipſo; two immediately after the cup; and three when he ſaith, pax domini. But the Miſſal hath them now another way, to wit, he muſt croſs both the bread and wine together three times, and again them both three times, then them apart once, and again them both apart once, and again

thrice and once, and again once and twice; signing himself between them; so oft with his hand; and then he must sign the chalice with the host; and then sign himself with the Platter, and once with the chalice; and all these in saying the Canon and Communio, and besides a hundred more; as when he comes at first unto the Altar, he must make a Cross on his face, and say, In nomine Patris, Filii, & S. S. then he blesteth the incense with the same words; then he besprinkleth both the horns of the Altar, &c. Many other such ceremonies have they, which if they be looked upon, by one who knows not what signification they put upon them, they are like a Stage-play. Though they give a signification unto every one of these ceremonies, yet so uncertainly, that one expoundeth them one way, and another expounds them another way; and the most that any of them saith, is, This rite may signifie this thing. So uncertain are things of religion when we stray from the bounds of Scripture. If we consider the authority of them, they are will-worship and devises of men, and brought into the Church some by one way, and some by another; some sooner and some later, and for the most part in conformity unto Jews or Heathens, as may be seen in Poly. Virgil. de invent. rer. If we consider the number of them, though Augustine speaking of the Sacraments said, the signs of Christians are fewer then the signs or rites of the Jews; even in number fewest, and in signification most clear; yet now they are more a great deal then the Jewish, as that one particular of the Vesture sheweth; and in signification both obscure and uncertain, and which is worse; whereas God would have the people then to be instructed by those rites (which the Apostle, under the Gospel, calleth beggarly rudiments) and now he would have his people informed in a more open and plain way, they hold the people in ignorance, and under more beggarly rites; as that the Bishop must have seven pieces of Vesture more then the Priest, to signifie the seven gifts of the spirit, wherein he should excel the Priest; the Tractus must be sung with a slow pronounciation, to signifie the miseries of this life; the Corporale signifieth Christ's body wrapped in a linnen cloath, &c. What need is there of such shadows or representations? Hath a Bishop need to learn from his slippers and his coat what manner of man he should be? Is the slow singing at one time more then at another, a ready way to teach people the miseries on earth? And which is worse then any of these, if we consider the main aim and doctrine of the Mass, it is derogatory to the sufficiency of Christ's Sacrifice; for they teach and contend, that every day they sacrifice unto God the Father the very flesh and blood of Christ, for the forgiveness of sins of all which offer, and for whom they offer, either quick or dead. But this is a cunning fallshood contrary to Scriptures, injurious to Christ, abominable to God, offensive unto men, and monstrous in the Church, as hath been proved by many. But my main purpose is, to shew the changes of the Mass from time to time. But they will say, Ceremonies are variable, and they have retained unchangeably, the main part of Gregory's Missal, which is the Canon. I reply unto the first, it is true Ceremonies are variable; but first they should not be multiplied, as the Roman Church doth. 2. The Ceremonies should be changed for the edification of the Church; but their changes are contrary, for some part that was read so that the people might hear and understand, is now read so that the people shall not hear what it is; and many ceremonies do require much time, ere the people can know what they do signifie; whereas they might learn the same things sooner, if they were informed plainly and directly; and many ceremonies are so dark, that even Priests know not what they do signifie. Next, whereas they say they retain the Canon of the Mass: First, have they not put away some parts of Gregory's Missal, Missal, and added far more? And doth not such addition and abolishing make up a great change? 2. Though we stand not for maintaining the Canon, as being not the work of Christ, nor of his Apostles; as Gregory confesseth lib. 7. ind. 2. Epist. 63; but either his own, or (as he seemeth to say there) of one Scholasticus; yet it is the mighty providence of God for the conviction of the Romish Church, that the Canon is continued: For they hold first, That in the Mass is a true, singular and proper sacrifice. 2. That the Bread and Wine are transubstantiated into the Body and Blood of Christ. 3. That the People should not partake of the Wine. 4. That men attain salvation, or eternal life, by merit of their works: but all these are clearly confuted by the words of that Canon. First, concerning the Sacrifice, it saith, a little from the beginning, Petimus uti accepta habeas & benedicas hac dona, hac munera, hac sancta sacrificia illibata. Here observe first, that the words are in the plural number, gifts, sacrifices: But Christ is not many gifts, nor many sacrifices, he is one gift Ioh. 4. 10. and one sacrifice Heb. 9. 20. & 10. 10. therefore Christ is not signified by these words. 2. The Canon saith, We pray that thou wouldest accept and bless these gifts: Should we think that Gregory would have men to pray for the acceptation of Christ, and for a blessing unto him, who is the dearly beloved of the Father eternally? I beleeve, Gregory did not understand the words so: And after the words which are called The Consecration, it is said, Supra qua propitio ac sereno vultu respicere digneris, & accepta habere, &c. that is, On which be pleased to look with a favourable and gracious countenance, and accept them as thou were pleased to accept the gifts of thy servant Abel, and the sacrifice of our Patriarch Abraham; and the holy sacrifice and immaculate hosty, which thy High-Priest Melchisedek offered unto thee. Whether shall we believe, that the offerings and sacrifices of Abel, Abraham and Melchisedek were acceptable unto God through Christ; or that they were the patterns of accepting the sacrifice of Christ? I beleeve certainly, that Gregory did not think the first, but the second; and so, that he would have Believers to pray for the acceptation of their offerings in and through Christ; and so it is said in the beginning of the Canon, Most gracious Father we humbly beseech thee, for Jesus Christ, thy Son, our Lord's sake; and we pray, that thou wouldest accept... these gifts. Moreover in the same Canon it is said, Hanc oblationem servitutis nostrae, sed & cunctae familiae tuae, quaesumus domine ut placatus accipias, i. e. O Lord we beseech thee that thou, being pacified, wouldest accept this oblation of our sacrifice [or of us thy servants] and of all thy family. Who can think that Gregory did mean, by these words, the oblation of Christ? Again it is said, Quam oblationem tu Deus omnipotens, &c. i. e. Which oblation, O thou Almighty, we beseech thee, that thou wouldest be pleased to make, in all respects, blessed, ascribed, ratified, reasonable and acceptable. Can these words be meant of the offering of Christ, and not rather of the offering of the people? And so it may be said of these words, We offer unto thy excellent Majesty, of thy gifts, and of what thou hast given. And these be all the words, at least the greatest part of the Canon, concerning a sacrifice; and since these be not understood of a proper and singular sacrifice, certainly in the Mass no true and proper sacrifice is offered. But they will say, the words are, Hac sancta sacrificia illibata, which cannot be understood of the offerings of the people; and therefore must be understood of Christ's sacrifice. Answer: First, for the word sancta, it may be understood of the peoples offerings, in respect of dedication, as well as the sacrifice of Melchisedek is called holy and immaculate hosty; and the more, if we take them with the words preceding, We beseech thee humbly for Christ's sake, that thou wouldest accept and bleſs theſe holy oblations. As for the word illibata, Alwin (who was the Teacher of Raban, as ſome write) de Divin. Offic. ſaith, Illibata dicuntur, id eſt, non praguſtata, id eſt, illibata is not as yet taſted, but abiding whole. Yea and in the ſame place he ſaith, By dona, munera & ſacrificia, one and the ſame thing is commended with ſeveral names; and what is offered upon the Altar is called munera, as the Lord ſaith, If thou offer thy gift. It is clear that he underſtood the gifts of the people; and conſequently not a ſingular and proper ſacrifice. I know alſo, that Illibata ſignifieth not offered; and that ſignification doth more confirm what I have ſaid. Secondly, concerning Transubſtantiation; the Canon ſaith, Quam oblationem tu Deus ... benediſtam. ... facere digneris, ut nobis corpus & ſanguis fiat dilectiſſimi Filii tui Domini noſtri Ieſu Chriſti. Here they ſay, are both the ſacrifice and tranſubſtantiation. But firſt, If all theſe words be conſidered together, it is clear that (as I ſaid) the words, Quam oblationem benediſtam, ratam, aſcriptam, rationabilem acceptabilemque, are not meant of the body of Chriſt; becauſe it is craved that the oblation may be bleſſed ... to the end, it may be the body and blood of Chriſt; for what we crave that it may be made the body, is not as yet the body. 2. I truſt none is ſo ignorant, to think that the word ſiat doth neceſſarily ſignifie to be made a ſacrifice, and to be tranſubſtantiated; and if that word can, in that place, admit another ſignification, it proves not either of the two, and far leſs both; and ſo we ſee how great a work is grounded upon the uncertainty of the ſignification of one word. I have already twice ſhewed how Raban expoundeth the word for a ſign, figure, ſeal and representation; and here I add the words of Auguſtine Epift. 23. ad Bonifa. Chriſt was once ſacrificed in himſelf, and is every day ſacrificed unto people in the Sacrament; neither is it falſely ſaid, that he is ſacrificed, for Sacraments have a ſimilitude of the things whereof they are Sacraments; and for this ſimilitude, they oſt have the names of the very things; as in a certain mannner, the Sacrament of the body of Chriſt, is called the body of Chriſt; and the Sacrament of Chriſt's blood, is called his blood. So ſay Auguſtine; and I could add the like teſtimonies of other Ancients, but I ſaid, I would prove it from the words of the Canon: Then obſerve firſt in the words immediately following, it is ſaid, Qui pridie quam pateretur, accepit panem. 2. After the conſecration, Offerimus præclara Majeſtati tua ex donis tuis ac datis hoſtiam puram. ... panem ſanctum vitæ æternæ & calicem ſalutis perpetuæ, ſupra qua propiti ac ſereno vultu reſpicere digneris, &c. 3. When the Prieſt takes the hoſty into his hands, before he communicateth, he is ordered to pray in this manner, Corporis & ſanguinis tui Domine Ieſu Chriſte, Sacramentum, quod licet indignus accipio, not ſit mihi iudicio & condemnationi, ſed tua proſit pietate corporis mei & animæ ſaluti. 4. When he takes the Cup, he is ordered to ſay, Gratias tibi ago, Domine Sancte Pater omnipotens. ... & precor ut hoc Sacramentum ſalutis noſtræ, quod ſumpſi indignus peccator, non veniat mihi ad iudicium neque ad condemnationem. Whence we ſee, that both before the conſecration (as they ſpeak) and after the conſecration, that which is received is called Bread and the Cup, out of what the people offereth from what God had given them; and it is prayed, that God would look graciouſly on theſe things, even on that Bread and Cup, as he was pleaſed to look on the offering of Abel; and that Bread and Cup is, two ſeveral times, called the Sacrament of Chriſt's Body and Blood, and the Sacrament of our ſalvation. Wherefore certainly, according to the Canon, the Bread is ſtill Bread, and the Sacrament of Chriſt's body, and the Sacrament of our ſalvation; and it is not tranſubſtantiated into Chriſt's body. But ſaith the Jeſuit Io. Hart, againſt Io. Reynolds, yea the Bread and Cup do tropologicè signifie the very Body and Blood of Christ. I answer, This is a begging of the question; for we hold, that there is a trope or figure in the words of Christ, This is my body; which they deny: And why should that be denied, more than to be affirmed in the words of the Canon; and the rather, that in the same Canon, and in the prayers after consecration, the Bread and Cup are expressly called the Sacrament of Christ's body, and the Sacrament of our salvation? A Sacrament is not the thing signified, but a sign and seal of it; and therefore according to the Canon, there is no transubstantiation of the Bread and Wine. Thirdly, Concerning the Communicants, it is to be observed, that the Canon is conceived in form of a Prayer, and in the name of the People; and therefore, by the way, I say, it should be pronounced so, that the people may hear and pray in the mean time; but it is said now with a low voice, lest the people hear and understand. But to the purpose; in the Canon it is said, Supplices te rogamus, Omnipotens Deus, ... ut quotquot ex hac Altaris participatione sacro sanctum Filii tui corpus & sanguinem sumpserimus, omni benedictione Cælesti & gratia repleamur, i. e. We humbly pray thee, Almighty God, that so many of us as shall, in partaking of the Altar, receive the holy body and blood of thy Son, may be filled with all Heavenly blessing and grace. Hence it is apparent, that they who receive the one element, should also receive the other, since they are conjoined in the Canon. And not any Papist can deny, that the custom was otherwise at that time, and some hundred years thereafter. Fourthly, Concerning the merits of men, it is true they pray, after the Agnus Dei is sung, in these words, Hac sacro sancta commixtio corporis & sanguinis Domini nostri Iesu Christi, fiat mihi omnibusque sumentibus salus mentis & corporis, & ad vitam æternam, promerendam & capefcentam preparatio salutaris, per eundem Christum Dominum nostrum. But whether the word capefcentam doth not declare the other word promerendam to be taken there improperly; or if the word promerendam should be taken properly for deserving, let it be judged by the words of the Canon; where it is said expressly, Nobis quoque peccatoribus famulis tuis de multitudine miserationum tuarum sperantibus partem aliquam & societatem donare digneris cum tuis sanctis Apostolis & Martyribus & cum omnibus sanctis tuis, intra quorum nos consortium non estimat meriti, sed veniæ quesimus largitor admitte per Christum Dominum nostrum, that is, We beseech thee, that thou wouldest be pleased to give freely unto us sinners, thy servants; hoping in the multitude of thy compassions, some part and fellowship with thy holy Apostles and Martyrs, and with all thy Saints, into whose society, we beseech, admit us; thou not reckoning our deserving, but grant us pardon, for Christ our Lord's sake. Who, weighing these words seriously, can imagine, that the first contriver of the Canon could plead for salvation by his own merits or deservings? Certainly, these words of the Canon do renounce all our merit, and teach us to rely upon the mercy of God for Christ's sake. And therefore, unless the first prayer be contrary unto the Canon, the word promerendam is declared by capefcentam, that is, they pray that the Communion may be a saving preparation for attaining eternal life. And hereby we may learn how to expound that word mereamur in many passages of the Ancients, as I have touched before. I conclude this point, seeing the Canon hath nothing of proper sacrifice in it, nor of transubstantiation, and ordereth that they who receive the bread should also receive the cup, and it takes away the merit of mens work; it is the mighty providence of God, for the conviction of the Romish Church, that the Canon continueth, when so many changes have been made in the Missal; and also it is a singular (I will not say prudence or wisdom, but) policy of the Bishops and Priests, that they will not pronounce the Canon so, that the people may know and understand it; lest the people know those errors which are so plainly contrary unto the Canon. I have also observed another place and change in a prayer after the Pax; there is a prayer in these words, O God, Father, fountain and original of all goodness, who being moved in mercy, wouldest that thy only begotten Son, should for us descend into the lowest part of the world, and assume flesh, whom unworthy I hold here in my hands, I adore thee, I glorifie thee, and I praise thee with my whole mind, and intention of my heart; and I pray that thou wouldest not forsake thy servants, but forgive us our sins, that we may be able to serve Thee, the only true and living God, with a pure heart and chaste body, for the same Christ our Lord's sake. We see this prayer is directed, from the beginning to the end, unto God the Father, and so have the first contrivers ordered it. But now in the Missal is a division, and between the words, I hold in my hands, and, I adore thee, &c. the rubrick saith, Hic inclinatus sacerdos ad hostiam, dicens, Te adoro, te glorifico, &c. as if the words preceding were only directed unto the Father, and the words following were directed unto the host; and so they adore, glorifie, and praise the host, as the only living and true God. Now who hath made this change, and when particularly it was changed; I think it can as hardly be pointed, as who did sow the Tares amongst the Wheat; but every one may see that an abominable change is made there. Raban knew not this rubrick and adoration, nor Io. Beletb; neither is any mention of it, in any of the forms of Mass recorded by Cassander.

*The Bible and Worship in vulgar
language.*

12. Methodius, a Bishop of Moravia Juliametana, went with one Cyril into Poland, in the daies of Lewis the Godly, and converted many of the Sclavi unto Christianity. He found the Vandal Letters, and translated the Scriptures into that language; and in their Liturgy they used the vulgar language: therefore he was summoned to Rome; he went, and defended himself by the testimony of Paul, Rom. 14. Every tongue shall confess unto the Lord; and he did shew the inconvenience of speaking in an unknown language among these new Profelytes. So Pope Nicolaus granteth liberty unto the Slaves and Polonians to use their own language. When he returned from Rome, he dealt with others in Dalmatia and Illyricum to put away the Latine, and serve God in their vulgar language. The Bishops and Priests were so offended with him, that he was constrained to return into Moravia, where he died, Catol. test. ver. lib. 9.

life of the Clergy.*

13. Huldricus or Uulrik (usually called Saint Ulrik) Bishop of Augusta Vindelico. did write unto Pope Nicolaus the I, against the Decree for single life of Priests. After a modest and grave Preface, he saith; Since there are very many proofs both in the Old and New-Testament; let it not, I beseech, be grievous unto thy Father-hood, that a few, of many, be inserted into this page. The Lord in the old Law ordained marriage unto the Priests, which he is never read to have forbidden again. But in the Gospel he saith... because of fornication, let every man have his own wife. The hypocrites say falsely, this belongeth especially to Laicks; and they themselves, although entred into the Holy Orders, spare not to abuse other mens wives. After other testimonies of the Scriptures, he citeth unto this purpose, some testimonies out of Regula Clericor. and out of Augustine; out of Tripartita Historia, he citeth the History of Paphnutius in the Council of Nice; then he bringeth the practice of Pope Gregory the I, who once condemned marriage of Priests, and when he saw so many heads of babes, even more then 6000, which were taken out of his pond, he condemned his own Decree, and said; It is better to marry, then to give occasion of murder. And then

Ulrik inferreth, If they had read such an accident as I have, I beleevē they would not (possibly) judge so rashly . . . Unto so fond, filthy suggestion of this command, (I will not say counsel) they have further said, It is more honest to have dealing with many women secretly, then openly in the sight and knowledge of men to be knit with one. Which surely they would not say, if they were of him or in him, who said, Wo to you Pharisees hypocrites, who do all things to be seen of men, &c. The late Romanists have great spight against this Epistle, and call it a Lutheran fiction; their Judices expurgatorii have ordained that it shall not be Printed again; and they have forged arguments against it from the name of the Authour, and the Age wherein he lived, &c. But the more they study to darken it, it is the more cleared; as may be seen in the Treatise of Bishop Hall, The honour of the married Clergy, lib. 3. sect. 2, 3, 4. One proof of it, is, that Aeneas Sylvius de morib. German. speaking of Ausburg, saith, Udalrik is the Saint of this Title, who did reprove the Pope concerning Concubines. So he nameth lawfull wives.

14. Gunther Bishop of Colen, and Thietgaud Bishop of Trevers, went with a Commission from their Nation, unto Pope Nicolaus; and were hardly dealt with, because they freely delivered the grievances of their Nation. They escaped with their lives, and did write back complaining of the wrongs which he had done them; and then they say, The eternal Emperour hath furnished his Empress and Spouse with spiritual and everlasting stuff; and beautified her not with frail or perishing dowry . . . Which benefits thou as a briggard interceptest, and takest from the Church of God, and transferrest unto thee; thou art a Wolf unto the Sheep, and thou killest the living; thou drawest the strong from above, and by thy wonders thou thrustest down to Hell. . . thou bearest the person of an High-Priest, but plaicst the Tyrant; under the Coat of a Shepherd, we find thee to be a Wolf; thou art called a Father, but falsely, and thou shewest thy self a Judas by thy deeds; when thou callest thy self the servant of servants, thou contendest to be Lord of Lords; and according to the discipline of Christ our Saviour, thou art the lowest of all the Servants of God's Church, but in ambition thou runnest headlong; whatsoever pleaseth thee, is lawfull; and thou art become a drone to Christians. [What remains but to call him the Antichrist, whom the Romanists call the third Elias?] They conclude; For these causes we, with our brethren and colleagues, will neither stand at thy command, nor acknowledge thy voice; neither do we fear thy Bulls and Thunders, &c. Of his Primacy they say, The Holy Ghost is the Authour of all Churches, how far soever they be separated thorow the World; the City of our God, whose Citizens we are, belongeth to the four airts or corners of Heaven; it is larger then the City which the holy Prophets have called Babylon, because she makes her god-head equal unto the Heaven; and braggeth that she is eternal, as if she were God having all wisdom; and glorieth that she neither erreth, nor can erre. Ph. Morn. in Myster. pag. 175. Where also is another Epistle written unto the same Pope, drawn out of the French Annals: it concludeth thus; We will in no way receive thy wicked sentence, which is far from the zeal of uprightness, unjust, unteasonable, and contrary to the Canonical laws; yea, with all the Synod of our brethren, we despise and condemn it as unlawfull, accursed, and fondly pronounced; and truly we will not communicate with thee, who art a favourer and pertaker with accursed persons, and despisers of holy religion; we are content with the communion of the whole Church, and society of brethren, above whom thou exaltest thy self, whom thou despisest, and from whom thou separatest thy self by thy swelling pride: Now we who have experience of thy craft and deceit, and also know thy disdain and swelling dominion, we yeeld nothing, nothing at all unto thee nor thy pride; whereby thou indeavourest to overwhelm us all at the pleasure of our enemies, whom thou favourest; and thou shalt know that we are not thy Clarks, as thou vauntest of thy self; but if thy pride would suffer thee, thou shouldest acknowledge us thy brethren and fellow Bishops. Hence it appeareth, that they begun by experience to smell out, where the Antichrist or the man of pride was.

15. When the controversie was between Charls the Bald, and the two Kings of Germany, for the division of Lorain, or (as Ph. Morn. speaks) for marches, Luithpert Bishop of Mentz, was so respected for his gifts of prudence and holiness, that the Kings did refer the deciding of the controversie unto him. When the Pope did begin to usurp more and more upon the Bishops of Germany, Luithpert writ unto King Lewis thus; The present cause permits me not to be silent any longer, which if I forsake, I cannot be excusable before our Lord Jesus Christ, unto whom it appertains; and I should be convict of my promise made unto your Majesty, if I sitting in the watch, wherein I am set, do see danger coming on you, and with idle and unfaithfull silence I dissemble, and becoming sloathfull I will seem an hireling rather than a Shepherd of the Church, the Pastoral care of which, unworthy I have taken upon me. The dignity of the Church is grievously shaken and defaced in the Seat of Saint Peter, even so that by a hid persecution the like hath not been heard; not by Infidels or them who know not the Lord, but by them (ô how to be bewailed!) who should be guides and governours of the Church; they endeavour to advance the doctrine of man above the word of God; and the malady of the head, if it be not prevented by timely and wholesom medicine, must needs spread through the members. Ye know the danger of God's people, which is fearfully approaching; neither can ye be ignorant, that the Pastours (at which the elements do tremble) who should provide for the safety of the weak, have left the path-way, and themselves run into perdition, and they open a ditch to so many as follow them. Wherefore I exhort your wisdom, who lovest truth and righteousness, that according to the wisdom given unto you from above, ye would deal with them which know the truth and love righteousness, what way the scandals of dissension may be removed, which the sower of Tares, by his craft, ceaseth not to spread; and that peace and long wished for unity, may be restored unto the Church; and the help of watchfulness may be had in time, lest foolish negligence give way unto the wounds; for all the body of the Church is not yet wounded, although the head be smitten with sores, and several members seem to be diseased; and therefore the infirm must be helped (if they will accept of cure) by those which are known to be whole and sound; or they must be cut off, according to the command of our Physician, lest the whole body perish. Wherefore it seemeth unto me both necessary and expedient, that the religious Prince Charls, your brother, being time requested unto this purpose, that as well he, as the Priests of his Kingdom, may meet with you and your Bishops, and may be partners of the same work with you; that when ye shall, by the help of God, return peaceably from your intended journey, with one consent and common endeavour, by the grace of God, ye may restore peace and concord unto the Catholick and Apostolical Church, according to orthodox doctrine. Ph. Morn. in Assester. pag. 162. Observe here the estate of the Church at that time; and that when the head is diseased, the body cannot be readily cured, but by common authority of Princes and Synods.

16. Hincmar (of whom I have made mention in Pope Nicolaus) was many years Arch-Bishop of Rhemes; upon several occasions he did solicit and flatter the Popes, and at other times did practice and write against them; as is to be seen in Baron. Annal. tom. 9. and the Cardinal doth accordingly allow and disallow him. In one of his Epistles he professeth, that he had received a Palle from Pope Leo the IV, not as a badge of subjection; and he avoweth plainly, that in doubtfull causes the Provincial Bishops should ask counsel from the Arch-Bishop, neither should a Bishop go unto the Pope, untill he advertize and confer with the Arch-Bishop, neither needeth the Arch-Bishop await for judgment from the See of Rome, so far as he hath certain decrees of Canons, Laws and Councils. And he did forbid his Nephew Hincmar to obey the Pope's citation, when he summoned him to Rome. In an Epistle to Pope Hadrian the II, he quoteth a testimony of Pope Leo the I, that authority is derived from Peter, and the other Apostles, unto all the Bishops of the Church; for the privilege of Saint Peter is, wheresoever according to his equity justice is done, no less in Rhemes then in Rome, and no more in Rome then in Rhemes, but is alike unto all every where, according as Bishops more or less discharge their office. And he expounds these words, Thou art Peter ... as Augustine doth in Ser. 13. de verb. Dom. I will build my Church upon that firm and solid confession which thou hast confessed. Ph. Moyn. in Myster. in an Epistle to Hincmar Bishop of Laudun, saith, The seventh general Council so called by the Greeks (indeed a wicked Council) concerning Images, which some would have broken into pieces, and some would have to be worshipped, was kept not long before my time by a number of Bishops gathered together at Nice; the Acts thereof the Bishop of Rome did send into Francia, in the Reign of Charls the Great (the See Apostolick willing it to be so) a Synod was held in Germany by the convocation of the same Emperour, and there by the path-way of Scriptures, and the tradition of the Fathers, the false Council of the Greeks was confuted and utterly rejected; of whose confutation there was a good big volumn sent from Charls, by some Bishops, unto Rome, which in my young years I did read in the Palace. This testimony is of more credit then a hundred late Writers, who deny that Synod at Frankford, or that a Synod under Charls did condemn the second Synod at Nice. Thereafter in that Epistle he saith, We should believe that the motion of repentance is from God, as the Apostle saith, If God will give them repentance To have a Church is not to have a primacy in Divine things; for then all rulers of the Church should have primacy; all those wicked men rule not the Church, who seem to be within; neither is it denied but they give baptism. In the same Epistle, he rebuketh his Nephew for denying baptism unto Infants, Catol. test. ver. lib. 9.

17. At that time was much to do in the doctrine of Predestination. Gotteschalk (by birth a Frank or Belgik, as Aventin. lib. 4. Annal. Boior. calleth him) was ordained a Priest by Rigbold chorepiscopus, in the vacancy of the See of Rhemes. The now named Hincmar, in an Epistle unto the Church of Lions (which is in Biblioth. Sixt. Senen. part. 1. pag. 1053. edit. Colon.) writes that he held these five Articles: First, God, before all ages, and ere he made any thing, even from the beginning, did predestinate unto the Kingdom whom he would, and did predestinate unto destruction whom he would. 2. They who are predestinate unto destruction cannot be saved, and who are predestinate unto the Kingdom cannot perish. 3. God willeth not that all men be saved, but only them who be saved; and whereas the Apostle saith, who willeth that all men be saved, he meaneth only all them who shall be saved. 4. Christ came not to save all men, nor did he suffer for all men; but only for them who shall be saved by the mystery of his Passion. 5. Since the first man fell of his free will, none of us can use free-will to do good, but only to do evil. Remigius, Bishop of Lions, in the name of the Church of Lions, defended these five Articles, as is to be seen loc. cit. Whereupon Hincmar writ unto Pope Nicolaus (as Baron. Annal. ad An. 948 relates) against Gottschalk, and calleth these Articles the heresie of the Predestinations, which was overthrown in Affrick; and thereafter in France by authority of Pope Celestine, and by the care and vigilancy of Prosper. When Gottschalk returned from Italy, Raban Bishop of Mentz, summoned him into a Synod; and when he could not persuade him to change his mind, he did write unto Hincmar and others, and did oppugn some conclusions which he had wrested from these five Articles. Remigius writes again, shewing that all the arguments of Raban did not touch the Articles, as it is in the above-named Bibliotheca. Then Hincmar summoned Gottschalk unto a Synod of 12 Bishops, and some Priests and Abbots, in Carissiac on Isara, where four Articles were enacted against him; he was condemned of heresie and contumacy; he was whipped with rods and cast in prison. The Church of Lions, after sight of these four Articles, sent forth their censure of them, both which are in Biblioth. cit. pag. 1082. The Canons are these: First, God Almighty made man without sin, upright, with free will, and set him in Paradise, whom he would to abide in the holiness of righteousness. 2. Man using ill his free-will, did sin and fall, and became the mass of perdition of mankind; but the good and just God did chuse of the same mass of perdition, according to his foreknowledge, whom by his grace he did predestinate to life, and prepared life eternal for them. 3. But others whom in the judgement of righteousness, he left in the mass of perdition, he foreknew them to perish, but he did not predestinate that they should perish; yet because he is just, he did predestinate everlasting punishment unto them; and therefore we say, there is but one predestination of God, which concerneth the gift of grace or the rendring of righteousness. Can. II. In the first man we have lost the freedom of will, which we have received by Christ; and we have free will unto good, being prevented and helped by grace; and we have free will unto evil, being forsaken of grace; and we have free-will, because it is freed by grace, and by grace healed from corruption. Can. III. God will have all men, without exception, to be saved, although all men be not saved; and that some are saved, it is the gift of him who saveth; and that some perish, it is the merit of them who perish. Can. IV. Our Lord Jesus Christ, as there was not, is, nor shall be any man, whose nature is not assumed in him; so there was, is, and shall be no man for whom he did not die, although all be not redeemed by the mystery of his Passion; it concerneth not the greatness and copiousness of the price, but it concerneth the part of unbelievers, and them who beleeve not with that faith which worketh by love; for the cup of man's salvation, which was made through human infirmity and divine vertue, hath in it self that it may be profitable unto all; but if it be not drunken, it cureth not. Followeth the sum of the censure of the Church of Lions: in the first part of the first Canon is no mention of the grace of God (without which no rational creature ever could, or now can, or shall be able to be, or abide, or persist in righteousness and holiness) as if man had been so set in Paradise, that by his free will only he could have continued in holiness, according to the Pelagian error. In the second part they took it ill, that although it be said, The elect are saved by the grace of God, and life eternal is prepared for those Elect; yet it is said, that God hath chosen those Elect, according to his foreknowledge, without mention of grace; as if it were grace that the Elect attain life; and grace that life is prepared

pared for them; and it were not grace, but foreknowledge that they are chosen, which is manifestly contrary to the Catholick faith; because God in chusing them whom he hath predestinate, foreknew not their merits so, as that therefore he hath chosen them, or because he fore-saw that of themselves they would be good; but the very election, that of the mass of perdition they were made the vessels of mercy, without any good merit; it was only grace by which they were severed from the children of perdition; for the Apostle diligently commends unto us this election not of merits but of grace, whereby not the good works of any were foreknown, but only divine mercy was prepared. Rom. 9, For the children being yet not born, nor having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to the election might stand, not of works, but of him who calleth; and 2 Tim. 1. according to his own purpose and grace which was given unto us in Christ . . . In the third part they do note that the truth is denied, and also confirmed by the testimony even of them who deny it; while they say, that God in his just judgement hath forsaken others, that is, the reprobates in the mass of perdition; and that he did not predestinate, but only foreknew that they would perish: for how foreknew he only, and did not predestinate that which by their own confession he did decree in just judgement? Why dare man accept in part, and deny in part the true and perfect predestination of the just judgement of God, whereby he, in his eternal counsel, did fore-ordain the righteous unto life, and the unrighteous unto punishment? How hath he foreknown only, and not also fore-ordained what by their confession he hath discerned in just judgement? As if the Almighty God hath both fore-known and fore-ordained, what in his just judgment he was to do unto the elect; but did foresee and not fore-ordain, what he was to do in the same just judgment concerning the reprobate; seeing on both sides is the same judgement and the same righteousness, whereby reward is given unto the righteous, and punishment unto the unrighteous; for if this predestination were violent or unjust or prejudicial unto any, it should no way be beleevd of him, in whom is no iniquity. And seeing most manifestly it is not violent, (because it compelleth no man to be evil,) nor unjust (because it punisheth them only, which through their own fault continue in evil,) nor prejudicial (because it pre-judgeth not any, as if through his sentence, and not their own merit, they do perish;) what is blamed where only equity and righteousness is found? Truly that doth Divine predestination towards men, which Divine prescience also doth; he foreknew that they would be evil, but he did not by his fore-knowledge compel them to be evil; he did predestinate them to be punished who did continue in evil, nor yet did he compel them by that predestination, that they were or did continue evil. And this is his equity, that who willingly continue in evil, should be unwillingly punished These things have we said, to the end, that if any thing be spoken unadvisedly upon occasion of obscure doctrine, or a perplexed question, it should not be maintained contentiously, or by synodical authority; but rather it may be as soon amended by acknowledging Divine truth. Of Can. 11. they complain, that it is defined confusedly, obscurely, and too briefly; and they oppose six Aphorisms out of an Epistle of Pope Celestine, unto the Bishops of France; and two out of the Council at Arausican: which are; First, In the transgression of Adam all men have lost natural power and innocency, and no man can by his free-will arise out of the depth of that ruine, unless the grace of our mercifull God lift us up. 2. No man useth well his free-will but by Christ. 3. All the indeavours, all the works and merits of the Saints should be referred unto the praise and glory of God, because no man can please him otherwise, but in so far as he hath given.

ven. 4. God worketh so in the hearts of men and in free-will, that every holy thought, godly purpose, and each motion of good will is from God; because by him we can do any good, and without him we can do nothing.

5. We profess that God is the author of all purposes and of all virtues, whereby from the beginning of faith we go unto God; and we doubt not but all the merits of man are preveened by his grace, by whom it is that we begin to will or to do any good; by which help and mercy of God free-will is not taken away, but made free; that of darkened, it becomes light; of wicked, upright; of fainting, heal; and of unwise, provident; for so great is the goodness of God toward all men, that he would have those things to be our merits, which are his gifts; and he will give everlasting reward, according to those things which he hath given.

6. We confess that the grace and help of God is given even to every act, and it is given not according to our merits, that it may be meer grace; that is, given freely, through his mercy, who saith, I will shew mercy on whom I will shew mercy.

7. We confess free-will, although it hath need of Divine help.

8. The liberty of will being weakned in the first man, cannot be repaired but by grace.

9. The liberty of will then is free, when it serveth not sin; for it was given such from God unto the first man, which being lost, cannot be restored, but by him who could give it; and therefore Truth saith, if the Son make you free, you shall be free indeed. The censure followeth; if it be said, we have lost the freedom of will in the first man; as if after the transgression of the first man no free-will remain in men, it is not agreeable unto truth; because if there be no free-will of mankind, how shall God judge the World? But if it be therefore said, because through the merit of his transgression we have lost the vertue of free-will, as it was made in the first man; take heed lest that which follows concerning the lost liberty of that will, which we have received by Christ our Lord, be so said, as if since we are regenerate by Christ, we have received such a condition and vertue of free-will, that henceforth we may be such in this present life, as that man was before sin; that as he was living without all sin, so the regenerate in Christ may live in this world without sin; which surely belongeth not unto the estate of this present life, but unto the blessedness of eternal life. But if it be said only, that for the beginning of grace which we attain by regeneration, we may seem to receive the liberty of will, which we lost in Adam, although nevertheless the fulness and perfection thereof, is to be expected in the life to come; why is the most clear truth darkned with so great ambiguity and confusion of words? Now how great absurdity is in that which followeth, And we have free-will unto good being prevented and helped as if after we are regenerate by the grace of Christ, then we begin to have as free-will unto good, so free-will unto evil; as if by that regeneration, when we are preveened and helped by grace, we have free-will unto good; and when we are deserted of the same grace, we have free-will unto evil. What reason or consequence of meaning can be here? Doth the grace of that regeneration work this in us, that from thence we get free-will as unto good, so unto evil? Further, if when we are renewed in baptism, we receive in Christ the liberty of will that was so lost in Adam, doth then only the grace of God preveene and help us? Or doth the same grace, as once it helped us that we should be free unto good; so leave us once, that we are made free unto evil? What is this so obscure, and (almost) no preaching of grace? Had it not been better to have made use of those sentences of the fore-named Fathers, which define this matter fully and clearly? Or that this definition had been framed in their words, and plainly been declared, how this grace of God preveineth and helpeth us, that is, whether once so great grace is given unto us in baptism, which may be sufficient for

for the whole time of our life, or whether it should be implored and gotten daily; and whether we have need of it for some good things, or for all? None of these things appear here; and therefore it had been better to have been silent, then to speak so fondly of so great a matter. For we have need of the grace of God not only for a good work, as it is said in this chapter; but also for the very beginning of faith, without which grace we cannot come unto the Sacrament of regeneration; we have need of grace for all and every good thing through every day; we have need of it to stir up in us a good will; we have need of grace to speak good and wholsom things; we have need of grace for all good waies of good works. Concerning Can. III. First they exhort to keep peace and unity, and to shun contention: Then they say, Behold one may think and say (as formerly it hath been thought and said) the Apostle said not generally, and (as they have added) without exception, who will have all men to be saved; but especially concerning them of whom he had said before, For all men, for Kings, and for them which are in authority; that when he saith All, he understands all sorts of men, even of all condition, sex, order. What unconsequent or contrariety unto the truth, is in this exposition? Likewise one may say (as it is found to be said by some Ancients) that the Apostle speaks of whole mankind; what ill or danger hath this exposition? For he who thinks so, doth not think that any man doth resist and go against the will of God, whereby he willeth all men to be saved; that God cannot do what he willeth; and both the one and the other speaking diversly, yet do agree faithfully and unanimously, that whether the Apostle spoke so or so, yet no man is saved but by the gracious mercy of God, and none is suffered to perish but in his just judgment. Certainly this is manifest in that question, that although God will have all men generally and indefinitely to be saved; yet in the hearts of some, through the bountifulness of mercy, he worketh the same in his will, that both they have a will to be saved, and they are saved (to whom the Apostle saith, With fear and trembling work forth your salvation; for it is God who worketh in you both to will and to do, according to his good pleasure;) but in the hearts of others, through the severity of his hid and just judgement, he worketh not this saving will, but leaveth them to their own will; that because they would not beleeve, they should be damned in just punishment. And this may be said, indeed, of them which have heard the word of the Gospel, but through the hardness of their own unbelief would not receive it. But what shall be said of so great a multitude of the wicked, who have been from the beginning of the world, untill the coming of Christ? And them who cannot be denied to be as yet in the utmost parts of the earth, unto whom never a Preacher is come; who could no way beleeve in him of whom they have not heard; nor receive a Preacher, seeing none hath been sent unto them. Shall such therefore be damned, because they have not beleeved, who never could hear? And nevertheless they shall be condemned for their other sins, and especially for original sin, wherein all have sinned; for it is not written in vain, Pour out thy wrath upon the Nations which know thee not; and the Apostle saith, Rendering vengeance in flaming fire on them who know not God. If one should ask of those, What hath the will of God done in them, who willeth all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth? What shall we answer? Will not a godly and prudent man chuse rather to be silent? Or certainly say with the Prophet and Apostle, Thy judgments are a great deep, and, O the depth of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how incomprehensible are his waies! Concerning Can. IV. IV. they say, in this new question three questions are propounded: First, that it is said, No man was, is, or shall be, whose nature is not assumed in Christ.

Of this question we hold thus, That the assuming of man's nature by Christ, was not of necessity of beginning, [ex necessitate incipiendi] but was only of his power and grace; so his flesh descendeth thorow all generations; so he is truly born very man of them, that what he pleased by shewing mercy, and healing and redeeming, he might thereof assume and reject what he pleased, or not. So in that unspeakable mystery of his incarnation, he mercifully did assume his elect, whom he came to redeem justifie and save; and whom he did judge unworthy of that mercy and redemption, he left them out of that marvellous susception. Let us therefore acknowledge truly that the susception of human nature in Christ, hath left unbelievers void of this mercy, and that he hath bestowed it only on them, that they have common nature with Christ, who receive him, and are renewed by his Spirit, by whom he was conceived. Away therefore with that superfluity, whereby it is said and defined, that there was, is, or shall be no man, whose nature he hath not assumed. 2. It is affirmed, No man was, is, or shall be, for whom Christ hath not suffered. Of which question what other can we answer, but that first we demand them who have defined this, and admonish them to weigh vigilantly and faithfully, lest perhaps by little considering what they should say, they say and write such things against the faith and their own conscience; for to omit those who are now, or shall be till the end of the world, among whom shall be the Antichrist, certainly of that innumerable multitude of the wicked, which have been from the beginning, untill the coming of Christ, and being dead in their wickedness are condemned in everlasting pains; we think not that they who have written this, do beleve that Christ hath suffered for them which are dead in their wickedness, and now condemned in everlasting judgment; for if it be beleevd that he hath suffered for them; why may it not also be beleevd; that he hath suffered for the Devil and his Angels? Therefore, as it cannot be said that Christ Jesus hath suffered for those wicked and damned Angels; so far be it, that we should believe that he hath suffered for those wicked and damned men But of those who as yet continue in their unbelief and wickedness shall perish, if good men who have defined these things could demonstrate unto us, by sure and cleat testimonies, from the authority of the Holy Scriptures, what the Lord hath suffered for those, we should also beleve the same; and if that they cannot, let them not contend now for that which they read not; let them be ashamed to determine what they cannot find to be decreed by any Council of the holy Fathers, or determination of Ecclesiastical doctrine; or if they find anything written by the ancient Doctours, whereby occasion of such interpretation may be given, yet saving the reverence due unto them, let them rather contain themselves, and submit unto Divine authority. 3. They say, All the unbelievers are not redeemed by the mystery of Christ's blood; so neither are the beleivers redeemed, who have not faith which worketh by love. Why should we speak of this question, seeing it is manifest from what is said, that no redemption in Christ is unto any unbelievers; and all beleivers who come truly unto faith and grace of regeneration, receive their true redemption and true regeneration; because they cannot be truly regenerate, unless it be truly certain that they are redeemed from the power of the Devil and bondage of sin; neither can they be truly redeemed, unless they be cleansed in the laver of mercy, and made free from the guilt of sin, and from the power of the Prince of this world; unless (which is most absurd in this definition) it be said, that our Lord Jesus Christ hath suffered even for the wicked who perish in their sins; and it be affirmed, that every beleever is not truly redeemed by the mystery of His passion, and renewed in his baptism. Hincmar, Bishop of Rhemes, could not take this censure sure patiently, but writ Epistles unto several Bishops in defence of his opinions: and Remigius sent abroad his censures of them, as Vsser. in histor. Gotzescal. cap. 8. hath at length. John Scot did follow Hincmar, and although in other things he had purchased a name; yet because here he undertook a wrong cause, Florus a Deacon of Lyons, and Prudentius Bishop of Tricastin did not spare him; as is at large loc. cit. cap. 9. & 10. & 11. I will shortly shew their testimonies, whereby summarily their doctrine may be known. Florus saith, Whereas he [John] saith, that man sinning hath lost liberty, but not the power and vigour of the liberty, he saith not rightly; for he hath not kept in part, and lost in part, the gift of liberty; but as he hath lost the power and vigour of liberty, so he hath lost liberty it self; so that now he is not free unto good from which he hath fallen, he continueth free unto evil; because as of his free-will he forsook good, so by free-will he cleaveth unto evil. Man therefore after that damnation hath free-will, whereby he may incline and doth incline unto evil through his will; he hath free-will, whereby it is possible that he may arise unto good; but that he ariseth unto good, it is not of his own vertue, but of the compassionating grace of God; for he who is heavily diseased, may possibly receive health; but that he may receive health, he hath need of a medicament; and he who is dead, it may be said, that possibly he may rise and live, yet not by his own vertue, but by the power of God; so the free-will of man being wounded and dead, may be healed, but by the grace of God shewing mercy. Again John saith, if any cause precede will (that is, nature) to think good or evil, it is not nature: where he speaks manifestly against truth; for if no cause precede the will of man to think or do good, whence is in man a good will, that is, a good affection to think or do any good? For man hath not of himself a good will--- not doth he any good--- but he hath it from him of whom the Apostle speaks unto believers, It is God who worketh in us both to will, and to do according to his good will: He by his mercy preventeth the will of man; as the Psalmist saith, My God, his mercy shall prevent me: He inspires into man the grace of thinking well; as the Apostle saith, Not that we are able to think a good thought as of our selves, but our sufficiency is from God. Therefore, He is the cause of good will in us; He is the cause of good desires, and of perfecting; He is unto us the cause of mercy and grace, by which we are able not only to do well and to perfect, but also to think well. And not only doth he these things in his elect in this life, but also before the foundation of the world, he hath predestinated them by his grace, that they should be holy and blameless before him, as the Apostle witnesseth. Seeing therefore so great and such a cause, which is the cause of all good things both in making and rewarding his creatures, is unto us the best and eternal cause of good will; preventing us by grace, that we may will well, and do well; how saith this man, that no cause precedes our will and works? Or if any cause precede them, that cause is not nature? Seeing the Almighty God (who is the cause of our good will) is the highest and best nature.... But far be it to say, that this highest and best cause precedes our will to think or do evil; and nevertheless a cause precedes, not efficient, but deficient; that is, the forsaking of the chief good, and covering inferior things; when the soul falleth from the love of God, and coveteth inferior things.... But albeit God is not the cause of our ill will, nor any subsisting nature, but the affection of the reasonable creature, falling from the love of the Creator; yet we may not say, that he is not the just revenger of our wicked thoughts, or eternal Predestinator of just judgment and vengeance; which this fellow would, by such ambiguities, make void--- Again this man saith, There is no predestination of God, but of them who are prepared for everlasting bleſſedneſs. We know ſurely, that this is an error of this age : It is to be marked in the writings of the Prophets, that the word predeſtination is not expreſſly mentioned; yet becauſe things concerning both predeſtinations appear and are declared moſt openly, the Apoſtle moſt confidently uſeth their teſtimonies for confirming this doctrine, and hath given them to be ſo underſtood by the Church, teaching us by his authority and example; and informing us, that we ſhould not contentiouſly and idly ſtrive for the word predeſtination in the Oracles of the holy Prophets; but by godly and peaceable underſtanding, whereſoever the matter is manifeſtly declared, we ſhould, without doubting, acknowledge and maintain the predeſtination of God. And if it be asked, How ſhall the World be judged righteouſly, whom the neceſſity of predeſtination forceth to periſh? Far be it that any of us ſhould ſay it; becauſe it is moſt open blaſphemy, that God by his predeſtination forceth any man to ſin, and to periſh by ſin. But by the judgment of predeſtination, whom continuing in their ſins he hath decreed to puniſh, he rather calleth them from their ſins, and ſtirreth in them (by hearing) a whoſom terrour, that they fearing may be amended, and amending ſhould not be damned. It is alſo moſt falſe that the fellow affirmeth, that there is no predeſtination of puniſhment; for if puniſhment were not predeſtinate for the Devil and his Angels, and all the wicked that are to be puniſhed with them, Truth would not ſay, Go into everlaſting fire prepared for the Devil and his Angels. And where he ſaith, Predeſtination is alwaies to be underſtood of the gifts of God's bounty, it is alſo falſe; for it is found and truly underſtood of the judgments of juſt damnation: Of which damned (through their own deſerving, and the juſt judgment of God) when this man ſaith, Cap. 14. § 4. that they are juſtly forſaken, in the damned maſs, according to the merit of original ſin; and they are ſuffered to live wickedly, and are at laſt to be condemned with everlaſting fire; even unwillingly, and contradicting himſelf, he ſaith no other thing, but that in Divine judgment they are predeſtinate unto everlaſting life; for if all that maſs be condemned, certainly it is condemned in the juſt judgment of God, and without doubt unto everlaſting perdition and puniſhment. And it is a wonder how he ſaith Cap. 14. That God hath predeſtinate pain unto ſinners, and hath not predeſtinate ſinners unto pain; for when he predeſtinated pain for them, he was not ignorant who were to be puniſhed. And when he confeſſeth ſaying, The foreknown; if God foreknew certainly who were to be puniſhed with theſe torments, what elſe did he, when he prepared moſt certain pain for every one of them, but predeſtinated them certainly for pain? For ſurely theſe only ſhall ſuffer, whom he hath foreknown to ſuffer; and what is it, that by unchangeable preſcience he hath foreknown them for pain? It was not to be feared, that what he foreknew to be juſtly, he hath not predeſtinated to do it juſtly. There is indeed another condition of mens laws, who ſo ordain certain puniſhments unto delinquents, that nevertheless they know not thoſe which do ſin thus, or which ſhall be tormented in theſe puniſhments; and therefore they may appoint and prepare puniſhments for ſinners, and know not that the puniſhments are juſt; and yet not appoint for puniſhments the ſinners, whom they know not at all; but if they knew certainly the perſons which are worthy of thoſe puniſhments, they might juſtly ordain them for the pain, as they appoint the pain for delinquents; as in the execution of judgment, whom they find guilty of capital crimes, they both rehearſe unto them the death which is appointed by the Law, and by open ſentence they adjudge them unto death; which is done by a certain knowledge of judgment, that they dare appoint as puniſhment for ſinners, ſo ſinners for puniſhments. Seeing then both theſe are rightly and juſtly done in the Courts of men, being informed and directed according to certain knowledge, that they discern justly and irreprovably pain for sinners, and sinners for pain; and yet not any of those guilty persons is compelled unto sin by the Laws nor Judges, but only because he who hath sinned is justly punished; how much rather may we beleve certainly, that this is done in Divine judgment, that (because by eternal knowledge he knows the pain which in justice is due for sinners, and the sinners to whom it is due) seeing he causeth none to sin, he predestinates most justly both punishments (which he knows to be most just) for sinners; and sinners (who are never unknown unto him, but most certainly known by eternal verity.) for everlasting punishment. So and more writeth Florus. And the judgment of Prudentius is in the abovenamed history, Vsser. cap. 11; where among other things he shews, that when Æneas (who had been a member of the Carisiac Synod) was to be ordained Bishop of Paris; Prudentius being called unto his ordination, did excuse himself by Letter, and sent unto Wenilo, Metropolitan of Senonen, four articles; which if the elect Bishop would not subscribe, he did protest that he would no way consent unto his ordination. These Articles are: First, That he confesse, that as free-will is lost in Adam by merit of disobedience; so it is restored unto us by our Lord Jesus Christ, and freed (now in hope, but afterwards really, as the Apostle saith, We are saved by hope) that nevertheless we have alwaies need of the grace of the Almighty God for every good work; whether for thinking, or beginning, or working, or perseverantly perfecting; and that without that grace we can no way either think or will, or do any good. 2. That he beleve and confesse, that in the most high and secret purpose of God, some are by the gracious mercy of God, before all ages, predestinated for life; and some, by his unsearchable righteousness, are predestinated for pain; to wit, that whether in them which shall be saved or condemned, he hath predestinated that which he foreknew he would do in judging; as the Prophet saith, Qui fecit, que futura sunt, Esa. 45. (juxta LXX Interp.) 3. That he beleve and confesse, with all the Catholicks, that the blood of Jesus Christ was shed for all men beleiving in him through the world; and not for them which have not beleived in him; nor will ever beleve; as the Lord himself saith, Matth. 20. The Son of man came... to give his soul in redemption for many. 4. That he beleve and confesse, that the Almighty God saveth whom he willeth; and that none at all can be saved, but whom he will save; and that all are saved, whom he will save; and therefore it is not at all his will those be saved, whosoever are not saved; as the Prophet saith, whatsoever the Lord willeth, he doth that both in Heaven and on Earth. And (saith Prudent.) although there be some other things, wherein he hath satisfied and subscribed, in which (being condemned in Pelagius) the Church hath universally consented; yet these being (against him and his followers) cleared from his froward expositions, by the Apostolical See, at the instance of the blessed Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage; and of Augustine with other 214 Bishops; and being published unto all the World, by many both Epistles and Books, all the Church to day rejoiceth in, confesseth, preacheth, holdeth, and shall hold. This Epistle of Prudentius, is in the 2 tome of the French Councils; and by it we may see not only his mind, but the universal doctrine of all the Church in all the World, as he affirmeth. Although Histories do not expresse whether Æneas did subscribe these Articles, yet it may be gathered from the 99 Epistle of Lupus Ferariensis, where he commends this Æneas; and saith, that Prudentius, with the other Bishops, did confirm his ordination. By authority of Lotharius a Synod was held, An. 855. at Valentia; the Canons thereof follow hereafter: For the present I add the words of Baronius concerning it generally, saying, The Bishops thought good to bring no other thing into the Church, then what the most holy Fathers and faithfull Teachers of the Church had, in all sincerity, taught formerly in Africa, in the Council at Carthage; and in France, in the Council at Arasiscap, whereunto we should cleave in all points; to wit, that the godly are saved no other way, but by the grace of God; and the wicked are condemned for their own iniquity. And that the wicked do not perish, because (as some say) they could not be good, but because they would not. Then he sheweth that the Acts of this Synod were sent unto Hincmar; and that he did by writing condemn these errors. But Vsser taxeth Baronius, that he hath written of this matter slenderly, and from the writings of Hincmar, and from Acts of Synods convinceth him; especially he declareth, from a book of the Church of Lions, that there was diversity of opinions among them of Lions, concerning the fifth Canon of this Synod, which (in the end of that book) thinks the greatest difference between the Elect and the Reprobates to be, that in the Reprobates remaineth the guiltiness of the first transgression, which is taken from the Elect, by the blood of Christ. Also he sheweth, that in the year 856, in the moneth of August, Charls the Bald did call a Synod at Bonoile (by Paris); and another in September at Nielph, where he gave unto Hincmar the Articles of the Synod at Valentia; and what he had received from others in favour of Gotteschalk, that Hincmar should answer unto them; and that after three years, Hincmar did return a great book of God's predestination, and of man's free-will; as Flodoard sheweth, Hist. lib. 3. cap. 13; and that the adverse party was not satisfied by that great volume; neither was the authority of the Valentian Synod lessned; and therefore An. 859, Charls calleth another Synod in Audemanturmo Lingonum, where for the instruction of God's people, the Canons of the Valentian Synod were voiced and confirmed again, and proclaimed; only in the fifth Canon they express not the four Articles (because they perceive, Hincmar was offended by so express condemning them, as if they thereby had neglected the limits and law of charity) and they did add the name of John Scot unto the nineteen Articles. This Synod is called Lingonenis in Concil. Gall. tom. 3. After 14 daies was a more frequent Synod of twelve Provinces at Saponaria, a Village of the City of Tullen, where was King Charls, and his Nephews Lotharius and Charls, sons of the Emperour Lotharius; there the Canons of the former Synod, and the Carisiac Articles were read again and again; great contention was between Remigius and Hincmar, with their followers (the one pleading for, and the other against the Articles of Gotteschalk;) but (as Hincmar writeth in an Epistle Dedicatory unto Charls the Bald) the stir was calmed by the wisdom of the Arch-Bishop Remigius, exhorting them all to bring unto the next synod the books of the Catholick Doctours; and as they shall find them agreeing unto the Apostolical and Catholick doctrine, all should hold together unanimously. It appeareth in the Acts of this Synod, that it was so soon closed, because of the murmurs in the country. All this time Gotteschalk was still in Prison in the Monastery of Hautvillier, whence he sent forth first a short confession, and then a larger one, confirmed by testimonies of Scripture, and of the ancient Doctours. In the end of the latter, he craved that there might be a free Synod, wherein truth might be made known unto all, and errors altogether taken away; and he lamenteth that for baseness of his person truth is despised, and his adversaries follow not charity, and refuse verity, only that they may seem victorious. Now of all that I have read concerning his Confessions, and the writings of both parties, I gather that at that time the greatest controversie was, concerning the predestination of the wicked unto punishment, howbeit there was also some difference concerning free will, and the efficient cause of conversion, or of faith and good works. And because Hincmar in his Epistle unto Pope Nicolaus, and Semipelagians make mention of Hereticks, whom they call Prædestinati or Prædestinatiani; here I add concerning that name, that the first who mentioneth it, was he who writ the continuation of Ierom's Chronicle; for he (about the 24 year of Arcadius and Honorius) writeth, saying, At this time began the heresie of Prædestinati, which had the beginning from Augustine. So it is expressly (saith Vsser in Hist. Gottes. cap. 2.) in two old manuscripts, one in the King's Bibliothéke, and another in the Benedictines at Cambridge; although in the Printed books it is not said, from Augustine; but, from the books of Augustine, being ill understood. And certainly these words of Hincmar are frivolous, since Pope Celestine did not write against such an heresie, but against the Pelagians, as is clear in his Epistles unto Augustine, and he doth approve the doctrine of Augustine, and Prosper in his Epistle unto Augustine (which, and the Epistles of Celestine, are amongst the Epistles of Augustine) writeth, saying, Many of the servants of Christ, which are in the City Massilies, think that in the writings of your Holiness against the Pelagian Hereticks, whatsoever you have disputed concerning the calling of the Elect according to the purpose of God, is contrary unto the opinion of the Fathers, and the mind of the Church. But it is sure, that the Massilians were Semipelagians: And Arnobius on Psal. 108. hath this note, Mark (saith he) that it was of his will, that he would not; Because of the heresie, which saith, God hath predestinated some unto blessing, and others unto damnation. In a word, whosoever pleaseth to search for this heresie, he cannot find that ever there was such an one; but that the Pelagians or Semipelagians, have used the name to discredit the sound doctrine of Augustine; and they seeing his books to be in high esteem, and authority in the Church, were afraid to put it upon him; and they did wrest some conclusions out of his books, which they did brand with the odious name of such an heresie.

17. At this time was Published an Exegesis or Commentary, on thirteen Epistles of the Apostle Paul, which was lately Printed at Rome, under the name of Remigius Rheniensis, which lived about the year 540, a Jesuit Baptista Villapand gave out, that he had found it at Saint Cecilia in Rome, and did publish it as a rich treasure lying so long time in a manuscript. Andr. Rivet. in Critic. sacr. lib. 4. cap. 27. sheweth the vanity of the Jesuit, seeing the same book was Printed above 30 years before that, at Paris, two several times; and in the Book is mention of Gregory and Beda. I add another reason; that Exegesis on 2 Thess. 2. at these words, Except there come a falling away first---, All Kingdoms shall fall away from the Roman Empire; and the man of sin, to wit, the Antichrist, who although he is a man, yet shall he be the fountain of all sins: Be revealed and made manifest, [and the son of perdition] i.e. a son of the Devil, not by nature, but by imitation; and is called perdition, because perdition shall come by him [He shall sit in the Temple of God, shewing himself as if he were God.] This may be understood two waies. And here hath first that opinion, that Antichrist shall be born at Babylon of the Tribe of Dan, &c. and then he addeth, Or also, he shall sit in the Temple of God, i.e. in the Church, shewing himself as if he were God; for as the fulness of God-head did rest in Christ; so in that man who is called Antichrist, because he is contrary unto Christ, the fulness of all wickedness and iniquity shall dwell; because in him shall be the head of all wickedness, the Devil, who is the King above all the children of pride. In these words the Apostle demonstrates unto the Thessalonians, that the Lord shall not come to judgment, untill there be a defection of the Roman Empire [Note] which now we see fulfilled and Antichrist appearing in the World, who shall kill the Martyrs of Christ. So far there. It is true, Chrysostom and others had long before expounded that Text in the same manner, but none did apply it in that manner; neither could it be applied before that time, seeing the Empire of Rome, though sometimes more weakned than at other times, yet was never so low before the daies of Lotharius; then every Nation had their own King, and Lotharius had a part of France, and a part of Italy; and his Successour had no more but a part of Italy. As for the appearing of Antichrist, we have heard before, in Seet. 14. what Gunther and Thiertgaud writ unto Pope Nicolaus; and in Seet. 15. what Luithpert writ unto King Lewis, both which agree with this exposition and application. Hence it followeth, that this Commentary could not be written before this time. Next consider for what cause the Jesuit, and after him others, do commend this Commentary; to wit, thereby they would prove the fancy of Transubstantiation to have been so old; for on 1 Cor. 10. it is said, The Bread which we break, is it not the Communion of the Body of Christ? Certainly, first it is consecrate and blessed by the Priests and the Holy Ghost, and then broken; and now although it seem [videatur, or, is seen] to be Bread, in verity it is the body of Christ; of which Bread whosoever communicates, he eats the body of Christ. And again it is said there, That Bread doth pass [transit] into the body of Christ, neither are they two bodies, but one body. Because the explication of this testimony, may serve for clearing many other such testimonies, I will set before you the words preceding and following, and then confer all together: First, a little from the beginning of that Chap it is said, He saith not, The Rock did signifie Christ; but as if it had been in truth, The Rock was Christ, though certainly it was not so by substance, but by signification: Likewise, speaking of the two sons of Abraham, he saith not, These signifie the two Testaments; but, These are the two Testaments: Christ then, in respect of firmness, is the Rock, not by substance; and the water which did flow out of the Rock, signifieth the doctrine of Christ, and the grace of the Holy Ghost; of which in the Gospel, Who thirsts let him come to me and drink, &c. It is also called a spiritual and following Rock, because it signifieth spiritually Christ, who followed them; of which spiritual Rock, following them, they did drink; because when human help failed them, Christ was at hand giving help; by whose power (who is the Word of God the Father) they were delivered out of the Land of Ægypt, and brought into the Land of Promise. So far there. And in the other place it is written thus, The Cup is called Communication, i. e. partaking, because all do communicate of it, and receive a part of the blood of Christ, which it containeth in it: [And the Bread which we break] on the Altar [is it not a partaking of the Body of Christ?] Certainly, first it is consecrate and blessed by the Priests and Holy Ghost, and then it is broken; and now although it seem [videatur, or, it is seen] to be bread, in verity it is the body of Christ; of which bread whosoever communiceth, they eat the body of Christ; [because one Bread] to wit, of Christ; [and one Body] to wit, of Christ, [we many are] who eat that Bread; the flesh which the Word of God the Father did assume in the Virgins womb, in the unity of person; and the bread which is consecrate in the Church, are one body of Christ; for as that flesh is the body of Christ, so that bread doth pass (transit) into the body of Christ; neither are they two bodies, but one body, for the fullness of the God-head which was in him, filleth also that bread; and the same God-head of the Word, which filleth Heaven and Earth, and all things therein, the same filleth the body of Christ, which

which is sanctified by many Priests through all the World, and maketh it to be one body of Christ; and as that bread and blood do pass into the body of Christ, so all which in the Church do eat worthily, are the one body of Christ; as he himself saith, He who eats my flesh, and drinketh my blood, abides in me, and I in him. Nevertheless that flesh which he did assume, and that bread, and all the Church, do not make three bodies, but one body; and as they which do communicate of the body and blood of the Lord, are made one body with him; so they which do wittingly communicate of things offered unto Idols, are one body with the Divil. And in the next Chap. he saith, Christ having ended the solemnities of the old Pasover . . . immediately he passeth unto the new Pasover, which he left unto his Church to be frequented (or frequently observed) in remembrance of his Passion and our redemption: He did break the bread, which he gave unto his Disciples, to shew the breaking of his Body, and his Passion, was not to be without his own will; as he had said, I have power to lay down my life, [Take ye, eat ye, this is my body which shall be delivered for you.] As the flesh of Christ which he did assume in the Virgins womb, is his true body, and was killed for our salvation; so the bread which Christ gave unto his Disciples, and unto all them which are predestinated for eternal life, and which the Priests do consecrate in the Church daily, with the vertue of the God-head which filleth that bread, is the true body of Christ; neither are they two bodies, that flesh which he did assume, and that bread, but they make one true body of Christ: In so far, that when the Bread is broken and eaten, Christ is sacrificed and eaten, and yet he abideth whole and alive; and as that Body which he did lay on the Cross was offered for our salvation and redemption; so daily that bread is offered unto God for our salvation and redemption; which although it is seen to be bread, is the body of Christ; for our Lord and Redeemer providing for our frailty, because he knew that we are frail unto sin, did deliver unto us this Sacrament; that because he cannot now die, and we do sin daily, we might have a true sacrifice, by which we may be expiated: Therefore because they make one body, and are offered for our redemption; he said, This is my body which shall be delivered for you; and he did add, [Do this] that is, sanctifie this body, [into my remembrance] that is, of my Passion, and of your Redemption, because I have redeemed you with my blood: The Lord leaving this wholsom Sacrament, unto all beleivers, that he might fasten this into their hearts and memory, did after the manner of a man, who approaching unto death, leaveth some precious gift unto a certain friend, saying; Have this with all diligence by thee, in remembrance of me, that when thou seest it, thou mayest remember me: Which friend receiving that gift of his most dear friend, if he did love him with all his heart, cannot but condole and be sad for the death of his friend, whensoever he beholdeth that gift left by his friend: Likewise we, how oft soever we come to consecrate or receive the Sacrament of that eternal gift, which the Lord, being to suffer, left unto us to be kept in remembrance of him, should come with fear and compunction of heart, and with all reverence, calling to mind with how great love he did love us, which did offer himself for us, that he might redeem us. [Likewise and the Cup] understand, he gave unto them [after he had supped, saying, This Cup is the new Testament in my blood] i.e. the Cup which I give unto you, signifieth the new Testament; as Fulgentius, or it confirms the new Testament in my blood, or by my blood. Here are all the words of that book, which concern the change or sacrifice in the Sacrament; and we see mention of a change, and a real change, and a real sacrifice; but no word of a change of a substance of the bread, which still remaineth; and is broken, after consecration, in remembrance of Christ's Passion, and of our redemption: And observe these words, The bread which Christ gave unto his Disciples, and unto all which are predestinated for life eternal, and which the Priests do consecrate daily with power of the God-head, which filleth that bread, is the true body of Christ; neither are they two bodies, the flesh which he did assume, and that bread; but they make one true body of Christ. Now what bread is that which he giveth unto all them which are predestinated for life, but even which he did assume in the unity of his person in the Virgins womb? And the Elementary bread is no more said to be his body, than it is said, The Rock was Christ; and it is his body, as all which do eat worthily, are his body, or made one body with him; and that is not by Transubstantiation, although really, but in a mystery or spiritual manner; albeit also the manner of the union between the Bread and Christ's body, and between Beleevers and Christ's body, be different in the special kind of mystery: The bread doth pass into the body of Christ really in the own manner, not by change of substance, but of use, signification, office and condition. And that bread is the very sacrifice of Christ in remembrance, as the gift which one friend leaveth unto another in remembrance of his love; so that whensoever we do sin, we may have daily in remembrance that true sacrifice, whereby we may be expiated. And the consecrating of that bread is the sacrifice of Christ, as the eating of the Lamb was the Pasover; the one in remembrance of their ancient deliverance out of Ægypt; and the other in remembrance of Christ's Passion, and of our Redemption. And that bread is the body of Christ, so that after the blessing (or consecration) it is seen to be bread, and is broken and eaten. These all are spoken there of that bread; and therefore according to that testimony, the bread is not transubstantiated, but is a remembrance of Christ's Passion and sacrifice, if we will speak properly. And moreover, at that time, all Beleevers did communicate and take part of the Cup; for which cause it is said there, the Cup is called the communication of Christ's blood. When the whole testimony is considered, it serveth more against the Romish Church now, than for them. But to return to the Authour of the book, it was Printed at Paris under the name of Haymo, Bishop of Halberstad; but (as the learned Antiquary Bishop Usher, hath observed in Hystor. Gottesc.) neither is it his; for though the Argument before every Epistle, be said to be Haymo's; yet before none of them is it said, that the Exegesis is his: And I add another reason, the opinions of Haymo are different from that Exegesis; I will name but one, Haymo on the Revel. lib. 1. near the end, saith, The Pillars of the Temple are not only they who are more perfect; as Paul saith, Peter and James and John, which seemed to be Pillars, &c. Here Haymo not only calleth these three more perfect, but Pillars also, which is more then Paul saith; but this Exegesis speaks not so much of them, for on Gal. 2. at these words, which seemed to be something; or as we have, Who were of reputation; it is written there, They seemed unto themselves to be something; for they did seem to have learning and vertue of themselves, but they neither had learning nor vertue of themselves, nor of their own merits; and therefore although they did seem unto the people to be something, they were nothing. He who writes so liberally of the three Apostles, would not (probably) have written so sparingly of them in the other place; and so the Authour of the Exegesis, would not have called Peter the head of the Church. Who then is the Authour of that Exegesis? The above-named Remigius, Bishop of Lions; as Bishop Usher proveth loc. cit. and we may find that his doctrine in that Exegesis, doth accord with that which we have heard; he did maintain concerning election, free-will, &c. as appears by these passages. On Rom. 5 he saith, As

but by Remigius, Bishop of Lions; and is contrary to the present Church of Rome, in many particulars following

by

by Adam sin and death did enter, so by Christ came justification and eternal life: therefore the Apostle saith, We are reconciled unto God; because as by one man sin entred into the World, that is, into the univetsality of mankind, (except Christ, which is from above) and by sin death came; so death both of body and soul hath gone over all men, even as on the first man, in whom all have sinned: So by our Lord Jesus Christ justification hath entred, and by justification life eternal... for in him all men have sinned, which were in his loins; as Levi was in the loins of his father, when he paid tithes. And he saith congruously, that sin entred first, and then death by sin; because so soon as he did sin, he became mortal; as the Lord had foretold, saying; In whatsoever day thou shalt eat thereof, thou shalt die the death: He did sin by coveting and eating, and he was made mortal in sinning. Amongst other things observe here, that Remigius makes no exception of sin in the universality of mankind, but only of Christ, and therefore the Virgin Mary is not excepted; and after the same manner do all the Ancients speak, in this point. On Cap. 9. What man can declare, why the Almighty God did chuse Jacob, before he was born, and rejected Esau, when neither the one, nor the other, could do any good or ill; except that on him, that is, on Jacob, he would bestow his grace and mercy, and on Esau he would fullfill his just judgment... therefore as it was not the purpose of God, and his predestination according to election of the good merit of Jacob; so the election of the Gentiles, was not according to the election of merits, but according to the free grace and predestination of God; therefore for what cause Jacob was chosen without good works, and Esau was hated without ill works, it is only known unto God, who knows all things before they be, and whose judgment is alwaies just.... He said unto Moses, I will have mercy, on whom... This is the order, On whom I will have mercy, by calling him unto my faith; I will have mercy, by giving him my faith, that he may beleve in me; and I will shew compassion on him, that he may live righteously, and be mercifull, and persevere in good works, according to which he shall receive the reward. [Therefore not of him who willeth] understand, is the will [nor of him who runneth] is the race, [but of God shewing mercy] is mercy, that he giveth unto man to will good, to do and to persevere: The only good will is not sufficient, unless also the mercy of God prevene him unto this end, to give unto him to will what is good, and to perfect the same good; as the Psalmist saith, His mercy shall prevene me, and his mercy shall follow me: But haply one will say, Why are the Elect rewarded, or what reward have they deserved, if both the good will, and the perfecting of the good work, be given unto them of God? I answer, therefore are the Elect worthy of remuneration; because so soon as they do perceive, that they are prevened by the grace of God, they do labour with all their indeavours to obey his will. [For the Scripture saith to Pharao:] The Scripture speaketh not by it self, but another by it; as here God speaketh. These last words I have marked, against them which say, The Scriptures is dumb and dead. At these words, Hath not the Potter power... he saith, So the Almighty God, the Potter of mankind, hath power out of the mass of perdition and sin, that is, out of the mass of mankind, to make one vessel unto honour; that is, to create one for this end, that he may be honoured in him; and that he honour him by calling him unto his faith, and by saving him unto life; and another unto dishonour, that is, in his just judgment to destroy the Reprobates, because of their wickedness; for of a corrupt mass, all the vessels are corrupt; but if the Potter, by the Engine of his Art, will purifie some of them from the fault of the mass, by baking it in the fire; may he not be magnified in those? And that he suffereth some unpurified, he is not to be blamed, because he continueth in his power, for the mass is his. On Cap. 11. at these words, I have left 7000 ... faith he; neither faith he, Are left unto me; but, I have left and reserved unto my self 7000 men; which when others became Idolaters, have not bowed And it is to be considered, because [according to the election of God's grace] that is, according to the gift of Predestination, the remnant is saved, not according to the merit of their works; wherefore he saith, in the Epistle unto the Ephes. As he hath chosen us, before the foundation of the World, in him, i. e. in Christ, that we should be holy and unblamable. [And if of grace] they are saved, who beleeve amongst the Jews [not now] was it [of the works of the Law] by which they thought to be justified, who continue in infidelity; [else grace were not grace] that is, if they were saved otherwise, which cannot be but by the grace of God; or else grace it self were not grace, but a merit But the election hath obtained it, that is, they who were chosen out of that multitude; whom before he called a remnant, now he calleth election; and as before circumcision is taken for the Jews, so here election is for the Elect, who obtain justification by faith. On Cap. 15. at these words, whatsoever is written, is written for our instruction ... he saith; The Apostle joineth himself unto all Beleevers, and will shew that all things which are written in Divine books, are not written for them, whose deeds and works are there reported, for they are in rest long ago; but for our salvation, and of them which are to come, that we may have whence we may take example of faith and good works; and whence we may know with what works God is pleased, and with what he is provoked to punish ... for what did it avail to Abraham that Moses hath written, he was obedient, and that he commends him to have pleased God? But he saith, Whatsoever things are written in the Law, Prophets, Psalms and other Scriptures, are written for our instruction, that we which are come unto the faith, may thence learn. Seeing Remigius writeth that the Scriptures are written for the instruction of all Beleevers; would he then have consented unto the Act of Trent, which forbids the use of the Scriptures unto Beleevers? On 1 Cor. 1. at these words, That no flesh should glory before him; he saith, No flesh, that is, no man: The wise and mighty cannot glory, because they are not called by him for their wisdom and riches; neither had they divine wisdom, or spiritual riches of themselves: The Apostles could not glory, because whatsoever they had of favour, they received it from God without their merits, and they cannot glory that they were chosen for their wisdom and riches He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord; he glorieth in the Lord, and not in himself, who confesseth that all the good he hath, he hath received it from God, without his own merit; and therefore seeks not his own glory and praise, but his glory from whom he hath received whatsoever he hath. On Gal. 6. on these words, God forbid that I rejoyce but in the Crofs of Christ; he saith, that is, I will not rejoyce in the riches and dignities of this World, but in the Crofs of Christ, i. e. in his suffering, which was done on the Crofs, will I rejoyce, from whence is my redemption and salvation. Or I will rejoyce in the Crofs of Christ, that is, in this will I rejoyce, if I can follow the suffering of Christ, what he hath sustained for me, I may sustain the like for his name. Hence we may see, that Remigius did not rejoyce in the painted or moulded Crofs, but in Christ's sufferings for our redemption. On Eph. 2. at these words, Built on the foundation; he saith, The foundation of the Prophets, Apostles, and of all the faithfull, is Christ; because they are grounded and established in faith of him; as he himself said, Upon this Rock, that is, upon me will I build my Church. Here Remigius expoundeth the Rock to signifie Peter. On Cap. 5. at these words, words, Not having spot or wrinkle; he saith, In this world the Church may be said to be glorious one way, because it hath Kings and Princes subject, and it hath many orders and degrees; but it cannot be without spot or wrinkle of sin, because it hath many penitents in it; and if we say we have no sin, we deceive our selves, and the truth is not in us; and, there is not a man upon earth which doth good, and sinneth not; wherefore it is better that we refer these words unto the general resurrection. On Cap. 6. The sword of the Holy Ghost is the Word of God, as the Apostle saith; that is, the doctrine and knowledge of the Divine Scriptures, which is given unto us by the Holy Ghost: And it is called a sword, because as enemies are put to flight by a sword, so by the knowledge of Divine Scriptures, we may put to flight all the craft and devices of the Divil, by following what the Scripture teacheth, and eschewing what it forbiddeth; and not only may we overcome the Devils, by the knowledge of the word, and by the help of God; but by authority thereof we may convince all Hereticks, and destroy all their errors. Reader, observe in this testimony the manifold use of the Scriptures; and especially that they are a rule wherewith all errors may be destroyed. On Phil. 2. at these words, It is God who worketh in you; he saith, Lest he seem to exclude God from our salvation, or as if without the help of God we could be saved: he subjoins, For it is God who worketh in you; therefore every good which we have, as well the good will, as the good operation, is not of us, but of God. . . . [both to will] that is, to have a good will [and to do according to good will] that is, that we may alwaies will what is good. On Cap. 3. at these words, If I may comprehend, in whom I am comprehended; he saith, All the Elect which are predestinated for eternal life, are comprehended in the Passion of Christ; because thereby are redeemed not only those who are saved after his resurrection, and who are purged in baptism, but all the godly which were before his coming. . . . whosoever are perfect, in comparison of others, let us think so, understand, that we are not perfect; for whosoever are perfect, that is, who are thought to be perfect; let us understand, that this is in comparison of Believers, and who have less understanding, because we are not perfect, in respect of what we shall have at the day of judgement. On 1 Tim. 2. he saith, Seeing the Psalmist saith, The Lord doth whatsoever he willeth; and the Apostle saith, which will have all men to be saved: Why are not all men saved? To which I say, Because it is true what the Psalmist saith, For he hath said, and it shall be; likewise he will save all men which are saved, and which by his mercy seek to be saved; for the Apostles have put the whole for a part; as in the Gospel the Lord saith, when I shall be exalted from the earth, I will draw all men unto me: for he drew not all men, nor draweth all men; but all, that is, the Elect out of all sorts and Nations, out of all sex and condition; from Kings unto Beggars, from the perfect unto the babe of one day; yet none can be saved, but whom God willeth, because he sheweth mercy on whom he will; for if all men had continued in perdition, just had been the judgment of God; but that his mercy and power might be shewed, because he is powerfull to save all men, in those which do perish he shews his just judgment, and his mercy in them which are saved; for his grace preventeth us that we have will, and our will should accord with his will, and then he will give us ability; and because we join our will to his will, we are worthy to be rewarded; and nevertheless it is all to be ascribed unto his grace, whatsoever good we do: He saith then, Which will have all men to be saved, understand thou, all which are saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the Trinity, which is the highest and substantial truth. On Cap. 3. he saith, The Church is called both the ground and Pillar of truth, which is but one thing; for the firmness of faith, and because [the Church] is established by heavenly doctrines and Divine miracles. In this observe, that the faith or truth depends not on the testimony of the Church; but the Church is a ground or Pillar, because it hath firm faith, and is established by Divine doctrines. On 2 Tim. 1. at these words, I thank my God, whom I do serve from my fore-fathers; he saith, This he saith that he may shew, that the ancient Fathers which were before the coming of the Lord, had the same faith which he and the other Apostles had; and did descend from those Fathers unto the Apostles, and from them unto us; as also it descendeth from us, unto them which shall come after us. In this one testimony, many things may be observed against the present Tenets of the Romish Church; (if I would stay) but one thing (though but a negative) I cannot omit that in all these descendings, is no mention of any dependance on the Roman Bishop or faith; so that if we have the faith, which the fore-fathers and Apostles had, and they which had the same from them; whether the Church of Rome now have the same, or not have it, we have the true faith: On Cap. 2. at these words, The Lord knows who are his; This is the impression of the Seal, He knows, that is, the Lord hath chosen them which belong unto his inheritance; and this is the seal of faith, because when others depart from the faith, they which are Elect can in no way be seduced. Many such other testimonies may be observed in that Exegetis, which Villapand calleth a rich treasure; a rich treasure it is, which so clearly sheweth the faith of the Church of that time; and that the Church of Rome now, having forsaken that faith in so many particulars, hath departed from the truth. And therefore Bellarmin was more wary then his brother; and though he did bring that testimony concerning the change of the bread, yet no where else would name that book, nor the Authour of it, in his book De Scriptoris Ecclesiasticis, although he forgot not others of less note.

18. Haymo was Bishop of Halberstad about this time, but it seems he was younger then Remigius. He writ sundry volumns, especially two books of Homilies. In the first, called Pars hyemalis, he hath these sentences. In Feria 4. quatuor tempor. at these words, Ave, gratia plena; he saith, She is well said to be full of grace, because she had attained what no other woman had attained; to wit, she did conceive and bear the Authour of grace. Behold, he expoundeth these words otherwise then the Papists do now. And here his words are, Gratiam quam nulla alia meruerat, assequitur; and I have translated the word meruerat after this manner, because (as I have marked before) the Ancients do use it in this signification; and (as follows) Haymo was far from the opinion of man's merit; Ibid. at the words, That Holy thing which shall be born of thee; he saith, For distinction of our holiness, Jesus is affirmed singularly to be born holy; for although we be made holy, yet we are not born holy, because we are bound with the condition of corruptible nature; that every one of us may with the Prophet sigh and say, Behold I was conceived in iniquities, and in sins hath my mother brought me forth: but he only was truly holy, which that he might overcome the condition of corruptible nature, was not conceived by the commixtion of carnal copulation. The Papists do hold that the Virgin Mary was free of original sin; to the end, that they may the more plausibly commend her to be worshipped as the Queen of Heaven. But behold, here Haymo saith more then Remigius said; for he saith not only that it was the singular priviledge of Christ, to be born holy; but more he saith, That he might overcome the condition of corruptible nature, he was not conceived by commixtion. Certainly, the condition which he overcome, was singularly the condition of Maries corruptible nature, seeing she was conceived by commixtion, Dominic. 4. post Epiphan. There was a great storm storm on the Sea, because the Persecution of Pagans, the Devil stirring them up, did arise against the Church, so that the ship was covered with the waves; that is, the persecution waxing, the Church did scarcely lurk in a few Beleevers, neither durst any man confess the name of Christ publicly, who was not prepared to die presently for Christ; which to have been in the daies of Dioclesian and others, the Histories do declare. This testimony confutes the Papiests holding that the Church doth flourish at all times; and witnesseth with us, that the Church hath been forced to lurk at some times. In Dominic. in Septuages. on the Parable Matth. 20. he saith, This Vine-yard is the holy Church, which hath been from the beginning of the World, untill the end thereof; so many godly as it bringeth forth, it begetteth so many branches: This Vine-yard was planted amongst the people of the Jews, but after the incarnation of our Lord, it is enlarged unto the ends of the earth, &c. In the same Homily, he saith; Because eternall life is rendred to no man by way of debt, but is given through the gracious mercy of God; therefore . . . And nearer the end, he saith, Seeing it is given to none by debt, but only of gracious mercy unto whom he willeth, none can grumble at the righteousness of God; because he sheweth mercy on whom he willeth, and whom he willeth, he hardneth; he shews mercy of his own goodness, and he hardneth without iniquity; because although his judgments are sometimes hid, yet they are not unjust. In Feria 4 post Iudica, on Ioh. 10. he saith on these words, And I give unto them eternal life; These are the Pastures which he did before promise unto his Sheep, wherein no herb withereth, but all is green, all waxeth, all abideth whole; and whatsoever is once taken in, is possessed for ever. And they shall not perish for ever; here understand, as ye shall perish which are not of my sheep. And none shall pluck them out of my hand; that is, from my power. Here he affirmeth the perseverance of the Elect, and the damnation of them which are not elected. In Feria 6 post Iudica on Ioh. 6. on these words, My flesh is meat indeed; he saith, Seeing all men do desire, by meat and drink, that they may not hunger nor thirst; nothing can do this truly, but this meat and drink, which maketh them, who receive it, to be immortal and incorruptible; and that is the society of the godly, wherein shall be full and perfect peace and unity. . . . Then he expoundeth how this may be which he hath said, and what it is to eat his flesh, and to drink his blood; He who eats my flesh, and drinketh my blood, abides in me, and I in him; that is, to eat his flesh, and to drink his blood, to abide in Christ, and to have him abiding in us; and therefore who abides not in Christ, or in whom Christ abides not, without doubt neither eats he Christ's flesh spiritually, although carnally and visibly he do press, with his teeth, the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ; but rather, he eats to his own judgment the Sacrament of so great a thing, who being unclean did presume to come unto the Sacrament of Christ, which no man takes worthily, but who is clean. Hence we see, that Haymo thought wicked men cannot eat the body of Christ, but only the Sacrament of it; and whosoever eats Christ's flesh, abides in Christ, and is immortal; therefore he did not beleeve Transubstantiation: And here again, he confirms the perseverance of them who have true grace. In the Homily De Passione Christi secundum Matth. he saith, After he had supped, he gave them bread and wine, to wit, in a mystery of his body and blood; for because bread strengthneth the heart of man, and wine augmenteth blood in man, justly is the bread turned into the body of Christ, and the wine into his blood; not by figure, or by shadow, but in truth; for we beleeve that it is the flesh of Christ in truth, and likewise his blood; but because human frailty is not accustomed to eat raw flesh, and to drink blood, therefore the same flesh is translated into bread, and his blood into wine. And in the next page he saith, He gave it unto his Disciples, and said; Take ye, eat ye. This is contrary unto them which give the Eucharist unto dead men; for when the Lord had said, Take ye; presently he adds, And eat ye; because it is not sufficient to take, unless each do eat it to his salvation; because what they could not take in their life, they shall not be able to take after death. Like- wise taking the Cup, he gave thanks, and gave it unto them; and said, Drink ye all of it; that whosoever takes, should drink. Here is Transubstantiation will a Romanist say: But observe first, How can the opinion of Transubstantiation stand with the preceding testimony? 2. He speaks here as Remigius did before; to wit, not a substantial change, but a real change in respect of use and condition. 3. He saith, Christ's flesh is translated into the bread; as well as he saith, the bread is turned into his body; but this they will not maintain, and neither of them is done substantially, and yet both really; to wit, as he saith in the first words, in a mystery. 4. He saith expressly, Christ gave them bread, and commanded to eat; therefore it is still bread, and must be eaten. The bread is such bread as strengthneth the heart, and the wine is such wine as augmenteth blood; therefore the substance of bread and wine doth remain. And here he condemns another practise of the Romanists, which although they do not profess in writing, yet I have heard credibly reported, that they do (as baptize dead children, so) put bread, or the hosty, into the mouths of the elder persons, when they are dead. This Haymo writ also a large Commentary on the Revelation; wherein, though he fail in the application of the Prophetical part, as not knowing what was to come, yet is he Orthodox in doctrine, and contradicts the present Romish Church in many particulars; and (as once I have said before) we look upon the pure mettle, and leave the dross. In lib. 1. at the words, Grace and peace; he saith, It is to be noted, that it is not said, Peace and Grace, but grace is permitted, and peace follows; because none can attain the peace of reconciliation, unless the grace of mercy previene him; because that we may come to the peace of God, we are prevented by the grace of God; and generally, all things which we have from God, whether in faith, or in work, in abstinence, fasting, and other things, are given to us freely of his only mercy. On cap. 2. at the words, I will make him a Pillar in the Temple; he saith, None doubteth that the Temple of God is the Church of the Elect. . . . The Lord then saith, Who overcome, understand ye, the temptations of the Diel, worldly lusts, and carnal delights, I will make him a Pillar in the Temple of my God; that is, I will make him strong in good work, that he shall not fear any loss; but moreover by the strength of his fortitude, that is, by his example and doctrine he may sustain the Church: And where it is said, He shall not go forth any more, it is manifestly known that he had gone forth . . . but being recalled, he shall go no more forth; that is, he shall be separated no more from the grace of Christ. As in this place, so in a hundred more of that Commentary, he calleth the member of the Church, the Elect; and he speaks oft of their perseverance. In lib. 2. on cap. 3. at these words, I will sup with him; he saith, The head supped with the members, and the members with the head; because Christ died for the Elect, and the Elect die with him, that they also may perfect the will of the Father: Christ feedeth us, because he inlightneth us with his faith; and on the other side, we feed Christ, when we do delight him with our faith and works. On cap. 8. at these words, And another Angel came, and stood before the Altar; he saith, This other Angel is the man Christ-God; of whom the Prophet saith, His name shall be called the Angel of the great Counsel; for he is the messenger of the Father's will, which came and stood stood before the Altar with a golden Censer, to shew that he is the true High-Priest of good things to come; for it is the ministry of a Priest to stand at the Altar, and diligently to burn the Incense being prepared with spices; for he is the Angel of Angels, and the High-Priest of Priests. Moreover, before the Altar, that is, before all the Church, which burneth with the fire of God's love; and offereth unto God a true sacrifice (that is, a contrite heart,) killing himself, that he might be a living and reasonable sacrifice: For before this Altar standeth the Angel, that is, the true High-Priest, by whom we send all our Sacrifices unto God the Father; wherefore also the Priests, in all their prayers, make mention of him, that by him they may be heard, saying; Through our Lord Jesus Christ To this Angel the Incenses are given, that he should offer them unto the Father upon the Altar, that is, upon himself, by whom the godly do direct, unto the Father, their prayers, and all their works; as it is written, If any man sin, we have with the Father an Advocate, Jesus Christ the just, and he is the propitiation for our sins. Here he expoundeth not that Text, as the Rhemists and other late Papists do, of a created Raphael or other Angel; and out of it, they would prove the lawfulness of praying to Angels. On Chap. 9. at the words, And there arose a smoke out of the pit; he saith, That is, the doctrine of wicked Hereticks is made manifest; which is well compared unto smoke, because it wants the light of truth; and what in the Holy Scripture gives light unto the godly, that poureth blindness upon Hereticks, and they cease not to obscure the light of faith unto others. . . . And there come locusts upon the earth, to wit, Disciples of error come to deceive the earthly hearts of men; for locusts neither walk forward, as some wights, neither do they flee as fowls; because the Disciples of Hereticks, and Hereticks themselves, neither have upright faith that they may flee and seek heavenly things with the godly; of whom Esaias saith, Who are these which flee as Clouds; nor have forward or right walking of works, that they can say with the Psalmist, He set my feet upon a Rock, and directs my steps. The locusts do leap and eat every green thing, because they are lifted up with pride; and kill so many souls as they can, which have the greenness of faith And it was commanded them, that they should not hurt the grass . . . Heretick grass is taken in a good sense, for it signifieth sucking ones, which cannot eat solid meat, but delight in the superfluous of the Letter; to whom the Apostle saith, I could not speak unto you as spiritual men, but as carnal . . . And every green thing, signifieth them who have made better progress; who can now understand what John saith, In the beginning was the word. And the Trees are they who are perfect and strong in the faith, because such can indure the wind of temptations . . . But only the men which have not the sign of God in their fore-heads, understand ye worthily; because here are excluded, not only those which are without the Church, that is, Pagans and Jews; but also false Christians, who have the sign in their body, that is, are baptized, and are within the Church, but with their works do defile the faith which they seem to have; and therefore are hurt. . . . seeing many do confess Christ in words only, but having a form of godliness, deny the power thereof; they confess they know God, but deny him by their works. The Reader may judge, whether in all this testimony he describeth not the Jesuits, as if he had seen or had experience of them; at least, his words are contrary unto them; for they especially do speak against the Scriptures, and cease not to obscure them; and so forth: But especially, mark how Haymo expounds The sign of God in their fore-heads; whereas the Rhemists in their Annotations, and others of that stamp, do expound it of the sign of the Cross. In lib. 6. on chap. 19. at the words, I fell at his feet, to worship . . . he saith, Because John saw him greater then himself, he falling down would have worshipped him; for here both the Angel and John take their own persons: for whereas the Angel had said, I am alpha and omega, the first and the last; he shews in this place, that he was sent in the person of Christ; when considering his own person, he forbids that John do not worship him . . . he saith, See, that is, beware that thou do it not, for I am thy fellow-servant; for we both, thou and I, have one Lord; and in nothing am I preferred above thee, but in doctrine, which I am sent to teach thee; neither am I thy companion only, but also of thy brethren; to wit, I profess my self the co-equal of all beleeving men, which have the testimony of Jesus, that is, the faith of Jesus . . . Worship God; as if he had said, Do not worship me, who speak these words unto thee, but him in whose person I appear. How far differeth Haymo here from the Reformed Church? And yet the Rhemists on that Text say, The Protestants abuse this place, and the example of the Angel, forbidding Iohn to adore him . . . but in truth it makes for no such purpose, but only warneth us, that Divine honour and adoration due unto God alone, may not be given unto Angels. But we see, that Haymo knew not any such distinction; and he gives a reason, why no Beleever should worship an Angel in any way. In lib. 7. on the same chap. he saith, If the first man had not sinned, he had continued immortal; but because he contemned God's command, immediately he incurreth God's wrath, and dieth. A little after, Haymo hath many significations of the word Sun, in Scripture; but he shews not that it signifieth the Pope. At the last words of the Book, he saith; Observe, this Book beginneth with grace, and endeth in grace; because both by preveining grace are we saved, and by subsequent grace are we justified: wherefore Paul also ordreth his Epistles unto the Churches, in this manner, that he beginneth with grace, and closeth with grace. He hath many such passages, but these may serve for a tast of the doctrine, of those times, in the Church.

19. Lupus was Abbot of the Monastery of Ferrara, by the water Lupa running into Sene, at the same time. He writ several Epistles unto King Lewis, to Hincmar, &c. which were Printed at Paris, An. 1588. In the first Epistle, he saith, Now they are accounted troublesom, who are desirous to learn; and as if they were set in an high place, the unlearned gaze on them continually; and if they can espy any fault in them, it is not called human frailty, but it is imputed unto the quality of learning. In the 2 and 4 Epistle, He comforteth his Master Einhard, after the death of his wife; he speaks honourably of marriage, and comfortably of the estate of the godly after this life, without any mention of Purgatory, or mass for the defunct: and he interlaceth these sentences, The word of God inlightneth the most obscure darkness of this life; as it is said, Thy word is a Lantern unto my feet: The way of man is not in his own power, but the footsteps of men are directed by God; and the liberty of man's free-will, hath altogether need of the help of God's grace. When we are in any distress, the more truly we are sensible of our frailty, the more speedily should we run unto the help of God's mercy; and it is sweetly said, Where man's power faileth, the help of God is present; neither is this a long travel, if we endeavour: for he who calleth saying, Come unto me, who are weary; he informeth them which come, and without all doubt he crowneth them continuing in him. Say with the famous and most sweet Augustine, Give me, Lord, what thou biddest do, and bid do what thou wilt; seeing God both previenes and follows us, that we may will or do any good. In the 112 Epistle, Let the worthiness of virginity be commended so, that the humility of marriage be not despised. Catal. test. ver. lib. 9. Trithem. in Catal. illustr. saith, that he writ of redemption superfluously, even to the salvation of Reprobates. Here Trithem. doth him wrong, as appears by the book it self, which was Printed lately at Rotterdam, with a Preface of the learned Doctor Kiver, or Renatus Devirans, who hath a part of his XXX Epistle written unto Gotteschalk, answering unto that question, Whether we shall, after resurrection, behold God with bodily ey? Here he commendeth the modesty of Augustine, and denieth that God can be seen in his substance, which priviledge is reserved unto the Spirit; and then he saith, Though I pay my debt of love unto thee, much respected brother, I cannot fully discharge it; but I exhort thee, that thou spend not thy spirits any more on such questions; lest being taken up with them more than is needfull, thou be lesse able to search and teach profitable things. In the mean time, let us walk in the most large field of holy Scriptures, and give our selves wholly unto the meditation of them, and seek the Lord's face humbly, piously and continually, for no good shall be lacking unto them who seek him. Then that Preface shews, that this Abbot was not Authour of that Book, which Trithemius and others do call his; but another Lupus, who did live at the same time; to wit,

20. Lupus Servatus a Benedictine, in the Abbey of Saint Amand, in the Diocye of Tournay, writ a Treatise of free-will, predestination, and of the price of Christ's blood. The sum of that Treatise the Authour did collect in an Epistle unto King Charls the Bald, who had commanded him to write on that subject. His words are; God made Adam upright, as the holy Scripture teacheth, and in him he created us all originally upright; this father of mankind forsaking natural uprightnes (none forcing him) did sin so grievously, that himself, and in him he condemned us all which are begotten of both sexes; God therefore made human nature excellently good, but man hath corrupted it miserably by his spontaneous fault: Adam was then, as saith blessed Ambrose, and we all were in him; but Adam perished, and we all perished in him: Let us praise God's work, and confess that nothing but punishment is due unto our fault. But God, to whom all things which were, are, and which are to come, are present (for he is what he is) nor can be any addition or diminution of his knowledge; seeing he fore-knew the whole mass of mankind to be corrupted with sin, would not hold from it the good of his creation, seeing he could use well even evil things; and before the foundation of the world, he did chuse out of that mass, whom by grace he would deliver from deserved punishment; as the Apostle saith, As he hath chosen us before the foundation of the world: But others, on whom he vouchsafes not this grace of mercy, he in just judgment leaveth them in damnation, which they have deserved by sin. And thus, as the Apostle saith, he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardneth. He shews mercy on such whom he assumeth by grace, and he hardneth those whom he doth not mollifie by the same grace; but howbeit in hid, yet in just judgment he leaveth them. Those then on whom he shews mercy, are predestinated for glory; as the Apostle saith, whom he hath fore-known, he hath predestinated, and they are called the vessels of honour. These do ow unto him what they are, and what they have, because they are made by his goodness, when before they were not; and of his bountifulnes they are saved, when they were lost. But those whom he hardneth, that is, whom he softneth not, which are left in damnation, which they have originally and actually deserved, are called vessels fitted unto contumely, and prepared for destruction. That those are created, it is the good gift of God; and that they are punished it is their own evil. Blessed Augustine in many of his books, and especially in that he writ last, doubteth not to say, that they are predestinated to punishment; not meaning a fatal necessity on them which shall perish, but the unchangeable desertion of them which are forsaken: For he had read, If God shut up a man, who shall open unto him? And also consider the works of God, that none can correct what he hath despised: And that also, I have given them over into the desires of their hearts, and they shall walk in their own devices. And I think he was led into this thought, especially by that testimony concerning God, Which made what was to come: And to whom it is said, Thou wilt give to every one according to their works; which, indeed, he will do to each one, except whom he blesteth by forgiving their iniquities, and hiding their sins; which advancing his grace with highest praises can say, He deals not with us according to our sins, nor rewardeth us according to our iniquities. With Augustine do, in other words, agree Jerom, Gregory, Beda, Ildore... as I could easily demonstrate. Certainly the first man did, by sinning, lose free-will in good, which he did despise; and he holds it in evil, which he chose: But as if a man willeth, he can kill himself, by withholding food from himself; but when he is killed, he cannot make himself to live; so man could willingly lose the use of free-will in good, by forsaking it; but he cannot resume it by his own strength, even although he would; therefore he shall not have free-will in good, unless it be made free by the grace of God. Our Lord Jesus, which knew (as it is written) what is in man, declareth this soundly, when he said, Without me ye can do nothing; to wit, no good thing; for he cannot be the Authour nor co-worker of ill, who (as John Baptist saith) is the Lamb of God, and takes away the sins of the World; to wit, both which were, and that they be not done. And elsewhere, If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be truly free.... God's grace preveneth us; as it is written, My God his mercy shall prevent me, that we may both will and begin: and his grace followeth us; as it is written, Thy mercy shall follow me; that in vain we will not or begin. These then are principally of God, as is clear by these testimonies; and but consequently ours, because they are done by us willingly; as it is written, Lord, thou wilt give us peace, for thou workest all our works unto us..... Lastly, whom God hath redeemed by his blood, it is learned by the Gospel. In Matthew the Lord saith, Drink ye all of this, for this is my blood of the new Testament, which shall be shed for many for remission of sins: And in Mark, This is my blood of the new Testament, which shall be shed for many: But in Luke, This is the new Testament of my blood, which shall be shed for you. Then two Evangelists say, For many; and one, For you; because the Disciples are amongst the many; but none saith, For all. And lest I be judged to search thus rashly, holy Jerom expounding that Text, The Son of Man came not to be served, but to serve, and to give his soul a ransom for many; saith, When he took the form of a servant, that he might shed his blood for the World; and said not, he would give his soul a ransom for all; but for many, that is, for them which were to believe in him. In this exposition, according to the Catholick faith, he teaches that only Believers are understood..... Who dare contradict so clear lights confirming their doctrine by Evangelical sense, but which are not ashamed to appear without light? And that I may speak with leave and reverence of so great a man, John Bishop of Constantinople [Chrysostom] not seeing this sense flowing from the fountain of the Gospel, when he expounds that of the Apostle, That, by the grace of God, he should taste death for all men; not for Believers only, said he, but for all the World; and truly, he died for all men: But what if all men believe not? He hath done his part. But when he thought thus, he hath not confirmed it by a Divine testimony. And if any hath shewed, or shall shew unto your Excellency, that one Faustus hath written far otherwise of the things, credit ye not him who erreth, &c.

21. At the same time was also question of the presence of Christ's body in the Sacrament. Charls the Bald gave in command unto Bertram, a Priest at Corbey, to search and write what was the doctrine of the Fathers and ancient Church in this article. Trithemius saith, Bertram was singularly learned, of an excellent eloquence and utterance, pregnant in judgment, and no less famous for holiness of life; and writ many excellent Treatises, whereof few have come to our hands. In obedience unto his Sovereign, he did compile a Treatise, De Corpore & Sanguine Domini, which is all inserted in Catal. test. ver. lib. 10, and was lately translated into our language, and Printed at Aberdeen; so that who pleaseth to read it, may easily find it. Only the estate of the question I set down here, with an argument or two; and his conclusion your high Excellency desireth to understand, Whether that Body and Blood of Christ, which is received by the mouth of Beleevers in the Church, be taken in a mystery, or according to literal verity? that is, whether it contain some secret thing which is only manifest to the eye of faith, or without the vail of any mystery; if the eyes of the body behold that outwardly, which the soul and mind do behold inwardly? Unto this he adjoineth another, Whether it be the same body which was born of the Virgin Mary, and which suffered and died? Concerning the first, he shews, that the word literal verity, signifieth a demonstration of a thing in its proper and manifest signification; as when it is said, Christ died: And that in a figure, is when a thing is signified in an over-hallowing vail or trope; as when Christ saith, I am the Vine; such speeches say one thing, and signifie another, saith he. His first reason is, If the Sacrament of Christ's body and blood be celebrated without any figure, it is not properly called a mystery, wherein is no secret thing, nothing removed from our corporal senses: But that Bread which, by consecration of the Priest, is made the body of Christ, shews one thing to the outward senses of men, and crieth another thing inwardly to the souls of Beleevers; outwardly the bread is the self-same that it was before, for we see the same shape and colour, and the same tast is perceived; but inwardly, a far more excellent, different, and precious thing is signified and exhibited, because it is heavenly and divine; that is, the body of Christ is shewed unto us, yet not seen with fleshly eyes; but is seen, taken and eaten by the looking of a beleeving soul. The wine also, which by consecration is made the Sacrament of Christ's Blood, representeth one thing outwardly, and contains another thing inwardly; for what see we outwardly but the substance of wine? tast it, and it is wine; smell it, and it savoureth wine; look on it, and you see the colour of wine: But if it be considered inwardly in the mind, it tasteth not as wine; but as the blood of Christ, unto the beleeving soul; and it is acknowledged such, when it is seen; and so it is approved, when it is smelled. These to be such, it is manifest; because none can deny, but that bread and wine, is only figuratively the body and blood of Christ; for, as is clearly seen and known, no flesh is in that bread, nor can any drop of blood be pointed forth in that wine; whereas nevertheless after consecration they are not called bread or wine, but the body and blood of Christ. After thirty other arguments, proving a figure in these words, This is my body; he comes to the other question, and hath this argument, The flesh of Christ, which was crucified, did shew no more outwardly, then it was in it self, because it was the flesh of a very man; to wit, a true body under the form of a true body: But we must consider in that bread, not only the body of Christ, but the bodies of all Beleevers are also represented in it; for which cause, it is made of many grains of wheat; because the body of the Church, is made up of many beleevers of the word of Christ; for this cause, as in the mystical bread the body of Christ is understood; so also, in the same mystery, the members of the Church are represented to be one in Christ; and as not corporally but spiritually that bread is called the body of the Church or believing people; after the same manner also, it must be understood to be the body of Christ; not corporally, but. Also the things which are alike, are comprehended under the same definition: But concerning the true body of Christ; it is said, He is very God, and very Man, who in the latter time of the World, was born of the Virgin: and these things cannot be said of the body of Christ, which is consecrated in a mystery in the Church; therefore according to a certain manner only, is it to be the body of Christ; and that manner, is by a figure and in resemblance, that so the truth of the thing it self, may be the more sensibly understood. In the prayers also, which are said after the mystery of the body and blood of Christ, and wherein the people answer, Amen; the Priest uttereth these words, We beseech thee, O Lord, which are partakers of the pledges of eternal life, that what we touch in resemblance in this Sacrament, we may receive it in the manifest participation of the thing it self. Now we know that a pledge or resemblance, is of another thing resembled; that is, they are not to be considered as they are in themselves, but as they have reference to another thing; for a pledge is of that for which it is given, and so is an Image the resemblance of that whose similitude it representeth. . . . wherefore it is the body and blood of Christ which the Church celebrateth, but as a pledge and resemblance. The conclusion is; Wherefore, most noble Prince, let your wisdom consider, that it is most clearly shewed, by testimonies of Scripture, and words of the holy Fathers, that the bread, which is called the body of Christ, is a figure, because it is a mystery; and that there is a great difference between the mystery of his body, and his body it self. . . . And we add (saith he) that the Bread and Cup, which are called the Body and Blood of Christ, do represent and are in remembrance of the Lord's death; as he said, Do this in remembrance of me; and Paulexpounds, How oft ye eat this bread, . . . shew forth the Lord's death. Now some Popish Indices have forbidden this book altogether, as unlawfull; and those of Doway perceiving that the forbidding of it, did occasion men to look after it, thought it better to let it go abroad; but in some places maimed, and in others perverted; as where it is said visibiliter, they will have it invisibiliter; and where it is said, secundum creaturarum substantiam, they bid to expound it, secundum externas species sacramenti. Likewise Bishop Usser, in Histor. Gottesc. cap. 11, writes, that he had seen other books of Bertram in manuscripts, and containing the same doctrine; especially his book De Prædestinatione, which he writ in defence of the doctrine for which Gotteschalk did suffer, is extant under the name of Ratrannus, Monk of Corbey.

22. Remigius Bishop of Autisiodor, or of Auxerre, about the year 880, was called Doctor Sententiosus; he writ many works. On Psal. 10, he saith; All my faith is in Christ, by him only do I beleve to be justified and saved; he is my mountain, and my refuge; for he is my Lord, which is God by nature; but all ye who are men, are infirm as I. On Psal. 18. The Heavens declare the glory of God; to wit, that he saveth not by works of righteousness, which we have done; but of his own righteousness; for all men have sinned, and stand in need of the glory of God, being justified freely. This is the declaring of God's glory; that is, his mercy which is shewed by the Sun, wherein God is glorified. So long as we are in this body, it cannot be but sin is in us; then it reigneth, when we consent, and make our will subject unto it: wherefore the Apostle saith, Let not sin reign in your mortal bodies: therefore, O Lord, cleanse me, and spare me; but so that I be not subject to my own thoughts, nor the inticement of others. On Psal. 21. Adam made the old people by conformity formity unto him; to wit, he was a servant; but the Lord hath made the new people, because he justifieth freely, without our preceding merits; for we made our selves sinners, but the only mercy of God makes us righteous. . . . The poor shall eat me; that is, shall receive the Sacrament of my body and blood; and they shall be filled by following me, and denying themselves; because to eat the Lord, is to have a will to follow him in all things, and to be one with him. On Psal. 29. Eternal life is not by merit; because we could fall of our selves, but we could not rise of our selves; but through his will, that is, only of mercy. On Psal. 33. Truly, they only are blessed, they only are saved, which are justified by grace, and not by their merits. On Psal. 39. When we live well, let us ascribe nothing to our merits, but all to the grace of God. On Psal. 55. If we will offer sacrifice to God, we need not seek any thing without to offer, within us is the Incense of praise, and the sacrifice of faith. On Psal. 64. Propitiation is miseration shewed after sacrifice: So Christ willing to shew mercie [propitiari] on his people, became a Priest, praying unto the Father, with hands lifted up upon the Crofs; he offered a sacrifice, because he offered himself on the Altar of the Crofs; he is the Priest, he is the Sacrifice, the Propitiator, and the propitiation. On Psal. 85. God the Father could give no greater gift unto men, then that he made his Word, by which he made all things, to be a head unto them, and did fit these men to be as members unto Him; so that He is God with the Father, and Man with men; who both prayeth for us, and prayeth in us, and is praised unto by us. He prayeth for us, because he is Priest and Sacrifice, interceding daily with the Father for us. He prayeth in us, because he is our head; neither is this any wonder, if Christ and the Church be in one voice, because they are in one bodie. He is prayed unto by us, as our God; he is prayed unto in the form of God; he prayeth in the form of man; there the Creator, here a creature. On Psal. 70. It is a great gift of God, and a great knowledge of man, to observe and understand, that whatsoever he is, he is nothing without the grace of God, and he is nothing of himself; for he which will be any thing of himself, he tendeth not to be; but who studieth to be something, by the grace of God, abideth in true being [in vero esse.] This is grace, by which we were made, when we were not; of ungodly, we were made godlie; of slaves, free; of damned, were assumed into the Kingdom. On Psal. 96. Let them be confounded who glory in Images; for Images are not to be adored, neither is an Angel to be adored; because it is said in the Revelation, See thou do it not. Catal. testat. verr. libr. 10.

23. Paschasius Rathbert, Abbot of Corbeyen, at the same time writ a book De Eucharistia. He saith Ca. 1. Christ hath left unto us his Church, no greater thing then this Sacrament and Baptism, and the holy Scriptures; in all which, the Holy Ghost (who is a pawn unto his Church) doth work inwardly the mystical things of our salvation unto immortalitie. But in them is nothing wondrous unto unbelievers; and yet unto them who beleeve nothing is better, nothing is given more wonderfull in this World: Not that these wondrous things lie open unto the eies, but by faith and understanding they are favourie with divine mysteries; and in them immortalitie and participation of Christ, in the unity of body, is granted unto mortal men. Ca. 5. We drink Christ's blood spiritually, and we eat his flesh spiritually, wherein eternal life is beleeved; to think otherwise, according to flesh, is death: and to eat the flesh of Christ spiritually, is eternal life. Ca. 6. Unless one abide in Christ, and Christ in him, he cannot eat of Christ, nor drink his blood: And what is it that men eat? Behold how oft all do eat at the Altar indifferently, one eats the flesh of Christ spiritually, and another not, although we see that he takes a morsel from the Priest's hand. What then getteth he, seeing there is but one consecration, if he get not the body and blood of Christ? Truly, because he eateth unworthily; as Paul saith, he eats and drinks damnation to himself. Ca. 15. Drink ye all of this, as well Ministers as Beleevers. In many Chapters, he distinguisheth between the sign and the thing signified. Biblioth. de la Bigne, tom. 6.

24. When Leo Armenius Emperour of Constantinople, had Wars with Martagon Prince of Bulgaria, his sister was taken Captive; the Emperour caused her to be instructed in the Christian faith, and she was baptized. Martagon sent for her, and in lieu of her he sent her husband Caphara. When she was returned, she did commend unto her Brother the Christian religion many a time; but he did nothing regard her speeches, untill the Country was plagued with pestilence and famine; and then he called upon that God whom his sister had so oft talked of, that he would deliver him and his people: Soon thereafter they were delivered, and he did acknowledge the power of Christ, and sent unto the Emperour for Teachers; then he was baptized. But the people moved insurrection against him, because he had forsaken the rites of his Ancestours. He was nothing afraid, but became victorious, and then they all became Christians. Zonar. Ann. tom. 3. After the death of the Emperour Theophilus, the Prince of Bulgaria seeing the Empire to be governed by a woman, and a young child, sent unto Constantinople, alledging his League now to be out of date; and he denounceth wars. Theodora returned answer, that she would defend the Empire, and if it shall please God that she prevail, he would be overcome by a woman; and he may consider what a shame that were unto him; but if she were overcome, his victory were not honourable, in taking advantage of a woman. When he received this answer, he was content to renew the former league, Zonar. ibid. I mark this History, to shew the difference of people in old times, from them who have lived lately; when Kings will make Wars without any denunciation, or accepting any reasonable intreaty. The Emperour Basilus Macedo did perswade many Jews to embrace Christian religion; and to effect that he gave them both money and liberty. He made also a League with the Rhositi, a Nation of Scythians, by the Mountain Taurus, but upon condition that they would accept Christianity, and sent Teachers unto them: But they lingere, and said unto the Bishop, That they would see some of those miracles, which he said Christ had wrought, or else they would not beleeve him. Then said he, Say what you would have done. They answered, Throw that book into the fire, which teacheth of Christ; and if it burn not, it shall be an argument unto us that Christ is God, whom thou preachest. The Bishop was content, a fire is kindled; and the Bishop lifting up his eyes and hands unto Heaven, said, O Jesu Christ very God, glorifie thy own name. So before them all he threw the Gospel into the fire: It continued in the fire a long space without any change. The Barbarians were astonished, and beleeving in Christ, did crave to be baptized. Zonar. loc. cit.

CHAP. IV.

OF BRITAIN.

1. IN the Year of our Lord 824. the Danes were Lords of Northumberland, and raised wars against Edmund King of England; they took him, and because he would not deny Christ, they tied him unto a Tree, and shot at him him till he died; then they cut off his head, and cast it among the bushes. His own Subjects did bury him both head and body at Halefdon, which from thence was called Edmundsburrow.

2. In the Synod held at Celicyth in England, about the year 816, the fourth Canon is, Let no Scot be permitted to administer Divine Service within any of our Diocies; because as no Bishop nor Presbyter should meddle with another Diocye without consent, far less should any people receive any Service from them of another Nation, which give no honour unto Metropolitans nor other Bishops. Sir Hen. Spelman in Concil. Hence it is clear by the testimony of that Synod, that at that time Scotland did not acknowledge Bishops. Of this more hereafter in Cent. XI.

3. In the year 832. Hungus King of Peichts died, and left his son Dorstforld to be his Successour, and he was killed by his brother Egan. Egan did think to establish himself in the Kingdom, by distributing his Fathers treasure amongst the Nobles; and by marrying his brothers wife Brenna, lest she thinking her self degraded would excite her father, the King of Merchis, against him. Nevertheless she murdered him, in revenge of the murder of her husband. Then Dongal King of Scots, sent unto the Peichts, and craved their Crown unto Alpin son of Achajus, and the sister-son of Hungus, and so the nearest heir. They returned answer, No Prince of another blood, might by their Laws reign over them; and they were accustomed to transfer the Crown from one house to another, as they had judged expedient; and for the present they had chosen Feredeth their King, neither by their Laws could they deprive him, during his life. Dongal sent a second message, with certification, that if they did refuse to do justly unto the only heir, he would invade them by Battel. The Peichts sent some armed men, to inhibit the Messengers from coming nearer, under pain of death. Wherefore the Ambassadors did presently denounce Wars in the name of King Dongal and Alpine, Boeth lib. 10. cap. 7. Then King Feredeth took unto his proper use all the riches and jewels, which others had given unto the Churches; and he bereft Church-men of all the Tithes and their possessions, and he gave their lands unto his domesticks; the Nobles condescending, and esteeming all things to be but as fallen into an enemies hand, which had been given unto the Church. In the mean time Dongal levied an Army; and by the way he died in the water Spey, by force of the stream. Then Alpine was crowned King of Scots, and led forward the Army; at Restennet he slue Feredeth with many of his Nobles. Bruda then was King of Peichts, but injoied not the Kingdom many moneths; his son Feredeth had as bad success. Then the Scots were careless, as if the Peichts could make no more resistance. But another Brudus amasseth all their forces, to fight not so much for lands and liberty, as for life and children. In Anguise they had the victory, and Alpine was taken and brought, with his hands bound, unto the next village, where he was beheaded in the fourth year of his Reign; and his head was fixed on a pole upon the Walls of Camelon, in token of their Victory. Then Brudus conceived it easie to root the Scots out of the Island, and to this end he levied an Army; but in the field variance fell amongst them, so that Brudus was constrained to dismiss them. Within three moneths he died, and his brother Drusken succeeded. At this time some young Gentlemen, pretending themselves to be Merchants, came into Camelon, and brought away Alpine's head unto his son Kenneth. He was desirous to revenge his fathers death, and to recover his own right; but the Nobility said, It was more expedient to delay, without war or peace, because the wisest and valiantest were slain. At last they were perswaded to take Arms; and when the Armies came near, they joined without the command of their Leaders, and fought cruelly. In the end the Peichts fought peace, and the Scots would not hear of it: wherefore Drusken gathered all his strength, and in Fife was utterly overthrown; many Peichts were slain, none of them (almost) remained in their land; some did escape into Northumberland, and some into Denmark. The Scots from thenceforth possessed all the land on the North of Adrian's wall, and Edinburgh became the Headburgh of Scotland. Boeth saith, They who did take the Tithes from the Church, had neither Tithes nor Land within less space then ten years, for this was An. 839. At that time the Bishops seat of the Peichts, was translated from Abernethy by Earn, unto Saint Andrews, and that was called the Bishop-seat of the Scots; for before that time Scotland had no Bishop, and Ministers were chosen by the suffrages of the people, after the manner of Asia, saith Io. Bale in Catal. Illustr. cent. 14. cap. 6. And John Mayr in Hist. lib. 2. cap. 2. saith, The Scots were instructed in the faith by Priests and Monks, without Bishops. Boeth lib. 6. cap. 5. speaking of the Emperour Decius, saith, In this time the Scots were very profound in Theology and Holy Writ, by the doctrine of certain Monks, which in those daies were called Culdei, that is, the honourers of God; for then all Priests that honoured God, were called Culdei. Here it is clear, that I. Mayr and Boeth do speak (after the manner of their own times) of Monks and Priests, and they use both these terms; and in ancient times, the only term was Culdei for the Teachers of the word; but more of this when we come to the erection of Bishops.

4. Constantine, the son of Kenneth, convened his Nobles at Scone, about the year 862, ordained that Church-men should attend Divine Service diligently, and abstain from all civil affairs; they should live content with the Patrimony of their Churches; they should preach the Word of God unto their people, and live as they teach; they should be free from all charges of Wars; they should not feed Horse nor Hounds for pleasure; they should bear no weapons, nor judge in civil actions; if they do, they should pay for the first fault a sum of money; and for the second, they should be degraded. He made also other Laws for bringing the people unto their old frugality and industry. Here Laws are enacted for Church-men, without Pope or Bishop. In this King's time came the Danes, with the Peichts, into Scotland, under two Generals Hubba and Humber, they were discomfited in Fife; but Constantine was slain. King Gregory chased the Peichts (which were remaining) into Northumberland; where he fought so happily with the Danes and Peichts, that they were all (almost) slain, by Gregory on the one side, and by Alfred King of England on the other; and Northumberland was possessed by the Scots, granting liberty unto the Saxons to go or abide. Because the Britons had aided the Peichts, Gregory took from them Cumber and Westmerland, and slue their Prince Constantine. His brother Herbert, considering the hostility of the Scots and Danes, chose to make peace with the Scots. So Alfred drew up a general peace of all the Christians in Britain, against the Danes as a common enemy; and it was agreed that Gregory, for his valiantness, should perpetually enjoy Northumberland. This Gregory, by Act of Parliament at Forfar, did confirm all the privileges of the Church; and ordained that Church-men should not be drawn before Civil Judges, but only before their ordinary: he granted unto them to make Laws and Constitutions for the good of the Christian faith; to discuss all debates concerning Oblations, Tithes and Legacies or Testaments; to accurse all Rebels, and that all persons which were excommunicated should not be heard in Civil Courts. Boeth. Histor. lib. 10. cap. 19. Some Irish men had spoiled Galloway, and returned privily: therefore Gregory went with all hast into Ireland, he fought two Battels against against two Governours, and vanquished them. Dublin was rendred unto him; he visited the young King Duncan, and protested that he came not for greediness of their Land, but to redress the wrong. With consent of the people, he took upon him the name of Tutor of the King, and committed him unto the trustiest of the Nobles, permitting them to use their own Laws; and requiring only of them, that without his seal they would admit no English, nor Britan, nor Dane amongst them; for assurance he took with him 60 men in pledge. This Gregory was called the Great, and died An. 892. Buchanan. Hist. Scot.

5. The fore-named Alfred was the first King of England, who had unction from Rome. He divided his movables into two equal portions; the one he appointed for uses secular, and divided it into three parts; one for his family; another for building of new works, wherein he had great delight; and the third he reserved for strangers. The other half he dedicated unto uses Ecclesiastical, and divided it into four portions; one for relief of the poor; another to Monasteries; the third to the Schools in Oxford, where he had erected a School for Grammar, another for Philosophy, and a third for Divinity; whereas before they had neither Grammar nor Sciences, because Pope Gregory the I. gave in command, that Britain should have no Schools, for fear of Heresies, but only Monasteries, Bale. And the fourth part he sent for the relief of distressed Churches without his Realm. Sir Hen. Spelman in Concil. pag. 176. sheweth, that he bewailed the ignorance of the Clergy in his time, that few on the South-side of Humber knew the Liturgy in English, or could translate an Epistle into the vulgar language; yea when he came first to the Throne, he found not one on the South-side of Thames. Note here, they did use the Liturgy in Latine, because they had received it so from Rome, and because the people in former times did understand it; but when the people understood it not, the King would have it rather in the vulgar. Alfred died An. 901.

6. John Scot (who was surnamed Ærigena, or born in Aire, for distinction from a former born at Melrose, and another in the XIII Century born in Duncce, otherwise called Subtilis) was famous for his pregnant judgement, wondrous eloquence, and (in those daies) rare knowledge of the Greek, Chaldean and Arabian languages. He went to Athens, and studied there some years. He returned into France, and was much respected by Charls the Bald; at whose command he translated the Books of Dionysius De Hierarchia, into Latine. Anastasius Bibliothecary of the Vatican, in the Preface before that Translation, writeth unto the same King, It is wonderfull how that barbarous man, which was born at the end of the World, and might have been thought to be as far distant in language, as he was in conversation from men, could understand such things, and turn them into another language; I mean (saith he) John Scot, whom I have heard to have been a very holy man. It is no marvel that he call him barbarous, because the Scots before that time, and some hundred years thereafter, did never acknowledge the See of Rome. This John did write a book, De Corpore & Sanguine Domini, against the opinion of carnal presence; which was condemned at the Synod of Verceilles, as followeth. Bellarmin de Eucharist. lib. 1. cap. 1. saith, This man was the first who writ doubtingly of this matter. It is the fault of the Romaniists that his book is not extant; but since it was not condemned by the Church for the space of 200 years, and none of his time spoke against that book, he wanted no reason in it. He writ a book of 19 Chapters, De unica Prædestinatione, more curious then sound; which was answered by Florus of Lions, as is before. He writ also a book with a Greek Title, περί Φυσικῶν Διακρίσεων, of the distinction of natures: Some write, In it is the resolution of many profitable questions, but so that he followeth the greeks more then the Latines, and for this the Pope did persecute him; he fled into England, and was in account with Alfred, and was his Counsellour and Teacher of his children; afterwards he retired to the Abbey at Malmsbury, where his Disciples murthered him with their pen-knives; being inticed thereunto by the Monks, because he did speak against the carnal presence; as saith Zepper. de calumnia heres. Berengar. and was accounted a Martyr, as is recorded by Guiliel. Malmsbu. de gest. reg. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 4.

CHAP. V.

OF COUNCELS.

1. MAny Synods were assembled in the beginning of this Century, and all ex jussu Imperatoris; as is express in the beginning of them particularly. In the year 813, Charls the Great assembled four Councils, one of 30 Bishops, and 25 Abbots at Mentz. In Ca. 4. it was ordained, That Baptism should be solemnly administred at Easter and Pentecost; but in case of necessity they might baptize at any time. Ca. 5. Seeing we have one God and Father in Heaven, and one mother the Church, one faith, and one baptism; therefore we should live in one peace and concord, if we desire to come into that one and true inheritance in the Kingdom of Heaven; for God is not the Authour of confusion, but of peace; and he saith, Blessed are the peaceable. Ca. 6. an Act is, That fatherles children should not be dis-inherited: [This Act is to be expounded by another, following in the Council at Cabilon.] And the Fathers protest, that if it seem, they have passed bounds in admonishing his clemency, the Act be amended. Ca. 8. We will that Bishops have power to provide, rule, govern and dispense Spiritual and Ecclesiastical things, according to the authority of Canons; and that Laicks be obedient unto Bishops in their ministry, to rule the Churches of God, to defend widows and fatherles: And that Bishops should consent unto Counts and Judges to do justice; and that just Laws be not corrupted by lies, false witness, false oaths or rewards. Ca. 10. We decree that there be a distinction, between them which are said to have left the World, and them who yet follow it: It is therefore provided, by a Law of the Fathers, that who are separated from the secular life, should abstain from worldly pleasures; as, that they be not present at games, nor unhoneft and filthy bankets. Jerom ad Nepotian. saith, We should love the houses of all Christians, as our own; but so, that they may know us rather for comforters in their griefs, then feasters in their joviality: let them not be Usurers nor seekers of filthy gain, nor exerce any fraud; let them fly the love of money, as the mother of many evils: let them leave secular offices and affairs; let them not ascend the steps of honour ambitiously; let them not take gifts for the benefits of Divine medicine; beware of guile and oaths; fly envy, hatred, and back-biting; nor walk with wandring eys, with unstable and wanton tongues or proud carriage; but let them shew forth the shamefacedness of their minds, in simple habit and conversation: let them altogether abhor the filthiness of words, as well as of deeds; eschue the frequent visitations of widows and virgins, and no way haunt the houses of women: let them indeavour alwaies to keep the chastity of an undefiled body, giving due obedience unto their Superiours: Lastly, let them be diligent in teaching and reading, in Hymns and Psalms continually. They who give themselves to be

be servants in God's worship, should be such, that all that while they study to knowledge, they may administer doctrine unto the people. Ca. 11. Abbots and Monks are ordained to conform their lives unto the rule of Benedict, even as they have promised. Ca. 12. Monks are forbidden to go out of their Monasteries, unless upon necessity, and with leave of their Abbot. Ca. 16. To leave the world, is to resist the pleasures of the world; as Paul saith, Who use the World, as if they used it not. Ca. 17. We who have left the World, should wholly observe this, that we have spiritual armour, and forsake secular armour; nor may we stay the Laity from bearing weapons, because it is an old custom. Ca. 24. We ordain, that fasting be kept four times a year by all men; that is, the first week of March, and all should come unto the Church on the fourth, sixth, and Sabbath daies; the second week of June on the same daies, and let all fast untill the ninth hour [or third hour after noon,] likewise the third week of September, and the whole week before Christ's nativity. Ca. 35. If any shall proudly condemn the Fasts, and will not keep them with other Christians; it is ordained in the Gangrene Council, that he shall be accursed, untill he profess amendment. Ca. 38. We command that Tithes be alwaies payed, which God hath commanded to be given unto him; lest if any one hold from God his due, God take away his necessities from him for his sin. Ca. 44. Let the people be alwaies admonished to make their Oblations in the Church; for this is a soverain remedy for their own souls, and the souls of theirs. Ca. 45. Let Priests admonish the people alwaies to learn their Creed, which is the sum of faith, and the Lord's prayer; and we will that they be condignly censured which condemn to learn these two; and therefore, they should send their children unto a School or Monastery, or to a Priest, that they may learn the Catholick faith, and the Lord's prayer, that they may be able to teach others at home; and who cannot otherwise, let him learn them in his own language.

2. In the Council at Worms is first a Confession of faith, which is a plain and sound exposition of the Creed of the Apostles, and no mention in it of Christ's descending into Hell. Ca. 1. None should presume to make chrisim, but the Bishop. Ca. 4. Let no Church be consecrated, untill the Bishop receive the gift of the Church confirmed by Charter, and sufficient means for him who shall serve in it. Ca. 8. Of the Revenues of the Church, and Offerings of the Beleevers, let four portions be made; one for the Bishop; another to the Clerks for their service; a third for the poor and strangers; and the fourth to be kept for the Fabrick of the Church. Ca. 10. All Clerks are forbidden to lie with their wives, upon pain of deposition. Ca. 17. Let no Bishop, Priest, nor Deacon have Dogs for hunting, nor Hawks. Ca. 25. Let Pennance be enjoined unto Penitents at the pleasure of the Priests, according to the difference of faults, and quality of time, persons, places, age, sighs and affection of offenders. Ca. 32. All Christians are forbidden to marry any of their kindred, so far as can be known. Ca. 35. Women who cause themselves to make abortion, should without all doubt be punished as murderers; but who in their sleep do smother their babes, we should judge more easily of them, because they have fallen into this mischance unwillingly. Ca. 41. Who continue in malice and envy, after they are admonished by the Priest, should be excommunicated. Ca. 51. Unto each Church a manse should be given free from all service; and the Priests should give no service but Ecclesiastical for Tithes, for the peoples oblations, alterages, Church-yards; but if they have any other thing, let them pay dues unto their Superiours. Ca. 51. When means may be had at the sight of the Bishop, let every Church have their own Presbyter. Ca. 52. If a Church be new built in a Village, let the Tithes of that Village be payed unto that Church. Ca. 61. When witnesses cannot be had to testifie of the certainty that an Infant was baptized, nor themselves can shew that they were baptized, without all scruple they may be baptized. Our neighbours the Mores advise us to do so, because they redeem many such from the Barbarians.

3. In the first words of the Council at Rhemes, An. 815, it is said expressly, This is assembled by the Emperour, after the manner of ancient Emperours. Here the Epistles and Gospels were read for information of Deacons. Ca. 6. The Missals were examined for information of Priests. Ca. 9. The rules of Benedict were read for reformation of Monks. Ca. 10. Liber Pastorales of Gregory was read for reformation of Pastours. Ca. 11. Divers Sentences of several Fathers were read, that both Prelates and People might be stirred up to zeal and study of good works. 12. A form of hearing Confessions, and prescribing penance, was ordered. Ca. 13. Eight principal vices were declared, that all men might know them, and by the help of God abstain from them. Ca. 14. Bishops were commanded to read more diligently the Scriptures and writings of the Fathers, and to preach unto the people. Ca. 17. Bishops and Abbots should not permit wanton jests in their hearing, but have with them the poor and needy; and the word of God should be sounding beside them. Ca. 35. As the Lord commandeth, no servile work should be done on the Lord's day, nor Markets be held. Ca. 39. Tithes should be given fully. Ca. 40. Prayers and Oblations should be made for the Emperour and his children, that God would preserve them in all felicity in this world; and of his mercy make them rejoice with the holy Angels in the world to come.

4. At Cabilon it was ordained, that Bishops and Priests should read the Scriptures diligently, and teach their people; they should maintain and erect Schools for young ones. Priests and Monks were rebuked, which did persuade people to give liberally unto Churches and Monasteries, that themselves might live at more ease; and they order that all such goods, as Parents at their death had given foolishly, should be restored unto their children. Bishops and Priests should not be drunk; for how can such rebuke the people? They should not meddle with civil affairs, nor exact any thing from the inferior Priests, nor for chriim, nor for dedication of Churches, or ordination of Priests. They who give publick scandal, should make publick repentance. Concerning Pilgrimages they note many faults; Clarks think themselves free from discharging their office, and cleansed from their sin, if they go to such or such places; Laicks think they may do what they will, if they go thither and pray; Noblemen under pretext of Pilgrimage towards Rome or Turone, do spoil many poor subjects; and poor folks go in Pilgrimage, that they may have the more free occasion of begging, and many times say, that they are going thither, when they have no such purpose; and some are so foolish, that they think the only sight of such places cleanseth them from their sins. And how all these things may be redressed, they expect the will of the Emperour, and not a word of reformation by the Pope.

5. At Aken was a Council by command of Lewis the Godly. There it was decreed amongst other things; First, That every Church should have sufficient maintenance for the Priest, that none need to beg. 2. None of the Clergy, of whatsoever degree, should wear any cloath of Scarlet, or such precious colour, nor have rings on their fingers. 3. Prelats should not have too large houses, nor many horses, nor frequent harlots, nor play at dice, nor have gold or silver on their shoos, slippers nor girdles. Whence may be understood the pride and pomp of Prelates in those daies; which gave occasion unto Platina to say, O if thou, Lewis, wert now alive! the Church hath need of thy holy holy statutes and censure, all orders of the Church are now so luxurious and voluptuous; thou wouldst see now, not only men (which haply might seem light) but horses, and other beasts clothed in purple, with a company of young men running before, and another of older following after; not upon Asles, as Christ did (who is the only example of living well upon earth) but upon fierce and harnished horses, as if they were triumphing over an enemy. I will not speak (saith he) of their silver vessels, and precious household stuff, seeing the ancient dishes of Italy, and ornaments of Attalus, and vessels of Corinth, are nothing in respect of them; and what follows on this, their intemperance I forbear to mention.

6. At Melda, upon the River Matrona, was a Synod assembled by Charls the II; where, among other Canons, it was decreed: First, That every bishop should have in his house one, which according to the pure mind of the Catholick Fathers, who is able to instruct the Priests in the faith and commandments of God; left the house of God, which is his Church, should be without the Lantern of the Word. 2. That Presbyters should not be suffered to continue abroad, but that they dwell at their Church. 3. A charge was given, in the name of Christ, unto all Bishops, unto Kings and all in authority, and unto all who have power in election and ordination in any Order Ecclesiastical, that none be admitted by simony, by whatsoever faction, promise or gift, either by the person or another for him. 4. That no Bishop do retire into a remote place for his own ease, and so neglect his charge; but that he visit his Parishes diligently, and he, with his children, live in chastity, sobriety and hospitality. 5. That the damnable custom of some Bishops be amended, who never or seldom visit their people; although the Lord hath said, I have set thee a Watch-man, &c.

7. At Rome was a Synod of 47 Bishops, convened by Pope Leo the IV, at the command of Lotharius; where these former Canons were confirmed in other words; and moreover, that a Bishop should not be consecrated unless the Clergy and People do crave him: Priests should be diligent in searching the Scriptures, and in teaching the people, and should not permit games in their fight; Priests should not be taken up with fenory, hunting, hawking, or any rural work, nor go abroad without a sacerdotal habit: Abbots must be able to cognosce and amend, whatsoever might be done amiss by their brethren.

8. At Valentia An. 855. was a Council by command of the same Lotharius; there was three Metropolitans, Remigius of Lions, Agilmar of Vienna, Roland of Arles, and 14 Bishops, with a venerable company of Priests and Deacons. Six Canons were enacted: The first for eschuing all new-coined words in doctrine. Ca. 2. God foreknows, and hath eternally foreknown, both the good things which the godly were to do, and the evil which the wicked were to do; because we have the voice of the Scriptures, saying, O eternal God which knowest all things, and hid things, ere they be done; Dan. 13. we faithfully hold, and it pleaseth to hold still, that He foreknew that good men were to be good by his grace, and according to the same grace were to receive everlasting reward; and that he foreknew that the wicked were to be wicked through their own wickedness, and were to be damned with everlasting punishment through his justice; as the Psalmist saith, Power belongeth to God, and unto him belongeth mercy, that he may render unto every one according to their works; and the Apostle teacheth, To them who by patient continuance in well doing seek glory, and honour, and immortality, he gives eternal life; but unto them which are contentious. . . . And again, In flaming fire rending vengeance on them which know not God. . . . And that the foreknowledge of God did not put upon any evil man, any necessity that he could not be otherwise; but that He in his Almighty and unchangeable Majesty (as he knows all things ere they be) did foreknow that the wicked were to be such of their own will: Nor do we beleve that any is condemned in His prejudice, but according to the merit of their own iniquity; nor that the wicked do perish because they could not be good, but because they would not be good; and through their own fault continue in the mass of perdition or original and actual sin. Ca. 3. But concerning the Predestination of God, it pleaseth and faithfully doth please, according to the authority of the Apostle, saying; Hath not the Potter power over the clay, to make of the same mass one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour? We confidently confess the predestination of the elect unto life, and predestination of the wicked unto death; and in the election of them who are to be saved the mercy of God precedes the good merit; but in the damnation of them who perish, their wicked merit precedes the just judgment of God: And in that predestination God hath only appointed what he was to do, either in his gracious mercy, or just judgment; as the Scripture saith, Which hath done what things were to be: But in the wicked he foreknew their wickedness, because it is of them; and he did not predestinate it, because it is not of him; but because he knows all things which he did foreknow, and because he is just, he did predestinate the punishment that follows their merit; for with him (as Augustine saith) is as well a fixed decree, as a certain knowledge of every thing; and hither belongs that saying of the Wise Man, Judgments are prepared for the Scorners, Prov. 19. Of this unchangeableness of the foreknowledge and predestination of God, by which the future things are already done, may that well be understood. Eccles. 3, I know whatsoever God doth, it shall be for ever; nothing can be put to it, and nothing taken from it; and God doth it, that men should fear before him. But that any are, by the power of God, predestinated unto evil, as if they could not be otherwise, We not only do not beleve it; but even if there be any which will beleve such evil, with all detestation (as did the Arausicane Synod) we say Anathema unto them. Ca. 4. Item of the redemption of the blood of Christ, because of so great an error which hath begun in this point; so that some (as their writings declare) define, that it was shed even for the wicked, which from the beginning, unto the coming of Christ, being dead in their wickedness, are punished with everlasting damnation; contrary to that of the Prophet, O death I will be thy death, and O grave I will be thy destruction; it pleaseth us, to hold and teach simply and faithfully according to Evangelical and Apostolical truth, that this price was given for them, of whom our Lord saith, So must the Son of Man be lifted up, that whosoever beleeveth in him shall not perish; but . . . And the Apostle saith, Christ was once offered to take away the sins of many: And moreover, the four Articles that were defined unadvisedly in the Synod of our brethren [at Carisiac] for their inutility, are also error contrary unto truth; and likewise other things concluded foolishly in the 19 Syllogisms [of John Scot] and glorious with no secular literature (although it be boasted otherwise) in which rather the argument of the Devil, then any argument of the faith, is found; we discharge them altogether from the hearing of Beleevers; and by the authority of the Holy Ghost we inhibit them, that those, and such things, be altogether shunned; and we do judge, that introducers of new things should be corrected, lest they be smitten more severely. Ca. 5. We believe that it should be held firmly, that all the multitude of the faithfull is regenerated by the water and the Spirit, and thereby truly incorporated into the Church; and according to Apostolical doctrine are baptized into the death of Christ, and washed in his blood; because neither could be true regeneration in them, unless there were also true redemption; seeing in the Sacraments of the Church nothing is in vain, and nothing in mockery; but altogether all things are true, and rely upon its truth and sincerity. And yet of that multitude of the faithful and redeemed, some are saved by eternal salvation, because through the grace of God, they continue faithfully in their redemption, hearing in their hearts the voice of their Lord, Matth. 10. & 24. Who continueth unto the end shall be saved; and others, because they would not continue in the salvation of faith, which before they had received, and did chuse rather to make the grace of redemption in vain, through their wicked doctrine and life, then to keep it, attain no way to the fullness of salvation and possession of eternal blessedness: Seeing in both we have the doctrine of the godly Doctour, Whosoever are baptized into Christ, are baptized into his death; and, All which are baptized into Christ, have put on Christ; and, Let us draw near with a true heart in fullness of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and being washed in the body with clean water, let us hold fast the profession of our hope without change: And again, For them which sin willingly, after the received knowledge of the truth, there remains no other sacrifice for sin; and, He that despises the Law of Moses Ca. 6. Item of grace by which the Believers are saved, and without which never any reasonable creature hath lived blessedly; and of free-will, which is weakened by sin in the first man, but by the grace of Jesus Christ is renewed and healed in his Believers: We believe constantly, and with full faith, the same that the most holy Fathers have left to be kept according to the authority of the Holy Scriptures; what the Arausican and African Synods have professed; what the blessed High-Priests of the Apostolical See have held in the Catholick faith; and presuming to decline no way into another side, concerning nature and grace: But we reject altogether the foolish questions, and almost the fable of old women, and Scot's pottage (which the purity of faith cannot digest, and which have miserably and lamentably arisen in these most dangerous and grievous times, unto a heap of our labours, and breach of charity) lest Christian minds be corrupted, and fall from the simplicity and purity of faith which is in Jesus Christ: So far they. What they say here of Scot's pottage, they understand that Treatise of John Scot; and have borrowed the phrase from Jerom's Prologue, on Jerem. lib. 1. (speaking of Celestius, a Disciple of Pelagius, a Briton, and not a Scot.) And from this word Baronius ad An. 855. §. 1. writes, that this Synod was convened against some vagring Scots, of whom Gottschalk was the prime man; and thereby hath brought not only his Brainus & Posssevinus, but also our Zeth Celvisius into this Historical error; whereas neither was Gottschalk a Scot, nor of one accord with this John Scot, as we have cleared before.

9. At Macra, within the Diocly of Rhemes, was a Synod An. 881. There they distinguish between the power Civil and Ecclesiastical; and shew, that only Christ Jesus was both King and Priest, after the Incarnation; and as the one hath need of the other, so neither should a King assume Priestly power; nor a Priest meddle with secular affairs, or usurp Royal power; but they come not to shew what power belongeth unto the Magistrate in Ecclesiastical affairs. They do recite a Synodal Homily of Gregory the I. wherein the ambition of Priests is taxed, in these words; Because we have slipped into external purposes, partly through barbarous clamours, and partly through negligence of our time; and we have left the ministry of Preaching, and to our punishment are called Bishops, who keep the name of honour, and not the virtue thereof; for they which have been committed unto us do forsake the Lord, and we are silent when they are weltring in their wicked works; nor do we reach the hand of correction; they perish daily with much wickedness, and we are careless when we see them going into Hell. But how can we amend the lives of others, since we have little thought of our own? for we are so bent upon Secular cares, that we are unsensible of what is within, because we do affect so much other things without us; for with the use of earthly care, our minds are hardened from heavenly desire; and when with the very use we are hardened in the actions of Adam's world, we cannot be softened unto those things which do concern the love of our Lord; when we are taken up with extraneous actions, we do forget the ministry of our own actions; we forsake the cause of our Lord, and do wait on earthly affairs; we take on us the place of holiness, and are drowned with earthly actions. It is verily fulfilled in us, what is written, And there shall be like People, like Priest: For the Priest is no better than the People, when we go not beyond them in the holiness of life. Behold! now is not any Secular action which is not administered by Priests. We see with how heavy a sword the World is stricken, and with what rods the people do daily perish; whose fault is this but ours? Behold! Towns are wasted, the Tents of the Church are overthrown, Monasteries are thrown down, the Fields lie wast; and we are the Authors of the peoples death, who should lead them into life; for, for our sin are the people beaten down, because through our sloth they are not instructed unto life. Let us take it to heart. Who were ever converted by our teaching, or being admonished by us were brought unto repentance? Who hath left their luxury by our information? Who hath forsaken pride or avarice? Here we are called Shepherds; but when we shall appear before the face of the eternal Shepherd, can we bring thither any flock which hath been converted by our preaching? But oh that we were able to preach; and could hold forth the duty of our place in the innocency of our lives! So far they:

10. In the first half of this Century, were many Synods in England, and did treat little or nothing in doctrine or manners, but only for jurisdiction and revenges of Bishops and Abbots; as is evident in S. Hen. Spelman Concil. About the year 887. was a Synod under King Alfred; at least, Laws both Ecclesiastical and Civil were published in his name. He beginneth with the ten Commands, and omits the second; for filling up the number, he saith, The tenth, Thou shalt not have Gods of silver or gold. On this place Will. Lambard (who did translate these Laws out of the Saxonish into Latine) saith, This omission of the second Command was not his fault, nor of the first writer, but of the first maker of the Laws; for (saith he) since the second Council at Nice, such was the darkness of these times, that for conciliating authority unto the Precepts of men, they thought good to diminish the Precepts of God.

11. At Tribur was a Synod of 22 German Bishops, An. 895. at command of the Emperour Arnulph, and the Decrees were made in his name. In Ca. 1. He commandeth to apprehend all excommunicated persons, and bring them unto him, that they may be punished with man's judgment, which will not fear the judgment of God; and if any be so rebellious, that they will not be taken, and so happen to be killed; they who kill them, shall be free from all censures both Ecclesiastical and Civil. Ca. 6. If any come presumptuously into a Church with a drawn sword, he commits sacrilege, and shall be punished as for sacrilege. Ca. 11. If any of the Clergy, although extremely coerced, shall commit murder, whether a Priest or Deacon, should be deposed; for we read in the Canons of the Apostles, That if a Bishop or Priest, or Deacon be found guilty of fornication, or perjury, or theft, he should be deposed; how much more he who commits so great a crime? for he who professeth to follow Christ, should walk as he hath walked; when he was reviled, he reviled not again; and when he was smitten, he smote not again. Ec. Ca. 13. Augustine the wonderful Doctour, seemeth to have spoken clearly of Tithes in few words; Tithes are required as debt: What if God would say, Thou art mine, O man; the earth which thou tillest is mine; the seed which thou scatterest is mine; the beasts which thou weariest are mine; the heat of the Sun is mine; and since all is mine, thou who appliest but thy hands, deservest only the tenth part; and yet I give thee nine parts, give me the tenth; if thou wilt not give me the tenth, I will take away the nine; if thou givest me the tenth, I will multiply the nine unto thee: If any man ask, wherefore should Tithes be given? let him know, that therefore are they given; that God being appeased with this devotion, he would give us necessities more abundantly; and that the Ministers of the Church being helped, may be the more free for Spiritual Service..... We do judge that there should be four portions of the Tithes and Oblations of Believers, according to the Canons, Ec. Ca. 40. It is not lawfull in Christian religion, that a man should have her to wife, whom he hath defiled in adultery. Ca. 41. If any man hath committed fornication with a woman, and his brother shall afterwards marry her; the brother which first defiled her (because he told not his brother, ere he married her) shall suffer a very hard penance and correction; and the woman, according to the second Canon of the Neocæsarian Council, shall be put to death.

Of EMPEROURS.

The Title of the Emperour depended not on the Pope:

After the death of Arnulph was great confusion in the Empire; the Italians would be at liberty, and the Germans strove for the honour of their Nation; so that Bellarmin de Translat. Imper. lib. 2. cap. 2. holdeth, that there was no Emperour between Arnulph and Otho the Great, because they were not Crowned by the Pope, neither went they into Italy. But Alb. Crantz in Saxon. lib. 3. cap. 4. saith, If he be not Emperour who is not Crowned by a Pope, who did Crown Augustus, and all the Cæsars, until Charls the Great? He by whom Kings do reign, and the mighty discern justice. If he be not Emperour who goeth not into Italy, let the Constantinopolitans lose their liberty, of whom few have seen Italy: So also the Emperours of our time [he died An. 1517.] Wherefore (saith he) let us not defraud these good Emperours of their own honour; we know by what way the Roman Popes have insinuated themselves into that inauguration. So far he. And seeing the three next Emperours did enjoy that Title, the Empire was not transferred from France to Germany by the Popes. These were Emperours beyond the Alps, as the Italian Historians term them. The Empire, through the last hundred years, went by succession, and not by election either of Pope or of Princes; except that once or twice the right heir was disappointed by their own negligence, and the ambition of others, saith Crantz. loc. cit. The Italians had their own respects, and would hold the Title among themselves, yet could never consent in the person of any; as followeth. The History of this Century is confused, as the times were miserable; for uncessant Wars were every where; wrongs, rapines and vices abounded, little justice was executed; especially in Italy learning decayed, charity was not known, zeal was gone, and the Infidels became strong.

times.*

2. LEWIS succeeded his Father in the Empire of the Germans; and Berengarius prevailed in Italy, but came not into Rome. The Hungars (a people ple lately come from Scythia) were troublesome to both these Nations, and they forced both these Emperours to give them a sum of money yearly. Lewis espying the weakness of the Pope, and the dissensions in Italy, had a purpose to recover it; once he put Berengarius to flight, and possessed himself of the most part of Lombardy; they received him in Belona, but laid hands on him unaware, and delivered him unto Berengarius, who caused his eyes to be put out; shortly thereafter he died An. 912. In his time the valiant Fernando Consalves, made great conquest in Spain against the Sarazens. Then contention arose between the French and the Germans for the Empire. Lewis King of Provence, pretendeth that he is nearest in blood; but the German Princes held together, and would have chosen Otho Duke of Saxony, a valiant and wise man, who had married the only daughter of the defunct Lewis; but he refused it, pretending infirmity in respect of his age, and fearing troubles; and he perswadeth to chuse,

3. CONRADE the I, Duke of Franconia, the Nephew of the Emperour Arnulph, and brother-son of Lewis. He followed the counsel of Otho during his daies. In the beginning of his Reign, Saba King of the Moors, by the procurement of Constantine, Emperour of Constantinople, came into Italy, and occupied Pavia, Calabria, and all the Kingdom of Naples, to the small advantage of him who had inticed him; neither could they be expelled, because of the seditions amongst Christians every where: Especially when Otho was dead, Conrade was molested by his son Henry, pretending that the Empire did by line belong unto him. Conrade sent his brother against the Saxon, who was overthrown; then he repaired his Army, and sent Embassadors unto Henry, requiring him to submit upon honourable conditions: Henry would hear of no Treaty. Then Conrade fell sick, and feeling death approach, he perswaded his brother Eberhard to submit unto Henry, and sent him unto him with the Crown, Imperial Robe, and other ornaments An. 920. Naucier. Constantine yet reigneth in Constantinople; and Berengarius the II was called Emperour of Italy, although he had but Lombardy with great difficulty, Pet. Mexia Histor.

4. HENRY the I, coming to the Empire partly by succession, and partly by voluntary resignation, with consent of the Subjects, did refuse to be Crowned by the Pope; or (as Crantz. in Saxon. lib. 3. cap. 4. saith) not that he despised it, but in modesty he did decline it; neither did he need the consent of the Princes, but because he was desirous of peace, he would ex abundanti assemble a Diet, that he might Reign with universal consent. He applied himself to set Germany in peace, and above all to assure the high-ways from Robbers, as usually they are frequent in time of wars. Several rose against him, but were suppressed. Arnold Duke of Bavaria, before this had lived in Hungary, as in exile; now he returneth with the Hungarians; he usurped the Title of Emperour. When both Armies were ready to join, Henry called him to a parley, and by perswasion overcame him; which haply he could not have effectuated by Arms, and Arnold became obedient. Then Rodolph, Duke of Burgundy, called himself Emperour of Italy, as followeth; He overthrew Berengarius, and caused him to fly, so that he died without recovering his dignity. Rodolph had no great mind to resist the Hungars, which were sent for by Albert Marquess of Tuscany, against Pope John the XII; and they took both lands and life from Albert; and moreover, did wait other parts of Italy. Therefore the Italians did invite Hugh, Duke of Orleans; he subdued Rodolph, and conquered more in Italy then any other of these late Emperours, and kept peace with Germany. Henry had wars with the Hungars, and was glad to have truce with them for nine years. In the mean time he overcame the Bohemians, and brought them under the Empire; as also he overthrew the Vandals about Brandeburgh, and gave their lands unto his Field-Marshal, with the Title of Marquess. Alb. Crantz. lib. ii. c. 8 & 9. He overthrew the Sclavonians by the Beltick Sea, and returned with much spoil. When the nine years truce was expired, he obtained so great a victory against the Hungarians, that all the Princes of Christendom sent unto him with congratulation. Then he intended to recover Italy from Hugh and the Sarazens, but was visited with sickness, and declared his son to be his Successour, An. 937. At this time Constantine was dead, who had many times fought with the Sarazens in Asia, and with the Bulgarians; the Russians had brought a thousand Ships through the Euxine Sea, and were discomfited by him. His father-in-law Romanus was partner of the Empire with him 26 years, and then another Romanus succeeded unto his father. Zonar.

Emperour,*

5. OTHO or Otto the I, was Crowned at Aken by the Bishop of Mentz, and was many waies troubled, for Bodislaus (who had killed his brother, because he had submitted unto the Emperour, or rather for covetousness of the Dukedom of Bohem) rebelled, and with the aid of the Hungars continued Wars the space of 14 years: And in the mean time his own brother Henry, with other Princes of Germany, fought many Battels against him. In the end they all convened their forces, and as he was crossing the Rhine with his Army, they came unawares upon that part which had crossed, and at first took his Ships. The Emperour was sorely moved that he could not come at his Army, and betook himself, with such as were with him, unto prayers; and the next morning all his Adversaries were scattered, neither knew they upon what motive, such fear had overtaken them. The Italians now hearing of his success, and being oppressed by Berengarius the III; they, and especially Pope Agapet, did invite Otho to deliver the Church and Italy. He was not slow, and vanquished the oppressour; and then by all the Italians he was saluted Augustus and Emperour. Tho. Couper. ad An. 962. Afterward his eldest son Ludolf, taking it ill that his father did marry again; and Conrade, Duke of Lorrain, the Emperour's son-in-law, taking it also ill that he had left Berengarius Governour of Italy, they conspire against Otho; Ludolf was taken, and Conrad fled; within some moneths he received them both into favour. Then the Hungars did raise such an Army that they thought themselves invincible; and in the mean time, on the other side, the Sclavonians rose against Otho: he subdued them both. Then Pope John the XII, and his faction at Rome, began to envy the prosperity of the Germans, and sent to Adelbert, the son of Berengarius, promising assistance if he would deliver Rome and Italy; and their adverse party, with two Cardinals, sent unto Otho, intreating that he would come unto the aid of the Church and Common-Wealth, for both were in danger. When Pope John had intelligence hereof, he caused the nose of the one Cardinal to be cut off, and the hand of the other. Otho composed his affairs in Germany the best way he could, and hastned into Italy; he took Adelbert captive, and came to Rome; and was Crowned by Pope John against his will. He thought it not a fit time to arraign Pope John, because all Italy was in uproar; but did exhort him to live as it became the Apostolical See; he sent Berengarius captive to Bamberg in Germany, and Adelbert into Constantinople to gratifie the Emperour there. Thereafter the people and Clergy of Rome, intreat Otho to reform the Church and Republick, for there had been no Councils in a long time, &c. Otho having appeased the tumult in the City, and having assurance of fidelity, calleth a Synod in Lateran (which, from the great number of Bishops out of Germany, Italy and France, was termed The Great Synod) and and summoned Pope John to appear, and hear his cause examined. John returned answer that he would not appear, because he knew that the Emperour purposed to dispossess him; and he accursed them all who sate in that Synod, and degraded them all of their functions. Notwithstanding his curses, the Synod continued, and the Articles against the Pope were read: First, That Pope John did not observe the Canonical hours. 2. When he said Mass, he did not communicate. 3. He ordained Deacons in a stable. 4. He had committed Incest with two sisters. 5. When he was playing at dice, he called on the Devil for help. 6. For money he had made boys of ten years old to be Bishops. 7. He deflowred Virgins, and of the Lateran Palace he made a stew. 8. He lay with Stephana his fathers concubine. 9. He caused houses to be set on fire. 10. He drank to the Devil. Catalog. test. ver. lib. 11. hath more Articles from Luthpr. lib. 6. cap. 7. When these things were propounded, the Emperour said, I know that envy follows honour . . . and in this case I conjure you all, that ye do not propound any thing against him in his absence, but what you know to be true. All the Synod, as if they had been one man, do answer; If these and worse crimes have not been committed by Pope John, let Saint Peter the Prince of the Apostles, which by his word shuts heaven upon the unworthy, never absolve us from our sins; let us be accursed, and at the last day let us be ranked on the left hand. The Emperour sent in his own name, and in the name of the Synod, unto the Pope a copy of these Articles, willing him to come and purge himself; and he promised by Oath, that nothing should be done, in that cause, otherwise then the Ecclesiastical Laws did prescribe. He returned answer thus; Pope John unto all those Bishops contempt: We hear say that you will make another Pope; which if ye do, I excommunicate you from the Almighty God, that we have no power to consecrate nor say Mass. When this was read, more Bishops were come from France and Italy; to wit, Henry of Trevirs, Wido of Muzia, Sigulf of Placentia, &c. And with one voice they writ again unto him, thus; Unto the great High-Priest, and universal Pope John, Otho By the clemencies of God, Emperour Augustus; and the holy Synod of Rome gathered in the Lord for the service of God, greeting: In the last Synod, which was held the 6 of Novemb. we did direct Letters unto you, wherein were contained the words of your accusers, and the causes of their accusation; and in these also we did intreat your greatness, as was just; and we have received Letters from you, not as the condition of the time, but as the vanity of your Counsellors would . . . it is written in your Letters not as becomes a Bishop, but a foolish child to write; for ye have excommunicated us all, that we shall not have power to sing Mass, or order any Church affairs, if we shall ordain another Bishop for the Romish sea. . . . If you delay not to come unto the Synod, and purge your self, certainly we will obey your authority: but if (which God forbid) you dissemble to come and purge you of those capital crimes, especially seeing nothing hindreth you, no sailing by Sea, nor distance of way, nor health, We will not regard your excommunication, but rather we throw it back on you, because we may do it justly. Judas the traitour and seller of our Lord Jesus Christ, did receive, with the other Apostles, power of binding and loosing . . . and so long as he continued good amongst the Disciples, he could bind and loose; but when the murder was killed with the poison of covetousness, and would kill LIFE; whom could he bind or loose but himself, whom he did strangle in an unhappy rope? Given Novemb. 21. and sent by Adrian a Cardinal Priest, and Benedict a Cardinal Deacon; who when they came to Tiberis, did not find him, for he was gone with Bow and Arrows into the fields; neither could any man tell whither he was gone; and when they could not find him, they returned with these Letters unto the Synod, when it was convened the third time. By this citation they declare that Peter's Chair doth not preserve a Bishop from becoming a Judas, nor from answering before a Synod for his fault. Then said the Emperour, We have expected his coming, that before him we might complain of what he hath done unto us; but since we know certainly that he will not come, we earnestly desire that ye may know how perfidiously he hath dealt with us; therefore we declare unto you Arch-Bishops, Priests, Deacons, and all the Clergy; as also unto the Counts, Judges, and all the people, that the same Pope John, being oppressed by Berengarius and Adelbert our Rebels, he sent Messengers unto us in Saxony, intreating that for the love of God we would come into Italy, and deliver the Church of Saint Peter and himself out of their jaws: And what we have done, God aiding us, I need not declare; when he was delivered out of their hands by my means, and restored unto his honour, and was ingaged unto us by his oath and fidelity, which he did promise upon the body of Saint Peter, he caused the same Adelbert to come unto Rome, defended him against me, did raise seditions, and in the presence of our Souldiers, he was Captain of the War, being arrayed with Helmet, Breast-plate, &c. Now let the Synod declare what they do discern in these things. All did answer with one voice, A strange wound must be cauterized; if by his corrupt members he had done ill to himself only, and not to all others, he might in some way have been tolerated; how many chaste persons are become filthy by following him? How many good persons are, through his example, become Reprobates? Therefore we wish, that by the power of your Imperial Majesty, such a Monster which is not redeemed by any vertue from his vices, may be removed from the holy Roman Church, and another set in his place, which may go before us in example of godly conversation. . . . Catal. test. ver. out of Luthpr. lib. 6. cap. 11. Then (as Io. Naucler. vol. 2. generat. 33. writes) said Otho, Ye Romans, unto whom the election of your High-Priest belongeth, set God before your eyes, chuse a worthy man, and when he is chosen, I will confirm him. So with common consent, or without any difference John was deposed, and Leo was chosen, An. 963. In another Session of the same Synod, this is the sum of the oration of Leo, It is not unknown, that all these evils are entred into the Church through the ambition of Bishops, who respecting their own authority more than the peace of the Church, have taken that priviledge from the Emperours, which Pope Adrian acknowledged to appertain unto Charls the Great, in governing the Church, and the election of the Bishop of Rome; wherefore the reformation of the Church requires, that the Constitution of Pope Adrian be renewed. Sigon. After some disputation the same was renewed, and the Decree is in Gratian. dist. 63. cap. In Synodo, these are the words: From henceforth let no man, of whatsoever dignity or religion, have power to elect a Patricius or Bishop of the highest Apostolick Seat, or to invest any Bishop, without the consent of the Emperour, which notwithstanding must be done without money; and he himself must be a Patricius and King: But if any be chosen by the Clergy and People, let him not be consecrated, unless he be approved and invested by the King. If any man shall enterprize against this Apostolick authority, we discern him subject to excommunication, &c. At this time Pope John made promise to distribute the treasure of Saint Peter, unto them who would kill the Emperour. The inconstant Romans were moved with this promise, nor did they love the government of a German; so they arose against the Emperour. He was forewarned, and put them to flight. Thereafter the Romans dealt for peace, they acknowledged the Emperour's clemency, and do vow to abide loyal in time coming; and for assurance the Emperour would have a 100 persons in pledge. So Otho returns into Germany, and within a short space Leo was expelled, and Pope John was received at Rome. Wherefore the Emperour went back, and laid siege to Rome, did through famine cause them to render. When he was entred the City, he restored Leo; and for taking away the schism, he calleth a meeting of the Clergy. Benedict the V. (who was chosen after John) came in his Pontificals into the Synod; and Benedict a Cardinal Arch-Deacon said unto him, By what right couldst thou put upon thee the Papal Ornaments and Vesture, so long as Pope Leo was alive? Whom thou didst chuse; canst thou deny, that thou didst swear before the Emperour, that thou without his authority, or the authority of his son, wouldest never chuse or vote to any Pope? He answereth, if I have done amiss, I pray forgive me. Then said Otho, It is equitable, O Fathers, to forgive him, seeing he confesseth his fault. Benedict did cast himself down at the Emperour's feet, and craved pardon. Leo deprived him of the degree of Priesthood, and the Emperour sent him into Germany, with Adaldag Bishop of Hamburg, where he died. Sigon. lib. 7. Now the Emperour made another face on Italy, he created many Dukes, who afterwards were the causes of many troubles; and by their favour the Popes waxed stronger. Now also Otho had conquered Pulia and Calabria, and was called the Great; he ordained his son to be his Successour, and caused him to be Crowned Emperour conjunct with himself, after the ancient custom of Emperours; and then did return into Germany where he died, An. 974. Pet. Mexia Hist. Romanus Emperour of Constantinople had two sons; but Nicephorus a valiant Captain was chosen Emperour, and not long after he was deprived and slain; and then John Zimisces, another Captain, was made Emperour. He expelled 300000 Roxellans out of Bulgaria, and annexed that Province unto the Crown, and for his victory he made triumph. After six years, through the treachery of his Subjects he was poisoned, and left the sons of Romanus, Basilus and Constantine of equal authority. Zonar.

5. OTHO the II had Wars with the Duke of Sclavonia, then with Lotharius King of France, for the Dukedom of Lorain and Austrich, and had good success. He married Theophania the sister of Basilus, Emperour of Constantinople, and with her the Emperour did renounce the Title of Sicily, Pulia and Calabria. Theod. à Nyen in Nemor. tract. 6. cap. 34. Nevertheless he seeing Otho pestered with so many troubles, came into Italy to recover Pulia and Calabria, which also he did. In the second fight Otho suffered great loss; and Basilus might have taken Rome, if he had pursued his Victory. Otho not daring to encounter him any more, fled into a boat to escape by Sea, and fell into the hands of a Pyrat, who carried him into Sicily, not knowing who he was: he was ransomed, and returned into Rome, where he died An. 984. Then again was contention at Rome for a new Emperour. The Romans would have had their Consul Crescentius chosen. Henry Duke of Bavier, and cousin of Otho the II, did challenge the right of educating the late Emperour's son Otho, and fought the Empire for himself. The Princes of Germany (for fear of Crescentius) did with one consent speedily chuse Otho, although but 12 years old.

6. OTHO the III, with natural fortitude, was learned in Grecian wisdom; for his rare gifts he was accounted the wonder of the World. He suppressed Crescentius, and was received by all Italy. He caused his Uncle Bruno to be chosen to the Papal Chair, this was Pope Gregory the V. The Romans did hardly condescend unto his election; and therefore when Otho was gone into Germany, Crescentius caused Pope John the XVIII. to be elected.

Ecc The

The Emperour is weakened again.

The Emperour is great again and puts a Pope to death.

The order for electing an Emperour.

The Emperour returned with speed, and forced the Romans to submit, and deprived Pope John of life. Aventinus writes, that they threw his body over the Wall of the Capitol, and since that day a Pope may not visit the Capitol. Also he did set Crescentius upon a vile horse, after he had cut off his nose and ears, and caused him to be carried through the City, and then hanged him. The Romans were still discontented, and feared lest the Empire might return to Constantinople, because Otho was so neer in blood unto Basilius, and so a new mutiny began. So soon as the Emperour had intelligence, he (having no male children) by advice of the German Princes (saith Naucler. chronogr. vol. 2. gener. 34.) and of his Uncle Gregory the V. would provide against insurrection in time coming. Many do call this the work of Pope Gregory; but if his power at that time be duly considered, we may rather think with Naucler, that Otho laid this foundation of electing an Emperour. First, That from henceforth none may challenge the Empire by right of inheritance, but by election only. 2. That the electors should all be Germans. 3. That the Emperour should be a German. 4. When the Seat is vacant, the Empire shall be administred by the electors. 5. That the Emperour should be chosen at Frankford, and be called King of the Romans, untill he be Crowned by the Pope, and then be called Cæsar Augustus. 6. Some do add that the Emperour should be Crowned with three Crowns, one of straw in Mentz, another of iron at Millain, and the third of gold at Rome. He devised some of these conditions to satisfie the Italians, and by the others he thought to establish the Empire in Germany; the Articles thereafter were more particularly cleared. Henry Duke of Bavier, for the good service he did for the Emperour at Rome (as followeth) got the first place of the Civil Estate, and was made Portitor ensis; the Marquess of Brandenburg was designed Camerarius; and the Count Palatine of Rhine was created Archidapifer: Unto them were conjoined three Bishops, of Mentz, Colein and Trevers; and if these could not agree, the odd voice was to be given unto the Duke of Bohem. The Peers of France were not well pleased, because their Kingdom was altogether excluded; nevertheless because their Royal race was lately changed from the blood of Charls the Great, to the house of Hugh le grand, Earl of Paris, they let it pass. Platin. in Gregor. 5. In the year 1001 the Sarazens invaded Italy, and took Capua. Otho did quickly overthrow them, and returning into Rome, said, that he would reform some things that were amiss in the Kingdom and Church, according to ancient custom. Sigon. de regn. Ital. lib. 7. and some write that he purposed to fix his manure at Rome. He begun to build a Palace in the place where Julian the Apostate had dwelt. The Romans in a sudden uproar slue many Germans, took Otho; and had slain him in his chamber, if Henry Duke of Bavier, and Hugh an Italian Marquess, had not feigned a capitulation with the Citizens; and in the mean time Otho disguised himself, and escaped their hands. It was not without the Supream Providence (saith Genebrard in Chronol. lib. 3. about the year 315.) that the Kingdom of the Church might have place, as it was foretold by Daniel. If he had said the Kingdom of Antichrist foretold by Paul and John, he had hit the mark. Otho returned into Germany, and thereafter he went back to Rome, where he was poisoned by a golden cup, which the wife of Crescentius sent unto him; and his body was carried into Germany, An. 1002. Crantz. in Saxon. lib. 4. cap. 26.

OF P O P E S.

Cardinal Baronius in tom. 10. ad An. 903. § 1. forewarneth his Reader, that now he shall see the abomination of desolation in the Temple, as it was fore-told by Daniel and by our Lord. What doth he insinuate in these words, but that the Reader should flie out of Babel, and leave her abominations? and the rather, because he continueth lamenting and crying, Eie for shame! alas for sorrow! that so many Monsters, horrible to be seen, were thrust into the See which deserves reverence of Angels! how many miseries, how many tragedies have proceeded from them! And Fascicul. temp. ad An. 894. saith, Oh, oh good God! how is the gold become so darkned! how many scandals do we read, that have been about these times in the Apostolical See, which thou hast kept with so great zeal hitherto! what contentions, sects, ambitions, intrusions, persecutions! oh the baddest times, when the godly man hath failed, and truth is perished from the children of men! alas! what convention, what congregation, what man shall now be secure, seeing primitive holiness hath so failed! A little before An. 914. he saith, There was presented unto Lewis, a Monster with a dogs head, and all the other members of a man; which did resemble (saith he) the estate of that time; for men without a head did wander hither and thither, barking like dogs. And Genebrard. in Chronol. ad An. 901. saith, This age was unhappy for one thing, that in the space of almost 150 years, were about fifty Popes (from John the VIII, till Leo the IX) which made defection from the truth of their Predecessours; and they were Apotactici, Apostatae potius quam Apostolici; that is, out of all order and Apostates, rather then the followers of the Apostles. And Naucler. loc. cit. gener. 31. speaking of Pope Romanus, saith, Behold how far these have degenerated from their Predecessours; for these holy men did maintain the decrees of their Predecessours as their own; but now they have forsaken the worship of God, and do exerce enmity one against another, no other way then most cruel Tyrants, for fullfilling their own lusts, when there was none to restrain their vices. Therefore did God pull them quickly away as Monsters, that they might do the less harm. Who will not wonder that in the time of the Reign of Lewis the VIII, Popes did possess the chair of blessed Peter; and he did not reign above 12 years. In a word, all old Historians do write of these times, that the Popes were not Successours of Peter; and I do premit these testimonies, because the Papists may possibly say, that what follows is all written maliciously, although it be written most truly.

1. BONIFACE the VI, came next to Formosus; he sate short time, saith Naucler. Platina saith, he sate but 26 daies, because nothing is written of him. They who deny the She-Pope, and the vacancy for eight years, would fill up the time here, and say that Boniface sate 12 years. But see whether that can stand with these former testimonies in the general, concerning the short lives of the Monsters, and with their practices that follow; and by this example others may judge what credit is to be given unto the late Popish Historians.

2. STEPHEN the VI did so envy the name of Formosus (because he hindred his ambition) that in a Synod he did abrogate all his Decrees, and ordained his body to be taken up, two of his fingers to be cut off, and his right hand (because therewith they consecrated the Priests) to be cast into Tiberis; and the remnant of his body to be buried in a Lay-man's burial. Platina

Popes were not Successours of Apostles.

Against Popes

tina subjoineth, This was a great controversie and a bad example, seeing thereafter this custom was almost evermore kept, that the following Popes did either violate or altogether abrogate the decrees of their Predecessours. Baronius ad An. 900. § 5.6. saith, This wicked man, who entred into the Sheep-fold as a thief, ended his life in a rope by the judgment of God. So indeed (saith he) all things both sacred and civil were confused at Rome; that the advancing of the Pope was in the power of them who were more potent; so that now the Nobles of Rome, and the Princes of Hettruria, did by their secular power thrust in and out the Romish High-Priest at their pleasure. Stephen fate 15 moneths.

4. ROMANUS the I annulled all the Decrees of Stephen, and fate three moneths.

5. THEODORE the II condemned all the Acts of Stephen, and approved all the Acts and friends of Pope Formosus; and fate 20 daies.

6. JOHN the X advanced the Decrees of Pope Formosus so highly, that the Romans conspired against him; and he was forced to fly unto Ravenna, where he held a Synod of 74 Bishops, and disproved the Decrees of Pope Stephen, and confirmed the Acts of Formosus. Baronius ad An. 904. § 4. hath the words of this Synod; to wit, The Synod that was held in the time of Pope Stephen the VI, our Predecessour of godly memory, in which the venerable body of the worshipfull Pope Formosus was dragged along the ground out of the violated grave, and as if it had been brought into judgment, and they did presume to judge and condemn it; (the like is not reported to have been done by any of our Predecessours;) that Synod penitus abdicamus; and in the margine, al. abrogamus, we do altogether reject or abrogate; and we forbid that in no way it be presumed by any to be done, by whatsoever judgment of the Holy Ghost. Baronius addeth these words, Here consider Reader, with what reverence the succeeding Popes did regard their Predecessours, how much soever they were worthy of reproof; that John called Stephen of godly memory, although he was to be abhorred, both for his ingiring himself into the Chair, and while he fate for all his wicked deeds, worthy to be accursed. Platina saith, I would think that the Popes themselves had left the steps of Saint Peter, à Petri vestigiis discesserint. If thou wert to day at Rome, Platina, thou shouldst suffer the fire for these words. John fate 2 years.

7. BENEDICT the IV fate 3 years, and 4 moneths. Platina calleth him and his successors monstra & prodigia, by whose ambition and bribery the Chair of Peter was rather usurped then possessed.

8. LEO the V, in something more then a moneth, was taken by Christophorus a Presbyter, and his familiar, and cast into Prison. How great the authority of the Pope was, through the fault of their Predecessours, it may be known (saith Nacler.) by this, when so great a dignity was in a moment, by force and faction, usurped by a private man. Some think that Leo died in sorrow, that he was spoiled by one whom he had fed in his family as a Wolf; according to the Proverb of Theocritus, τρέφειν καὶ λυκιδεῖς, τρέφει κύας ὥστε φαγάνται; that is, feed young Wolves and Dogs to devour thee. Nacler.

9. CHRISTOPHOR came to the Chair by evil arts, and lost it miserably; for in the seventh moneth he was cast out, & merito quidem, and driven into a Monastery. Nacler.

10. SERGIUS the III took Christophor out of the Monastery, wherein the Romans had thrust him, and put him in a more close prison. Platina saith, He was a rude and unlearned man, very proud and cruel. He had been hindered by Pope Formosus from preferment, and by that faction was banished from from Rome; therefore now he causeth the body of Formosus to be taken up, and then degraded him, cut off his head; and lastly, cast his body into Tiberis as unworthy of Christian burial; and also he deposed all the Bishops and Priests which had been consecrated by Formosus, Platin. Sergius did first ordain that Candles should be carried about on the day of Maries purification. Behold, I pray (saith Platina) how far these Popes had degenerated from their Predecessours! for they were most holy men, and refused the dignity when it was tendered unto them, because they would attend on praying and Christian doctrine; but now they sought and got the Papacy by bribery and ambition, they contemned the worship of God; they kept continual enmity and hatred one against another, like most cruel Tyrants; being set to satiate their lusts, when there was none to restrain their vices. He sate 8 years.

11. ANASTASIUS the III follows. In his time they report, that the body of Pope Formosus was found in the River by Fishers; and when it was brought into Saint Peter's Church, the Images did salute it. Let the indifferent Reader judge, whether a body lying so many years in one grave, and then in another; and then so many years in the water, could remain whole; and being without the head and hands, could be discerned to be the same. Certainly if the Images gave such reverence unto the Corps, Satan hath moved the Idols before the Idolaters, as sometime he spoke out of them. Anastasius sate 2 years. Because this is the last place where mention is made of Pope Formosus, I would ask the Romanists, whether Pope John did erre in degrading Formosus? If he did erre, how then stands their doctrine that a Pope, in his Chair, with his Cardinals cannot erre? Bellarmin. de Rom. Pontif. lib. 4. cap. 3. 5 & 6. If John did not erre, how then did not Pope Martin erre in repelling the doings of his Predecessour? Or how did not Pope Formosus erre in all that he did and said contrary to his Canonical Oath? If Formosus did not erre, how did his Successours not erre; of whom one did annull his Decrees and Consecrations, and another did confirm them, and annull the contrary? Bellarmin saith, A Pope may erre in matter de facto, or in questione facti, non juris. But here we see, that one of them condemned the Decrees of another in questione juris, or in respect of lawfulness; yea the lawfulness of their being Popes; and although Pope John, in his Synod at Ravenna, had discharged that the like be not attempted by any judgment of the Holy Ghost, [and are not these words blasphemous?] Yet Pope Sergius the III would not be discharged, but did the like and worse. Was not here Pope contra Pope, and that in their very Chair and Synod? And do not all the ancient Historians condemn these men as unlawfull Popes, who had forsaken the waies of the more ancient good Bishops? What is now become of their continual succession? And from whom have they now their Ordination and Consecration? even from such as both Popes and Cardinals have judged worthy to be accursed.

Some questions are propounded unto Epist.

12. LANDUS lived obscurely six moneths, at that time when Rodolph overcame Berengarius, as Platina thinks. Then (saith Sigonius) they assembled to chuse a new Pope, but nothing was done according to Laws; for Aldebert, by the perswasion of his mother-in-law Theodora, gave a Pope, not from the Romans, nor by the votes of the Clergy; but as she pleased, from Ravenna.

13. JOHN the XIII came to the Papacy in this manner, as Luithprand Arch-Deacon at Ticino hath written, at the same time. Theodora a most shameless whore, and Roman Lady, burned in lust with the beauty of this John, coming to Rome she had not only lust, but compelled him to lie with her; in the mean time the Bishop of Bononia died, and John was set in his place; before John was consecrated; Peter Bishop of Ravenna died; and through ambition of the whore John forsook Bononia, and usurped the See of Ravenna. Then God did take away the Pope who had so unjustly installed him; and the whore, not willing that her Paramour should be so far distant from her imbracing, forced him to accept the Papal Chair. When Baronius had related these words of Luithprand, he subjoins; Thou hast heard, Reader, the most lamentable estate of this time, when Theodora the elder, a noble whore, held the Monarchy in the City; but whence came so great dignity unto so infamous a woman? she was a noble Roman of the blood of the Senators, excellent in beauty, and crafty in wit, and conquered the Monarchy by her Adulterer. [Stephen the VI. mark the succession of Popes.] Theodora having attained the Dominion of Rome, caused her posterity to follow in the same; she had two daughters, Marozia and Theodora, not only alike, but more given to venery. Marozia married the fore-named Aldebert; and in adultery she did bear unto Pope Sergius a son, called John. Aldebert usurped the Dominion of Rome; and then the whores did cut off, and thrust in, Popes at their pleasure. This John shewed himself a Souldier, more then a Bishop, for he did take Arms against the Sarazens in Italy, and expelled them. Platina saith, The Church had need of such a Bishop. At the intreaty of King Rodolph, he ordained a child of five years old to be Bishop of Rhemes. Wherefore Baronius ad An. 908. §. 4. cried, Thou seest, Reader, by authority of what Pope (if he may be called a Pope) this was brought into the Church; to wit, of John, then whom none is more filthy. As his entry into that Chair was most infamous, so his death was most wicked; for when Adelbert was defunct, Marozia would have married Guido or Vido Marquess of Tuscan, that so she might convey unto him the Dominion of Rome, which did appertain unto her son Albericus. Pope John withstood her; therefore she caused Vido to pluck him out of the way, and having put him in prison, he caused a Pillow to be laid upon his mouth, in the 14 year of his Papacy. Platin.

14. JOHN the XII, son of Pope Sergius the III, was preferred by his mother Marozia, the people would not consent unto his election. Onuphr. in Annotat. on Platin. ad Ioh. 11. Fasciculus tempor. saith, He was intruded, and immediately cast out again, therefore he is not reckoned in the Catalogue of Popes; and in a tumult,

15. LEO the VI was set up. He is commended by Platina for his civil vertue, in respect of these corrupt times. Io. Funccius saith, He did nothing worthy of knowledge, except that he was desirous of peace; because (saith Bale.) perhaps he was glad that Isabel would suffer him to live; but she could not comport the repulse, and so caused him to be poisoned in the 7 moneth.

16. STEPHEN the VII was like to his Predecessour, and after 2 years was poisoned by Marozia. After the death of Vido, Marozia invited Hugh Duke of Burgundy, and now King of Italy, to take the Dominion of Rome; which he could not bring to pass, unless he would marry her, although he was the brother of Vido; and therefore Luithprand writ of her, Nubere germanis satagens Herodiabinis, &c. It hapned that when Albericus, at his mothers command, was holding the water (in an uncomely gesture) under the hands of his stepfather, Hugh gave the boy a blow; he resolved to revenge it, and stirred the Romans against Hugh, and was the first assaulter in his own Palace. Hugh leapt over the wall, and escaped. Albericus brought again the former government by Consuls, and under that title he governed Rome; and the election of the Pope depended on him, and after Stephen he set up again his brother John.

17. JOHN

17. JOHN the XII being restored, did nothing worthy of record, saith Platina. He fate 4 years 10 moneths.

18. LEO the VII is also obscure: he fate 2 years.

19. STEPHEN the VIII was vexed by the Romans. Naucley. saith, For his dishonest wounds he came not abroad, and lived a wretched life for a space: he fate 3 years, and died An. 932. Onuphr.

20. MARTIN the III in 2 years restored some Churches, and was bountifull to the poor; but he fed not souls, neither did Baronius exclude him from the name of Monster.

21. AGAPETUS the II was chosen in a troublefom time; therefore he sought the aid of Otho, as is said before. Fasciculus tempor. ad An. 964. saith of him and his Successours, Holiness left the Popes, and went unto the Emperours at this time, as is most evident. He fate 9 years 7 moneths.

22. JOHN the XIII, the son of Albericus, succeeded. How old this father of fathers could be, may be gathered by supputation of years; when Hugh was expelled, Albericus was but a boy; and till this time were not passed 20 years; neither was this Octavius, or Pope John his fathers eldest son, as Baronius hath marked; and therefore he saith, He who could not be a Deacon for age, like a Stage-player acteth the Pope; and nevertheless (saith he) consent made him Pope; for it is a lesser evil to have a monstrous head, then to be infamous with two heads. And a little after he preferred this Pope, above others which were chosen Canonically by the Clergy. Let Platina tell what he was; One (saith he) defiled from his infancy with all shame and filthiness, given to hunting, if he could spare any time from his luxury, more then to prayer. By the advice of the Senate he sent for Otho, against Berengarius; and when he was releevd, he practised against his redeemer; therefore (as is before) he was deposed, and restored again by the Romans. And immediately, even in these same daies (saith Platin.) the most wicked man was judged to be stricken of God, lest the Church had been wasted with a schism: Some write (saith he) that this Monster was taken in the act of adultery and killed. But he was intruded, at that time, by his father powerfully; and delighting himself with another man's wife, died suddenly without repentance. Sigebert saith, Sine viatico. Fascic. temp. saith, Behold! O everliving God, how unlike are they unto former Bishops! O the depth of God's judgments! who can search them out! Let Bellarmin excuse him among the rest, and pass him over in silence. Platina saith, he was worse then any Pope before him; but he saith not, and worse then any after him, for worse Popes are coming. Onuphrius on that place of Platina saith, He first changed his name, because he thought not his Christian name honourable enough; but we have heard that others have done the like. He fate 10 years.

23. BENEDICT the V was chosen by the Romans, although Leo the VIII (who was advanced by the great Synod) was yet alive; wherefore Otho returned to Rome in wrath, and restored Leo, as is before.

24. LEO the VIII sitting now peaceably, did renounce in favour of the Emperour and his Successours, all the Donations of Justinian, of Charls the Great, of his son Lewis. The words of the Bull, in Crantz. Saxon. lib. 4. cap. 10. are; Leo Bishop, the servant of God's servants, unto Otto our spiritual son in Christ, the Emperour Augustus, and unto all his Successours, Emperours, and Kings of Italy: Whatsoever the Lord Charls King of France and Lombardy, and Patricius Romanus; as also his father Pipin, have given of the Royalty of this Kingdom of Italy, unto blessed Peter the Apostle in the Church of Rome, whether they were given by instruments by the Notary Etherius, or whether they came by Oaths or Donations, or any other way from Justinian

Emperour, or King Arithpert; all these things we give and adjudge unto you Otto Emperour, and to Alheida your wife and consort of the Empire, and unto your consorts and succesfours of this Kingdom of Italy for ever; being present the holy Evangelists, and many Patronages of the Saints that ye may have and possesse all these things for ever, for the uses of your Court, the Military affairs, and to fight against Pagans and Rebels of the Roman Empire; and therefore by authority of this instrument, we confirm and strengthen unto your posterity from generation to generation for ever; and if any shall destroy this our authority, and be found to violate it, or do contrary unto it, let him know that he shall fall under the wrath of blessed Peter, Prince of the Apostles, and our wrath, and of all our Predecessours: And moreover, if he repent not of the evil, lethim be liable unto the Julian Law of Lase Majestatis, &c. After the soleimn form, fiat, fiat, this Bull was subscribed, by all the Arch Bishops, Bishops, Cardinals, Priests and Deacons, chief Officers of the Roman Church; by the Consuls also, Exconsuls, Senatours and civil Lords; and by all which by subscribing could give any confirmation. The names fill up a page. This Bull was kept at Florence for the use of the Emperour; as Henry token a Canon of Magdeburg witnesseth, in Catal. test. ver. lib. 11. Onuphrius proveth, that this Leo was a lawfull Pope: And whatsoever can be said against the Bull or Instrument, Crantz. li. cir. cap. 11. saith, It is more authentical and legal then that Decree of Constantine's Donation, in longa Palea. This Leo sate 2 years.

25. JOHN the XIV was not chosen, till Otho sent his Messengers unto the election; as also this Pope did in other things reverence the Emperour; and for this cause Peter Captain of the City, two Consuls, and the Elder men, whom they call Decarchones, and others rose against him; they laid hands on him in the Lateran Church, and kept him in Prison 11 moneths. The Emperour made hast to Rome, and put all the above-named persons in Prison till the cause was examined; and then the Consuls were exiled into Germany, the Elder men were hanged, and Peter was given unto the pleasure of the Pope, who caused him to be stript naked, to shave his beard, and hang him by the hair a whole day, and set him upon an Ass with his hands under her tail, then so to be led through the City, in the mean time being scourged with rods; and lastly banished out of the City. After this manner did this Ghostly Father obey the Gospel, Love your enemies, saith Platina. This Pope did first baptize Bells; he called the great Bell in Lateran, John. He sate 7 years.

26. BENEDICT the VI succeeded in place and miseries; he was taken by Cintius Captain of the City, and cast into the Prison of malefactors, where he was strangled; or as others say, famished in the 18. moneth: But I fear (saith Platina) that the reward of Benedict was according to his merits, since none hath written that his death was revenged; and Otho is accounted a very good man, and a most ready defender of the Roman Church.

27. DONUS the II sate one year, without doing any thing worthy of record.

28. BONIFACE the VII came to the Papacy by unlawfull means. Platin. When he saw that the Citizens conspired against him, he hid himself; and seeing no appearance of tranquility, he stole all the Ornaments of Saint Peter's Church, and fled into Constantinople. Then

29. BENEDICT the VII was set up by the Romans. Otho was offended that they had transgressed the Acts made in his fathers time; he hastned to Rome, and exerceed severity against the rebellious Romans; they in suffering deserved death, did take unto themselves the name of Martyrs: But Fasc. temp. maketh a distinction; they were killed as some in the primitive Church were were killed; alike punishment, but not alike cause. Benedict followed the Emperour in this tumult, and received from him a temporal sword; that is, authority to punish all seditious persons within the City; and so he banished some, and imprisoned others. His Successours have enlarged the petty jurisdiction. Stella cler. Catal. test. ver. lib. 11. He sate 9 years.

ven him.*

30. JOHN the XV was no sooner set in his Chair, but Pope Boniface the VII, having made monies of his sacrilege, levied an Army and entred Rome; he took Pope John, pulled out his eys, and thrust him into Prison; where (as some say) he was murdered by Ferracius a Noble Roman, and father of Boniface now Pope again. Within 11 months Boniface died suddenly, and his Corps were drawn by the feet along the streets, the people exclaiming against him. Platin. John and Boniface sate 15 months, and died An. 982.

31. JOHN the XVI was expelled the City by Consul Crescentius. When the Consul heard that the Pope was sending his complaint unto the Emperour, he was content to reconcile with him. So between prosperity and adversity he sate 10 years, 10 months. Platin.

32. GREGORY the V was advanced by the Emperour, no man contradicting, saith Alb. Crantz. Saxon. lib. 4. cap. 26. The Romans took it ill, that the Emperour and Pope were both Germans; and in a sedition they set up JOHN the XVII, a Greek; and by the power of Crescentius, whom he had bought with money; for he had brought so much money from Constantinople, that even constant men might have been allured to wickedness by his gifts; but he died with ignominy in the 10 month, saith Naucler. vol. 2. generat. 34. Because he was not lawfully chosen, he is not inrolled among the Popes, by some. Hence is so great variance amongst the Johns following; for they who omit the She-Pope, and this John, call the next John the seven-tieth, whereas others call him the ninetieth; and so forth of the rest. Gregory staid in Hetruria till John was installed, and then did run unto his Nephew Ortho, who came with all hast into Italy, took Rome by force, and apprehended Pope John and Crescentius, as is before. After this Gregory did ratifie, quod Ortho 3 ex Consilio Principum Germania constituit, saith Naucler. lo. cit. that is, what the Emperour had ordained, by the advice of the German Princes, concerning the election of the Emperour in time coming. Naucler nameth the persons of the Electors, and their places, otherwise then I have named them from Platina; for he nameth first the Count Palatine of Rhine, second the Duke of Saxon, &c. But Platina speaks probably, and it is certain, that upon other considerations, some Articles were changed afterwards. The Jesuit Dion. Petavins in Ration. temp. par. 1. lib. 8. cap. 17. saith, The report is, that Gregory the V did tie the power of electing an Emperour, unto the suffrages of certain Princes, whom being seven in number, either he or some successour is thought to have appointed. But it is clear by the History that the Emperour had more power then the Pope, at that time, both in Italy and Germany; and certainly, the following Popes have taken occasion, by this manner of election, to usurp above the Emperours; or (as in Fascic. temp.) upon this occasion the Eagle did lose many feathers, and was at last made totally naked. Gregory sate 4 years, and died An. 999. Of this Century we see generally, that the Popes which were chosen by the Romans were wicked men; and as they sought the Chair ambitiously for honour and power, so they had no respect to religion (even as the Popes following in the next Century) and therefore the Emperour had the greater reason to endeavour, and could the more readily obtain that order concerning the election of the Popes; but it was soon wrested out of his hands; as followeth.

Of Divers Countries.

*A description

1. IN this Century diligence decaieeth, and every vertue fainteth through want of established Princes, especially in Italy: The distressed Pastours, in more ancient times, did shine in doctrine and holiness, when the Church was under persecution, or Pastours under correction of Archirectional power; but when Priests began to glance in silks and colours, and had liberty from subjection unto Princes, their lives became odious and filthy; their licence brought forth such monsters of men, who by avarice and ambition entred into the places of good men, and did not discharge their office. There was little study of Liberal Sciences; few and empty Schools of languages; the Clergy and Priests, having forsaken their old discipline, were given to lucre, nor were they respected by their flocks; and only Monks were noted to have some eloquence. Nevertheless as it was ordained in Synods of the former Century, that Priests and Monks should read the Scriptures and Writings of the Fathers, now by reading and preaching the same doctrine by some, God did sequester some here and there, which did beleve truly in Christ, although in so great fear of tyranny and tumults of War, that they durst scarcely speak of corruptions, idolatries, superstitions and wickedness, which at that time were so luxuriant. I will not mention divers signs that were seen in Heaven, portending so great evils. Great alterations befell in every Kingdom almost, the Hungarians oppress Italy and Germany, although they were restrained; besides many other broils in both those Nations; France hath another race of Kings; incessant were the Wars in Spain between the old inhabitants and the Moors; the Sarazens suffered neither Greece nor Asia to rest in peace. Bellarmin in Chronolo. speaking of this Century, saith; Behold an unhappy age, in which are no famous Writers, no Councils, bad Emperours, and no good Popes, God then providing that no heresie did arise. And Baron. ad An. 900. § 1. saith, A new age beginneth, which for rudeness and barrenness of goodness, is called The Iron Age; and for deformity of evil abounding, is Leaden; and for want of Writers, is called The Dark Age. And ad An. 912. saith more sharply, What was the face of the Roman Church! how filthy, when most lude and potent whores did reign in Rome! at whose pleasure Bishopricks were changed, Bishops were given; and which is most horrible to be heard, their Paramours were thrust into Saint Peter's See, which are written but to fill up the role of Popes; for who can call these lawfull High-Priests which were thrust in, without any order, by such whores? no mention of the Clergy chusing and consenting, the Canons were prest in silence; what manner of Cardinals, Priests and Deacons canst thou think were chosen by these Monsters? seeing nothing is more natural then that every one beget others like to himself; and who can doubt but that these did consent in all things unto them who had chosen them? After this manner he continued bewailing and detesting the iniquity of those times. It may justly then be added, Since the face of the Roman Church was so blurred, and those in the Chair of Peter (as they speak) were so abominable and wretched; what is become of the line of succession whereof they boast? And since that wicked generation did continue so long space of time, from whom have they ordination in the following ages? And here we may remember what Pope Gregory the I writ on Iob. lib. 34. cap. 2. I will yet declare a sadder thing, by the fearful order of hid dispensation; ere that Lemathan shall appear in that damned man which he shall assume, the signs of vertue shall be withdrawn from the Holy Holy Church ; for prophecy shall be hid , the vertue of abstinence shall be diminished , the words of doctrine shall cease , and no miracles shall be seen. Which things indeed Divine dispensation will not take away altogether ; but he sheweth not these openly and in plenty , as in former times. And this is done by admirable dispensation , that by one thing both the piety and justice of God may be fulfilled ; for while , the signs of vertue being withdrawn , the Church seems more contemptible , both the reward of good men groweth , which do esteem her under hope of heavenly things , and not for present signs ; and the mind of wicked men against her appears the more easily , who neglect the promised invisible things , while they are not engaged by visible things. Therefore while the humility of Beleevers is as it were destitute of the multitude and manifestation of signs , by the terrible trial of Divine dispensation , mercy is bestowed on good men ; even by the same means , whereby just wrath is heaped upon the wicked. So far be. Now what do these two Cardinals , in these their lamentations ; and that Pope in this fearfull Prophecy of Divine dispensation , but confirm what is the usual doctrine of the Reformed Churches , that The Church did lurk for a space of time. But the Romanists in these daies will not hear this , and the deluded people are made to beleeve that the Church of Rome hath continued through all ages in glorious Majesty. And yet even in these darke times were some witnesses of the truth , although not without some dross of the corrupt age.

2. Ambrosius Ausbert , a French Monk , in the beginning of this Century , writ Commentaries on the Psalms and Song of Salomon , and ten books on the Revelation ; out of which I have selected these testimonies. Lib. 3. cap. 5. The old and new Testament are called one book ; because the new cannot be separated from the old , nor the old from the new ; for the old Testament is the new veiled , and the new is the revelation of the old The Lord said unto Peter , bearing the type of the Church , Thou art Peter , and upon this Rock will I build my Church ; as if he had said , Upon me will I build thee. Lib. 4. cap. 8. It is no wonder that our prayers and tears are offered unto God not in our name , but by the great High-Priest ; seeing Paul exhorts us , saying , Through him let us offer up the sacrifices of praise unto God. Lib. 5. cap. 11. When God rendreth reward unto his servants , he rewardeth his own gifts in them ; for he would not say , He rendreth a reward , unless he had gotten the works of reward ; but we could not have the works of reward , unless we had gotten from Him that we were able to work ; in this sense we ask daily , Give us this day our daily bread ; if it be ours , why ask we it daily to be given us ? It is ours by receiving , which was not ours by having. Lib. 6. cap. 13. The book of Predestination , as it containeth the Elect written in it by unmovable eternity ; so by no means receives it the Reprobates to be written in it ; But why so ? If this be asked of me , I answer briefly , Because God is most good , mercifull , meek and just ; mercifull , because he freely saves some sinners ; just , because for the merit of reprobation , and not without justice he condemneth the ungodly. Lib. 8. cap. 17. If the Elect follow preventing grace , and the Reprobates cannot accuse his justice. And Cap. 19. Grace goeth before a man , to shew him the way whither he should go ; and grace follows him , to move him unto that which it shews In this we give glory unto God , when we confess that by no precedent merit of our good works , but by his mercy only we have attained so great dignity. Lib. 10. cap. 22. How doth he which will take that blessed water , if it be given to each one freely ? And truly saith the Apostle , It is not of him that willeth or runneth , but of God who shews mercy. How can he who willeth take it , but because in both these the mercy of God is commended ? which both makes the unwilling to become willing, and also freely bringeth the willing unto that which he desireth: As if the giver of that grace were saying, Who being freely inspired, hath begun to desire heavenly things; let him be confident, that he may freely attain those things; for no other but who willeth takes the water of life freely; because none other is brought unto eternal life even freely, but he who beginneth first to will, being preveened by grace: Hence is it said, God worketh in us both the will and the deed, according to good pleasure: But the Apostle seemeth to contradict this, when he saith, To will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not. But know, that whereas he saith, To will is present; he knew that he had received from God that whereby he would; which he himself proveth, saying, What hast thou, that thou hast not received? Understand, Nothing at all. Say then, Who thirsteth let him come ... that is, who being unwilling is made willing (by no preceding merits of good works, but by the gracious will of God) let him drink abundantly of the water of eternal joy, out of the invisible fountain.

3. Theophylact Arch-Bishop of Bulgaria, in the beginning of this Century, writ on the four Evangelists and the Epistles of Paul. His testimony is the more to be accounted, because Christophor Porfena, Prior of Saint Balbina in Rome (which did first translate his works, and then dedicated them unto Pope Sixtus the IV.) testifieth of him, that as a Bee he hath gathered into his Honey-hive the most approved sentences out of many Authours, especially out of Chrysostom, as out of a golden fountain, he had drawn very golden interpretations. And Berald (who at the order of Michael Bodet Epist. Lingonen. did review that Translation, when it was to be reprinted An. 1533. by Iod. Bad. Aycens.) saith in his Epistle unto the Reader, This is certain enough, that all these Commentaries are pious and orthodox, and differ far from those things which the multitude of Theologians, in these daies, do with much pride beat into the ears of the unlearned people; for he not only expounds the Apostles mind every where, but likewise refert, sapit ac spirat, he resembleth, savoureth and breatheth it; which or how few it can be justly said, he may easily understand who will compare the new Divines with the ancient both Latine and Greek. So far Berald. Out of these two testimonies, observe that Theophylact doth agree with the Ancients before him, as Chrysostom, Basilus, and others of those ages, whom he often quoteth; and doth disagree from the multitude of Preachers in the Roman Church, about the year 1533. Where then is their frequent gloriation of the constancy, and unity of the Roman Church with the Ancient Fathers? Hear then what Theophylact saith in the Articles of controversie in those daies. In Prolog. before Evang. Matth. he saith, Because heresies were to bud forth, which are ready to waite our manners, it was thought necessary that the Gospels should be written; to the end, that we learning truth out of them, should not be deceived with the lies of heresies, and our manners should not altogether be undone. On Cap. 13. near the end, speaking of Christ and his mother, he saith, The mother would shew some human thing, that she had power over her son; for as yet she had no great thoughts of him; and therefore while he was yet speaking, she would draw him unto her: Porfena here addeth on the margine, Legem causè. To wit, he saw that these words are against the Tenets of Rome, that the Virgin was free from all sin, and by right of her mother-hood she can command her son. On Cap. 16. Because Peter had confessed that Jesus is the son of God; he said, that this confession which he had confessed, shall be the foundation of Beleevers; so that every man which shall build the house of faith, shall lay this foundation; for although we build many vertues, and have not this foundation, a right confession, we do build unprofitably

They have power of binding and forgiving, who receive the gift of Episcopacy [or oversight] as Peter did; for although it was said unto Peter, I will give unto thee; nevertheless it was granted unto all the Apostles. When? when he said, Whose sins ye forgive they are forgiven: For when he said, I will give; he signifieth the time coming, that is, after the resurrection When Peter speaks rightly, Christ calleth him blessed; but when he feareth without reason, and will not have him to suffer, he lasheth him; and saith, Go behind me, Satan. In Luc. cap. 2. Bishops should keep their Flock; and ἀγροαυτείν, that is, sing in the field, sing spiritual things, and teach the people, and hear divine visions and sayings. Bethleem is the house of bread; and what other is the house of bread but the Church, in which bread is provided? it is therefore the duty of spiritual Shepherds to seek heavenly bread; which when they have seen, they must preach it unto others The things whereof the Scripture is silent, we should not inquire. On Cap. 16. Nothing is so profitable as diligent searching of the Scriptures; the Devil may falsely and apparently make a search of the dead, to deceive the unwise; and from Hell he may sow doctrine according to his wickedness; but those who do duly search the Scriptures, nothing can delude them; for the Scriptures are a lantern and light, which when it shines the thief is found and made manifest; therefore we should beleeve them, and not regard the rising of the dead. And a little before he saith, As it is impossible for any man to pass from the company of the just into the place of sinners; so it is impossible, as Abraham teacheth us, to pass from the place of punishment into the place of the just The bosom of Abraham is the possession of good things, which are prepared for the just, passing from the Waves of the Sea into the Haven of Heaven. On Ioh. cap. 1. The new Testament is called grace; because God gives freely unto us, not only remission of sins, but the adoption of children. And it is called truth; because whatsoever the Fathers saw in figure, or spoke, He hath here preached these clearly Here we learn that the miracles of Christ's childhood are but feigned and lies, and made up by them who would scorn the mystery; for if these had been true, how could the Lord have been unknown which wrought them? for it is no way likely that he was not famous which did such miracles: But it is not so; for before he was baptized, he wrought no signs, neither was he known. On Cap. 3. If thou knowest not the wind, which is a Spirit subject to sense, how searchest thou curiously of regeneration by the Spirit of God, how and from whom it is breathed? If this Spirit cannot be comprehended, far less is the grace of the Holy Ghost subject to the laws of nature. Confounded therefore be Macedonius the fighter against the Holy Ghost, and Eunomius before him; for he would make the Spirit a servant, although he hear, in this place, that the Spirit bloweth whither it will; far rather hath the Holy Ghost a more free motion, and doth work where he willeth, and after what manner he willeth When thou hearest that the Son of man came down from Heaven, think not that his flesh came down from Heaven; this did Apollinarius teach, that Christ had a body from Heaven, which did pass thorow the Virgin, as thorow a Conduit: But because Christ is one person consisting in two natures, therefore whatsoever belongs to the Man-hood, is spoken of the Word; and again, what belongs unto the Word, is spoken of the Man: So here the Son of Man is said to come down from Heaven, because He is one person; and again, lest when ye hear it said, The Son of Man came down, you would think that he is not in Heaven: He saith, even he which is in Heaven; for do not think that I am not there, because I came down; but both am I here bodily, and I sit there as God with the Father Here we learn that the old Testament is like, or of the same nature with the new; and there is but one giver of the old and new Testament, although Marcion and Manicheus, and that rabble of Hereticks deny it. He teacheth also, that since the Jews, beholding the brazen Serpent, did escape death, far rather we looking on him which was crucified, and beleeving, shall escape the death of the soul. . . . Adam died justly, because he sinned; but the Lord died unjustly, because he had not sinned. . . . and because he died unjustly, he overcame him by whom he was killed, and so delivered Adam from death, which was laid justly upon him. On Cap. 6. Diligent faith is a guide unto good works, and good works do conserve faith; for both works are dead without faith, and faith without works. . . . He saith, I am the bread of life; he saith not, I am the bread of nourishment, but of life; for when all things were dead, Christ maketh us alive by himself, who is that bread, in so far as we beleeve that the leaven of mankind is heated by the fire of his God-head; and He is the bread of life, not of this natural, but of that unchangeable life, which fails not by death: And who beleeve in that bread shall not suffer hunger by hearing the Word of God, nor suffer spiritual thirst; because he hath the water of Baptism, and sanctification of the Spirit. . . . And shewing that faith in Christ is not a common thing, but a gift of God, and given by the Father to the upright in heart; he saith, Whomsoever the Father gives unto me, he shall come unto me; that is, they shall beleeve in me, whom my Father gives unto me. . . . And I will not cast him out which comes unto me, that is, I will not lose him, but I will save, and I will refresh him with much diligence; for I came from Heaven to do no other thing but the will of my Father. And near the end of that Chapter he saith, When ye hear that his Disciples went away, do not think it of his true Disciples, but of them who did follow in the order of Disciples, and seemed to have the form of Disciples, while they were taught by him; for there were some among his Disciples, who being compared with the other multitude, were called his Disciples; for they abode longer time than the multitude; but being compared with others which were true Disciples, they were not to be considered, because they beleeved him but for a time, and (as I might say) with a cold heat. . . . The flesh profiteth nothing. . . . the flesh, that is, to expound these words carnally, profiteth not, but are the occasion of scandal: So then they who understood carnally the things spoken by Christ, were offended: Therefore he addeth, The words I speak, are spirit, that is, are spiritual; and life, having no fleshly thing, and bringing eternal life: Shewing that it is the excellency of the God-head to reveal these hid things, he saith, There be some among you who beleeve not; when he saith Some, he excepteth the Disciples. On Cap. 10. He sheweth the sure tokens of a good Shepherd, and of a Wolf. . . . and first of the pernicious Shepherd, saying, He entreth not by the dore, that is, by the Scriptures; for he useth not the Scriptures and Prophets as witnesses; for certainly the Scriptures are the dore, by which we are brought unto God, and these suffer not Wolves to enter; for they forbid Hereticks that we may be secure, and they give a reason of every thing; therefore he is a thief who entreth not into the fold by the Scriptures, and so is found by them. . . . Because the Scriptures are understood and opened by the Holy Spirit, they do shew Christ unto us; the Porter is justly expounded the Holy Spirit, by whom, as the Spirit of wisdom and knowledge, the Scriptures are opened, and by them the Lord entreth to have a care of us, and by them the Shepherd is known. And the Sheep hear the voice of the Shepherd; for because they had often called him a deceiver, and they would through incredulity confirm this, saying, Doth any of the rulers beleeve in him? Christ shews that they should not think him a deceiver, though none of those beleeved in him, but rather they should be cast out of the sheep-fold; for, saith he, if I come in by the dore, it is clear that I am the true Shepheard; and ye which beleeve not in me, seem not to be sheep. On Cap. 12. speaking of the word Osanna, he saith, Out of these Texts any man may understand, that the Scripture attributes salvation unto God only. On Cap. 20. Though many signs of his resurrection were given, yet these only are written; and that not for ostentation, or that the glory of the only begotten may be shewed; but that ye may beleeve, saith he: What is the gain? who reapeth it? not Christ; for what gain hath he that we beleeve? But it redounds unto us; for he saith, That ye beleeving might have life through his name. On Rom. 1. What righteousness can we have who are defiled with abomination and filthy deeds? but God hath justified us not by our works, but by faith. On Cap. 3. If the Law had power to justify, what need had we of Christ? If thou wilt say, By what law is this glorying excluded? is it by works, seeing the Law commandeth, He who doth these things shall live by them; for these things did the Law of Moses command. He saith, Not, but by the Law of faith, which gives righteousness by grace, and not by works. You see how he calleth faith a law, because this name was in such veneration amongst the Jews. On Cap. 6. He calleth life, grace, and not a reward; as if he had said, Ye do not receive the reward of works, but by grace are all these things given unto you through Christ, which worketh and doth them all. On Cap. 10. The righteousness of God is by faith, which requires nothing glorious or grievous of us, but all our hopes is on the grace of God. On Cap. 11. If of works, then no more of grace, or else work were no more work; if we be made acceptable unto God through works, grace were superfluous; but if grace be superfluous, then must works also be taken away; for where grace is, working is not requisite; and where working is, no grace is required. What then? When he hath shewed what grace is, and that it is the gift of God without the works of men; he asserteth, that the Israelites have not attained justification, though they sought it, because they sought it not rightly; and they thought to have righteousness by works, which could not be: But (saith he) the election, that is, they which are chosen have attained it; and by this word election he shews, that the excellency of things to come, and all other things are bestowed on men by the gift of God. On Cap. 13 He [the Apostle] teacheth that all men, whether a Priest or Monk, or an Apostle, should be subject unto Princes. On Cap. 16. The Apostle teacheth that dissensions and scandals, that is, heresies are brought in, by them which bring any doctrine besides the doctrine of the Apostles. On 1 Cor. 3. Miracles are done, very often, for the profit of others; and therefore are they done sometimes, even by unworthy men. Cap. 14. Signs are for unbelievers, for believers have no need of them, seeing they do already beleeve but prophecies are profitable both to believers and unbelievers Behold how by degrees he proveth plainly, that he who speaks with his tongue only, and understands not, doth the less good even to himself; and this was the meaning of Basilus on this place. . . . What then is more to be sought of God? that we may pray in the Spirit, that is, with grace, and with the mind, that is, with meditation to conceive what we should pray. On 2 Cor. 4. That the excellency may be of the power of God, and not of us; that it may be clear (saith the Apostle) that the excellency of the apparent virtue comes not from us, but from God; or lest it be thought that we can do any thing worthy of praise, as of our selves, let us ascribe all unto God, and let us acknowledge that is of his gift, whatsoever we do well. On Gal. 2. Paul demonstrates, in this place, that he was equal unto Peter; for (saith he) he who wrought by Peter in the Apostleship of circumcision, wrought also by me amongst the Gentiles Some say, It was not Peter the excellent follower of Christ, which was rebuked by Paul, but another Cephas... But hear most wise man, for neither do we say, that Peter, as ignorant what he should have done, was rebuked by Paul; but we say, that he willingly did admit reproof, that he might give unto others an example of patience. On Eph. 1. at these words, The exceeding greatness of his power in us; he saith, Nor is it easie to be understood, how great is that power and vertue which changeth a man's mind from the wonted custom, and to pull it out of errors; from which to draw a man sticking in them, so great power is requisite, that so great power scarcely appears in raising the dead; for the Lord did raise the dead with one word, and yet he converted not the Jews to him, by perswading with multitudes of words and miraculous works: He saith therefore, the revelation of the Spirit is necessary, that we may learn the same faith, which we have received, that we have received it by the greatest power and working of God; for as he raised Christ from the dead, so hath he brought us unto light when we were dead, and hath drawn us from infidelity; and therefore he saith, it was done by the exceeding greatness of his power, and the power of his vertue. On Cap. 2. Yea it is to be thought a greater power, to bring into the right way straying souls and addicted to sin, than to raise up the dead. And at these words, By whose grace ye are saved; he saith, He puts in this as being stricken with astonishment, wondering at the unspeakable gift of God; for he saith, Ye are not saved by your travel or work, but only by grace; as for your works, certainly ye were worthy of wrath and punishment. On Cap. 6. The Apostle sheweth how Parents may bring their children into obedience; if ye will, saith he, have your children obedient unto you, bring them unto, and acquaint them with the word of God; and say not, let Monks study the holy Scripture, for it is the duty of every Christian, and especially of him who converseth in worldly affairs; and the rather, that he hath need of more help, as who is driven among the waves of the World; therefore it is most profitable for thee that thy children both hear and read the holy Scripture; and out of them they shall learn, Honour thy father and thy mother: but if thou breed thy children in the books of Heathens, they will learn very bad things out of them; which shall not be, if they be acquainted with the word of God. On 1 Thess. 1. It is manifest that souls are brought unto faith and salvation, not by perswasion of man, but by the power of God. On 2 Thess. 2. The Lord will not come, unless there come first a departing, that is, the Antichrist; whom he calleth a departing, because in very deed he will cause many to depart from Christ... So that he sits in the Temple of God as a God; not in the Church of Jerusalem only, but he will sit in all Churches every where: Shewing himself that he is God; he saith not Saying, but Shewing, that is, he will attempt to prove that he is God; for he will make such great works and signs that he may deceive all men... What with-holds, that is, hindreth; but what is that? some have said it is the grace of the Spirit: some say the Roman Empire, to which opinion John Chrysostom agreeth; for unless the Roman Empire be destroyed, Antichrist can have no way to do as he willeth. Paul hath expressed this darkly, for he would not rashly take upon him the malice of the Romans, nor cast himself into danger in vain: for if he had said, the Roman Empire will be taken away shortly, they presently would have buried him quick, as threatening the ruine of the Empire: and they would have killed all the Believers that followed him, as if they wished the overthrow of so great an Empire... Only he that with holds shall with-hold... that is, when the Roman Empire shall be taken away, then shall he come; for so long as they are under the fear of this, no man will easily submit himself unto another; but when this is overthrown, he will be.

gin another dominion; and as if all were his, he will pervert the things that concern both God and man; for as other Monarchies were taken away one by another, before the height of the Romans . . . so this Kingdom of the Romans shall be destroyed by the Antichrist, and Daniel hath prophesied that it shall be so. Some understand otherwise, but I would have thee to think, as we have said with blessed Chrysostom. On 1 Tim. 1. at the last words, he saith, Thou seest how to search curiously into divine things, turned into blasphemy; for it is injurious against God, when we endeavour to comprehend in our mind and thought the things that are done by his will and dispensation. On Cap. 3. One may ask why the Apostle omitteth the Priests? because what things are spoken of Bishops, belong unto Priests; for these are commanded to instruct others, and to govern the Churches, and are inferiours unto them by the only ceremony of consecration. On 2 Tim. 3. That the man of God may be perfect; amendment, saith he, must be sought from the Scriptures, that nothing may be lacking to him which walks according to God: if therefore thou desirest to be perfect, and wishest neither to be cast down with adversity, nor puffed up with prosperity, (for that is perfection) seek advice of the holy Scriptures when thou wantest me: And since he writ of such reading unto Timothy, being filled with the holy Spirit, how much more are we to be exhorted thereunto which have need of this Spirit? And observe how we cannot be upright and perfect, unless the holy Scriptures do help us. On Heb. 9. so, And Christ was once offered; by whom was he offered? by himself, and not by another man; for though he was the High-Priest, he was also the sacrifice and the oblation. To take away the sins of many . . . Why, saith he, of many, and not of all men? Because all men beleeve not; but Christ's death is equal to the perdition of all men, that is, it is sufficient that all men perish not, and and it was paid for the salvation of all men, and he died for all men so far as was in him; and nevertheless he hath not taken the sin of all men, because they fight against him; and so they had made the death of Christ unprofitable unto themselves, which certainly is horrible to be spoken, and very lamentable, seeing that death brought salvation unto many. This was the mind of Basilus also; and nevertheless we find in the Gospel, That he might give his life a ransom for many, to be expounded for all. Cap. 10. Can never with these sacrifices which were offered year by year . . . If they, being once offered, had been available, they should no more have been offered; but when the oblation was made year by year, and often, it is clear that they were too weak for bringing salvation unto them who were desirous of it; and therefore after the first offering followed another, and again, and again another; for amongst Drugs that are called most valid and efficacious, which being but once applied or drunken, doth heal and cure; but what must be often changed and applied, hath the less vertue of healing, and doth no good unto the sick. But one may ask, Do we not offer without blood? Yea indeed, but then we remember the death of Christ, and we have but one oblation, and not many, seeing He is offered but once; for we offer him continually; or rather, we remember his oblation, even as if at this time He were sacrificed; wherefore it is certain that we have but one sacrifice, and the Law had many; although (as it is said before) it was offered the oftner, that it might be the more profitable unto many, which nevertheless is far otherwise: But our sacrifice (as I have said) is but one and once offered, and continueth whole both in this life and that to come, and it is more perfect; for it is but one blood, and once poured forth; and one body, although it was offered for many; and it is not many, as it is but one sacrifice which is offered; for we do offer that continually as if it were present. So far from Theophylact. But here some

may object, that Theophylact agreeth not with the Reformed Church in many particulars. It is true, and therefore I say often, we must make separation of the dross from the pure gold; but his difference is supposed to be greater than it is. Porfena in his Epistle unto the Reader before the Gospels, saith; Theophylact follows Chrysostom concerning free-will and faith, and some other things; and therefore in expounding some places he is somewhat more violent: which I say, that herein you should use discretion, which knowest thy self to be addicted unto the Canonical Scriptures only; and not to fear thee from reading of him, as some are wont when any passage displeaseth, they throw the book away: so say I, in reading of any book written by man, we who are addicted to the holy Scriptures only, must use discretion. But it seemeth, Porfena speaks not this unto Papists, because they are not addicted to the holy Canonical Scriptures only; and he saith that Theophylact is more violent in expounding some places; where certainly Porfena understands, that he crosseth the Tenets of the Romish Church. But this may be more clear by particulars. 1. Porfena hath often marked the margine with liberum arbitrium, as if Theophylact did there assert the Romish error concerning free-will; and I know that others do alledge his testimony against the doctrine of the Reformed Church, howbeit he speak nothing against us, nor for them; as is clear by inspection of particular places. On Luk. 15. fol. 103. on the margine is Liberum arbitrium; and in the line is, The substance of man is rational, whereupon followeth free-will; for all rational creatures have a free-will, and the Lord hath given them reason that they may use it freely, &c. It is clear, that Theophylact speaks there of the nature of man absolutely, or without any relation to any particular condition of man, before the fall or after the fall; and he speaketh against the Stoicks and Manicheans, which did hold that the actions of men were carried by fate or pressing necessity; and therefore it follows there, If God would have us to be compelled, he had not made us rational, and of a free-will. On Ioh. 6. at the words, Will ye also go away; he saith, The Lord saith not, Go ye away; for this had been to repel them; but he asketh, will ye go away? whereby he makes it free, whether they will follow him or not; and he sheweth that he will not have them to follow him in fear. On these words also hath Porfena fixed Liberum arbitrium. As also on Mat. 16. at the words, If any will follow me; he saith to the same purpose, The Lord saith, If any will; to shew free-will and not coacted vertue. These and many more places are clearly spoken against the necessity of fate or coaction; which now is not controverted. But if you ask, By what power is an unregenerated man converted? he hath said it already on 2 Cor. 4. and Eph. 1 and 2. Or if you ask, By what power doth a regenerate man continue in the faith and practise of godliness? Theophylact teacheth that on Phil. 2. at the words, For it is God who worketh in you both to will and to do: Whereas he had said, with fear and trembling; now he saith, that they need not fear; for I have not spoken so, that ye should despair, but be the more wary; for if ye take heed and be diligent God will make all perfect; for it is he which makes you prompt to such a good will, that we will good things, and also bringeth such promptitudes of our mind unto an end; for God worketh in us both the will, that is, he inableth you that ye desire good things, and he will augment this good will, and kindle it that it may be the more fervent the Apostle takes not away free-will, but willeth that we should alwaies give thanks unto God, and committed all unto him: Mark (saith Theophylact) but this manner of speaking; he saith, in you who work your salvation with fear and trembling; for in such men which are willingly led unto good, God worketh all things. According to good will, that is, that it may be fulfilled in you, what is acceptable unto God for God will enable us to live rightly, although it were no other cause but only this, because so he willeth. 2. It is objected, that Theophylact saith, that election was made upon the fore-sight of faith and good works; as on Eph. 1. it is, When he saith, He hath chosen, he pointeth forth both the mercy of God, and their vertue, to wit, whom God had separated, as who were to be good. I answer, In these words Theophylact toucheth not the moving cause of election; but only teacheth, that God had chosen none but such as were to be good and godly; and this he insists oft upon; against them which held, that faith, or profession of faith, is sufficient to salvation, although men do not good works, as is clear by the words following; for when the Text saith, That we may be holy and without blame before him; he addeth, Lest it come into ones mind, that God hath chosen whom he willeth to be saved, and thereupon one be slack and think it is not any more needfull to study unto vertue, that one may attain life, seeing they are already chosen according to the pleasure of God, and there is no more hope unto others; unto this he saith, God hath chosen us that we should be holy and without blame; that is, that we should live in that holiness which God hath given unto us who have been washed in baptism; therefore let us continue and keep a godly life. Whence it is clear, that he judgeth the moving cause to be the only will of God; and thereupon follows that scruple which he removeth; and this may be cleared from his words on v. 2. ch. 2. 10. 3. Porsena marketh in the margin at the words of institution in Matth. 26, Panis qui sanctificatur in altario corpus & caro Domini est, non figura; and the words in the line are, When he saith, This is my body; he sheweth, that the bread which is sanctified on the Altar, is the same body of Christ, and not an answering figure; for he said not, This is a figure, but This is my body; for by unspeakable operation it is transformed, although it seem unto us to be bread; because we are infirm, and do abhor to eat raw flesh, especially the flesh of man; and therefore it appears bread, and is flesh. And on Mar. 14. When he had blessed, that is, had given thanks, he broke the bread; which also we do, adjoining prayer. This is my body; this I say, which ye take; for the bread is not a figure only, and some exemplar of the Lord's body, but the body of Christ is converted into it: For the Lord said, The bread that I will give you, is my flesh; he said not, it is the figure of my flesh, but it is my flesh. And again, Unless ye eat the flesh of the son of man. But you will say, How is not the flesh seen? O man, that is because of our infirmity; for because bread and wine are of such things wherewith we are accustomed, we abhor them not; but if we saw blood and flesh set before us, we could not indure them, but would abhor them; therefore the mercifull God condescending unto our weakness, keeps still the forms of bread and wine, but transubstantiateth them into the vertue of flesh and blood. These be his words, without any fault, in the translation. Now behold the vanity of man's mind, when it is fond on a thing. Ixion (as the fable is) would so faine have had Iuno, that he thought he had her in his imbracement, when he had but the wind or cloud. So the Romanists think, they have here their transubstantiation, when they have but words far different from what they do fancy. In these testimonies they lay hold on two passages: First, The bread which is sanctified, is the same body of Christ, and not an answering figure. I would they could conjoin the words on Mark, It is not a figure only, and some exemplar of the Lord's body. Where the Authour denieth not simply or absolutely, that the bread is a figure and exemplar of Christ's body; but saith he, It is not a figure only; or, it is not only a figure and some exemplar; therefore according to his mind, It is a figure and some exemplar, but more then a bare figure, and a special kind of exemplar. Against whom is this said? I have read it imputed unto some that the bread is a meer sign of Christ's body; but I never read any who hath so affirmed, except Socinians or Anabaptists. So then in these words Theophylact speaks according to the mind of the Reformed Church. But he saith, It is the same body of Christ. And so saith Christ himself, This is my body; and so say we: Therefore the question is, in what sense the bread is his body? Next they say, It is by transubstantiation of the bread into the body of Christ. Here first mark, that the former passage proveth it not. 2. Where saith Theophylact so? they say, in these words, By unspeakable operation it is transformed, although it seem to be bread. I answer, In so great a matter the words ought to be considered attentively. What is transformation? it is two-fold, if we speak properly, external and internal. External is when the outward form of a thing is changed into another; but this is not in the Sacrament, which keeps still the forms of bread and wine; as it is said expressly in the words on Mark. Internal transformation is when not only the outward form is changed, but the inward nature and essence of a thing is changed into another which was before; as when Lot's wife was turned into a Pillar of salt, or Moses's rod into a Serpent. But Theophylact saith, It appears bread, and is flesh. Wherefore he meaneth not a proper transformation, but an improper kind; and so saith the Reformed Churches. The Romanists say, he saith, The bread is transformed into the body of Christ. Where saith he so? not on Matthew, for his words are, But the body of Christ is turned or converted into it. It is one thing the bread is transformed into the body of Christ; and another thing, Christ's body is converted into the bread; and therefore he saith, God transelementeth the bread into the vertue of flesh. So neither on Matthew nor Mark, either first or last, doth Theophylact assert a transformation or transubstantiation of the bread into the body of Christ; but in the first place, he speaks of a converting of Christ's body into the bread; and in the other, he speaks of a transelementation of the bread into the vertue of flesh; and the Papists do hold neither one nor the other. As yet I speak not of the truth of the matter, nor of the meaning of the Authour, but shew how the Papists delude themselves with his words. As for his meaning in this matter, unless his words be contrary one to another, the first words must be expounded by the latter; that is, when he saith, The body of Christ is converted into the bread; he meaneth, God keeps still the forms of the bread and wine, both outward and inward; but transelementates them into the vertue of Christ's flesh and blood; that is, from bare and earthly things, he translates them into another rank (for this is the proper signification of μετασχηῖν, to set in another file or rank) of things, even of spiritual things; even of sealing and conveying unto us the vertue of Christ's body and blood. Μετασχηῖν properly, is to remove a souldier from one file into another, and then the souldier changeth not his nature, but his place and use; and so it is with the elements of the Sacrament. And we may be the more assured, that this is the mind of Theophylact, because for confirmation he adds, The Lord said, The bread that I will give you is my flesh; and on these words in Ioh. 6. he saith, Note well, that the bread which is eaten by us in the Sacrament, is not only some figuration of the Lord's flesh, but the same flesh of the Lord; for he said not, The bread that I will give, is a figure of my flesh, but it is my flesh; for by mysterious words it is transformed, by mystical blessing and accession of the Holy Ghost, into the Lord's flesh: And at the words, Unless ye eat the flesh of the Son of man; he addeth, When we hear, unless ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, ye shall not have life; we must in taking the Divine mysteries [or Sacrament] hold undoubted faith, and not ask what way; for the natural man, that is, who follows human and natural thoughts, is not capable of spiritual things which are above nature; and so be under- derstandeth not the spiritual eating of the Lord's flesh; of which they who are not partakers, are not partakers of eternal life, because they have not received Iesus, who is eternal life; for it is not the flesh of a meer man, but of God; and is able to Deifie us, to wit, being united unto the God-head. That flesh is also verily food, because it indureth not for a little time, nor can be corrupted, as corruptible food, but it is a help unto eternal life. In these his words, we see that he speaks not absolutely, as he did seem to speak on Matthew; but as he spoke on Mark, The bread is not only some figuration; and then he saith, It is transformed by mystical blessing and acceßion of the Holy Ghost. And then he saith, In taking the Divine mysteries we must hold undoubted faith; then they who have not faith undoubted, cannot eat that mysterious Sacrament. And we must not ask what way; to wit, as they do now, whether the substance of the bread be turned into the substance of Christ's body; or whether the substance of the bread is turned to nothing, and Christ's body comes into the form of the bread; or &c. Theophylact is far from asserting any of these waies. And when he saith, That flesh is verily food, because it indureth not for a little time, nor can be corrupted; he speaks not of the visible bread, which experience teacheth to be corruptible; but he speaks of the Lord's flesh, which we receive by faith. In a word then, Theophylact speaks nothing of transubstantiation, but rather against it; and the Papists delude themselves, and abuse his words. A fourth thing they object out of Theophylact, that he asserts the Primacy of Peter, when he saith on Joh. 21, He who durst not ask concerning the Traitor, but did commit the question unto another, now the government of all is concredited unto him: And on the margine Porſena addeth, Praefectura omnium Petro tributa; and it follows as if Christ were saying unto Peter, Now I bring thee forth that thou mayest govern the world, and follow me; and on the margine, Praest Petrus orbi. But to expound these words, as if Peter were the only governour of the World; and the government of the World were wholly concredited unto Peter alone, is far contrary unto the words and mind of Theophylact; as we have heard from him on Gal. 2, where he asserteth that Paul was equal unto him; and on Matth. 16, where he asserteth that all the Apostles were of equal authority. Peter therefore was a governour of the world, but not the only governour; for all the Apostles were as much governours as he, in respect of power, since the power was given unto them all, with one and the same words, as Theophylact asserts; and whatsoever power they had, yet they had no civil power; because (as we have heard from Theophylact on Rom. 13.) all souls, even Apostles, must be subject unto the Civil Magistrate. Neither do the words of Porſena insinuate so much as they would have, for Praefectura and ægrotia is but a subordinate power, and a little jurisdiction; yea, and for the most part a conjunct power; as Praefectus urbis, which at Rome were two conjunct, and subordinate unto the power of the former. So this is all the power which they can bring unto Peter, from the words of Theophylact; and we may see how, in many particulars, he differeth from the Tenets of the Romish Church, and favoureth them not in the main things, wherein they pretend to have his consent.

4. Radulph a Benedictine of Flaviak, in this Century writ 20 books on Leviticus, and 14 books on the Epistles of Paul, as witnesseth Gesner. In the Preface on Levit. he saith; Although it should move us not a little to beleve that the world was contrary unto the faith; and now is subject unto the faith; and that the faith was declared by so many miracles, and testified by the blood of so many Martyrs; yet the singular ground of faith is in the Scriptures, when it is clearly seen to be fulfilled in our daies, which we know was prefigured and foretold so many years by the Sacraments of the Fathers, and Oracles of the Prophets. Here by the way note, that not only Radulph, but many others of the more ancient Fathers, do use the word Sacrament for the rites of religion, yea and for mysteries, and very largely or homonymously. Lib. 1. cap. 1. Our Lord Jesus Christ is our Altar, because we lay our oblation on him; for if we do any good thing, we hope that by him it shall be accepted of the Father; and therefore the Apostle Peter saith, Offering spiritual sacrifices acceptable unto God through Jesus Christ. . . . The authority of the Holy Scripture doth furnish unto us matter of holy thoughts. Ibid. Scarcely can any good work be perfected without admission of some sin; it is therefore to be feared, lest when the reward of perfect devotion is expected, the punishment of our guiltiness be required of us. Lib. 2. cap. 2. That Angel is none other, but our greatest High-Priest, of whom we speak; to wit, he was sent by the Father unto men, and sent again from men unto the Father, to plead the causes of men before the Father; he being the Mediatour of God and men. Ibid. cap. 4. Whatsoever man can do for himself, were no way sufficient to obtain forgiveness, unless the immaculate sacrifice of that Just one did commend the repentance of sinners. Lib. 5. cap. 3. When ye do any good thing, ascribe not the very affection of godliness unto you, as if ye could do it of your self; for it is God which worketh in us, at his good pleasure, both to will and to perfect. . . . he who ascribeth grace unto himself, must necessarily lose grace for which he was not thankfull. Lib. 6. cap. 3. He dieth, who discovereth his head, because while he expects salvation another way then by the grace of Christ, he doth estrange from himself Christ, who is life and salvation. Lib. 12. cap. 1. The interposition of lots, is the manifest commendation of God's grace; for as when a lot discerns, deliberation of men is idle, and neither of the parties looks unto himself, but awaits the trial of lot; so in us all who are the children of wrath. . . . it is not considered who would come forth, but whom the mercy of God would deliver. . . Nor in saying so do we destroy man's free-will; for man hath liberty, if he be helped from heaven; otherwise it is nothing, if it be destitute of grace; for the Lord saith, Without me ye can do nothing. . . . Man hath nothing, that he hath not received; for in all things the mercy of God preventeth us; for we knew him not when he was working our salvation in the midst of the earth. Lib. 17. cap. 5. The suffering of Christ is preached, unto the end of the World, by the Teachers of the people, that salvation may be unto the Nations by remembring it; and as the woman which had the flux of blood, was healed by touching the hem of his garment; so the Church by remembring his Passion, which is let down from the corporal presence of Christ unto us, obtains eternal salvation. Ibid. The Holy Scripture is unto us a well furnished Table, and spiritual cordial, given unto us to comfort our heart-qualms against our enemies. Lib. 20. cap. 1. Who is he which can do all that the Lord commandeth? we have not that blessedness, nor are of that worth that we can obey him in all; for none on earth is free of sin, nor can any living be justified in his sight. Ibid. No man is worthy to ascend into heaven, unless he be purged from his sins; sin looketh for hell rather than for heaven, and deserves death, not life; torments, not glory: the Paschal Lamb could not take away these; but he could take it away, of whom it is said, Behold the Lamb of God which takes. . . Catal. test. ver. lib. 11.

5. Gerard Bishop of Laureacen. or Laurilheimen, did accuse the Bishops of Bavier, before Pope Leo the VII, for several crimes; wherewith they had not only stained their lives, but undone the Churches of Christ. The Pope writ unto Elilulph Juvavien, Eisingrin Regmoburgen, Lambert Fruxinen, Visund Sabonen. and other Bishops of Bavaria. First he laith to their charge their slackness, as he had heard it of Gerard; then he rebuketh them that they do do flatter Princes and Magistrates, they did wink at the faults of the wealthy, they corrupt godliness, defile religion; they do prophane holy Philosophy and disturb Christian peace; that by authority of Bishops (which were dumb dogs not able to bark, and blind watch-men) Christians do deceive one another, and the weakest were oppressed.... by magnificent buildings out of measure, and luxurious feasting, they did not carry themselves as becomes the Shepherds of Christ's flock. The disease must be most dangerous which is spread from the head, &c. Here is a complaint against Bishops, and a warning of them; but no mention of reformation. Catal. test. ver. lib. 11. ex Aventin.

6. Otho the Great was more active; for (as it is written above) he called the Pope to an account; and when he heard of the multitude and dissoluteness of Monks, he did judge it more expedient, that they be few and good, than many and idle or hurtfull. Alb. Crantz. in Saxon. lib. 3. cap. 22. saith that he had much to do with them; and that this began at the Bishops, being discontent that Abbots were in so great favour with the Emperour. Nevertheless this example sheweth what was the condition of those times, and what should be done. But after that time multitudes of new orders came up, as followeth; but few Otho's for many ages; he caused many to lay off their hoods, and to live a secular life; but the Popes were more desirous, that many idle men were depending on them, then that any should say unto them, What doest thou? and Emperours and Kings had more power at that time, which their posterity did suffer to be possessed by Bishops and Popes.

A reformation necessary and intended, but upon strong grounds

7. Smaragdus Abbot of the Benedictines of Saint Michael in Britany of France, about the year 980. writ Commentaries on the New-Testament. On Ioh. 3. How is the Son of Man said to have descended from Heaven, or to be in Heaven, even when he was speaking on earth? the flesh of Christ came not down from Heaven, nor was in Heaven, before the time of his ascending; but because the person of Christ is one consisting in two natures, and therefore the Son of Man is rightly said, both to have descended from Heaven, and also before his Passion to have been in Heaven; because what he could not in his human nature, that he did in the Son of God, by whom it was assumed. But this also may be asked, how is it said, None ascends into Heaven, but he who came from Heaven, seeing all the Elect do truly confide that they shall ascend into Heaven; as the Lord hath promised, Where I am, there shall my servant be also? Clear reason untie this knot, because the Mediatour of God and Man; the Man Christ Jesus is the head of all the Elect, and all the Elect are the members of the same head; as the Apostle saith, He gave him to be the head over the whole Church.... therefore none ascends into Heaven but Christ in his body, which is his Church.... Whosoever desireth to ascend into Heaven; must conjoin himself by true unity of faith and love, unto him which came down from Heaven, and is in Heaven; giving to understand, that we can ascend into Heaven no other way, but only by him which came down from Heaven; as he saith elsewhere, No man comes unto the Father, but by me. On Cap. 11. If saith be in us, Christ is in us; therefore if thy faith be on Christ, Christ is in thy heart. On Cap. 10. He is an hireling, who hath the place of a Shepherd, but seeks not the gain of souls; who hunteth after earthly wealth, rejoiceth in the honour of preferment, and delighteth in reverence given him by men. On Act. Cap. 10. He rose from the death, and went up on high, and he alone makes request in Heaven for us; he doth with the Father, what he sought of the Father, because he is Mediatour and Creatour; Mediatour, to pray; and Creatour, to give. On Rom. cap. 1. The same is the predestination of the Saints, as it was most apparent in the Saint of Saints, which none can deny if he understand the Oracles of truth; for we see, that the Lord of glory, as he was man, was predestinate . . . and therefore as he only was predestinate to be our head, so many are predestinate to be his members; and God calleth them which are predestinate his children, that he may make them members of his predestinate only Son. On Cap. 12. Our mind is renewed by the exercises of godliness and meditation of God's word, and understanding of his law; and how much one makes progress from reading the Scriptures, and how much his understanding doth highly ascend, in so much he is a new man, and daily becomes more and more new. On Gal. 3. It must needs be that believers are saved by only faith on Christ. On Phil. 3. Because ye are perfect in faith, ye are perfect in conversation, placing your hope in the only faith of Christ, and walking in a heavenly conversation. Catal. test. ver. lib. 11.

8. The Danes had received the Christian faith about the year 750, by the preaching of Heridag, but liberty of religion continued among them; some were Christians, and some were Heathens; all did acknowledge that Christ is God, but the Heathens said that other Gods were more ancient, and of more power. Alb. Crantz. in Saxon. lib. 3. cap. 25. sheweth, that they rebelled against the Emperour Otho the I. and in the end he and they did agree, that the Danes should accept Bishops thorow all their Country; and they were the more easily induced hereunto, because their King Harald (being the son of a Christian, Tira a daughter of the King of England) was baptized; and at this time the Queen Gunhilda, and her son Zueno, with a great many of the Nobility, received the faith and were baptized. Otho was present at the baptism of the Prince, and called him Zuenotto. Harald continued faithfull unto death; but Zuenotto did forsake the faith in his fathers life time, yet afterward he embraced it again. When Otho had so agreed with the Danes, he turned against their neighbours the Wandals. At that time Wagrii, Winuli, Obotriti and Polabi were dwelling along the Coast of the German sea, all under one name and language, called Wandali. His father had subdued them; but when they rebelled, Otho forced them unto obedience, to pay tribute, and to accept the Christian religion; then innumerable people were baptized, and Churches were built thorow Wandalia; but they abode not constant untill the daies of Otho the III. and he made Magdeburgh or Virginopolis the first Bishop-seat of the Wandals. Likewise Otho the I. sent Aldebert to preach the faith unto the Pruteni, and other barbarous people Northwards; where the holy man was Crowned with Martyrdom, faith Theod. à Nem. About the year 965 the Polonians received the Christian faith; their King Miecislus was baptized, and at his command the idols were broken down; and he erected two Arch-Bishopricks, and nine Bishopricks. Io. Pappus in histor. convers. gent. About the year 966. Pilgrin Bishop of Patavium, and Wolfgang Bishop of Ratisbona, went into Hungary to establish religion under King Diezo, the father of Stephen, of whom it follows to speak in the next Century. About the year 988. Vladomir Duke of Russia married Anna sister of the Eastern Emperour Basilus, and was baptized at Constantinople; and returning home he established the Christian religion, according to the discipline and rites of the Greeks, thorow his Dominions. Io. Pappus ibid. Fascic. temp. hereupon hath this observation; So, so while one Nation falleth, another riseth, that no Nation may glory before the Father of lights.

OF BRITAIN.

1. ABout the year 901. Edward the elder, King of England, expelled the Danes out of Essex, Mercia and Northumberland. At that time the authority of investing Bishops, and other Ecclesiastical Benefices, as also of prescribing Laws unto Church men as well as to the Laity, was in the power of the King, and not of the Pope; as is evident both by the Laws of Alfred King of England, and Guthurn the Danish King of Northumberland; and by the election of seven Bishops, and the division of five Dioceses into ten, in one Synod by authority of this Edward; as is at length in Sir Hen. Spelman Concil. but the Pope would be meddling in such matters by way of confirmation. Nevertheless the Pope's authority did not derogate from Kings or Princes, their power of ruling all matters both Ecclesiastical and Civil within their own Dominions. The like is seen in the Laws of his son Ethelstan; as is written loc. cit. and by M. Fox in Act. & monime thus; I Ethelstan King, by advice of Wifelm my Arch-Bishop, and of other Bishops, command all the Prelates of my Kingdom, in the name of our Lord and of all the Saints, that first of all they, out of my own things, pay the Tithes unto God, as well of the living Beasts, as of the Corns of the ground; and the Bishops do the like in their property and the Elder-men.... This I will that Bishops, and other head-men declare the same unto such as be under their subjection; and that it be accomplished before the term of Saint John Baptist. Let us remember what Jacob said unto the Lord..... Seeing by this Law I have bountifully bestowed on you, all things belonging unto you, take ye heed unto your selves, and to them whom ye ought to admonish, that none of you transgress against God nor me.... Every Bishop should promote all righteousness both of God and the word, &c. He ordained that, in every Burrough, all measures and weights should be confirmed by the Bishop's advice and testimony. Spelman in Concil. pag. 55. In pag. 411. Hoel King of Wales, made a Law that no Church-man should be a Judge in Civil affairs.

2. In the year 913. Constantine the III. King of Scots, gave unto Malcolm the son of Donald the V. the Lands of Cumberland and Westmerland, as unto the appearing successor of the Crown; hereby making a preparative, that these Lands were given by the King, unto him which should be next King; as afterwards the successor of the Empire, was installed King of the Romans, prejudging the liberty of suffrages. Here by the way it is to be marked, that from the first King Fergusius, untill Kenneth the III. the King of Scots was, by election, from among only them of the Blood Royal. In the daies of King Constantine, Ethelstan King of England made invasion upon these lands, and did so great harm unto the Scots, that the King renounced the Crown, and would live a Monkish life at Saint Andrews amongst the Culdees. Edmund King of England, being pestered by the Danes, made a League with Malcolm An. 945. and restored the above-named Lands; upon condition, that the Heir of the Crown should acknowledge the King of England, to be Supreme Lord of Cumberland and Westmerland; even as afterwards the King of England did unto the French King for Normandy, &c. This designation of a successor was occasion of great troubles; for Kenneth the III. made Malcolm, the son of King Duffus, Governour of those Lands; and afterwards he would have preferred his own son unto the Crown; but the designation of the other Malcolm, and his good fame, did cross his desire: wherefore the King caused him to be poisoned, nor could the Authour of the deed be known, all men had so good an opinion of the King. Then Kenneth propounded unto his Nobility, a new designation of his Successour; and also propounded the example of other Nations, where the eldest son of the King, or the nearest in blood, doth succeed; and if the heir be not of ripe age, the worthiest of the Nobility governs the Realm, under the name of Tutours, and not Kings; and by this custom, said he, seditions, bloody wars, and murders are prevented, which have been frequent in this Country through the ambition of the Nobility. There first he asks the opinion of two, which were of highest estimation, and who might seem most to oppose this novation. They, partly for fear, and partly to decline ambition, did allow the King's purpose; and so it passed current, that the King's son was declared Governour of Cumberland. Now as Kenneth goeth about in this way to establish his posterity, he troubleth his conscience; and partly with inward gripings for the aforesaid murder, and partly with dreams, he was so vexed, that in a morning he goeth unto the Bishops and Monks, and confessed his sin. Since King Gregory, about the year 855. made some Laws for immunity of the Clergy, the Priests had straid from the learning and devotion of the ancients: So they brought comfort unto the King, not from the mercies of God through Christ; but injoin him (for their own advantage) to visit holy places, and graves of Saints, to kiss reliques, to redeem his sin by hearing of Masses and alms-deeds; and to account more of Monks and Priests than he had done before. Euchan. hist. li. 6. But Bishop Spotewood in his History lib. 2. saith, They were not yet become so grossly ignorant, as to beleve that by such external works the justice of God is satisfied; although some idle toies, such as the visiting the graves of the Saints, kissing of reliques, hearing of Masses, and others of that kind which avarice and superstition had invented, were then crept into the Church; yet people were still taught, that Christ is the only propitiation for sin, and by his blood the guilt thereof is only washed away. Herein his judgment is charitable; but how true it is, I see not his warrant. The King resolves to obey the direction, and as he was going to visit the grave of Palladius, he lodged with Fenestella Lady of Fettercairne, and was treacherously murdered by her, in the year 994. Then Constantine, son of King Culen, at all occasions begun to regret the iniquity of the former novation, that thereby the Country would be indamaged, and all they of the Royal Blood defrauded: For, said he, what is more foolish than to permit unto Fortune the chief matter of the State? What if the King's children, through infirmity of body or mind, be unapt for government? What if babes had been Kings when the Romans, Peichts and Danes did oppress the land? What is more against reason, then to establish that by Law, which God, in his word, hath threatened as a curse? Neither is the pretended danger of sedition and murder prevented thereby, since there is no less fear of Tutours than of Competitours; because those also must be the nearest in blood: Wherefore the present occasion is not to be omitted, but presently to abolish that Law, if it deserve the name of a Law, which was enacted by tyranny and fear; and the former customs, whereby the Kingdom hath flourished from small beginnings, is in time to be restored; lest it cannot be remedied, when a preparative is once past. A Parliament was held at Scone within 12. daies after the death of Kenneth, and Constantine was proclaimed King. The Governour of Cumbria, being as yet but young, had little assistance; but his base brother Kenneth levied an Army for himself, and Camped at the water Alound, near unto the King; and perceiving his number to be lesser than the Kings, he sought the advantage of Sun and wind; the King relied upon his number, and both Captains were slain. Then Grim, the son or brother-son of King Duffus, was proclaimed King by that party. The fore-

The power of Law-making belongs to the King, and not to the Pope.

named Malcolm raised an army against him; by mediation of Bishop Forthad they agree that Grim shall remain King of the Land by the North-wall of Severus; and Malcolm, during his life time, shall possess the South-part, and succeed to the Crown. Nevertheless King Grim considering that his seed would certainly be debarred of the Crown, began to oppress both parts; so that the North-part sought aid from Malcolm, and Grim was forsaken by his Army, and slain in the year 1016. This tumult for succession is not yet ended, as followeth.

3. There is extant a Book, called Altercatio Ecclesie & Synagoga, without the name of the Authour; by authority of Chronic. Hursang. it is given to Gislebert an English Monk, who is said to have lived in the beginning of this Century. It saith in Ca. 4. The Holy Spirit first makes the will good, and then worketh by it; truly whatsoever good can be done, whether to think, or to will, or to perfect, is to be ascribed unto God, and not to man's free-will; therefore if God worketh these three things in us, to wit, to think, to will, and to perfect; surely He worketh the first without us, the second with us, and the third by us; seeing by giving the good will he preveneth us; by changing the evil will with consent, he joineth us to himself; and by furnishing unto our consent ability and facility, the inward worker is made manifest externally by our outward work. Ca. 8. The righteousness of God is manifested; here righteousness is meant, not wherewith he is just, but wherewith he cloatheth man, when he justifieth the ungodly freely: Unto this righteousness the Law and the Prophets give witness; the Law, because by commanding, threatening and justifying no man, it sheweth clearly that man is justified, by the quickning Spirit, thorow the gift of God; the Prophets, because what they fore-told, Christ hath fulfilled at his coming We cry unto the most secret ears of God by desires, more then by words; for unto him who knows all things, our wilhes are voices; if thou desirest good, thou hast cried; Moses was silent in voice, and cried by faith, as the woman touching the hem of Christ; but others do cry in fear, and fail in faith. Catal. test. verit. lib. 11.

4. Fredward a Knight, about the year 940. writ a book concerning the Presence of Christ's body in the Sacrament, following the doctrine of John Scot, and of Augustine. Paschasius an Abbot writ against him. Ibid. About the year 950. it was reported as a strange thing, that Odo a Dane, then Bishop of Canterbury, turned the bread on the Altar, into the flesh of Christ, and from flesh into bread again. He confirmed the strange doctrine, with strange arguments; to wit, by lying miracles. Ibid.

5. At that time was great contention in England, between the Monks and the Clergy, whereas before all Cloisterers and Priests were called Clergy or Clerks; but then they which did profess a single and more strict life, were called Monks and Regulars, and others were called Seculars. This was so hot, that where a Monkish Bishop had place, Secular Priests were thrust out; and likewise the Secular Bishops did with the Regulars. During this difference, Dunstan Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, obtained from the Pope a Palle, and a Bull to cast all the Priests, who had wives, out of some Monasteries, which by consent of some other Bishops, they had lately taken from the Monks. Many did dispute and Preach against him. Antonin. hist. tit. 19. par. 3. cap. 6. remembreth a Scot which did especially resist Dunstan; and Alfred Prince of Mercia, took part with the Priests. Pol. Virgilius in histor. Angl. writes, that in a Synod it was debated and concluded, that Priests should be restored; and immediately a voice was heard from the wall, whereon was the Image of Christ, saying; They think amiss, who favour the Priests. That was received as a Divine Oracle, and the Priests were secluded from their Benefices and Mo-

Priests and

nasteries. They say, None heard the words but the King; and the Bishop, and the Priests and their adherents became dumb and spoke no more. But Sir Hen. Spelman in Concil. pag. 491. shews that no mention is of this miracle in Florent. Wigorn. who about that time writ the life of King Edgar; and saith, The Synod was dissolved because of a variance in the election of a new King; and Hoveden writing next after Florent. hath nothing of it. All do agree that in this Synod the one part did maintain their liberty by testimonies of Scripture, ancient Canons, practise of the Church in all ages. On the other side Dunstan advanceth the late Canons, and the Papal Bull; and when he saw that his Gorgon had no force, and the Synod would determine of the Priests, Ramulph hist. lib. 2. cap. 11. saith, that he raised the Devil to speak out of the Image these former words. The adverse party protests to the contrary, and would not consent; because they knew that God would not work miracles, for confirming errors contrary to his own word. Catal. test. ver. lib. 11. Because at that time all did not agree, the King sent into Scotland, craving some learned men to be sent unto a Synod, that was called for that cause. Io. Bale Cent. 14. saith, Fathard, or as some call him, Etheldrad (possibly they were two) singular for learning, eloquence and authority, went; and in Synodo Calmenfi did confirm the marriage of Priests by Scriptures, and strong arguments, to be lawfull; that the Monks, being blinded with the light shining so brightly, had nothing to say against him. Dunstan said he was old, and could not attend such disputes; and although ye seem to prevail, it will not be for long space, nor shall ye have your will; and so by his art he caused the beams or joists of the house to fall; some were killed, many were wounded; only Dunstan was safe with his chair, that was fixed on a Pillar. So the controversy was ended with Devilish cruelty. Catal. test. ver.

6. In the end of this Century Elfrick, Abbot of Malmsbury, became Archbishop of Canterbury; by him a Sermon was appointed to be read publicly on Easter-day, before they received the Communion. It was Printed at London, An. 1623; and afterwards at Aberdeen, together with Bertram's treatise: In it is written thus, Men have often searched, and yet do search [So this was questioned before Berengarius] how bread that is gathered of corn can be turned into Christ's body; and wine that is pressed out of many grapes, is turned, through one blessing, into the Lord's blood? The answer is made thus; Some things be spoken by signification, and some by things certain; a true and certain thing it is, that Christ was born of a Maid; he is said to be bread by signification, and a Lamb, and a Lion; he is called bread, because he is our life; he is said to be a Lamb, for his innocency; but yet Christ is not so by true nature, neither bread, nor a Lamb. Why then is the holy Housel [or Sacrament] called Christ's body or his blood, if it be not truly what it is called? without they be seen bread and wine both in figure and taste; and they be truly, after their hallowing, Christ's body and blood, through ghostly mystery.... Much is between the body of Christ wherein he suffered, and the body which is hallowed to Housel; truly the body wherein Christ suffered, was born of the flesh of Mary with blood and bone, with skin and sinews, in human limbs, with a reasonable soul, living; but this ghostly body, which we call the Housel, is gathered of many corns, without blood or bone, without lim, without soul; and therefore nothing is to be understood there bodily, but all ghostly. [Mark this distinction between the two bodies, or the sign and the thing signified.] Whatsoever in that Housel gives substance of life, that is of the ghostly might; therefore is that Housel called a mystery, because one thing is seen in it, and another thing is understood; that which is seen there hath bodily shape; and that which we do understand, hath ghostly might: Cer-

ments in the
per.

Certainly Christ's body which suffered death, and rose again from the dead, is eternal and impassible; that Houfel is temporal, not eternal, it is corruptible, and dealed into several parts, chewed between the teeth, and sent down into the belly; howsoever after ghostly might, it is all in every part; many receive that holy body, and yet it is so all in every part after a ghostly mystery; though some chew less, yet there is no more might in the greater part then in the lesser, because it is whole in all after the invisable might. This mystery is a pledge and a figure, Christ's body is the truth it self; we keep this pledge mystically, untill we come to the truth it self, and then is this pledge ended: Truly it is (as we have said) Christ's body and blood, not bodily, but ghostly; and ye ought not to search how it is done, but to hold in your beleeif that it is so done. So there. It is true in that homily are some suspicious words, as it speaks that the Mass is profitable unto the quick and dead, and a report of two miracles; but are judged to be an addition, because they stand in that place unfitly; and the matter without them, both before and after, doth agree most orderly; and these purposes are different from the scope of the Authour. The same Author hath two other Treatises, one directed to Wulfsin Bishop of Shirburn, and another to Wulfstan Bishop of York; in both which he hath the same doctrine of the Sacrament, saying; That lively bread is not bodily so, nor the self-same body wherein he suffered; neither is that holy wine the Saviour's blood, which was for us in bodily things, but in ghostly understanding; both be truly, the bread his body, and the wine his blood; as was the heavenly bread, which we call Manna.

CHAPTER V.

OF COUNCELS.

1. IN this Century were no Synods assembled for doctrine or discipline (as in other times) all Nations were so pestered with wars, as is touched now; only for some personal causes, were some Synods; among them all, one is remarkable at Rhemes, in the year 991. where Arnulph Bishop of the place was deposed, for some trespass against the King and Gerebert. (Afterwards Pope Sylvester the II. was placed in that See. And here by the way we may see, what power Kings had then in deposing and investing Bishops.) Some of the Bishops would have had Arnulph's cause referred unto Pope John; and others did alledge a Canon of the Synod at Carthage of 227 Bishops, and Augustine was one of them; Causes should be determined where they are begun, that there is no need of Appeals unto Bishops beyond Sea; that is, as they understand it, unto the See of Rome. Then stood up Arnulph Bishop of Orleance, and made a long Oration, whereof a part is; Let it be far from this holy assembly to defend or accuse any man against Divine or Human Laws.... We deserve to be drawn before the Thrones of Kings, if we seem to contradict Divine Laws in any thing.... Most reverend Fathers, we do reverence the Church of Rome for the memory of Saint Peter, nor indeavour we to resist the Decrees of the Roman High-Priests; yet following the authority of the Council of Nice, which the Church of Rome hath also revered continually. But there are two things that we must alwaies look unto; that is, whether the silence, or new constitutions of the Roman Pope, seem to prejudge the received Laws and Decrees of former Councils? If his silence shall prejudge, then all Laws shall be silent, when he is silent; and if new Constitutions do prejudge, to what end do all Laws serve,

A Synod at Rhemes opposeth the power of the Pope,

M m m which

which are made when all things are governed at the pleasure of one? Ye see, that these two things being once admitted, the estate of the Churches of God is in danger; and when we seek Laws by Laws, we have no Laws. But ô lamentable Rome, who broughtest forth so many lights of Fathers, unto our Grand-fathers; and pourest forth, in our time, most monstrous darkness, and infamous to the following ages! Of old we hear of worthy Leo's and great Gregory's; what shall I speak of Gelasius and Innocentius? There is a long role of them which have filled the World with their doctrine. The Universal Church might have been committed [and was not committed unto them] who for their good life and doctrine excelled all the World; howbeit in their happiness this thy privilege [or intended usurpation] was opposed by the Bishops of Affrick, fearing as we think these miseries, rather than the stamp of thy Dominion. For what have we not seen in these our daies? We have John (surnamed Octavian) walking in the puddle of uncleanness, conspiring against Otho the Emperour, whom he had Crowned Augustus.---- Malefacius an horrible monster succeeds, going beyond all the World in wickedness, and defiled with the blood of former Popes; and he also was condemned in the great Synod, and chased away. Shall it be Decreed, that unto such Monsters void of all knowledge of Divine things, [where was then the head of Omnis-science, in his breast?] innumerable Priests should be subject, who are famous throughout the World for knowledge and godly conversation? What is this, Reverend Fathers, and in whose default shall it be thought to be? it is our, it is our fault, our ungodliness, which seek our own things, and not the things that concern Jesus Christ; for if in any man who is elected unto a Bishoprick, gravity of manners be required, and good conversation, and knowledge of divine and human things; what is not to be required of him who seeks to be the Master of all Bishops? What think ye, Reverend Fathers, of him who sits in a high Throne, and glorieth in his gold and purple cloaths? [He is more like to Nero, than to Peter or Paul; nay, that is not enough] to wit, if he be destitute of charity, and puffed up with [a conceit of] knowledge, he is Antichrist sitting in the Temple of God, and shewing himself as if he were God. But if he be destitute of knowledge, nor hath charity, he is an Idol in the Church of God; from whom to seek responses, is to advise with an Idol. [Let any Jesuit answer unto this dilemma; for both the parts are sharply pointed, and they cannot truly find a third.] Whither then shall we go? the Gospel shews us, that a certain man sought fruit thrice on a Fig-tree, and because he found none, he would cut it down; but after intercession he delayed: Let us therefore await our Primats; and in the mean time, let us search where we may find the green Pastures of God's Word. [Here is a right way of seeking resolution.] Some witnesses present in this sacred assembly shew, that there may be found some worthy Priests of God in Germany and Belgia, who are our neighbours. Wherefore if the anger of Princes do not hinder, the judgment of Bishops might be sought thence, rather than from that City, which weigheth judgment by the purse. [Then he alledgeth and refuteth the Canons, that were wont to be cited on the contrary; and reports the like practices of the Church of France: And then he saith] If passage to Rome were stopped with Armies of besieging Barbarians; or if Rome were serving a barbarous Prince at his pleasure, or were advanced into some Kingdom, shall there be no Councils in the mean time? or shall the Bishops of the World to the damage of their own Countries await for Councils, and Councils of ordering their affairs from their enemies? And truly the Canon of Nice, which by the testimony of the Romish Church, goeth beyond all Councils, and all Decrees, commandeth that Councils be held twice every year, and prescribes nothing therein therein concerning the authority of the Bishop of Rome. But to speak more plainly, and to confess openly, after the fall of the Empire, this City hath lost the Church of Alexandria and Antiochia, and omitting mention of Asia and Affrick, now Europe goeth away; for the Church of Constantinople hath withdrawn her self; the inward parts of Spain know not her judgments; therefore there is a departing, as the Apostle speaks, not only of the Nations, but of the Churches also; that Antichrist seemeth to be before the dores, whose Ministers have occupied all France, and do oppress us with all their might: And as the same Apostle saith, now the mystery of iniquity is a working, only who with-holds shall with-hold, untill he be taken away, that the son of perdition may be revealed, the man of sin. . . . Which now is manifest, that the power of Rome being shaken, religion being banished, the name of God is contemned with frequent perjuries, and the worship of Divine religion is despised, even by the High-Priests; yea Rome it self, being almost alone, departeth from her self; for she provides neither for her self, nor for others. In the end he exhorts the Bishops, there present, to go forward in the deposition of the other Arnulph, according to the Ecclesiastical Canons; as they did, and he himself did consent unto the sentence of his depolition. Ph. Morna. in Myster. inq. & Magdebur. Histor. cent. 10. ex Actis Synodi, in an ancient manuscript. When Pope John heard that his See was contemned, by the Synod at Rhemes, he threatneth his curse against King Hugh, and his son Robert. The King returned answer, that he had done nothing in contempt, but was willing to justify all what he or his Bishops had done, if it pleased the Pope to meet him at Gratianopolis on the Frontiers of Italy and France; or if rather he would come into France, he promised to receive him with the highest honour. The Pope sent his Legates into France, and in the mean time Cerebert sent an Epistle unto Seguin, Arch-Bishop of Senon (who was said to favour the deposed Arnulph) the tenor whereof is; It became your worthiness to eschue the craftiness of deceitfull men; and to hear the voice of the Lord, saying; Here is Christ, or he is there; follow not, One is said to be in Rome, who justifieth those things which ye condemn, and condemneth those things which ye think just. . . . God saith, If thy brother offend against thee, go and rebuke him. . . . how then say some, that in the deposition of Arnulph, we should have awaited the deposition of the Romish Bishop? Can they say that the judgment of the Romish Bishop, is greater then the judgment of God? But the first Bishop of Rome, or the Prince of the Apostles saith, We must obey God rather then man. Also Paul, the Teacher of the Nations, crieth; If any man preach unto you otherwise then what ye have received, although he were an Angel from Heaven, let him be accursed. Because Pope Marcellin offered incense unto Idols, should therefore all Bishops offer incense? I say boldly, that if the Bishop of Rome himself sin against a brother, and being often admonished, will not hear the Church; even the Roman Bishop, according to the command of Christ, should be esteemed as a Publican and Heathen; for the higher up, hath the lower fall. And if he think us unworthy of him, because none of us assenteth unto him, when he judgeth contrary to the Gospel, he cannot therefore separate us from the communion of Christ; seeing even a Presbyter, unless he confess or be convicted, should not be removed from his Office: And the rather because the Apostle saith, who can separate us from the love of Christ? and, I am perswaded that neither death nor life. . . . The priviledges of Saint Peter, saith Leo the Great, is not, where judgment is not exercised according to righteousness. Wherefore occasion should not be given unto these our enviers, that the Priesthood, which is one every where, as the Catholick Church is one, should be subject unto one man; that if he be corrupt with money, fa-

your, fear or ignorance, none can be a Priest, except whom these vertues recommend unto him. Let the Law of the Catholick Church be common Farewell, and suspend not your selves from the sacred mysteries. Pope John had intelligence of this Letter, and summoned the Bishops of France unto a Synod, first at Rome, then at Aken. The Bishops answered, They were not obliged to go out of their own Country. At last he named Munson, on the borders of France. Where only Gerebert appeared, and boldly maintained the cause of the French Church; so that the Legate Leo could do nothing, without new instructions from the Pope; save only that he appointed another Synod at Rhemes; and in the mean time he suspends Gerebert. The Bishop said unto the Legate, It is not in the power of any Bishop or Patriarch, to remove any of the faithfull from the Communion, unless he confess or be convicted; and none of these could be laied unto his charge, and no other Bishop of France was there. Afterwards Gerebert, fearing the inconstancy of the new King, went into Germany, and not long after he was advanced unto the See of Ravenna. As he did fear, it came to pass, and Arnulph was restored. Nevertheless Gerebert cannot contain himself, but he writes the Apology of the French Church; as his Epistle unto Wilderodon, Bishop of Argentine, testifieth. Ph. Morne. in Myster.

Observations,

2. Out of these four Centuries it is clear; First, That many both of the Civil and of the Ecclesiastical Estates, did oppose the ambition and usurpations of the Bishops of Rome. 2. That the Canons that were enacted at the Synod of Trent, were not known in former ages; although Papists dare say, that they have authorized nothing but what was held by the ancient Church. 3. Although the Ancients gave way to unnecessary rites, and fond superstitions; yet in matter of doctrine and faith, they held the same which the Reformed Churches do teach now; and they begun to see that the Bishop of Rome is the Antichrist. 4. We see the truth of what Pol. Virgil. writes de invent. rer. lib. 5. cap. 1. Many rites were borrowed from the Jews, and ancient Romans, and other Heathens; which (saith he, lib. 6. cap. 8.) we know not whether it was well done, since experience teacheth, that whatsoever reason might be for bringing them into the Church; yet the manners of Christians now, require to abolish them.

3. Because after this time ordinary Synods were not held, I shall omit this Chapter till we come unto the XV. Century: And when, upon particular causes, either Emperour or Pope, or others, did call a Synod, I shall speak of them in those places.

CHAP. I.

Of EMPEROURS.

Of this Age it is to be premitted generally, that (as Car. Baron. ad An. 1001. §. 1 & 4. saith) at that time the revelation of Antichrist was proclaimed in France, preached in Paris, published thorow the world, and beleevd by many. He confirmed this by the testimony of Abbo Floriacen, who in Apologet. ad Hugo & Robert. saith, When I was a young man I heard a Sermon, in a Church at Paris, concerning the end of the world, that so soon as the thousand years are expired, Antichrist shall come; and not long after the general judgement shall follow. Wherefore Vsser de statu & success.

Age.*

Eccles. cap. 3. adviseth his Reader, that now he shall see the Popes exalted by pretext of religion, and government of the Church; now they will wring all Civil government from Emperours and Princes, and they will sit as Monarchs; now they give Laws concerning Civil things; they do raise seditions, and depose Princes; now they lead Armies, and impose Taxes; now they have no care of religion, unless some witness of the Truth dare open his mouth against the waxing errors; or unless some ceremonies serve for advancing the Papal grandure, or seem expedient to draw money unto their Sec; as will be manifest especially after the year 1070.

2. HENRY the II. Duke of Bavier, and Nephew of Otho the I. was chosen Emperour by the Princes Electours, according to their new authority, An.
1002. This was the first time that Bishops had a voice in the election of the Emperour; and hence it came that they sit in the Imperial Diet; and in some other Nations Bishops are Parliamentary Lords. Henry was so distracted with wars against Robert King of France; and then against Bodislaus King of Bohemia, for the space of 10. years, that he could not go to Rome. After his Coronation there, he conquered Calabria and Pulia unto the Empire, from the Calisti; that is, the Deputies of the Greek Empire. Shortly thereafter the Normans entred into Pulia, and were partners with the Greeks against the Germans, and thereafter became Lords of both Sicilies. Henry gave his sister in marriage unto Stephen King of Hungary, on condition that he would be a Christian. He held a Synod at Frankford; of which Dithmar. lib. 6. and after him Ph. Mornay in Myfter. say, A general Synod is assembled at Frankford, and visited by all the Bishops on this side of the Alps; Willegifus was Moderator, and no word of the Pope. In the year 1024. Henry fell sick, and intreated the Electours, that they would chuse Conrade Duke of Suevia or Franconia to be his Successour. The two brothers Basilus and Constantine, had now reigned 50. years together; but Basilus was the worthier, and had the greatest sway, and died three years before Constantine, who then did reign vitiously; and before his death, he ordained his son-in-law Romanus Argyropolus to be his Successour.

3. CONRADE the II. was pronepnoy of Conrade the I. He was called Emperour, and was not chosen for two years thereafter, because of discord among the Electours, and then were sundry Competitours; as Conon Uncle of the late Henry. And many did claim liberty upon occasion of the inter-reign. He calmed all these troubles by his prudence, and without blood-shed. He went into Italy with a great Army, and subdued Millain; and at Rome was Crowned by Pope John the XXI. with great applause of the people. When he returned into Germany, he was necessitated to go back into Italy, because several Cities did revolt; he inflicted severe punishments on the offenders; and arriving at Rome, he releevd Pope Benedict, as followeth. Then he did visit all the Lands of Italy, belonging unto the Empire or Church, without resistance, and returned with Triumph into Germany; where he thought to live in Peace, but within few daies he died, An. 1040. Romanus proved a most valiant Prince at first, but following the waies of covetousness he was hated; in the sixth year of his Reign his wife Zoë procured his death, that she might marry Michael Calaphatus; he ruled the Empire 7. years, and defended it valiantly against the Sarazens in Asia, in Syria, and on the frontiers of Phœnicia. After him Zoë married a fourth husband, Constantine Monomachus; he was a vitious man, and the Sarazens prevailed in Asia the less. After him, and the death of Zoë, her sister Theodora reigned two years so happily, that great lamentation was for her death. After her, within three years were three Emperours; to wit, Theodora had named an old man Michael Stratiotes; Isaac Comnenus rebelled against him, and the people receive him; but he was taken away by death, and when he was sick he named Constantine Duca.

4. HENRY the III. (called The Black) was chosen Successour to his father, not without difficulty; for the Pope and some Electors did alledge, it is dangerous if the son did succeed unto his father, but they yeeld for his valour. He purchased great honour in subduing the King of Bohemia. the Duke of Lorain; and in restoring Peter King of Hungary, against an usurper Andrew. In his time were many Popes of no authority, and their lands were taken by others, without resistance. Henry had wars with Henry King of France, to him the Emperour presented to decide the controversie hand to hand, that no more innocent blood might be spilt; at a parley they do agree. In the end of his Reign God sent on the earth, for the sins of men, famine, sword and pestilence. The Emperour through heaviness contracts sickness, and caused the Electours to swear unto his son (not yet baptized) as King of the Romans; and he died An. 1057. In Greece Constantine was so hated for covetousness, that the Subjects would not make resistance against the Infidels, conquering many Towns in Asia, he died in his 7. year. His sons were young, and the Empress Empress Eudocia took upon her the government. Because the Infidels prevailed, the Princes caused her to take Romanus Diogenes for her husband; he proclaimed himself Emperor, and went against the Sarazens, and after divers chances was taken, An. 1072. Axan the Sultan laid him at the foot of his Throne, and stepped up and down upon his body; and thereafter sent him home with promises of mutual alliance between their children. The Greeks judge him unworthy of the Empire, and Crowned Michael son of Duca. He picked out the eyes of Diogenes, and made him a Monk. The Turks still do prevail in the Eastern parts of the Empire; therefore Michael was deposed in the 7. year, and Nicephorus (an old man) was chosen. Alexius Comnenus, Michael's brother, thrust him forth, and reigned 27. years.

5. HENRY the IV. was chosen successor to his father; because he was so young, and there was peace in the Empire, the government was committed unto his mother Agnes by consent. But the Princes began to be weary of a woman's government, and would have him to take the power into his own hand, while he was but young, and then all was done as the Princes would; but when he came to riper years, he reversed many of their deeds. Vita Henr. in fascic. rer. On the other side they were offended, and began rebellious attempts, so that he was forced to take up Arms, and especially against the Saxons. He was neither unlearned nor peevish; yet had so bad luck, that who-soever took up Arms against him, was thought to do religiously, Guil. Malmsh. de gest. Angl. lib. 3. He was given to vengence; but otherwise was wise, religious, eloquent, liberal to the poor, and would not willingly be subject unto any power. He had continual jars and wars with the Popes, through the wicked pride of Hildebrand. By the way Princes may learn how to deal with the Popes; he that stands in awe of their curse, shall be a slave to their Miter; but if you despise them, ye may at last have them as ye list: for the Papal curse may be compared to Domitian's thunder; the crack seemed terrible, but the cause and effects of it are but a toy. Hildebrand setting his heart to exalt himself above all power, began first to prosecute the Acts of his Predecessour, concerning the collation of Benefices, or (as they spoke) simony, and he required the Emperour to cast out all such Bishops. The Emperour thinking the Pope's words to be the commandments of God, did obey without delay; and without any other order denieth the Bishops their Revenues, and thought he was doing God good service, so long as he understood not the craft of Hildebrand. Whom he cast off, Hildebrand did promote, and having divided them from the Emperour, he tied them to himself by oaths and other favours, Benno Cardin. At that time the Normans having conquered Pulia, Calabria and Magna Græcia, were in fear of the Emperour; and Mathildis, the richest Duchess of Italy, was easily inticed. Hildebrand drew them two on his side, and the Saxons (who were not well pleased that the Empire was gone from their house) and many others. He being so strengthened, chargeth the Emperour to appear, upon the second day of the second week in Lent, An. 1076. in his Council at Lateran, for his simony; with certification, if he appeared not that day, he would excommunicate him. In the mean time the young Emperour, being troubled with wars against the Sarazens, thought it not so necessary to attend the Synod. Without any more accusation, citation or conviction, the Pope excommunicated the Emperour, and his Counsellor Herman Bishop of Bambergh, and some others (unheard) for simony; that is, because the Emperour had given, and they had accepted Benefices without the advice of the Pope. It is said by Card. Benno, that none of the Cardinals would subscribe the Sentence. The Emperour was not a little offended at this new or unknown presumption of the Prelate, and convened a Council at Worms;

How to deal with the Popes.

The Pope is opposed.

where all the Bishops of Germany (except the Saxons) and many out of France and Italy were assembled. There the Pope was accused of ambition, perjury, wresting the Scriptures to serve his turn, usurping the Offices of King and Priest, as Decius and other Heathens had done in old time; and of many infamous things done through avarice and pride. They conclude, Hildebrand is worthy of deposition; and the Bishops of Italy, in a Synod at Ticino, subscribe the same sentence. Catalo. test. verit. lib. 13. Alb. Crantzius in Saxon. lib. 5. cap. 5. saith, The Sheep do judge, despise, and forsake the Shepheard. Whether formality could be had at that time, or what equity was on either side, the Reader may judge; but clear it is, the Pope was opposed and condemned by the two Synods. Crantzius saith, they writ a Letter unto him, which they conclude thus; Because thy installing was with so many enormities, and the Church of God is in danger of so grievous a storm, by the abuse of thy novations; and we find that thy life is blotted with so manifold infamies, and so grievous a scandal is approaching, as we never promised obedience unto thee, so from hence we renounce any obedience; and because thou doest not account any of us a Bishop (as thou hast publicly proclaimed) none of us will account thee Apostolical any more. The power that was granted unto Henry the III. of creating High-Priests, made them so bold, saith Crantz. Roland a Priest of Parma, was sent to Rome with this Letter; and to summon Hildebrand, in the name of this Council, to yeeld up his Seat, and to summon the Cardinals to repair unto the Emperour for a new election. Pope Gregory assembled the Cardinals in the Lateran: First, He killed the Messenger in the Church. 2. He condemned the Sentence of the Council. 3. He deposed Sigefrid Bishop of Mentz, with all others who had been in that Council. 4. He deprived the Emperour of his Title, and released all his Subjects from their Oath of obedience. On the other side, the Emperour sent through all Nations, far and near, his Letters, declaring how presumptuously and unjustly the Pope had dealt with him. The Princes of Germany, some being perswaded by the Saxons, some fearing that thunder, and some rejoicing in a new occasion of usurpation, do assemble at Oppenheim, October the 1. and they conclude to fall from Henry, unless he will submit unto the Pope, and confess his errors; and they prescribe the manner, as followeth. Such was the peevishness and inconstancy of the Germans. The young Emperour seeing that his Princes were ready to forsake him, promised upon Oath, that if the Pope will come into Germany, he would ask forgiveness; and they ingage themselves to accompany him thereafter to his Coronation at Rome. When the Pope was come to France, intending for Ausburgh (as it was appointed) to meet the Emperour, Venericus Bishop of Verceles, made him believe that the Emperour was coming with an Army against him, and advised him to retire for his safety unto Camisio, a City of the Dutches Mathildis. Henry hearing of this vain fear, and that his Nobles had forsaken him, followed the Pope; he laied aside all his royalty, and came with his Empress, in the midst of winter, unto Canusio; he was staied at the Gates, and standing with bare feet, the space of three daies, did humbly call for audience. On the third day answer was brought, His Holiness was not at leisure. The Emperour continued intreating that he might be heard. Fourteen Cardinals, and the Arch-Deacon, and the Primicerius, with many other Clerks of Lateran (unto the judgment of whose seat now all the World is obedient, saith Pet. Mexia) considering this intollerable arrogancy, went away and refused to communicate with the Pope; and the above-named Venericus thereafter writ a book, De discordia regni & sacerdotii, against the Pope. At last by intreaty of the Dutches, and of Azo Marques of Areste, and of the Abbot of Clumak, the Servant of

Servant of Servants was pleased on the fourth day to accept the Emperour on these conditions: First, On the Pope's part he shall freely exerce all Pastoral charge thorow all the parts of the Empire. 2. On the other side, Henry shall do penance as the Pope shall injoin him. 3. He shall appear at any time that the Pope shall appoint. 4. He shall be content that the Pope be judge of his cause. 5. He shall answer to all accusations to be laied against him in the Council, and shall never seek any revenge. 6. Whether he be cleared or not cleared in the Council, he shall stand to the Pope's pleasure, either to have the Kingdom restored, or not restored. 7. Before the trial of his cause, he shall not use his Royal Ornaments, Scepter or Crown, nor usurp authority to govern, nor crave any Oath of obedience from the Subjects. The Emperour accepteth all these, and upon oath promised obedience, and was loosed from excommunication only; and so was let go in peace, (as saith the Authour Apolog. de unitat. Eccles. such as Judas feigned.) He took his journey to Papia, intending (as some write) to Rome, where he was ordered to do penance. The Pope triumphed not a little that he had so vexed the Emperour, and sent Legates to compound with, and absolve such as were excommunicated for cleaving unto the Emperour. But all the Bishops, Princes, and people of Italy were in an uproar, and deriding the Legates, said; They account not of Hildebrand's excommunication, whom all the Bishops of Italy (long time before that) had excommunicated for simony, blood, adultery, &c. and that the King had done otherwise then became him, and had utterly stained his glory, by submitting his Majesty unto an Heretick. And after more ripening of the sedition, they were of one mind to cast off the father, and to chuse his son (though very young) to be their King; and to elect another Pope by whom he should be Crowned. Lomb. Schafnaburgen. writes so (though a follower of this Pope) not of them who had followed Henry, but were ready to forsake him; and so doth Nausler, who addeth, that they would have the Acts of the Apostate Pope annulled. The Emperour writ unto them, that he had done so of necessity, and for conserving publick peace. Nevertheless the Cities shut their gates against him. Hildebrand mistrusting what might befall, if God would give unto the Emperour a more quiet Kingdom, consulted to displace him, and to derive the Empire unto Rodulph a Duke of Saxony (who had married the Emperour's sister, and to whom the Emperour had given the Dukedoms of Suevia and Burgundy, Catal. test. ver.) upon these conditions, that he should not meddle with Church assemblies; that he would quit all presentations of Bishopricks; and not declare his sons to be his Successours, as if it were by inheritance. Platin. For to effect this, Letters were sent thorow Germany, to perswade men that Henry was justly excommunicated; and that they would consent unto the Pope in chusing Rodulph to be Emperour. After these Letters, he sent unto Rodulph a Crown, with this inscription, Petra dedit Petro; Petrus Diadema Rodulpho. The Reader may consider the truth of both parts of that verse, since Peter did neither receive a Diadem from Christ, nor can we read, that he gave a Crown unto any man; and although Hildebrand took upon him to give it, it followeth not that Peter gave it; unless we may reason in this manner, Hildebrand would not submit unto every Ordinance of God, nor unto the King as Supream, therefore Peter would not submit, &c. We read, that he whom they call Hell's King, did proffer to give the Kingdoms of the earth; but no other creature, before this Helbrand, attempted to do the like. Now the proud Prelate gave command, to the Bishops of Mentz and Colein, to cause the election and anointment of Rodulph, and to defend him against all opposition. And he writ unto the Princes of Germany, saying; Go on, ye holy Princes of the Apostles, and what I have said, do ye confirm by interposing your authority exerce this judgment against Henry speedily; and let all the children of iniquity know, that he is not put from the Kingdom by chance, but by your doing. Naucler. vol. 2. generat. 36. At this time the Emperour was at Rome, and knew not what they were doing in Germany, till the Bishop of Strawsburg went with all hast and told him. He said he would crave the Pope's leave to return. The Bishop answered, that is to no purpose, for I assure you the Pope hath contrived all these things against you. Crantz. Saxon. lib. 5. cap. 7. So he goeth away privately; he gathereth an Army, and marcheth to defend his right; and in the mean time he sent unto Gregory, putting him in mind of his League, and intreating him to stay Rodulph from usurping the Empire, or else to proceed against him. Gregory being otherwise minded, replieth, A man cannot be condemned till he be heard. Whereupon followed a bloody battel with uncertain victory; then they both, trusting unto the Pope's favour, send to know, unto whom he would adjudge the Empire. Ere the Messengers were returned, both Armies were refreshed, and had fought again. Then the Pope began to consider, that this manner of dealing might not only turn to the great damage of Germany, but of other Nations also; and thinking to help Rodulph another way, he sent Commissions unto the Bishop of Trevers, to hold a Council in Germany, and there to determine to which of the two the Empire did appertain, by just and publick consideration; promising, that what they did determine, he, by the authority of God Omnipotent, and of Saint Peter and Paul, would ratifie. The Emperour would not let them assemble in Council, unless Rodulph do renounce the Title of Emperour. The Legates considering that this was contrary to the mind of the Pope, return and shew what was required. Then Hildebrand accursed the Emperour again, and sent his excommunicatory Letters unto all the Nations; and deposed Gerebert Bishop of Ravenna, for siding with the Emperour, and sent another into his See. At this time Henry and Rodulph had the third conflict at Elystrum, where several Princes were killed on both sides, and Rodulph's hand was stricken off, and he being deadly wounded was carried unto Mersburg, Crantz. lib. 5. cap. 7. there he called before him the Bishops and other friends, and holding up his right hand with groans said, There is the hand by which I did swear fealty unto my Lord Henry, and by your perswasion I have fought so oft against him unfortunately; go ye now and perform your first Oath unto your King, for I go the way of my fathers. So he died An. 1080. Crantz. loc. cit. Naucler. hath more lamentable words. The Saxons stand up for another Emperour, and again for another. Henry was victorious against them both. Then the Saxons make recourse unto Hildebrand, and accuse the Emperour of the most hainous crimes that malice could devise; for they trusted in a well-affected Judge. The Emperour hearing of the calumnies, seeks peace of the Pope, but had no audience. Wherefore, in the same year, he assembleth a Council at Brixia, of many Bishops (saith Platin. and Crantz.) from Lombardy, Italy and Germany, and accuseth the Pope of Necromancy, Perjury and Usurpation; and complained of the Church of Rome, that the Clergy had preferred their Bishop before him; whereas his father had, without their election, advanced several Popes; but now this Pope, contrary unto his Oath and promise, had thrust-in himself, without the knowledge of him who was their Magistrate and King. These objections were heard again, and with one voice they condemned Hildebrand, as one not elected of God, but one who had intruded himself by fraud and money, a subverter of all order in the Church, a disturber of the Christian Empire, a sower of discord where peace was, a most wicked man, calling into question the Catholick faith, a Necromancer, infected with a Pythonical spirit, &c. For which crimes they declare him unworthy of the Roman See, and unless he willingly leave the place, they threaten him with an everlasting curse; and they chose Gerebert (or Wusbert) Bishop of Ravenna to govern the Church, him they call Clemens the III. Otho Frising. and Pet. Mexia. But think you that the Pope would obey? No way. Wherefore the Emperour made all speed with an Army towards Rome. Mathildis hearing of his marching, and fearing his power, gave the Provinces of Liguria and Tuscya unto the Church of Rome. Bellarmin. de Rom. Pont. lib. 5. cap. 9. In the way the Emperour subdued her Lands, and the Lands of the Marquess Esten, and thereafter he came to Rome; where An. 1083. thirty Bishops assembled in Council, and conclude against Gregory, as they had done at Brixia, and did subscribe the Decree. The Romans stood up so long as the Pope abode with them; but when he had brought them into the extreamest jeopardy, he fled into Adrian's Tower; and then the Gates of the City were set open, but the Emperour would not enter, untill a way was made for his Army thorow the Walls, and Pope Clement was received into Saint Peters. Gregory sent for Robert Guiscard the Norman, Duke of Naples for aid, and unto Mathildis, but all in vain. So he was glad to escape into Salerno, where he died in exile; and (as may be read in Fascic. rer. expetend. and in Matth. Paris. and sundry others) when he was sick, before his Cardinals, he bewailed his fault in his Pastoral charge; and that by instinct of the Diuel he had stirred up sedition and wars among men. Benno testifieth, that he sent this his Confession unto the Emperour, and unto all the Church, intreating that they would pray for pardon of his sins. After his death, and the death of them whom the Emperour had left Governours of the City, the Romans set up Pope Urban the II. who insisting in the trace of his Predecessour, did perswade the Emperour's eldest son Conrade (the Father had left him Governour of Italy) to take up Arms against his father; and gave him in marriage Mathildis, then the relict of the Duke of Naples. He put Clemens from his Seat; but when his father came against him, Conrade was out-lawed with consent of all the Princes, and the younger brother was declared heir of the Empire; but first with an Oath given, that during his fathers life, he should not meddle with the Kingly power, without his fathers consent. Fascic. rer. Now many feared intestine Wars between the two brothers; but Conrade died soon thereafter, and Urban was made out of the way, and the fore-named faction set up Paschalis the II. He would be inferiour unto the others in nothing, and excommunicated the Emperour, and dealt with his son (though by nature and solemn Oath bound to the contrary) to take the Scepter in his hand, and bear himself as King, rather then both his father and himself be dispossessed, and suffer hazard by another. The young man was inticed, and the Pope caused the Princes to elect Henry the V. Armies were levied by both parties, and some skirmishes follow, but the Father had the better; yet seeing there could be no end of the Wars without ruining the Empire, he consented unto a parley with his son, who was advised to deceive his father by this means; he came to him with feigned repentance, the Father welcomed him as the Prodigal in the Gospel, and dismissed the greatest part of his Army; whereas his enemies gather at Mentz, and appoint Binga for him to keep Christmas. So soon as he was entred the City, himself being the fourth person, the gates were shut, and all others were held out. Then the son spoke fairly unto his father, and promised all duty if the father would reconcile himself unto the Church. The Father referred the whole matter unto the Diet of the Princes, and they went together unto Mentz. There at first the son said unto his Father, Seeing the Bishops would admit no communion with him.

he would do well, for peace sake, to retire unto such a house near unto the place of the Diet; and if he had refused, he was able to force him. But the Father doth it willingly, and then the son kept him as in close prison, permitting none to speak with him, but his accustomed servants; and he freely exercised the Imperial power untill the year 1106. In that Diet the Bishops of Alba and Constance, the Pope's Legates, spoke much against Henry the IV. for his simony, and contumacy against the sentences of so many Popes; and exhorted them all, as obedient children, to provide for the safety of their mother the Church, by breaking the pride of one, a contumacious person. They all do consent to the deposition of the Emperour, and they sent the Bishops of Mentz, Colein and Worms, to take the Imperial Ornaments from him against his will. They declared unto him the sentence of the Diet. Henry asked, For what cause had the Princes pronounced so severe Sentence against him, before he was heard? They answer, For simony, in bestowing Bishopricks and Abbocies. He saith unto them one by one, you Bishop of Mentz, and you Bishop of Colein, What have I got from you? They answer, Nothing. Then, saith the Emperour, I thank God, that in so far ye are honest men; truly your Bishopricks might have brought much treasure into my Exchequer, if I had sought it; and my Lord of Worms knows, neither is any of you ignorant, whether I did advance you for gain, or of meer favour; wherefore I say unto you, Fathers, continue in loyalty, I am now an old man, and turn not Our glory into shame: I appeal unto the general Court, and if I must yeeld, I will give the Crown unto my son with my own hands. They refuse, and speak menacingly. Then he went aside, and arrayed himself with the Imperial Robes; and returning saith, These are the badges of my honour; these hath the goodness of the eternal King, and the election of the Princes bestowed on me; and God is able to continue me in them, and to restrain your hands from what you intend; and We did not fear such violence, nor have provided against it; but if duty move you not, stand in awe of God; and if ye do not regard duty, nor fear of God, here We are and unable to resist violence. The Bishops were astonished, yet after a little pause they exhort one another; they take the Crown off his head, then draw him from his seat, and pull off all his Royal Robes. This was a Pastoral work. The Emperour with deep groans saith, The God of revenge look to it, and avenge this iniquity of yours; the like ignominy was never heard before: I confess God is just, and I suffer for the sins of my youth, but ye are not guiltless; and because ye do contrary unto your Oath, ye shall not escape the hand of the just avenger, and your portion shall be with him who betrayed his Master. They stopped their ears, and departed with the Royal Ornaments. Alb. Crantz. in Saxonia lib. 5. cap. 20. saith, Some report these circumstances another way. Thereafter they sent him as Prisoner to Ingelheim, where he was advertised that they were talking of cutting off his head; wherefore he made an escape, and went to Leodium, (as appears in Epist. Henrici Regi Celtar. in Fascic. rer. exper. There he was entertained honourably by the Bishop; and therefore the Bishop Otbert, with all his Church, was excommunicated by Pope Paschalis; who writ also unto Robert Earl of Flanders, to pursue Henry with all his followers; assuring him, that he could not offer better sacrifice unto God. Epist. Paschalis tom. 2. Concil. Edit. Colon. An. 1551. Otbert was not silent, and in the name of the Church of Leodium published an Apology; wherein he saith, It were Apostolical to follow the Apostle, as it were Prophetical to follow a Prophet; but as our sins deserve, the Apostolical (who should pray for the King, howbeit a sinner, that we may live a quiet and Apostolical life under him) is so contentious, that he will not suffer us to live in peace: Seeing the words both of the Apostle and Prophet do so sound, I the daughter, do humbly ask my mother, the holy Church of Rome, Whence comes this authority unto him who is called Apostolical, that besides the sword of the spirit, he useth another sword of blood against her Subjects? Then he shews how far this Pope hath departed from the steps of Gregory the I. both in life and doctrine. This Apology is loc. cit. Also the Emperour writ unto his son, unto the Bishops, Dukes, and other Potentates of the Empire, that they would cease from pursuing him and his friends against all equity and piety; and at several times he appealed unto the Pope, as is evident by his Letters in Fascic. rer. expetend. But Apologies, Supplications, and Appeals had no place; so that in the end the old Emperour was brought to the necessity of begging a prebendary, from the Bishop of Spira; although he had preferred the Bishop unto that See, and had erected a glorious Monastery of the blessed Virgin there, he could not obtain so much. So he returned privately unto Leodium and died; his body lay unburied in an old deserted Chappel five years, and then was buried at Spira. He had fought 62 battels, and was never toiled; he died An. 1107. Alb. Crantz. writes much to excuse the Son and the Popes, and bitterly against the Father; yet he hath no particular fault against him, but (as he speaks) simony and contumacy. Of the Eastern Emperours it follows in Henry the V.

C H A P. II.

OF P O P E S.

1. SYLVESTER the II. (before called Gerebert) had been a Monk in Orleance, and made a contract with the Divil to advance him unto the Papacy. Thence he went to Hispala in Spain, where becoming a Doctor, he had amongst his hearers Otho the III. Robert King of France, Lotharius a man of noble birth, afterwards Bishop of Senon, and others. Robert gave him the Bishoprick of Rhemes; the Emperour advanced him to Ravenna; lastly, by great ambition, and aid of the Divil, he attained the Papacy, saith Platina and others. The Emperour, for favour of his Master, gave unto Saint Peter eight Counties; Pisa, Senogallia, Favum, Aucona, Fossabrum, &c. Vsser. de stat. Eccles. cap. 3. ex Gerber. Epi. 158. Benno Cardinal of Ostia saith, When the 1000. years were expired, Gerebert coming out of the bottomless pit of God's perdition sate 4. years; and as by the responses of Satan he had deceived many, so by the same responses he was deceived, and in the just judgment of God he was taken away by suddain death. What he saith briefly, Platina declares more fully, thus; Once Sylvester asked the Divil, how long time he might enjoy the Papacy? The answer was ambiguous, If thou go not to Jerusalem, thou shalt never die. After four years and one month, he was saying Mass in Lent, in a corner of the Rood-Church that was called Ierusalem, within Rome; and he asked how that Chappel was called? They said, Ierusalem. Then he knew the time was come when he must die; wherefore he became sad, and confessed his sin before the people, and exhorted them to beware of ambition and craft of the Divil, and to live holily. Then he commanded them to cut his body into pieces, and lay it on a cart, and to bury it wheresoever the horses of their own accord would draw it. The report is (saith Platin.) that by the Providence of God (wher. by sinners may learn the hope of forgiveness, if they repent in their life) the horse stood at Lateran, and there he was buried; whereas yet (saith he) by the ratling of

his bones, and moistness of his tomb, is portended the death of the Pope. It were a shame to relate these things, if they were not the words of their own Writers. Platina saith he had it from Mar. Polon. Vincentius Belluacensis, Laurent. Schrader. in Monimen. Italia lib. 2. and Galfrid. And the same is written by Pol. Vergil. de invent. rer. lib. 5. cap. 8. but he speaks not of the Presage. Naucler. had all in generat. 34. Onuphrius would purge him of this blot; and alledgeth that the knowledge of the Mathematicks, in these rude daies, was taken for Magick. But the words of the now-named Authours are more clear; it is certain (say they) that he attained to the most secret things of all Sciences, and especially of the Mathematicks; but as quick wits can scarcely hold themselves within bounds, he entred into Necromancy; and it is so thought by many Authours, not without great infamy; by which Necromancy he made way unto the Papacy. He was the first Pope who caused to beat the drum unto the Wars in the holy land, (as they spoke) and published an Epistle with this inscription, Wasted Jerusalem unto the Universal Church commanding the Scepters of Kings; Gerebert Epist. 18. but the expedition was not so soon begun. Of all the Popes from Sylvester the II. unto Gregory the VII. inclusive, Bennotestifieth that they did exceed Jannes and Jambres in jugleries; although the height of Antichristian pride be referred unto Gregory the VII. and others after him. To, Naucler. in volum. 2. generat. 31. saith, The Popes of that time had departed from the foot-steps of Peter and it is horreur to hear what vile things were done by almost 28. Popes immediately succeeding. After the death of Sylvester (saith Benno) was strife among his Necromancing Disciples, each contending to usurp the Papacy.

of the Pope is changed.

The Feast of all Souls.

2. JOHN the XIX. (alias XVII.) by the help of the Diuel (who then gave the Papal Chair) followed the Sorcerer Sylvester, saith Bale & Blond. He first did exclude the people of Rome from the election of the Pope, and so did restrain it unto the Clergy only: He was wont to say, The people must follow, and not precede. By him (as saith Fascic. tempor.) the Feast of all Souls, next after the Feast of all Saints, was brought into the Church, An. 1004. by the advice of Odilo Abbot of Cluniak, who thought that Purgatory was under the Mount Ætna; and being in Sicily, dreamed that by his Masses he had delivered many souls from thence; and said also, that he heard the voices of Devils lamenting for the loss of the souls, which were taken from them by Masses and Dirges. M. Fox in Acts & mon. citeth Bakenhorp in Prolog. 4. li. senten. qu. 10. John fate 5. months, and was poisoned by his Clergy.

3. JOHN the XX. (alias XVIII.) by prodigious Arts attained the See of the Satanical Papacy. Benno. He considered into what difficulties his predecessors had intangled themselves, and willingly took ease to himself; he died, not without suspicion of poison, in the 4. year; Benno saith, within one year. The years of many of them are reckoned variously.

4. SERGIUS the IV. was a man of most holy life, before he was Pope, saith Naucler. and fate 2. years: But Benno reckoneth him in the same category with the others, and saith he fate 3. years; he died An. 1012. when Italy was wasted with famine and pestilence.

5. BENEDICT the VIII. was a Hawk of the same nest; the Cardinals conspired against him, and set up another; he prevailed by the weight of his purse, and had a good friend of the Emperour Henry the II. he fate 11. years. After his death, he appeared unto Odilo riding on a black horse. Odilo had been familiar with him, but then he was afraid; and asked, Art thou Pope Benedict which is dead? He answered, I am that unhappy Benedict. O Father (saith the Abbot) how go all things with thee? He said, I am tormented, but I may be helped; go therefore to my brother John, who now is in my place, and and bid him give unto the poor the Treasure which lieth hid in such a place, and he named it. Then he appeared unto Pope John, saying; I have hope to be delivered; but oh! that Odilo of Cluniak would intercede for me! Platin. But Fascic. temp. hath more of their discourses. Behold with what delusions Satan did then deceive the World, that he might establish his Kingdom; and this is a sure ground (forsooth) for the doctrine of Purgatory, and praier for the dead.

6. J O H N XXI. (aliàs XIX.) was the son of Gregory Bishop of Portuen. and succeeded (as it were) heritably unto his brother; for he was not entred into Church Orders, saith Platin. Baronius saith, That unworthy man entred unworthily, and came into that Seat tyrannically and by evil means; for all things were then done at Rome by Enchanters and Necromancers, Theophylact, Io. Gratian, Laurence, Brazut, &c. Nevertheless (saith he) his life was wondrously approved by the Romans, but he shewed not his virtues; possibly he understands the yearly alms, which he enjoined to Princes, and some Masses unto Priests, and fasting on Saturday unto people; and the Canonizing of Saint Romwald, and Saint Martial; and the Feasts of John Baptist, and Saint Laurence, all these had their beginning from him. Nevertheless Baronius saith, That unworthy man is in the lowest Purgatory; he sate 8. years, and died in the 25. year after his Master Gerbert, saith Benno.

7. B E N E D I C T the IX. was made Pope, An. 1033. although he was not above 12. years of age; for Albericus Marquess of Tuscias, would not suffer that Chair to be taken from his house; therefore by bribery he thrust in his son, a Tyrant, a Monster and Opprobry of the Church. Baron. ad An. 1033. §. 6. Car. Benno saith, He was given to Necromancy and doctrine of Divels; and he named his Masters. In the woods and mountains he caused women to run after him, whom by Magical Arts he forced unto his wicked lusts. His own books (saith the Cardinal) that were found in his house, after his death, bear witness of his Arts, and it is notoriously known by every boy. Platina saith, He was thought unworthy of his place, and therefore he was deposed. But Benno and others say, that he with Laurence and other his companions, had plotted to deprive Henry the III. and gave unto Peter King of Hungary the Title, as he sent unto him a Crown with this verse, Petra dedit Romani Petro, tibi Papa Coronam. Whereupon followed an open battel between Godefrid Duke of Lorain, General unto Henry the III. and the same Peter. In the first fight Peter was taken, and Henry made hast towards Rome. The Pope was afraid, and sold his Chair unto the above-named Io. Gratian (afterwards Gregory the VI.) for 1500. pounds of gold. As for his death, Platina saith, he was condemned by the judgment of God: Benno saith, he was strangled by the Divels in the woods. Platina addeth, It is certain his Image appeared very monstrously, he was like to a Boar in body, to an As in head and tail; and the man who did see him was an Eremite, and did ask, how he had been so metamorphosed? He answered, Because in my life I lived like a Beast without law and reason, and without God, and now I must wander in this shape, at the will of God and of Saint Peter, whose See I have defiled. Fascic. temp. This is a sure proof to reverence Saint Peter's Chair. This Pope sate 10. years; or 12. years, as Onuphrius; or 13. years, as Fascic. temp.

8. G R E G O R Y the VI. attained the See by money, (as it is said) and not by election; nevertheless Gregory the VII. acknowledged him for Pope, because he did confirm his Acts, and called himself the seventh of that name, and his successors to the number now of fifteen. In his time were three Popes together, for Benedict seeing that the Clergy would not consent unto his bargain, and so it was not like to take effect, did claim his former right; Gregory would not renounce his possession. The Authour of Fascic. tempor. saith, Because Benedict was ignorant, he caused the consecration of another Pope to say Mass for him, which did not please many; therefore a third was chosen, who alone might discharge the duties of the two. This was Sylvester the III. who had his Manour at Saint Maria Major, Benedict in the Lateran Palace, and Gregory at Saint Peters. Baronius saith plainly, Rome was at that time a beast with three heads, which came out of Hell. And therefore (saith Platin.) by the prayers of the best sort, the Romans sent for Henry the III. An. 1047. and an Eremite writ these lines,

*Imperator Henrice, Omnipotentis vice,
Unica Sunamitis*

Nupsit tribus maritis: Dissolve connubium

Et triforme dubium. Vsser. de success.

Eccles. cap. 4. ex Gregor. Heimburg. in Consulat. Primatus Papa, par. 3. The Emperour came into Italy, and (as Platin. saith) compelled these three most ugly Monsters to renounce their Papacies; and then was chosen Swidiger Bishop of Bamberg, or Clemens the II. Benedict escaped by flight; Gregory and Hildebrand were sent Prisoners into Germany (where the Pope died, and Hildebrand obtained liberty to return) and because Sylvester was made Pope without ambition, he was permitted to return into his Bishoprick. Ph. Morn. in Myster. iniqu. ex Leo Ostien. c. writeth so, that for these things done so happily and so Canonically, the Romans gave unto this Henry the honour of *Patriciatu*s, as of old unto Charls the Great, and with the Diadem of the Empire they ordained such a Chain of Gold. Platina saith, this Gregory was killed in the Church of Saint Peter by the fall of a stone, and was buried there not without opinion of holiness. But how doth this agree with what he and others have said before. Onuphrius in Annotat. in Platin. expressly contradicts him, and saith, he died at Cluniak, whither he was sent by the Emperour. Neither do they agree in the space of his sitting.

9. CLEMENS the II. being confirmed, a Synod was held; and an Act was made, that the Bishop of Rome should not be chosen without the knowledge and confirmation of the Emperour. This constitution was conform to ancient practice, and it was then judged necessary for tranquility in time coming; seeing (as Platina saith) every factious or potent man, yea even some of base degree, by corrupt suffrages attained to so high dignity. Nevertheless the Cardinals would not suffer it to stand, but presently did despise it by subtle and open practice. Likewise the Romans did swear, in the same Synod, that they should not intermeddle with the election of the Bishop, but as the assent of the Emperour should concur. Nevertheless the Emperour was no sooner gone, but contrary to their Oath and Act made thereupon, even within nine months, they poisoned the Pope, which some impute unto his next successor, Platin; and some unto Bruzate, who is said to have poisoned six Popes within 31. years. Car. Benno.

10. DAMASUS the II. starteth up neither by consent of the people nor Clergy; for every ambitious man then could climb into Saint Peter's Chair, saith Platin. But others say, when Clemens was poisoned, they did set up Benedict again; and the Emperour caused this Damasus to be set up, who was Bishop of Brixia; hereunto Onuphrius seemed to agree, for in Annotat. in Platin. at Clemens II. he saith expressly, that the four next Popes were chosen by the authority of the Emperour, and proved it by instances. So Fascic. tempor. saith, Henry the III. deposed five Popes, and set up the sixth. Damasus escaped not Brazutus cup 35. daies. Now we come (saith Onuphr. loc. cit.) out of most obscure darkness, and all things shall be more clear. Then was great con-contention at Rome for the Papal Seat; wherefore the Romans, by advice of the Cardinals, sent unto the Emperour, desiring to give them a Bishop, who was Benno Count of Etisheim, and Bishop of Tullenis, or Leo the IX. being verily an Ass, since among the Bishops of Germany none other would come amongst the enchanters of Rome. Crantz. in Saxon. When he was coming in his Pontificals toward Rome, the Abbot of Cluniak met him; and he, with Hildebrand (which then had leave to return with the Pope) began to chide him for taking his authority from the Emperour, and not from the Clergy, as others had done before. The simple man was perswaded to change his habit, whereby he conquered the consent of others, and was elected.

11. LEO the IX. by perswasion of Hildebrand and Theophylact took up Arms, and went in person against the Normans prevailing in Sicily; and by these two, remaining alwaies with him, was betrayed and delivered into the hands of Duke Gisulph, who said unto him, Peter put up thy sword; and so sent him away well accompanied unto Rome. There he could not live peaceably, and so he went into Germany. Whilest he was with the Emperour in Worms on Christmas day, Lambert the sub-Deacon read the Epistle, after their own manner; the Pope sent unto him, and commanded him to read in the Roman manner; Lambert would not change. Wherefore the Pope, with a loud voice, deposed him from his Office, and commanded him to depart. Luithpold Arch-Bishop of Mentz, went from the Altar, and would not proceed untill the sub-Deacon were restored; because Worms was within his jurisdiction, and the man should not be deposed in his presence without his consent. The Pope restored him again, and so they went on. Crantz. in Saxon. lib. 4. cap. 45. commendeth the Pope for equanimity; and the Bishop for maintaining his own jurisdiction. In a Synod at Mentz, was the Pope, the Emperour, and 130. Bishops: It was ordained there, That no Clark should follow Dogs or Hawks in hunting, nor deal in civil business: None should be admitted a Monk till he came to perfect age, and by his free-will. Nauceler. generat. 36. And Crantz. li cit. cap. 43. saith more, The Pope was President; Sibico Bishop of Spira was accused of adultery, and was purged by examination of the Sacrifice: And there also the heresie of simony, and of Priests marriage was condemned. He returned unto Rome, and on a day (as Nauceler. writes) he saw a Leper at his gate, he commanded to take him in, and to lay him in his own bed; the next day when he sent to visit him, no man was there. Whereby they understood, that Christ was come to visit the Holy Father. With such lying miracles were they wont to deceive the World often; but for the most part I omit such. When he had sate 5. years, he was poisoned by Brazut. An. 1054. Then the Romans, partly reverencing the authority of the Emperour, and partly judging none at Rome worthy of that honour, sent Hildebrand in the name of the Clergy and People unto the Emperour, to give them a Bishop. Ph. Mornay in Myster. ex Sigon. de regn. Ital. lib. 8. but Platina saith only, They did so, lest they might seem to attempt against their Oath. Car. Benno saith, Hildebrand did oft run from Rome unto the Emperour, and back again, without the advice of the Church; and if any other was named Pope with speed, Brazut gave him a cup of poison.

A lying miracle.

12. VICTOR the II. was sent. In a Synod at Florence he deprived many Priests, for that which they called simony and Nicolaitanism. He sate 2. years, and was poisoned.

13. STEPHEN the IX. was elected by the Clergy and People, not awaiting the Emperour's nomination, for he was young. Now this Pope accused the defunct Emperour Henry the III. of Heresie, that he had diminished the authority of the Church, or (if ye will have it more plainly) had restrained the pride of the Popes. But when he begun to speak of seeking confirmation from the Emperour, the cup of Brazut was prepared for him. Then Hildebrand assembled the Cardinals, and caused them to swear, that they would chuse no Pope without common consent. So he took journey to the Bishops of Florence to bring and install him; and the Clergy swore, that they would not proceed in election before his returning. Nevertheless the Count of Tuscany, by gifts and threatnings, did cause the people to chuse his brother.

14. BENEDICT the X. a man altogether ignorant of Letters. Peter Damian Bishop of Ostia protested against the election, but they made no account of that. When Hildebrand returned with Gerard Bishop of Florence, he caused the Clergy, according to their Oath, to proceed in a new election, seeing that Benedict was not Canonically called. The Clergy saw the friends of Benedict to have power at Rome, went to Sena, and there do chuse Gerard or Nicolaus the II. Benedict considering that the most part of the Clergy were his adversaries, retired to Velitra, and lived privately.

15. NICOLAUS the II. held a Synod at Sutrio, by the aid of Duke Godefrid and Italium Bishops, and annulled the election of Pope Benedict. Then he went to Rome and held another Synod at Lateran, where a Decree was made; That if any by money or favour of men, whether of people or souldiers, without Canonical election of Cardinals, shall enter into the Throne of Saint Peter, he shall not be called Apostolical, but Apostatical; and it shall be lawfull for the Cardinals, Clergy and People, calling upon God, to accurse him as a robber, and to thrust him from his seat by any help of man. Gratian. dist. 32. cap. Vnde Nicolaus. Here the election of the Pope is limited, and ascribed unto the Cardinals; but (as Pol. Vergil. de invent. rer. lib. 4. cap. 10. hath observed) it was to be approved by other Priests, and by the people of Rome; and another might have been chosen who was not of that Colledge. But within a short time both these were abolished; for now (saith he) the Cardinals, without consent of People or Priests, do chuse only a Cardinal to be Pope, although there be no law for that. Some write, that Nicolaus gave the Dukedom of Pulia and Calabria unto Robert Guiscard: But Platina saith, Robert defrauded his brothers son, and the Pope was offended for Godefrid's sake; yet suffered him to enjoy it, because he gave a part of the Dukedom unto the Pope, and himself became Tributary unto the Church of Rome. After three years Nicolaus was poisoned. The Lombards had been oppressed by him, and now were desirous to have a Bishop of their Country; therefore they sent unto the Imperial Court for favour in the election; for the nomination of the Pope (saith they) appertained unto the Emperour. Then Agnes did send one, who was thought most fit: And so in a Synod at Basil

16. HONORIUS the II. was elected. Hildebrand and the Cardinals at Rome, set up ALEXANDER the II. They gathered Armies, and fought a bloody battel near Rome. Honorius was said to have the worle, and recruits his forces. The Emperour sent an Embassadour Otho, or (as Platina calls him) Anno Bishop of Colein, who sharply expostulated with Alexander in a Synod at Rome, for taking so much upon him without the knowledge of the Emperour; and contrary to his Royal privilege, as it had been acknowledged, for the most part, by his Predecessours. Hildebrand made the Apology for Alexander briefly. Otho taking more part with the Roman Clergy, did procure the cause to be referred to another Synod, to be held at Mantua, where Alexander had friends. He appeared; but Honorius sent word, that the Master should not be judged by his Disciples; and would not come, unless less he might be Moderator of the Council. By the way observe this contest, Who should be Moderatour in a Synod? Before this, if the Emperour had named a President, there was no opposition; or when the Emperour winked, or was contemned, any Patriarch might moderate within his own Diocly. Otho answered in the name of the Synod, He being but one, should submit himself unto the Holy Oracle and Sentence of so many Fathers. Then Alexander, having no present competitour, was heard; and when he had sworn that he had used no unlawfull means for obtaining the Papacy, he was confirmed. Car. Benno writes of him thus, When he understood the intention of Hildebrand, and others the Emperour's enemies, that they had set him up for a private respect of their own, he told them publickly he would sit no longer in that place, (he was at Mafs) unless he had consent from the Emperour. Wherefore Hildebrand was in such rage, that he could scarcely hold his hands off him, till the Mafs was ended. Then, by force of Souldiers, he threw the Pope into a chamber, knocked him with his fists, and railteth at him that he would seek favour of the Emperour. Then was he thrust into Prison, and stinted to five shillings a day of the money of Luca, where he had been Bishop; and Hildebrand turned all the rest of Saint Peter's revenues to his own use. At this time Sueno, King of Denmark, made his Land Tributary unto the See of Rome; following the example of Casimire, King of Pole, in the daies of Benedict the IX. and paid yearly Peter-pence. Alexander died in prison after 12. years.

Denmark and Poland Tributary to Rome.

17. GREGORY the VII. (alias Hildebrand) caused himself to be elected, the same day that the other died; contrary to a Decree, which ordained that the election should not be before the third day; to the end, that the Clergy and Cardinals may be the more frequently assembled. After ten weeks he was confirmed by the Emperour, saith Platina; but not till the Emperour sent a Count to challenge the Romans: And then Gregory said, He was chosen indeed, but he had delayed his consecration, untill he knew the King's pleasure. And Car. Benno testifieth, that many of the Cardinals would not subscribe unto his election. Because he had been a Disciple of Gregory the VI. in honour of his Master, he took his name, peſſimo Magistro pejor Discipulus, saith Benno. Aventin. Annal. lib. 5. reports, that an ancient and famous Writer, living at that time, when he comes to speak of Hildebrand saith, We are come to factions, fraud and wickedness; it is dangerous to write truly, and it is a sin to write falsely. Car. Benno relateth his enchantments and juggleries at large; and saith generally, When Satan could not persecute Christ openly by Pagans, he plotted to turn religion topsie-torvy, by a false Monk, under shew of religion; but although Divine Providence suffereth such things, yet the time of retribution is at hand. Bellarmin. de Pontif. Rom. lib. 4. cap. 13. would purge him of these blots, saying; We have no Authour of that time, who accuseth Gregory the VII. but one Benno; and he did not write so bitterly against him in truth, but only under the name of Pope Gregory, he would describe a wicked Pope; or Benno is not the Authour of that book, but some Lutheran; and he alledgeth ten Authours of that time commending Hildebrand. The whole History confuteth the first excuse, and the other is convinced by the copies of Benno, more ancient then Luther; and by many Authours before Luther, who do cite Benno. Namely, Orthwin Gratius (who was not a Lutheran) in Epist. ad Lector. prefixed to the same book, saith; More credit is to be given unto Benno, then unto Platina or others who favour the Popes too much. And though his own faction commend him, it is no wonder; and they testifie of more then ten times ten others, writing against his impieties. It is enough for the Truth, that she wanted not witnesses, and Tyranny had con-

tradition at the rising; yea and of the same ten, although one excuse of one crime, yet he accuseth him of another. Were they all Lutherans, whom Onuphrius in Annotat. in Platin. ad Grego. VII. reports to have called this Gregory a Necromancer, a simoniack, blood-thirsty, &c.? He was the first kinder of those toilsom wars, Bellum Pontificium, between the Emperours and Popes, as followeth. Before that time there was some order in the Church, and Bishops were subject unto Emperours, as Miltiades and Sylvester unto Constantine; Gregory unto Maurice; Leo unto Charls the Great. Chrysostom on Rom. 13. saith, The Apostle shewing that these things [subjection, &c.] are commanded unto all, both Priests and Monks, and not to Seculars only, saith in the beginning, Let every soul be subject unto superiour powers, although he be an Apostle or Evangelist or Prophet, or whoever he be; for this subjection overthrows not piety; and he saith not simply, be obedient, but be subject. Cumin Ventura, a late Popish Writer, in Theſaur. Politic. printed at Frankford, An. 1610. pag. 386. saith, The ancient Emperours received not their beginnings from the Popes: And in the next page, The Popes in time of the old Empire, were subject unto the Emperours, untill Lewis the Godly renounced his right, which renunciation was revoked by the Emperour, and renounced by a Synod in the daies of Pope Leo the VIII. And Onuphrius in vita Gregor. VII. saith, Although the Bishops of old Rome were revered as the Vicars of Christ and Successours of Peter, yet their authority reached not further then the teaching and maintaining of the faith; they were subject unto the Emperours, and were created by them, and in all things were at the beck of the Emperours, and a Pope durst not judge nor discern any thing belonging unto them. Bellarmin. de Lascis lib. 3. cap. 8. propounds and proves, that Kingdoms are given immediately by God unto wicked men, as Dan. 2. and that these Infidel Kings should be obeyed, unless one will set himself against the Ordinance of God, in 1 Pet. 2. To this purpose he cites the testimony of Augustin. de Civ. Dei lib. 5. cap. 21. & 15. he saith expressly, All Kings and the State of Venice, and such others, have none above them in temporalibus; otherwise they could not be called Heads of their Commonwealths, but members only. But then Gregory the VII. the first of all Romish Bishops, swelling with pride, and trusting in the strength of the Normans, and to the riches of Mathildis; and seeing dissension amongst the Germans, durst not only excommunicate Caesar, but deprived him of his Kingdom also. A thing not heard in former ages, saith Otho Frising. de gest. Frideri. lib. 1. cap. 1. So speaks Onuphrius loc. cit. and addeth, For I account not the fables concerning Arcadius, Anastasius and Leo Iconomachus. And Gosfrid. Viterb. in Chron. par. 17. saith, We read not that any Emperour, before this, was excommunicated by a Pope of Rome, or deprived of his Empire; unless that be called excommunication, when Philip the first Christian Emperour, was for a short space set amongst the Penitents; or that Theodosius, &c. Aventin. in Annal. lib. 7. writeth, that Everhard Bishop of Salsburg said, Hildebrand under pretext of religion (170. years since) had laied the first foundation of Antichrist; and he first began those wicked wars, which untill this time have been continued by his Successours. So Gregory the VII. did glory of himself, that he could bind and loose in Heaven; and he could give and take away Kingdoms, Empires, and whatsoever men possess on earth. He could abide no equal, far less any Superiour, derogating from others their due right and honour, and arrogating all unto himself. After him the Emperours could have no interest in the election of the Pope, saith Ventura loc. cit. Likewise he kept Bishops and all Prelates in aw, suspending some, and chopping off the hands of others at his pleasure; he released Oaths of Allegiance; yea whatsoever ever he did, the Pope must be feared, as one who could do no wrong. In a Synod at Rome, he decreed it to be simony to accept any Bishoprick, Abbotcy, or Church-living from a Lay-man, were he King or Cæsar who gave it, and the receiver as well as the giver should be excommunicated, Platm. By this means he severed Church-men from Princes, and tied them unto the Popes for ever; and the former custom of the Church, in all ages, was then condemned; and the Decree of Pope Leo the VIII. was condemned; yea himself might by this Decree be deposed. Henceforth whatsoever ambition any Pope once practiseth, his Successour will make it a rule. But one thing is above all wonders (saith Corn. Agrippa de vanit. scient. cap. 56. They think that they may go up to Heaven by this means, for which Lucifer was cast down. He did forbid the Benedictine Monks to eat any flesh at all; and permitted unto others, as weaker or more imperfect, to eat flesh on some daies. In the year 1076. he published some Aphorisms, with the Title Dictatus Papæ; these are extracted by Spalaten. de Rep. Eccles. lib. 4. cap. 9. and are the Picture of his mind; The Roman Church was founded by the Lord alone; the Roman Bishop is the only Universal Bishop; [Gregory the I. behold thy Antichrist] he only can set up and depose other Bishops; he may depose and excommunicate absents. [This was a warrant for his practise against the Emperour.] If any be excommunicated by the Pope, none may abide in one house with that person: He alone can make new Laws, erect new Congregations, unite or divide Benefices: All the Princes of the earth ought to kiss his feet: His only name should be heard in Churches: No Synod should be without his commandment: No book is Canonical without his authority: All weighty causes, in whatsoever Church, should be brought unto him: He may absolve Subjects from their Allegiance: He may judge all men, but can be judged by no man: And all these, because the Roman Church cannot erre; and the Pope, being Canonically elected, is by the merits of Saint Peter undoubtedly sanctified; and there is but one name on earth, to wit, the Pope, &c. Mornay in Myster. hath more of this kind. What more could Hildebrand say, to prove really in his person the fulfilling of these words, 2 Theff. 2. 4.? Only he omits this conclusion, Therefore I Gregory the VII. am the Antichrist. But others did not fail; for many said then (as Aventin. lib. 5. testifieth) Hildebrand is the Antichrist; under the name of Christ, he doth the work of Antichrist; he sits in Babylon, in the Temple of God, and exalts himself as if he were a God; he vaunteth that he cannot erre; he destroyed both peace and godliness, &c. He commanded a Fast to be kept, with prayers that God would reveal whose opinion was truer, whether of the Church of Rome, or of Berengarius, in the controversie of the Sacrament; he sought a sign to establish his faith, but none was given. It is a wonder, that neither the Pope could with all his infallibility determine the doubt, nor in that lying age some cogging miracle not devised. Then he sent two Cardinals, Alto and Cuno, unto Suppo Abbot of Saint Anastasia, to keep a Fast of three daies with his Monks, and on every day they should sing the whole Psalter, and the Masses for the same end; but so neither could they find any sign. Gar. Benno. On the second holy day of Easter-week, he, in a Sermon, said, Never accept me for Pope, but pluck me from the Altar, if that false King [all understood that he spoke of the Emperour Henry] shall not die before the Feast of Saint Peter; or else shall be so dejected from his Kingdom, that he shall not be able to command six souldiers. This he spoke before the battel between Henry and Rodolph. But God preserved the Emperour, and the time being expired, (saith Benno) he feared to be contemned according to his own words; and said, that he meant not of his body, but of his soul. Some said, The Kings soul could not lose all his souldiers to fix. But Mattheus Parisie; and Onuphrius in vita Gregor. VII. say, He prophesied truly of the false King, but he failed in the application; it was to be understood of Rodolph. Paul Bernutenf. writ the life of this Pope in two books, and there saith of him thus: The Romans usurp Divine honour; they will not render account of their doings, neither can they willingly hear it said unto them, Why doest thou so? They hold that saying, Sic volo, sic jubeo, my will is sufficient reason, Io. Lampad. in Mellis. But his own words decipher him no worse, (as they are rehearsed by Platina.) In the first deposition of the Emperour he said, Peter chief of the Apostles, I pray incline thy ears, and hear me thy servant, whom thou hast brought up from my infancy, and untill this day thou hast delivered from the hands of the wicked, which hate me for my faith in thee, and they have persecuted me; thou art a sufficient witness unto me, and the godly mother of Jesus Christ, and thy pious brother Paul, who was pertaker of Martyrdom with thee, that I took not the Papacy of my own accord, but against my will; not that I thought it unlawfull or rapine to ascend lawfully into thy Chair; but I would rather have passed my life in Pilgrimage, then to have come into thy Throne, which is so high for fame and glory: I confess therefore, that by thy grace, and not by my merits, hath the charge of the people been committed unto me; as also the power of binding and loosing: And so I trusting in this assurance, for the dignity of thy holy Church, in the name of the Almighty God, Father, Son and Holy Ghost, I cast Henry, the son of the deceased Henry the Emperour, from all Imperial and Princely administration, because he hath too boldly and rashly laied hands on thy Church; and I absolve all Christians, subject unto the Empire, from their Oath, whereby they are wont to give their fidelity unto their true Sovereigns; for it is just that he should want all honour, who attempteth to diminish the Majesty of the Church; yea and he hath contemned all my or rather thy commandments belonging unto his salvation, and the salvation of the people; and he hath severed himself from the Church, which he indeavoureth to lay waist with seditions: Therefore I bind him with a curse, the chain of a curse; I, certainly knowing that thou art Peter; and on thy Rock, as a sure foundation, Christ our King hath built his Church. Here many particulars may be observed in these words; and they give just occasion to demand, Whose servant thought this Gregory himself to be? He saith to Peter, Me thy servant, thy seat, thy grace, thy commands? Why did he not derive his authority from Christ, if he was the Vicar of Christ? We read this Title in his words related by Platina; but he began not as yet to conciliate authority unto himself by this Title, neither did any Bishop of Rome use it before him. The Jesuit Azonius Instit. Moral. par. 2. lib. 5. cap. ult. writeth, that this Gregory in a Synod did ordain, that only the Bishops of Rome should be called Papa; although in former times it was common unto other Bishops, as is certain (saith he) out of Cyprian and Ruffin; and we may adjoin the Epistles of Augustine and others. But Bellarmin. de Rom. Pontif. lib. 4. cap. 3. saith, Christ praied in Luk. 22. for him, to whom he said, Confirm thy brethren; but the Church hath no brethren whom she may or should confirm: Who I pray (saith he) can be feigned to be the brethren of the Church Universal? Are not Beleevers the children of the Church? After the same manner may we argue: Since none can be called the Brother of the Church, far less can they be called the Father or Spouse of the Church. Gregory sate 12. years, and died in exile, as is above related.

18. VICTOR the III. came next, without consent of the Emperour, and shewed himself bold enough, untill he was poisoned with the wine of the Mass

Mas in the 16. month of his Papacy. Platin. Others say he died of a dissentery. Both may be true, the one being the cause of the other. His short life, and the miserable success of his Predecessour, did not teach his Successours wisdom; but as the Kings of Israel followed the steps of Jeroboam, rather than of David; so the most part of the Popes contemn the Imperial authority, and follow the pride of Hildebrand, rather than the good example of Christ or Peter.

19. URBAN the II. was set up by the same faction, Clemens the III. yet living, who was chosen with consent of the Emperour. They did excommunicate and accurse one another. Urban would release none whom Gregory had accursed; therefore fearing insurrection, or (as Platin. saith) fearing the inconstancy of the Romans, he crept out of the City, and dwelt at Amelphis; where he held a Synod, and another at Troy in Pulia, and the third in Placentia; in them all confirming the Decrees of his Master Gregory against the Emperour, and against married Priests, and strengthening the Laws for the Papal authority. At last he was constrained to fly unto Claremont, where he assembled a Council under pretence of consulting for recovery of the Holy Land from the Turks, An. 1094. of which it follows. There he made many constitutions; as, The Church is pure in faith, and free from all Secular power: No Bishop, Abbot or Clark shall accept any Ecclesiastical dignity from the hand of a Prince or any Laick: Whosoever shall lay hands violently on, or apprehend, men of holy Orders, or their servants, shall be accursed: Whosoever shall marry within the seventh degree of kindred, shall be accursed, &c. Matth. Paris. in Wilhel. 2. There also he renewed the excommunication against the Emperour, and against Pope Clement. So one Pope at Rome, and another Pope at Claremont had contrary Synods, cursing one another, burning one anothers Acts, and abjuring their Consecrations, Baptisms and Masses. Nations and Cities were divided, and some people, espying the pride and vices of both the Popes, did continue neutral; and learned, by lamentable experience, that a Church can be ruled without a Pope. When Popes and Bishops were taken up with bloody wars, and tyrannical usurpations of Secular power, what could the Sheep learn from such Pastours? Urban did ordain, that these words should be propounded unto all Intrants at their admission, Wittingly and willingly I shall not communicate with them who are excommunicated by the Church of Rome: likewise I shall not be present at the consecrations of them who accept Bishopricks or Abbeyes from Laicks; so may God help, and these holy Evangelists, as I shall never change from this sentence, Platin. He did confirm the hours and Matins of Saint Mary, saith Hec. Boet. lib. 12. cap. 12. And the Officium to be solemnly read on the Sabbath-day, saith Fascic. tempor. Pol. Vergil. de invent. rer. lib. 6. cap. 2. saith, As Pelagius the II. ordained the Priests to keep the seven Canonical hours, as a present remedy of mens weakness, who fall seven times a day; so Urban the II. ordained, that so many hours should be kept to the honour of the Virgin. The Arch-Bishop of Toledo covenanted with this Urban, that he should make him Primat of Spain; and therefore the other should endeavour to make all Spain Tributary unto Rome. Before that time the Church of Spain was not subject unto Rome, neither do we read of any Spanish Cardinals at Rome. The Order of Cistercian and Carthusian Monks were about that time devised in Burgundy, and confirmed by Urban. After the Council at Claremont he returned into Rome; but with such authority, that he was glad to lurk in the house of a Citizen Peter Leo, the space of 2. years, and died there in the 13. year of his Papacy, and the year of our Lord 1099. To move the more men unto the expedition against the Turks and Sarazens, he devised the first proclamation of indulgences, or the full remission of all sins, unto all that would go thither, to deliver that holy Land, (as he said) and the Sepulchre of Christ our Saviour, from the power of the Mahumetans. His Successours following this his example (as it is easie to add unto things that are once devised) did enlarge these indulgences; to the benefit not only of them who went thither, but unto every one, which though they went not, yet would contribute for the maintaining of Souldiers in that expedition. Upon this account great sums of money were brought unto the Pope. Thereafter these Indulgences were proclaimed unto all which would contribute unto the Wars, against those which were called enemies of the Roman Church, though they were Christians. Under these colours vast sums were gathered from time to time, although many times the money was imploied another way, as followeth; and God (who brings light out of darknes) made the same indulgences to be the occasion of Reformation.

C H A P. III.

Of Divers Countries.

1. IN the beginning of this Century were many prodigies, as tokens of evils following, (Platin.) signs in the Heavens above, Earth-quakes below, in the Sun darknes, on earth Snakes were seen fighting against other, Fountains were turned into blood, the air was corrupt. Ia. Vsser. hath them at great length, de success. Eccles. cap. 3. & 4. Whereby some were moved to say, Antichrist is come into the world. Tho. Cooper ad An. 1099. In an assembly at Aken, in the year 1016. were convened many both Princes and Bishops: The Emperour Henry spoke of God's wrath hanging over their heads, and advised them to think upon a way how these judgments might be turned off. A Decree was made, that all men should study to escape those judgments by fasting, actions of piety and alms; for (say they) the true doctrine of inward and saving repentance, or of turning unto God, as the consideration of sins that are committed against the ten commands, of faith in Christ, and the true and serious amendment of life, hath been altogether obscured, yea and buried by outward worship and human traditions; therefore, by publick authority of this Synod, it is compounded, that Priests attend more upon their Service, all people give themselves unto fasting, and Princes be more liberal in their Alms. Sigebert. & Crantz. in Saxon. lib. 4. cap. 4.

2. The Fathers of the Primitive Church, guessed that after a 1000. years from Christ's birth or passion, or from the destruction of Jerusalem, Antichrist should come; and shortly after his appearing, the world should have an end; as Germanus, Patriarch of Constantinople, sheweth in Rer. Ecclesiast. Theoria, out of Theophilus, Cyrl, Chrysostom, &c. And about the thousand years from Christ's nativity, many men looked that it should come so to pass. But when the thousand years were expired after the destruction of Jerusalem, and they saw no such Antichrist as they had imagined, neither did such things come to pass as they had conceived, concerning the end of the World; then, as if they had been delivered from the danger thereof (faith Baronius Annal. tom. 11.) they made fair buildings and Churches throughout the World, especially in Italy and France. Whereunto Ia. Vsser. doth apply that saying of Henry, Beware of Antichrist; it is evil, that the love of Churches hath overtaken you; it is not well, that ye reverence the buildings and walls of Churches; ye conceive amiss of these: is it any doubt that Antichrist shall sit in these?

The Mountains, and Lakes, and Woods, are more safe unto me. Likewise some made defection from the Faith, and returned to Paganism, as in the North parts, Luitici Obotriti, Vari, &c. So did Vilgard, a Gramarian, in Ravenna, trusting to the apparitions of soul spirits, in the likeness (as they professed) of Virgil, Horace, and Iuvenal; when he began to vaunt foolishly of his knowledge of humanities, they appeared unto him, and gave him thanks for his love to their Books, and promised to make him partner of their glory: Thereafter he began to profess, that the Divinity of the Poets was true; at last he was challenged, and condemned by the Patriarch Peter: But many in Italy, Sardinia, and in Spain, followed the same impiety, and were punished, some with the sword, and some with fire, Rodolp. Hysto. l. 2. c. 12.

3. Berno, excellent in all learning, was set over the Augianes, anno 1008. he wrote many Books; in Marc. Evang. sect. 3. he saith, In the holy Scriptures do hang the armor of our salvation, Serm. de concor. offic. c. 5. Our weakness can do nothing without God; as Lazarus could not rise by himself, Serm. de ascend. Dom. Christ is the head of the whole Church, and all the elect are his members; At that time lived Oecumenius, and Olympiodorus; two famous Greek writers. Guthet, Bishop of Prague, was famous for learning, and holiness, and was put to death by the enemies of the faith, Platm. in Benedict. 8. and in Benedict. 9. he saith, Gerard, a Venetian, and Bishop of Hungary, a good and learned man, suffered martyrdom; the Infidels tied him to the wheel of a Cart, and let it run from the top of an high mountain, so that he was all crushed; yet he suffered it with joy.

4. Fulbert, Bishop of Charties, or Carnatum, was a learned man; sundry Sermons, and Treatises, that are among the works of St. Augustine, are said to be his. He wrote an Epistle to Adeodatus, wherein he first reproveth a gross opinion of some men, who held, that Baptism, and the Eucharist, were naked signs; Then he proveth, that these should not be considered as mere and outward signs; but by faith, according to the invisible vertue of mysteries: The mystery of faith it is called, saith he, because it should be esteemed by faith, and not by sight; to be looked on as the spirit and minde, and not as sight of body; seeing onely by faith, beholdeth the secret of this powerful mystery; for what seemeth outwardly bread, and wine, now inwardly it is the body, and blood of Christ; we being encouraged by the authority of our true Master, when we communicate of his body, and blood, we confess boldly, that we are transfused into his body, and that he abideth in us. Taste and see how savoury that meat is; unless I be mistaken, it tasteth like Angels food; not that thou canst discern it with thy mouth, but mayst taste it with thy inward affection; open the mouth of faith, enlarge the hope, and the bowels of love, and receive the bread of life, even the food of the inward man: from faith of the inward man, proceedeth the tasting of the inward food, while certainly, by the infusion, or preception of the gracious Eucharist, Christ floweth into the bowels of the communicating soul; when a godly soul receiveth into her chaste corners, in that form wherewith she beholdeth him present with her, under remembrance of the mystery, and as the Spirit revealeth, to wit, as an infant lying in his mothers bosome, or offered upon the altar of the crosse, or lying in the grave, or verily having trampled death under foot, and rising again, or carried high in glory above the heavens; according to which forms Christ entreth into the acceptable habitation of the communicant; and refresheth his soul with so many (to speak so) several blisses, as are the ways that the eye of holy meditation can behold him: neither let it seem a vain thing unto thee, that we say, that according to the beholding of a desirous soul, Christ is found within the bowels of the communicant, seeing thou art not ignorant that our fathers sojourned through the wilderness, and were refreshed with Angels food, to whom a fertile rain brought meat of one colour, but of divers tastes; and according to the appetite of every one, it gave sundry delights of taste, that whatsoever their appetit did covet, the secret dispensation of the Giver did furnish the same; to whom their gust gave what their eye could not see, because it was one thing which was seen, and another which was taken; therefore wonder thou no more: What Manna under the law did signifie by shadow, the revealed verity of Christ's body layeth open, in which body the divine Majesty condescendeth mercifully unto our weakness, that with what sort of punishment mans body is punished, he should taste the same in his body sensibly; but God performeth this in the breast: as he saith himself, He who cometh of me, shall live by me: Now therefore the scruple, or doubt, is to be removed, seeing he who is the Giver, is a witness of the truth. Then he illustrateth the same, by comparison of a baptised man; who albeit outwardly he be the same he was before, yet inwardly he is another, being made greater then himself, by increase of invisible quantity, that is, of saving grace, &c. here is no word of substantial change of the elements; the bread is still bread: but we finde two other changes, to wit, the faithful are transfused into the body of Christ, and Christ is infused into the habitation of a faithful soul; yet so, that Christ's body remaineth in the heavens; and, by the revelation of the Spirit, faith beholdeth Christ present, or lying in his mothers bosome, and dying, and rising, and ascending, and he entreth into the gracious habitation of a faithful communicant, and refresheth him so many ways, as is said: Here also we see, that the substance of bread remaineth, as the substance of him who is baptised remaineth, albeit inwardly he be another, Biblioth. part. de le Bigne tom. 3.

5. Berengarius, Deacon of St. Maurice in Angiers, was his disciple, who hearing Math. Parisiensis calleth him Archiepisc. Turonen. a contrary error unto the former, was broached in his days; to wit, that the bread of the Eucharist, was the very body of Christ; and the wine his blood substantially, or properly: Berengarius, I say, hearing this, taught, that the body of Christ is onely in the heavens; and these elements, are the Sacraments of his body and blood, as followeth. The occasion of this controversie at that time, is written by Gustmund, in his second book against Berengarius, to wit, when Lanfrank, Abbot of Bec-heloin in Normandy, was a boy, in Italy, it hapned, that a priest, (as he saith) saying Mass, found very flesh upon the altar, and very blood upon the chalice, he burned to take them, and immediately declared the matter unto the Bishop, who, assembling with moe Bishops, ordained, that that flesh, and that chalice, with the blood, should be kept in that altar for ever, as a most worshipful Relique. From this deceiving Impostor many were moved to believe, that the body and blood of Christ was present in the elements, not onely sacramentally, as the Fathers spake, but substantially. Berengarius wrote and preached against this Capernaitis error; and therefore Adelman, Bishop of Brixia, wrote unto him; In the beginning he saluteth him, his holy and beloved Brother, and condisciple under Fulbert, Bishop of Carnatum: Then he sheweth, he heard it reported that Berengarius did teach, that the body and blood of Christ, which are offered upon the altar throughout the earth, are not the very body and blood of Christ, but onely a figure, or certain similitude; howbeit indeed Berengarius had said nothing so: To the intent Adelman may bring his Brother from this opinion, he intreateth him brotherly not to depart from the doctrine doctrine of their master Fulbert, and of the Catholike Church. Then he appealeth to the testimony of Augustin, Ambrose, and Jerome [who never taught any transubstantiation, or impanation] He writeth also, that the very flesh and blood of Christ, was given unto the Apostles at the first institution, and are still given unto faithful communicants; for he who said in the beginning, Let there be light, and the light was made of nothing; why, saying of the bread, This is my body, may he not cause it to be the same? Afterwards he sheweth how Christ worketh this by the mystery of man; for when he was made immortal, and going up to heaven, he said, Behold, I am with you unto the end of the world; because he was comperfonate of two natures, one circumscribed, another uncircumscribed: by his circumscribed nature, he went from place to place; by his uncircumscribed nature, he is whole every where illocally, and abode with them; yet he did not separate the Son of Man from the Son of God; and when the Son of Man ascended up to heaven, he was there as the Son of God; as he witnesseth himself, No man ascendeth up to heaven, but he who came down from heaven, the Son of Man who is in heaven: If therefore he was there by the unity of person, whether he had not ascended by property of nature; for in the same unity he abode still on earth with men, after he had ascended up to heaven. Therefore, that faith may be exercised in believing, because that vital Sacrament appeareth not under a bodily shape, it is hid profitably, as the soul in the body. Last of all, The water in Baptism, seemeth to be common water; and a baptised man, What seemeth he, but what he was before? he declareth this at great length, that neither sense, nor reason, can reach to comprehend this mystery; where sense judgeth that water to be an humide liquor, cold in substance, and which may be turned into air, or earth: but how by the water, and the Spirit, a soul is regenerate, and forgiveness of sin is given, unto this unsearchable mystery, neither sense nor reason can attain; and nevertheless, we must surely believe, That the unbodily soul, is created by bodily water, &c. Mark here, as Christ's body was not in heaven, when he said, Behold, I am with you; and yet, even then he was in heaven wholly, in respect of his person; so now his body is in heaven, and not on earth, where notwithstanding he is personally. Again mark, We have here an union of the water and the Spirit, to the regeneration of the soul: but who ever thought, that that water is the Spirit? or that the thing signified is corporally, or locally in the water? or who can imagine, that the body is turned into the soul, when the body and soul are united? And yet Adelman writeth, that the union of bread and wine, with the body and blood of Christ, is like to these two unions; to wit, by these comparisons he would shew, that though the elements remain still the same, and Christ's body be always in the heavens, till he come again to judge; yet there is a real, and sacramental union twixt the sign and the thing signified; and that the faithful certainly communicate of both together. What answer Berengarius did return to his con-disciple, we cannot finde; But he wrote an Epistle to the forenamed Lanfrank, declaring the abuses of the Sacrament, and commending the book of John Scotus on that question: And he wrote expressly, that the body of Christ is not in the Sacrament, but as in a sign, or figure, or mystery. He spake also, in his preachings, against the Romish Church, in the doctrine of Marraiage, and necessity of Baptism. Io. Oecolampad. epist. lib. 3. fol. 154. print. at Basil anno 1536. And Bellarm. in praf. before his Books de Pon. Rom. witnesseth, that Berengarius called the Church of Rome, the Malignant Church, the Council of Vanity, and the Seat of Satan; and he called the Pope, not Pontificem, vel Episcopum, sed Pompificem, & Pulpificem. It happened that Lanfrank was not at home, and the Convent opened the Letter of Berengarius, and sent it with a Clerk of Rhemes unto Pope Leo IX. The Pope summoned a Synod at Verceles; Berengarius was advised not to go himself, but send some Clerks in his name, to answer for him; The two Clerks were clapt in prison; Scotus was condemned 200. years after his death; and the doctrine of Berengarius was condemned; yet nothing done against his person at that time, because many favored him. Lanfrank was now a pleader for him; but he was commanded by the Pope, to answer him under no less pain, then to be as great an Heretique as he. Lanfrank following the sway of the world (for afterwards he was made Bishop of Canterbury) performed the charge. In that Book he sheweth, that Berengarius, in the words of Institution, This is my body, did appoint them this; that is, this bread: and the bread remaineth (saith he) bread, so that it becometh what it was not; to wit, the body of Christ sacramentally. Even as Ambrose said, The Sacrament consisteth of two things, one visible, another invisible; the thing signified, and the sign: which thing signified, if it were before our eyes on earth, it were visible; but since it is lift up to the heavens, and sitting at the right hand of the Father, it cannot be brought, until the time that all things be restored. Again, Lanfrank saith, Thou believest the bread and wine of the Lord's Table, to remain unchangeable, in respect of the substance; that is, to have been bread and wine before the consecration, and to be bread and wine after the consecration; that they are called the flesh and blood of Christ, because they are celebrated in the Church in remembrance of his flesh, which was crucified; and of his blood, which was poured out of his side; to the end we, being admonished thereby, may call to minde the Lord's passion; and when we call it to minde, we should incessantly crucifie our own flesh, and the vices and infections thereof. What absurdity could be in these words, worthy of so many curses? and what was against the Scriptures? But Lanfrank, hoping to catch some advantage by these last words, as if Berengarius had said, These signs are naked signs; he did beat the air, and nothing impugned the true doctrine of Berengarius; for this is the special argument of Lanfrank against him, The doctrine of the Apostles ordained to be preached, that the flesh and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ is eaten with the mouth of the body, and with the mouth of the soul; that is, both bodily and spiritually; seeing with the mouth of the body we eat and drink corporally, as oft as we receive the Lords body from the altar, by the hands of the priest; but it is eaten and drunken spiritually, with the spiritual mouth of the soul; when sweetly and profitably, as Augustine saith, it is called to memory. That the onely begotten Son of God, for the salvation of the world, took upon him our flesh, hang on the crosse, rose again, appeared, ascended, and will return again to judge. Of the spiritual eating, the Lord said to his disciples, Take, eat. Augustine endeavored to demonstrate the spiritual eating, Traet. 26. in Iohan. when he said, Eat the heavenly bread spiritually, bring innocence unto the altar: This then is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that whosoever eateth of it shall not die; but, which belongeth to the vertue of this Sacrament, and not to the visible Sacrament, who eateth inwardly, not outwardly; who eateth with heart, and not who cheweth with teeth. Here if Lanfrank by his bodily eating, or eating with the mouth of the body, will have both the signs, and the signified thing to be taken bodily; his argument against Berengarius is silly: or if he meant it onely of the signs, Berengarius saith the same. But Guitmund, Bishop of Aversa, turned further aside, and wrote more bitterly, and less truly against Berengarius, Who can hold laughter, saith he, when he heareth Berengarius expounding expounding the words of our Lord concerning the Sacrament, This is my body, i. e. this bread is my body. O most impudent foolishness! why may not the teeth touch that which the hand toucheth? If the body of the Lord was touched by the hands of Thomas, after his resurrection, and by the holy women, why may it not to day be touched more easily, and surely touched? that is, chewed by the teeth of the faithful; He therefore who gave himself to be handled after the resurrection, he will not flee from our teeth for uncleanness, &c. Nevertheless Berengarius abode constant, and was in high estimation, both with Nobility and People; and therefore Pope Victor the II. gave direction to the Bishops of France, to take order with him. They assembled at Towres anno 1056. there was Hildebrand, and the Priests legate; Berengarius eluded the Council, rather then open his minde; for he professed generally, That he followed the sentence of the Catholique Church; that is (said he) as the Scriptures, Fathers, and Primitive Church have taught. And more particularly he said, that the bread and wine became the flesh and blood of Christ; not as in a shadow, but truly. Pope Nicolaus II. hearing that Berengarius was honored of many, summoned him again to a Synod at Rome, anno 1059. and there (as Baron. ad ann. 1059. saith) without any disputation, he condemned his own error. But Vfser. de succes. Eccles. c. 8. hath marked, that (Sigon. de reg. Ital. lib. 9.) when Berengarius, with many arguments, defended, that the Sacrament (to speak properly) was the figure of Christ's body; and Cardinal Albericus (who was nominated to dispute against him) could not by voice resist him; and neither of the two would yield to the other. Albericus sought the space of seven days to answer in writing; as also it is remembered by Leo Ostien. in Chron. Cassin. lib. 3. And at last, when disputation could not prevail against him, it was given him in option, Whether he would recant, or burn? The old man, for fear of death (as Pa. Masson. Annal. Franco. lib. 3. speaketh) made that beastly recantation (a perpetual argument of his dastardly courage, and of the brutish ignorance of that Council) which was penned by Cardinal Humbert, and is registred by Gratian. de consecr. dist. 2. Ego Berengarius. Nevertheless, the words of the recantation are as far from Romish transubstantiation, as white from black. These are the words, (so far as they concern our present purpose) faithfully translated; I Berengarius, do consent unto the Apostolique and Roman See; and with my mouth and heart confess, that the bread and wine, which are laid on the altar, after the consecration, are not onely the Sacrament, but also the very body and blood of our Lord Jesus; and sensibly, not onely in Sacrament, but in truth, are handled with the hands of the priest; broken, and chewed with the hands and teeth of the faithful, &c. John Semeca, the Glossator of the Decrees, expressly condemneth the words of this recantation, and saith, If thou understand not the words of Berengarius soundly, thou shalt fall into a greater heresie then he did; for we break not Christ's body into pieces, nisi in speciebus. Lombard li. 4. Dist. 12. E. 1. saith, Not in the substance of his body; but in a Sacrament; that is, in specie. And Bellarmin. de Concil. lib. 2. c. 1. saith, In signo, & non in se. When they say, understand soundly, they understand clean against the Text; for if by species, and sign, they understand not bread and wine (as the ancient Fathers did certainly mean, and speak) they deceive the world, seeing whiteness, and such other qualities, can never be broken without some substance: neither are these qualities, the sign of Christ's body; wherefore the substance of bread remains after the blessing. And when they condemn the confession of Berengarius, and call it his words, they consider not that they condemn their Pope Nicolaus, and their Council of one hundred and fourteen Bishops prescribing it, and ordaining Berengarius to subscribe it, and which sent that confession unto the Bishops of Italy, Germany, and France, as Catholique. It is certain, that Berengarius, returning home, returned also to his former doctrine, and wrote in defence of it; so that (as Blondus saith) he was summoned again by Pope Gregory the VII. anno 1079. and then subscribed another recantation; and an Act was made, That thenceforth none may dispute, nor teach another, concerning the body and blood of our Lord, except for bringing unto the faith them that are gone astray. It seems, that as yet, Gregory was not resolved of his doubt. Bercold, a Priest of Constance, ad ann. 1083. saith, Albeit Berengarius abjured that heresie in face of Synods, yet he ceased not to return unto his vomit. Some have written, that Berengarius denied the baptism of Infants; but, saith Ja. Usser, In so many Synods held against him, We never finde any such thing laid to his charge. And unto the said Usser it appears, that, who in those days were charged to deny the baptism of children, did hold no more but this, Baptism conferreth not grace ex opere operato. So Berengarius died, holding his first doctrine, at Towres, in the Isle of St. Cosina, and was buried in S. Martins, where his Tomb was reared; and Hildebert, Bishop of Cænoman, and then of Towres, made his Epitaph; which is in Gual. Malmesbu. de Gest. Anglo. lib. 3. And this is a part of it;

Huic jam quinta dies abstulit, ausa nefas.*

Illa dies damnosa dies, & perfida mundo,

Quà status ecclesia, quà spes, quà gloria cleri.*

Quà cultor juris, jure ruente, ruit.

Post obitum secum vivam, procor, ac requiescam,

Platina, in Ioban. 15. calleth Berengarius, famous for learning and holiness: He is reported to have been an hearty friend to learning, and did breed many Students of Divinity at his proper charge; and by means of them his doctrine was sowed through all France, and the Countries adjacent; this was matter unto his adversaries, to envy him the more. Albeit he did waver, as Peter did; and albeit his doctrine was so oft condemned by the Popes, yet it could not be rooted out of men; for Math. Paris. in Hist. ad ann. 1087. writeth, that all France was affected with this doctrine. And Math. Westmonast. at the same time, saith, That the doctrine of Berengarius had corrupted all the French, Italian, and English Nations: so that the Berengarians, that is, the Preachers of the true faith (which the Romanists call Heresie) against the rising errors, did not lurk in a corner. And Sigebert Gemblac. in Chron. saith, Much was disputed by many, both for him, and against him, by word, and by writing. Ex edit. Antwerp. anno 1608. where it is to be marked (saith Vsser de eccles. succes. c. 8.) that in the Edition at Paris, anno 1589. the words, For him, are omitted. Also Thuan, in the Epistle Dedicatory of the History of his time, hath marked, That in Germany were many of the same doctrine; and that Bruno, Bishop of Treveres, banisht them all out of his Diocess, but sparing their blood. And Io. Tossington, a Franciscan, in his confession, set forth anno 1380. saith thus, The heretical sentence, which is raised of the dreams of Berengarius, affirmeth openly, that all the Fathers of the Church, and doctors of the second thousand years (as they speak) that is, who have been within 380. years, have been after the loosing of Satan; and the doctrine which we (saith he) commonly hold to be the faith of the Church, concerning the blessed Eucharist, they say, It is not right, but an error, and heresie, and the tares of Satan, being let loose. Vsser. c. 3.

6. To defend the words of the former recantation, which was given in the Synod at Lateran unto Berengarius, these flatterers of the Romish Idol have devised a new distinction of orall eating, to wit, orall eating is either visible or invisible; And they called the opinion of eating Christ's flesh visibly, the error of the Capernaïtes; and they said, the eating of Christ's flesh with the mouth invisibly, was the explication of Christ; so writeth Ivo Bishop of Carnotum, anno 1092. Catalo. test. ver. lib. 12. But the Fathers of higher antiquity condemned all orall eating as Capernaïtism; neither were the Capernaïtes so subtil to make such distinctions: Yea, surely Christ would have made his correction according to their error. Behold what Augustine saith Tract. 27. in Iohan. Who abideth not in Christ, and in whom Christ abideth not, without all doubt he neither spiritually eateth Christ's flesh, nor drinketh his blood; albeit carnally, and visibly, he with his teeth do press the Sacrament of the body and blood of Christ. And Tract. 28. What is it? they are spirit, and life; they are spiritually to be understood: understandest thou them spiritually? they are spirit, and life; understandest thou them carnally? so also they are spirit and life, but not to thee. They, understanding spiritual things carnally, were scandalised. Here Augustine opposeth carnal eating, whether visible, or invisible, unto spiritual eating and understanding: and he saith, that carnally men eat not the flesh of Christ, but the Sacrament of his flesh.

Twofold eating with the mouth was devised then, and is refused.

7. Bellarmin writeth in his second Book de Pon. Rom. c. 21. that the great Schism twixt the Greeks and the Latines, began anno 1054. because in that year Michael, the Patriarch of Constantinople, did excommunicate the Pope, and all the Romanists, for adding Filioque unto the Decree of the Ephesin Council, concerning the procession of the holy Spirit. Here we may see who made the Schism; the Greeks kept the Decree, as it was first enacted; but the Latins added Filioque. And when, in the same place, Bellarmin saith, It is uncertain when the Latins added it; but certainly, saith he, not before the 600. year: and the Greeks espied the addition in the days of Pope Nicolaus I. At this time Pope Leo IX. wrote against the Greeks; and Michael the Patriarch, and Nicolas a Monk, wrote against the Latins. Of this difference I will speak (God willing) when I come to the Council at Florence, where they disputed this question. Why was there so great a Schism then? Bellarmin. de Cleri. li. 1. c. 19. saith, The differences were not confined within that one, but there were many others; of which these are rehearsed by Fox, in Act. & Mon. out of an old Register of Hereford. 1. The Church of Constantinople is not subject, but equal unto Rome. 2. The Bishop of Rome hath no greater power than the four Patriarchs; and whatsoever he doeth without their knowledge and concurrence, is of no strength against them. 3. Whatsoever hath been concluded, or done, since the seven general Councils, is not of full authority; because, from that time, they convince the Latins to be in an error, and to be excluded from the holy Church. 4. The Eucharist is not the very body of Christ; also whereas the Romish Church doth use unleavened wafers, they have great loaves of leavened bread. 5. They say, that the Romish Church erreth in the words of Baptism; for the Romanists say, I baptise thee, &c. but the Greeks say, Let this creature of God be baptised in the name, &c. 6. They hold, that the Spirit proceedeth from the Father, and not from the Son [of this in another place.] 7. They hold no Purgatory; nor that the prayers of the Church do help the dead, either to lessen the pain of them in hell, or to increase the glory of them who are ordained for salvation. 8. They hold, the souls of the dead (whether elect, or reprobate) have not their full pain, nor glory; but are reserved to a certain neutral place, till the day of judgement. 9. They condemn the Church of Rome, because Women, as well as Priests, anoint children (when they baptise them) on both shoulders. 10. They call our bread Panagria. 11. They condemn our Church for celebrating Mass on other days then Sundays, and certain Feasts. 12. They have neither cream, nor oyl, nor Sacrament of Confirmation. 13. Neither do they use extream unction; expounding the place of St. James of spiritual infirmity, and not of corporal. 14. They injoyn no satisfaction for Pennance; onely they shew themselves to the Priests, who anoint them with oyl, in token of the remission of their sins. 15. Onely on Maundy Thursday they do consecrate for the sick, and keep it the whole year after; and think it more holy that day, then any other: neither do they fast on any Saturday, save onely on Easter-even. 16. They have but five Orders; as Clerks, Deacons, Sub-Deacons, Priests, and Bishops: whereas the Romish Church hath nine Orders, according to the nine Orders of Angels. 17. In their Orders they make no vow of single life; alledging the Canon, J. N. Priest, or Deacon, shall not put away my wife, as it were for honesties sake. 18. Every year, on certain days, they excommunicate the Church of Rome, and all the Latins, as Heretiques. 19. They excommunicate him, who striketh a Priest. 20. Their Emperor doth name Patriarchs, Bishops, and others of the Clergy, and deposeth them at his pleasure; also he giveth Benefices to whom he listeth, and retaineth the Fruits of the same Benefices as it pleaseth him. 21. They blame the Latins, because they eat not flesh, eggs, nor cheese on Friday. 22. They hold against the Latins, for celebrating without consecrated Churches, and fasting on the Sabbath days; and for permitting menstruous women to enter into Churches before their purifying; also for suffering dogs, or other beasts, to enter into Churches. 23. They use not to kneel at their devotion; yea, not to the body of Christ, but one day in the year; affirming, that the Latins, like goats, or beasts, prostrate themselves on the ground in their prayers. 24. They permit not the Latins to celebrate on their Altars; and if it chance a Latin Priest celebrate on their Altar, by and by they wash it, in token of abomination, and false sacrifice. 25. They condemn the worship of Images as idolatry. These are the Articles contained in the said Register: But there are many more in the Book of Catholic Traditions, published in the French tongue by Th. A. I. C. and translated into English, and printed at London ann. 1610. out of which I have drawn these Articles. 1. All the Apostles were equally universal Pastors, and no primacy given to Peter, who was never at Rome, but when he was martyred. 2. To say, that the Church is grounded on the stone of Rome, is hard and grievous, and not far from the Jewish baseness, to include the Church within a Town. 3. St. John, ending his life after Peter, had the first place among all Evangelists and Bishops; and he never taught, that Rome, by divine right, ought to be the Lady of other Churches. 4. But after St. John, the Bishop of Rome obtained the first place among the Bishops, within the Roman Empire: for seeing the Citizens of Rome reigned above other Cities, he had been proud and audacious, who would have preferred himself before their Bishop, especially without Ordinance of a Council. 5. The Churches of Italy, and others their neighbors, by lapse of time, gave to the

the Church of Rome, not onely the first place, but also superintendence over the Bishops near them in particular, to give his advice in matters that happened, until a Synod might be held; yet never any presidency, or power was given to the Church of Rome above other Churches. 6. As all the Apostles were equal in Authority, so they left behinde them every one diverse Successors of equal Authority. 7. He who accuseth the Scriptures, accuseth God the Author thereof; but God is void of blame, and the Scriptures contain the whole matter of faith. 8. Those onely are Canonical Books, which were contained in the Ark, and written in Hebrew before, or in Greek after the coming of the Lord. 9. They hold, they were the first Nations converted unto Christ, and in that regard they are the men who truly, and purely maintain the Traditions of the Primitive Church; as it was taught them by the Apostles. 10. Faith is an assurance of the love of God; and he who doubteth, cannot approach unto God with confidence. 11. The saying of Paul, It is not in him who runneth, nor in him who willeth, prevents two mischiefs; One, that no man exalt himself: for grant that thou runnest, or endeavorest, yet think not what thou doest well, is thine; for if thou be not inspired from above, all is vain: Another, that no man deem that he shall be crowned without service. 12. Faith is imputed to justification; faith sufficeth for all; faith absolveth, justifieth, and maketh partaker of eternal glory: for God requireth no other thing, but compunction and mourning. 13. When we praise good Works, we mean not to exalt our selves by them, or to put our trust in them; but we desire men would give themselves thereunto, as to things necessary unto salvation, and which every one is bound to exercise, according to his power, following the commandment of God. 14. They communicate under both elements; and they have one fashion for the Communicants in the Church, and another for the Sick: the Priests, with little or no reverence, eat the remanent elements, which are not eaten by the faithful; but for the sick, it is kept all the year, being consecrate the week before Easter. 15. They celebrate the Liturgy in their own Language, that the people may understand. 16. The Bishop of Rome cannot by his Indulgences deliver any from these temporal punishments which God inflicteth; neither ought he to dispense with the fulfilling of all these works of repentance, which are possible, &c. The most part of these last differences, are fallen twixt the east and western Churches since the 11. Century; and in them all we finde, that the differences are either calumnies articulated by the Church of Rome, or matters of Discipline, or Ceremony, or then our Reformed Church agreeth with them.

8. The Bishop of Millan had the next place in Italy unto the Bishop of Rome; he had eighteen Suffragan Bishops under him, twenty two Ordinary Cardinals, and divers other Offices of mark: he was always named by the King of Lombardie; neither he nor any of his Clergy trotted at any time to Rome. This was a great moat in the Priests eyes, and therefore the Popes oftentimes sought to bring Millan into subjection unto their See; but the Millanoyes still kept their liberty. At last, ann. 1059. Ariald Clericus Decumanus conspired with Landulfus Cotra præfatus populi against the Arch-Bishop Wido, and made a pretext, that married Priests ought to be exautorate. Wido assembled all his Bishops and Clergy at Fontanetum; with common consent it was denied, that Priests should have liberty of marriage. Then was great strife in the Town; the Nobility defended Wido, and the People were for Landulf; who sent Ariald to Pope Nicolaus II. accusing the Clergy of Millan, and requiring him to send some Judges to try the matter: He was glad of the occasion, and sent Peter Damian, Bishop of

Rome.*

Ostia, and Anselm, Bishop of Luca. So soon as Damian began to talk of his Commission against the deposing of married Priests, for that their heresie the people cried, with shouting, The Pope hath no Authority over Millan; neither will we lose our liberty which our Fathers have maintained; nor will we go under the yoke of any forain Church; With this the Bells rang, the Trumpets sounded, and all the People were in an uproar; so that at this time nothing could be altered, nor in all the days of Landulf. After his death, his Brother Erlembald, coming into his room, stirred the former coal; he went to Pope Alexander II. unto Luca, ann. 1065. and easily obtained a Decree against the Clergy. The Arch-Bishop would have it examined on Easter-day; but Erlembald, and Ariald commoved the People, so that Wido durst not go out at his gate. In the next year Wido, and his followers prepared themselves against their enemies; and Ariald fled for fear: when he was drawn back by force, he was accused as the Author of the tumult, and shamefully put to death: then Erlembald held his peace. But the next year he obtained another Decree, That none should be accounted a lawful Bishop, without the consent of the Pope, notwithstanding the election, and approbation of the People, and Clergy. In the absence of Wido, he compelled the People, and Clergy to subscribe this Decree. The Bishop was astonished when he heard it, and being now old, and desirous of rest, renounced his Bishoprick, and sent the badges of his Office to the Emperor Henry IV. who sent Godifrid Castillionarius into that See, ann. 1068. Pope Alexander threatned him with his curse, that he should not be so rash; and Erlembald by force thrust him out of the City. And when Wido died, the Pope sent Atho, a Priest of Millan, into that See, at the request of Erlembald, who also caused him to be received with great murmuration of the People, that such dignity should depend on the Pope. The Emperor did pursue his right, and therefore a new broil began twixt him and the Pope. The Pope accused the Emperor of Simony, and Heresie. By this means the Church of Millan was brought under the yoke of the See of Rome. Ph. Mornay in Myst. pag. 237. About that time the Saracens had divided Spain into several Dominions, and those Lords were called Kings; they could not agree among themselves; and the Bishops took usually arms for their several Kings; especially the Bishops of Aufa, Gerumda, and Barcinon, went under the colours of King Zeluma, against Almahad, and were all three killed in battel. Baron. Annal. ad ann. 1011. This division among the Saracens, gave some advantage unto Alfonso V. and Ferdinand; yet for some ages they could not subdue, nor expel those Kings of Castile Infidels.

Contention
of the Clergy.

9. Before this time Priests were forbidden to marry, but could not be restrained from their liberty, and many had their own wife. In the year 1074. Hildebrand, in a Synod at Rome, condemned all married Priests as Nicolaitans; He directed his Bulls (as they called them) to Bishops, Dukes, and other Powers, declaring them all to be no Priests which had a Wife; forbidding People to salute them, or pay them Tithes, or to acknowledge them in any way. This was a new example, and (as many said) inconsiderate judgement, saith Matth. Paris. in Williel. Conquest. and against the sentence of the Fathers; especially it was against Canon Apostolor. 6. saying, Let not a Bishop, or Presbyter, put away his Wife under pretext of Religion; or if he put her away, let him be excommunicate. It was against their own decrees, Dist. 28. c. Siquis, If any shall teach, That a Priest should for Religion forsake his Wife, let him be anathema; And Dist. 31. c. Siquis, If any do blame Marriage, or shall detest a faithful Woman for lying with her own Husband; or think the Man culpable, as if for that cause he cannot enter into into the Kingdom of Heaven, let him be anathema. It was contrary to Pope Leo IX. who in epist. ad Nicet. Abba. saith, We always confess, It is not lawful unto a Bishop, or Priest, nor Deacon, to forsake his own Wife for Religion; but that he should give her food and raiment, and not lie with her bodily, as we read the holy Apostles did; even as the blessed Apostle saith, Have we not power to lead about a Wife, a Sister? Pol. Vergil. de inven. rer. li. 5. c. 4. is large in this purpose, and concludes thus; This I may say, That that forced chastity was so far from being better then married chastity, that no crime did bring, imprint, or burn-mark more shame upon the Order, more evil upon Religion, or more sorrow unto good men, then the blot of Priests lusts; therefore it may be thought useful, both unto the Christian Re-publique, and to the Order, that at last the liberty of marriage might be restored unto Priests, which they may keep holily without infamy, rather then to defile themselves most filthily with that vice. The Index expurgatorius of the year 1571. hath ordained all these words, and many more of that Chapter, to be blotted out. And what obedience was given unto this Decree of Hildebrand, is clear in Naucle. vol. 2. gener. 36. where he hath this Epistle unto Constance; Gregory, Bishop, the servant of God's servants, unto the Clerks, and Laicks, both greater and lesser, in the Dioc of Constance, salutation and blessing; We have sent unto our brother your Bishop Otho exhortatory letters, by which, according to the necessity of our Office, by Apostolical Authority, we have commanded him to exclude Simoniacal heretic altogether out of his Church, and that he shall earnestly preach the chastity of Priests; But your Bishop, neither reverencing the command of blessed Peter, nor taking heed unto his own duty, as it is reported unto us, hath not done what we did fatherly advise; and not onely disobediently, but rebelliously hath he, as we have understood, publicly permitted unto his Clerks, altogether contrary unto our command, or rather of blessed Peter, that they which have wives, may keep them; and they which have none, may have them by unlawful temerity: which so soon as we heard, taking it ill, we wrote again unto him, shewing how he had provoked our indignation; and also we have summoned him unto our Synod at Rome, to give the reasons, and in the audience of the whole Convent declare the causes of his disobedience, if they be reasonable. These things, most dear children, we make known unto you, that we may provide for your salvation; for if your Bishop will with open hand fight against us, and be contumacious, it is not fit he should rule, &c. Wherefore, as we have said, by Apostolical Authority we command all those, which are obedient unto God, and blessed Peter, if he shall continue hardened, that ye give him no reverence of obedience; nor think that to be any hurt unto your soul; for if he will be contrary unto the Apostolical precepts, we, by the Authority of blessed Peter, do absolve you from all yoke of subjection unto him; so that if any of you were bound unto him by obligation of Sacrament [or Oath] he shall not be subject unto him in giving any fidelity, so long as he continues rebellious against God, and the Apostolical See. Naucle. saith moreover, It is worthy the observation what Hersfeldensis reports of the constitutions of Hildebrand: Hildebrand, convening with his Bishops of Italy, had decreed in many Synods, that, according to the Institutions of ancient Canons, Priests may have no Wives; they which have any, should put them away, or be deprived: and that none be entered into the Priesthood, which shall not profess single life for ever. This Decree being proclaimed thorow all Italy, he sent many letters unto the Bishops of France, commanding that they in their Churches, should by an everlasting curse, put away all women from the houses of Priests; All the faction of Clerks presently do rage against this Decree, and said, The man was plainly heretical, and of a mad minde; which having forgot the Lord's word, saying, All cannot receive this word; but who may, let him receive it. And the Apostle saith, If any cannot contain, let him marry; it is better to marry, then to burn. Now he by violent compulsion, will compel men to live after the maner of Angels; and while he denieth the accustomed course of nature, he looseth the rains to fornication and uncleanness: But if he will continue to execute this Decree, they will choose to forsake the Priesthood, rather then Marriage; and then let him who dispiseth men, see how he will provide Angels to govern the people in the Church of God. Nevertheless the Pope was instant, and by continual missions did accuse all the Bishops as careless. The Bishop of Mentz perceiving that it was not an easie work to root out an old custom, would walk more moderately; and at first gave them the space of an half year to advise, exhorting his Clergy to do willingly what they must do at last; and to remove both from himself, and the Pope, the necessity of dealing more severely. Then in October he assembleth his Synod at Erdsfurt, and urgeth, that without any more delay, they would now either abjure marriage, or leave their service at the Altar: They brought many reasons to the contrary, to elude the wickedness of his so pressing command. When neither reasons nor supplications could have place against the Authority of the Apostolical See, whereby he did alledge, he was forced against his will; the Priests went forth as to advise, and their counsel was, to return no more into the Synod; But some cry, It were better to return into the Synod, and pull him from his Episcopal Chair, before he pronounce his execrable sentence against them; and if he were punished with death, as he deserves, they might leave a notable monument unto posterity, that none of his Successors dare put such a calumny upon the Priestly Order. This was reported unto the Bishop, and he was advised by his friends, to preveen the tumult in time: Then he sent forth, and intreats them to settle themselves, and return unto the Synod; and he promiseth with the first opportunity to perswade his Apostolical Lord, if by any way he can, to surcease from the severity of his Decree: These things were done ann. 1074. The next year the same Bishop held a Synod in October at Mentz, where, with other Bishops, came the Bishop of Curia, the Popes Legate, with letters, and commands unto the Arch-Bishop, with threatnings of his Order, and Place, to compel presently all the Priests within his Dioc, to forsake their wives, or to dimit the service of the Altar for ever. Which when he professed to obey, the Clerks which were sitting round about him arose, and did so confute him with words, and rage against him with their hands, and gestures of their bodies, that he was past hope to escape with his life. So being overcome with such difficulty, he resolves to deal no more in this matter, but refer it unto the Pope, to end it when and in what maner he would by himself. So far writes Naucler. The Author of Catalo. test. ver. li. 13. calleth this Bishop of Mentz Sigefrid. Then such a Schism was in the Church, that the people would not send their Priests unto the Bishops, but did elect them among themselves; and put them in Office without the knowledge of the Bishop, whereby the people would prevent the peril of Intrants; seeing the Bishop would admit none, unless they did swear to live a single life. Naucler expresses it thus, Upon this disception followed an horrible pest in the Western Church, so that Laicks, in time of this disention of the Priests, did administer holy things, baptise, anoint with filth, instead of the true and holy Oyl. He writes thus, as if he thought, that none can be lawful Presbyters, unless unless they be ordained by the Bishop, or at his command; And nevertheless neither the Priests, nor the People did think so: But of this point more followeth in the next Chapter. And hence it appears, that both Priests and People did oppose the Popes Decree, and that not only in Germany, but in France also. Yea Gebuiler, a late Papist, testifieth, that in those times Twenty four Bishops in France, and Germany, with their Clergy, did constantly maintain the liberty of marriage. More of this followeth in Clemens 3. The same Pope Gregory commanded all men to abstain from flesh in time of Lent: his Successors have pressed it more and more, as meritorious of eternal life, and satisfactory for sin, and under pain of deadly sin. In former times had been a Lent, or sort of fasting, but with liberty, and much variety. Socrates Hist. li. 5. c. 22. saith, The manner of fasting usually observed before Easter, as all the world knows, hath been diversly observed: The inhabitants of the princely City of Rome, do fast three weeks together before Easter, excepting Saturday, and Sunday. Illyricum, all Greece, and Alexandria, begin their fasting five weeks before Easter, and that space they call forty days fast. Others begin seven weeks before Easter, and in all that while they use abstinence but for fifteen days, pausing before every of them; and these few days they call Lent. So that I cannot but marvel, that howbeit they differ in the number of days, yet all do call their observations, forty days fast. Neither is this difference in the number of days, but there is a greater diversity in the kinds of meat; for some abstain from every living creature; some feed upon fish; others with fish eat fowls of the air, affirming (as Moses writes) that their original is of the waters; others eat neither nuts, nor apples, nor any kinde of fruit, nor eggs; some feed onely upon dry bread; and some receive not that; some, when they have fasted until nine of the clock, refresh nature with divers sorts of meats: Other nations have other Customs; the manner and cause are infinite, seeing none is able to shew a president, or record of it in writing; it is plain, that the Apostles left liberty unto every man, at his own discretion, without fear, compulsion, or constraint, to addict himself unto what seemed good and commendable. We know for certain, that this diversity of fasting is rise throughout the world: so far Socrates. Before him Theodoret on Rom. 14. at the words, Let every one abound in his own sense, saith, He speaks not generally, but of meat onely he gives liberty unto every one: for this Custom continues unto this day in the Churches, that one abstains, and another eats any meat without scruple; neither doth the one condemn the other, but this law of concord makes them the more famous and laudable. And Eusebius Hist. li. 5. c. 26. repeats the Epistle of Irenæus unto Victor Bishop of Rome, saying, Neither is this difference of the day onely, but of the manner of fasting; some think they should fast one day, some two, some more, some forty, and telling the hours of the night, and day: neither began this variety in our time, but long before; yet for all this variety they held unity one with another, and as yet we retain it; for this variety of fasting commends the unity of faith. They who before were Bishops of that See, I mean Acircetus, Pius, Higin, Iclesphorus, and Xiflus, did not observe it themselves, nor did they publish any such president unto posterity: and though they kept not that Custom, they held unity with others who came unto them from other Churches, &c. Indeed Caranza in Summ. Concil. hath a Decree as of Iclesphorus; to wit, We Decree, that seven full weeks before Easter, all Clerks, that is, who are called into the Lot of the Lord, should fast from flesh; because, as the life of Clerks should be different from the conversation of Lay men, so there should be a difference in their fasting.

Observe, the time is here appointed seven full weeks, and it is enjoined unto Clerks only; nor is any thing forbidden but flesh. But how can this Decree stand with the words of Irenæus, or with the practice of Rome in the days of Socrates? In the first Council at Orleance (and that was about the time of the Nicen, and a National) is such an Act concerning Priests; only Augustine in Epist. 86. saith, If you ask my opinion in this, I, resolving it in my minde, do see in the writings of the Evangelists, and Apostles, fasting is commanded; but upon what days we should fast, or not fast, I do not see it defined by precept of our Lord, or his Apostles: so he. Bellarmin De bon. oper. li. 2. c. 15. saith, It seems a wondrous difference was among the Antients in keeping of Lent; Nevertheless Pope Gregory had a precedent; for Eusebius Hist. li. 5. c. 16. saith, Montanus condemned marriage, and eating of flesh; and also he kept three fasts yearly, whereof one was two weeks before Easter: It is also to be marked, that whatsoever necessity belaid on keeping of Lent, yet a man may have a dispensation from his Priest for a small sum of money, as the Papal Chancery directeth.

are noted.

10. Peter Damian, Bishop of Ostia, wrote a Book De Correctione Episcopi & Papæ: it is in Catal. test. ver. lib. 12. There he sharply rebukes the arrogance of Bishops which will live as they list, without subjection unto censure; albeit the Prophet David did not spurn at the admonition of the Prophet Nathan; and Samuel (though suffering wrong) did not refuse the censure of the people of Israel; and albeit Peter was endowed with such graces, yet he was subject to the censure of others, Act. 1. and when he was rebuked by Paul, he did not quarrel, but took it in good part, because he well understood, it was not of malice, but in love. But (saith he) now they say, I am a Bishop, I should not be rebuked by my sheep; they must be silent, whatsoever be my carriage, &c. He concludes, Therefore let this pernicious Custom be abolished by Ecclesiastical discipline; away with this deceitful subterfuge, that he who pretends so malepert arrogancy, may not enjoy his sin with immunity. In an Epistle unto Udalrik, Bishop of Firma, he reproves the Popes, that they do contrary unto that which they are commanded to teach; for they should exhort all men unto patience, and toleration of injuries, and forbid vindictive contentions: But now (saith he) what Bishops should exhort others to do, they themselves will not do; Christ commands to forgive thy brother seventy times in a day: the King may use the temporal sword, but a Priest should use only the sword of the Spirit, which is God's Word; If for maintaining the faith, Priests should not carry iron weapons, how then see we armies of them rising against one another for earthly things? But so it is fulfilled what the Apostle writes, When they preach to others, themselves are found to be reprobates.

Opposition against Gregory VII. and description of the Church at that time.

11. About the year 1072. at Nantes, in low Brittany, a Letter was presented unto a Clerk, as directed from hell; in it Satan, and all that fry, gave thanks unto all Church-men, because they were not deficient unto his and their pleasures; and by negligence of preaching, they sent so many souls unto hell, as no age preceding had seen so many. Mat. Paris. ad ann. 1072. Cardinal Benno testifieth, that none of Hildebrand's Cardinals would (at first) subscribe the excommunication of the Emperor Henry; and he hath a large Catalogue of Cardinals, Bishops, and Deacons, who left the Pope, and would never return unto him; so that (as he saith) the Church was divided, the one party pretending the Authority of the Pope, and the other accusing them and their Pope, that he and they taught, and did contravay unto the Scriptures and primitive Church. He addes, that he and his Successor Turban, had presumed to violate the Decrees of Chalcedon, namely, in baptizing, baptising, and communicating without the Church: But (saith he) as Eusebius alone defending the unity of the Church against Liberius, proved him to be an Heretique; and by his refusing to communicate with him, did binde him with the keys; so & much more is Hildebrand, persevering in this error, condemned unto hell, by the departing of so many Fathers from the Roman Church; and who accurse his Heresies, and abuses of the power of binding and loosing. Then he hath a large description of Hildebrand, and his disciples; saying, Let the Prophets be astonished at the voice of Peter, and his disciples; they are men in face, and scorpions in tail; wolves lurking in sheep-skins, killing bodies, and deestroying souls: their Religion is nothing but treachery, and covetousness; they haunt widows, and lead women captives who are loaden with sins: by occasion of times they give heed to the spirit of error, and doctrine of divels; which their Master Hildebrand hath received from his Masters Theophylact [or Pope Benedict IV.] Laurence Bishop of Amelphis, John, or Gregory VI.---- Because Satan could not openly persecute Christ by Pagans, he craftily intends to subvert the name of Christ by a false Monk, under thew of Religion: but albeit God permit such things to be done (our sins so deserving) yet the time of recompense is at hand, Catal. test. ver. li. 13. Many other Books were written against this Hildebrand: there is named one in the German tongue, written by Waltram Bishop of Niembergh, as is thought; the Author bewails the miseries of the Church, and lewdness of Clerks; then he addes, Hence the Catholique faith is defiled; hence that unrighteousness hath waxed so, that instead of truth, false testimonies; and for common faith, perjuries do abound: since Laws are silent, giving place to wars, that saying of Hoseah is fulfilled, There is no truth, nor knowledge of God, nor mercy in the land; cursing, and lyes, murder, and stealing have overflowed.--- Behold, some Bishops have joyned unto the faction of Hildebrand, accounting more of him, then of all the Catholique Church; so it comes to pass, that while the enemy soweth in the Lord's field the tares of many scandals, that now in Bishopricks are no Sacraments of Christ and his Church (which should be the work of the Bishops of God) but execrations, which are the works of the Servants of Satan; who (as Cyprian writes) seeing Idols forsaken, and his Temples left by the multitude of Believers, hath devised a new craft, under the name of a Christian, he deceives the unwise; and by Heresies and Schisms, he overthrows the faith, &c. In another place he saith, Now it appears Satan is loosed out of the pit, seeing, as it is written, he is come forth to deceive the Nations. Ia. Vsser. de Eccles. statu. c. 5. hath the same. The above-named Waltram, in another place lamenteth, That then a new sort of Bishops, swelling in pride because of the gifts of Believers, drew all things unto themselves under cloke of Religion; and they were painted walls, and hypocrites.

12. When Gregory, and Victor, the two heads of that pernicious faction, were gone, the Bishops of Germany and France, considering the calamities of the Church by that unhappy Schism, thought good to meet at Garstung, for debating their strife no more with swords, but with reasonings: so the Bishops of both factions convene in January. There Conrad, Bishop of Utrecht, had a long Oration to this purpose; We are assembled, prudent Fathers, to establish peace, which our Saviour at his departure did leave: the temerity, violence, and pestiferous errors of those, who are not ashamed to dispise that heavenly gift, I wish I could cut in sunder with the two-edged sword, and confute with the testimonies of the two Testaments, according to Christ's command. Who despiseth an Oath, breaks covenant, and keeps not promise, dispiseth him by whom he hath sworn; he offends him, whose name the other party hath believed : As I live, saith the Lord, the Oath that he hath dispised, and the Covenant that he hath transgressed, shall I bring upon his pate. Shall he who hath transgressed his Covenant escape? You must consider not so much unto whom, as by whom thou hast sworn; and he is more faithful, who did believe thee, swearing by the name of God, then thou art, who hatchest mischief against thy enemy, or rather now thy friend, and that by reason of divine Majesty. We finde it commanded concerning Tiberius, and Nero, who were not onely most cruel Tyrants, but most vile Monsters, Give to Cæsar, what is Cæsars; and, fear God, and honor the King: and not onely be obedient unto Princes, who bear not the sword in vain, even though they be evil; but supplicate the most high God for them, that under them we may lead a quiet and peaceable life. All power is of God, and he who resists power, resists the providence of God. Therefore those are ambitious, and presumptuous, who dare with whorish faces misinterpret that saying of our Lord and God, What ye shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven; and what ye binde on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and force it to serve unto their own lust, and indeavor to gull us, as if we were children without all knowledge.---Our heavenly Teacher did open the hearts of his disciples to understand the Scriptures, Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms; and he commanded them to preach in his name unto all the Nations, repentance and forgiveness of sins, and that they should be witneses of those things. Therefore Hildebrand was carried headlong into ambition, when he usurped the power of the eternal God, whose Messenger he should have been; such are the times now, such are the manners, and such are the men. The most high Majesty had provided but slenderly for the affairs of mortals, if he had so intrusted the sword into the hand of any man. Who could restrain the lust of men? who could rule it? truly the wisest is not sufficient for such a burthen. We have not need that any should teach us in what maner Peter, and his Colleagues did use their spiritual power, or (to speak more properly) the dispensation and administration of God's stewardship (for they were but stewards of the divine Oracles.) It is as clear as the light, by the book which the Physitian Luke hath written of the Acts of Christ's Messengers, the weapons of our warfare are spiritual, and not iron, nor robberies, murders; killing of men, nor perjuries; and our helmet, breast-plate, girdle, buckler, and sword, are peace, love, righteousness, hope of salvation, truth, the word of God, and faith. These Divine Gifts our most Christian Emperor did often proffer most willingly unto Hildebrand, but he refused to accept them, &c. The Papal party had chosen Gebhard, Bishop of Salisburgh, to speak in their name; but when he heard this Oration, he would not open his mouth to speak in the contrary. Avënt. Annal. lib. 5. It was appointed at that time to assemble again in May at Mentz. The Papal party did preveen the time, and assembled at Quintelburgh (now called Quedlinburgh) in April; there they wrested some words of Wezilo, Bishop of Mentz, and condemned him as an Arch-Hereticque: they called themselves the true Church, and consented unto the election of Clemens III. The Synod at Mentz was very solemn: there was the Emperor, the Electors, and many Dukes; Peter, Bishop of Portua, and Legate of Clemens; and many Bishops of France, and Germany: by common suffrage the faction of Hildebrand was condemned, as contrary unto Christian piety: and a Decree was published to this purpose; All Christians should shun the company of those accursed persons whom we have named, seeing they have made defection from us, and not we from them: they promised to be present at this Synod, but they will not come; they abuse Christian piety, and leaving the sheep, they run unto the enemies of the Republique; they not onely exhort unto fire and sword, but also are ring-leaders, and Captains of the war--- What would they have done if they had lived in the days of Domitian, Decius, &c. Aventi. lib. cit. who recordeth many other Synods condemning that faction: As also Sigebert, a Monck of Gemblac, who hath continued the Epitome of Jerom, and hath briefly written the History of the Church from the year 381. untill 1112 there he noteth many errors of the Popes; namely, That they presume to absolve Subjects from their Allegiance unto their Princes. He saith of them, False Prophets, false Apostles, and false Priests have arisen, who deceive the People with a false Religion; and dare advance themselves above all that is worshipped: while they seek to establish their own power, and dominion, they have put away Christian charity and simplicity.

13. When Bishops and Priests became Monarchs, some Monarchs became Pastors; as Olaus King of Norway, and Steuchilus King of Sweden, taught their Subjects the Word of God. Herman Contractus, Count of Vering, infirm in body, was admired in the knowledge of the Greek, Arabick, and Latin tongues; singular in Philosophy, especially Astronomy, Rhetorick, Poesie, and Divinity. Jo. Lampad. in Melissi. remembreth also that some Germans were then persecuted for denying Purgatory, the bodily presence of Christ in the Eucharist, and the worship of Images. Ebert, a Monck, wrote againt them, and contemptuously called them Cathari, or Puritans; the Emperors also, and the Popes, made Constitutions against them. The People Heneti were compelled to receive Bishops, and Priests, in the days of Otho I. but after his death they killed the Bishops, they threw down the Churches, and returned to Idolatry. Henry III. restoreth the Christian Religion, and erecteth Bishopricks among them. 10. Pap. in Hist. Convers. After the death of Steven King of Hungary, were sturrs there for many years; in the year 1045, the Princes of the Kingdom being vexed by the severity of King Peter, sent for Andrew, Bela, and Leventa, which were of the kindred of Steven, and banished into Bohem and Poland. The King understanding this Plot, did cause to be hanged Visca, Bua, and Buchna, three chief men, and punished others cleaving unto them other ways. For this cause, the Nobles convening at Canad, sent for Andrew, and Leventa again, with solemn promises, and oath, to bring the Kingdom into their obedience. So soon as they came, all the People came unto them at Novum Castrum, demanding first to permit the People to live after the ancient way of their Fathers, in Paganism; to kill the Bishops, and Clergy; to forsake Christianity, and worship their Idols; which was granted. The chief of them, Vacha, began in the Castle Belos; and his Son gathereth Socoers, and Soothsayers, by whose enchantments he purchaseth the Peoples favor. Then the People threw down the Churches, and killed all the Latin and Dutch Priests cruelly; Likewise Andrew, and Leventa levieth an Army against the Christians. And four Bishops, Gerard, Bisbrit, Buld, and Beneth, and Zehung Count of Alba, meet together in the Church of God; where Gerard saith, Brethren, fellow Bishops, and other believers here present, we shall to day go with the Crown of Martyrdom unto our Lord Jesus Christ: for this night I saw the Lord Jesus Christ communicating unto us the Sacrament of his body and blood. After Mass they went with the King and his Army, and were killed at Pesh; and the King was taken, and brought to Alba, where he died ann. 1047. Then Andrew was crowned; and so soon as he was free from enemies, he enacted a Law, That all Hungarians should renounce Paganism under pain of death: and himself did profess the faith in Christ. Nevertheless the Emperor Henry went down the Danube with a great Army, and besiedgeth the Castle Pesch: some Hungarians in the night-time boareth all the Emperor's Ships under the water, and drowned them, so that the Army was weakened, Naucler. Gener. 35. And in Gener. 36. he shews how the Emperor sought peace, and hardly obtained it; for continuing peace, they did agree that Solomon, King Andrew's Son, should marry Sophia, the Emperor's Daughter. But then Bela, the King's Brother, made a new insurrection, and by help of the Polonians invades the Kingdom; and prevails so, that Andrew was killed, and Solomon fled into Germany; and Bela was crowned at Alba: Immediately he calleth a Parliament, for settling and ordering the Kingdom. Many of the common People, especially the Countrey men, say unto the King, Grant unto us to live after the maner of our Fathers, in Paganism, to put away Bishops, and Priests; and to retain our Tithes; and to lay waste the Churches. The King was amased, and craves a delay for three days: On the third day the chief of the multitude come for the answer; At the King's command Soldiers fall upon them, and then invade the multitude; and when some of them were killed, others cry for mercy, and renounce Paganism. By conferring the former part with this, it appears that two things especially did hinder the Reformation of the Heathens at that time; to wit, They had Latin Priests, who did the Service in an unknown language; and they took it ill to be burthened with payment of Tithes: and moreover, Religion was pressed upon them by the sword. In time of the wars twixt the Emperor Henry, and the Saxons, Mistiwoi, a Prince of the Wandals, did so approve himself unto D. Bernard, that he did espouse unto him his Sister: Before the day of marriage, Tiaderik, a Marquess, said unto the Duke, It was a base thing to give such a Lady unto a dog. So soon as this was reported unto Mistiwoi, he said, Are we then dogs? is this the reward of our trouble? if we be dogs; we will let them feel our madness. The Wandals then renounce Christianity, and profess hostility against Christians: at Aldenburgh they made their sport with sixty Priests; they destroy Hamburg, and the Bishop Benno escapes with his life: they expel the Marquess of Brandeburgh out of all his Lands. Duke Bernard levieth an Army against them; and the Emperor sent aid unto him. In this fight Mistiwoi was killed, and the Wandals were brought into payment of their former tribute. But for eighty years they were not sincere in Religion, saith Al. Crantz. in Saxo. li. 4. c. 34. In the days of the Emperor Conrad, Mistiwoi Duke of Poland, did renounce the faith; and raising an Army, made great havock in Germany, twixt the Rivers Sala, and Albe; destroyed many Churches, and Monasteries, and killed many thousand men. When he heard that the Emperor was preparing against him, he returns with his spoil. Loc. cit. c. 36.

Of the Manichees.

14. About the year 980. Theodor, Bishop of Antioch, besought the Emperor, John Zimisca, to remove the Manichees (who called themselves Cathari, and Pavacimi) into some remote place; because they overspread all, and infected many with their Heresies. The Emperor transports many of them into Philippopolis, in Thracia; where Alexius Comnenus (Emperor in the days of Henry IV.) caused dispute with them; and by information, did prevail with many of them. Zona. This heresie spread into Bulgaria, (as afterwards they were called Bulgari) Slavonia, Lombardie, and France; nor could it be restrained by Decrees of Popes, nor power of Arms, saith Sylvius in Europ. c. 16. The Emperor Henry caused to be hanged a number of them ann. 1062. and some of them were burnt in sundry places. Their errors were,
They

They condemned marriage, and eating of flesh; they dispise the Old Testament, and some parts of the New; they held that there were two Creators; one good Creator, of things invisible; and another ill, of visible things: they deny baptism, and the resurrection from death. Vsser. de Eccl. statu. c. 8. ex Rad. Arden. Homil. 8. post. Trinit. They were divided into divers Sects, different in some other opinions, and they had their own Bishops.

15. All this time, since the last mention of the Turks, and Saracens, the Turks (as is said) lived under the Saracens, subject unto them and their Religion; and living by pasturage, without any Ruler of their own Nation. In this age they became Princes of Babylon, and Persia, and within a short space they were Lords of all Asia, unto Pontus, and the Euxine Sea, which is called Turcomannia untill this day. When the Saracens were divided among themselves, especially the Sultan of Persia, Hircania, or Sogdiana, and Media, fell at variance with the Calipha of Babylon, he sent for the Turks, by whose hand he prevailed; and when he refused to pay them, they robbed him of his Kingdom; and were advanced more and more in both the Armenios, Cappadocia, Bithymia, &c. In the year 1009. the Turks conquered Jerusalem from the Saracens; not long thereafter the Saracens of Egypt were Masters of it again, and kept it till the coming of Goditrid. About the year 1028. the Calipha of Egypt spoiled the Church of Jerusalem: and after twenty years, the Emperor of Constantinople made a league with Deber Calipha; and by his permission he built the Church again ann. 1051. The Turks compel the Calipha of Babylon to create their Prince Tangrolix Zadok, King of Asia. Then they made a league with the Calipha of Egypt, and reigned peaceably forty and six years. At that time Peter, an Eremit (who was wont to say his Pater Noster by a roale of Beads, and from whom the Romans have their Gades. Pol. Vergil. de inven. rer. li. 5. c. 9.) came into Rome, and reports the miseries of Christians under the Infidels; Whereupon the Popes dealt with the Princes to go unto their aid. And Pope Urban II. perswaded many Princes at Claremont, to recover the Holy Land (as they called it) out of the power of Turks and Saracens. The Princes took the sign of the Cross for their cognisance; and several Nations did vary the colour, or situation, or some circumstance of that badge, to the end the Soldiers might know their own Prince, when they had occasion to go into these wars: and hence are so many sundry sorts of Crosses in Europe. In the first interprise Godisfrid Duke of Bullion, Prince of Lorain, was their General; he sold his Dutchy unto the Bishop of Leodium, that he might amass the more money: with him were his two Brothers, Baldwin, and Eustachius, Bohemund Duke of Apulia, Raymond Earl of Tolouse, Robert Earl of Flanders, Robert Duke of Normandy, and Son to William the Conqueror, Hugh Brother of Philip King of France, &c. Two Armies went before Godisfrid; one under the conduct of Peter the Eremit, and the other was commanded by Gotteschalk a Presbyter; they were both spoiled for their plundering, some in Hungaria, and some in Bulgaria; and some arriving into Bethynia, went abroad without order, and were killed by Solymán ann. 1096. The Princes went by Sea from Venice, and when they did meet with the remnants of the former Companies, they were mustered about six hundred thousand of foot, and one hundred thousand horse. They did first assault Nicomedia, and were repulsed by strong fortifications of the City, and for want of victuals: and the Turks and Saracens joyned against the Christians. Alexius, Emperor of the Greeks, sent aid unto the Christians, and then the Turks were forced to yield up Nice ann. 1097. After that was an open fight, wherein forty thousand Infidels were slain;

and the Christians with small loss took Iconium, the head City of Lycaonia; then they gained Heraclea, and Tursus; appointing the Government of these Cities unto Baldwin; who thereafter subdued Antiochia, Edeffa, Cilicia, and Comagena, &c. After all this, Jerusalem was taken on the thirty ninth day of the siege; and Robert Duke of Normandy was chosen King of all the Conquest; and Jerusalem was appointed the chief City of the Kingdom: but Robert hearing that his Brother William, King of England, was dead, would not accept it. Then Godifrid was proclaimed first King of Jerusalem ann. 1099. This expedition was begun with a good intention, that the Land might be purged from Idolatry, and Christians might be freed from grievous thardom; but it was continued by the craft of Popes, for enlarging their Dominion abroad, and for weakening the Empire, and the hinderers of their usurpation, that themselves might promote their power with the more facility at home; and often that they might gather great sums of money under this plausible pretext; as follows very plainly, and especially after the 1200. year. At the first some did smell the vanity of the Expedition; for Anselm (of whom in the next Chapter) writing unto one William intending thither, said, I admonish, advise, pray, beseech, and command thee, as one whom I love, that thou leave off thy going to Jerusalem, which is not now The vision of peace, but of tribulation; and leave these treasures of Constantinople, and Babylon, unto the robbery of bloody hands; and think upon heavenly Jerusalem, and walk in the way unto it, which truly is the vision of peace. Lib. 2. Epist. 19. Out of these few words appears what was his judgement, and also what was the intention of many in that voyage.

16. By degrees were the Legati à latere brought in Authority among the Nations; and they did enlarge the Popes Phylasteries. At first, because Rome was the chief City of the Empire, from thence, as from a seminary, were Preachers sent to sundry Nations, to preach, and plant the Gospel, or to confute Heresies, thereafter to provide vacant Benefices, and to supply the Bishop of Rome his absence in Synods; in all which they did no other thing, but as other Bishops might have done, and also did: But when the Bishops of Rome were made Patriarchs, and became ambitious, these Legates did the same offices at some times; but therewith they began craftily to enjoin unto Arch-Bishops, and Metropolitans, to execute some things, which by the Word of God they were commanded to do; and they would give them power within their own Diocies, as if Bishops were Vicars of the Roman Patriarch, or his Legate. These Primates did gladly embrace this shew of honor, that for reverence of the Roman Church they might be the more respected in their own jurisdiction; and sometimes the more easily advance themselves above their Competitors. Sometimes the Popes sent Legates into other Diocies with such modesty, that they had Authority to attempt nothing without concurrence of the Bishops, or Synod of that Countrey; Albeit these Legations were partly godly, and at the worst were tolerable, yet they were not potestativa, or imperious, but charitativa, or exhortatory: Nevertheless the Popes brought the Churches, and Bishops, into subjection by such means; for afterwards they were sent onely for ambitious usurpation, covetousness, and worldly affairs. The ordinary Legates at Picen, Romandiola, Bononia, Ferrara, Avenion, and if there be any such others, are Provincial Deputies, Pratores, or Vice-Rois; The Nuntio's at the Court of the Emperor, or of any King, or Prince, or State, are Ambassadors, or Spies for secular affairs: The affairs of any Church that are gainful, if they be of less account, are reserved unto the judgement of the Nuntio, Nuntio; yet not definitively, but to be determined at Rome; and things of more weight are reserved for the Court of Rome wholly; In the mean time the power of Metropolitans, and Bishops is neglected. The ancient Bishops of Rome, did severely enjoin their Legates to acknowledge duly the inferior Bishops within their own jurisdiction; but now they pass by the Metropolitans, and draw all actions unto themselves, and the Court of Rome: Also their ambition and avarice have so provoked some Nations, that they will admit no Legate, as Sicilie, and France hath entrenched their office. These particulars are more fully written by Spalatenf. de Rep. Eccles. lib. 4. cap. 12.

OF BRITANNY.

1. AS I touched in the former Century, England was oppressed by the Danes, so that Swan, a Danish King, did bear the Scepter of England; and when he was dying, he left England to Harald, Denmark to Canut, and Norway to Swan, his three Sons. Harald lived not long: After him, and the death of the unfortunate English King Agelred, great contention was in England for the Crown; some were for Edmond Ironside, the Son of Agelred, and some for Canut; After many bloody fights, both parties agree to try the quarrel twixt them two onely; in sight of both Armies they make the essay, with swords, and sharp strokes; in the end, upon the motion of Canut, they agree, and kiss one another, to the joy of both Armies, ann. 1016. and they covenant for parting the Land during their lives, and they lived as brethren. Within a few years a Son of Edrik Duke of Mercia, killed Edmond traitorously; and brought his two Sons unto Canut, and said, God save our onely King. Thereafter Canut reigned in England twenty years, and all the Counsellors swear unto him; By their advice he sent the two Sons of Edmond unto his Brother Swan, King of Denmark, willing him to put them out of the way; He abhorring such a fact, sent them to Solomon, King of Hungarie; where Edwin was married with the King's Daughter, and left her soon a Widow: and the other Brother, Edward, married Agatha, the Daughter of the Emperor Henry III. It is written that Canut established Laws Ecclesiastical, as well as Civil; among which are these: First, All men should holily worship God onely throughout all ages; they should most religiously hold fast the one rule of Christian Religion: they should with due loyalty and obedience honor King Canut; We further command, that every one of each Order, shall diligently, and holily keep the Religion of his own Office, and Function, namely the Servants of God, Bishops, Abbots, Monks, Regulars, and Nuns, and square their life according to their prescribed rule; Let them pray oft, and much unto Christ, both night and day, for all Christian People: And all the Ministers of God, especially the Priests, we entreat and command to obey God, and keep dear chastity, that they may escape God's wrath, and hells fire, seeing they know certainly, it is not lawful for them to have fellowship with women for lust; and who shall abstain from them, let him have God's mercy, and on earth the honor due unto a Thane. Let every one pay his Tithes yearly. Each one should prepare thrice a year (at least) to receive the Eucharist, so that he may eat the same to wholefom remedies, and not to damnation. If any woman commit adultery, to the open shame of the world let her nose and ears be cut off, &c. Spelman in Concil. Canut died ann. 1039. and his Son Hardiknut reigned four years, and his Brother two years;

Scotland.

2. After the death of Grim, King of Scots, Malcolm would not accept the Crown, until the Law which was made in his Father's time, concerning Succession, were confirmed with consent of the Parliament. He was molested by the Danes; and in token of his two victories, two stones were set up in Anguise, in two several places, as yet bearing the name of their Captain Came. At that time Malcolm divided a great part of the patrimony of the Crown among his chief Captains, so that from that time the Kings Revenues were small; and therefore the Nobility gave unto the King the Wards, and Marriages of their Sons (if yong.) He which was so careful of Succession, had no Sons. Duncan, King, the Son of his eldest Daughter, was killed by Macbeth, his Cousen-German, and Succesor. In a word, while some strove for the ancient Liberty, and others for the priviledge of Succession, ten Kings were killed by their Successors, until the year 1103.

Alteration
in England.

3. When England was freed from the Danes, they sent to Normandy, inviting Edward the Confessor, and Brother to King Edmund, to come. He fearing their inconstancy, did refuse, until they sent pledges to abide in Normandy; and then was Crowned ann. 1045. In his time was that Law made, which concerneth the Kings Oath at Coronation: A King, because he is the Lieutenant of the most High King, was appointed to this end, that he should regard and govern the earthly Kingdom, and People of God; and above all things his holy Church, and defend her from wrongs, and root out Malefactors from her, yea, scatter and destroy them; which unless he do, he cannot be justly called a King. A King should fear God, and above all things love him, and establish his command throughout his Kingdom; He should also keep, nourish, maintain, and govern the holy Church of his Kingdom, with all integrity, and liberty, according to the Constitutions of his Fathers, and Predecessors, and defend it against enemies; so as God may be honored above all, and ever had in minde: He should establish good Laws, and approved Customs, and abolish evil, and remove them all out of his Realm; He should do right Judgement in his Kingdom, and execute Justice by the Counsel of his Nobles. All these things should the King swear in his own Person, before he be Crowned. Mat. Parisien. describes the manners of the Countrey, at his coming, thus; The Nobles were given to gluttony, and lechery; they went not to Church in the Christian manner in the morning, but onely had a Priest, which made haste with the Mattens, and Mass, in their Chambers; and they heard a little with their ears. The Clergy were so ignorant, that if any knew the Grammar, he was admired by them. All men were so given to carousing, that both nights and days were spent in that exercise, &c. This King had no Children, and sent for Edward the outlaw; he came, and died within a year at London, leaving one Son, Edgar, and two Daughters, Margaret, and Christiana. After Edward, Harold, Earl of Oxford, was Crowned; then William, Duke of Normandy, came into England with an Army, pretending a right by covenant with King Edward, and did so prevail ann. 1067. that Harold was slain; and he was called, William the Conqueror. Within a few years he made a great alteration in the Kingdom; the most part of his Knights, and Bishops, were Normans; and many English, with Edgar, fled into Scotland, where King Malcolm had married Margaret, Edgar's Sister; and they incited Malcolm to invade England; and he entered into the North part ann. 1071. At last a peace was concluded, upon condition that a Mark-Stone was set up in Stannmoor, as the mark of both Kingdom, with the portraict of both Kings on on the sides of the Stone. Ia. Vsser. de Eccles. statu. c. 6. shews out of sundry Authors, that when the Wars were twixt William and Harold, William sought the Pope's advice, and Harold despised the Pope. So Alexander II. then Pope, sent unto William a Standart, in good luck, or hope of his victory: and when William had obtained the victory, he sent Harold's Standart unto Alexander. Thereafter the Pope writes unto him thus; Thy wisdom knows, that the Kingdom of England, since the Name of Christ was known there, hath been under the power and defence of the Prince of the Apostles, until some, becoming members of that wicked head, and following the pride of their father Satan, have forsaken God's Covenant, and turned away the English People from the way of truth--- for as thou knowest well, while the English were faithful, upon account of their pious devotion, they gave a yearly Pension unto the Apostolical See; of which a part was brought unto the Roman high Priest, and a part unto the Church of S. Mary, which is called, The School of the English, for the use of the Brethren, &c. King William confirmeth the gift, and, (as it follows thereafter some pages) until he was established, Hildebrand was so affected toward him, that he was evil reported by the Brethren, grumbling that he had so affected, and helped the committing of so many Homicides; and that William was devoted unto the Apostolical See, above all others of his condition. But when the Pope was not content with the King's Liberality, and sought an Oath of Loyalty, William wrote unto him, saying, Religious Father, Hubert thy Legate admonished me, in your name, that I should give Loyalty unto thee and thy Successors; and that I should be more mindfull of the Money, which my Ancestors were wont to send unto the Roman Church: the one I have accepted, and not the other: Loyalty I would not give, nor will I; because, neither have I promised it, nor do I finde that my Ancestors have done it unto thy Ancestors. While I was three years in France, the Money was gathered carelesly; but since my returning, by the Divine mercy, what is gathered, is sent by thy foresaid Legate---Pray for me, and for the standing of our Kingdom, &c. Hildebrand was not pleased with this Letter; and therefore in an Epistle unto Hubert, he said, Thou knowest very well what account I make of Money, without Honor. And then, speaking of King William, he saith, The Roman Church may lay many things unto his charge; none of all the Kings, even of the Heathenish, have presumed to attempt against the Apostolique See, what he hath not been ashamed to do; to wit, that any hath been so irreverent, and shameless, as to discharge his Bishops, and Arch-Bishops, from the Churches of the Apostles. Therefore we will that thou, in our name, study to admonish him, that as he would take it ill, if his Subjects give him not due honor; so he would not impair the honor of the holy Roman Church; and by giving due thanks, he may procure the favor of blessed Peter. For we being mindefull of our former love toward him, and following the meekness of the Apostle (by God's help) so far as we can, have spared his fault hitherto; but if he will not put an end unto this, and others his faults, that thou knowest, let him surely know, that he will grievously provoke the wrath of blessed Peter, &c. Among his other faults that were offensive unto Hildebrand, William had imprisoned his own Brother Odo, Bishop Baiocen, without regard of his Episcopal Order; as he writes unto the King, saying, One thing toucheth us near, and by touching vexeth us, and among the excellent monuments of thy Royal Vertues, doth violently overcloud the joy of our friendly heart, that in taking a Bishop, thy own Brother, not providing for thy honor (as it became thee) but preferring thy earthly wariness, and reason, unto God's Law, thou hast not taken notice of Priestly dignity. The honor of a Brother, and Episcopall Dignity, are no way to be matched in comparison; if you will compare it to the glory of a King, or to the Crown of Princes, these are more inferior, then if you would compare Lead unto Gold; So Hildebrand. And nevertheless Baronius assureth us, that the King made no account of his Intercession, nor Argument.

4. Before this time were no Dioceses, or Bishopricks, in Scotland: and sure it is, by Act of Parliament at Scone, under Constantine the II. all Churchmen were forbidden to meddle with secular business; therefore at that time a Church-man, could not be a Parliamentary Lord. But King Malcolm Canmore brought in new Titles of honor into the Civil Estate, after the manner of other Nations; and so he changed the Government of the Church, and erected six Bishopricks. At that time (as all our Historians write) many strangers from Hungary, and England (which both were tributary unto Rome, and in great troubles) came into this Land with Queen Margaret, and by her and their information, the King was perswaded unto such changes, both in the Civil Estate, and Church. Here then is a change of the Discipline in the Church of this Land, and we see by what means it came, even from Rome, where things were very corrupt at that time. But let us look back into former times, and compare all together. Bishop Spotswood, in his History, would have the Bishops to have been more ancient; and saith, that Amphibal was the first Bishop of the Scots, who lived in the Isle of Man, where King Cratiline built a stately Church, to the honor (why would he not say, for the service, or worship) of our Savior; and called it Sodorensis Fanum: and that was the Cathedral of the Bishops of the Isles, till the Scots were dispossessed of that Isle; and from thence the Isle Jona, or Icolmkil, hath been the seat of the Bishops. Then page 7. he telleth of Ninian, the first Bishop of Galloway, or Candida Casa, and of Palladius, sent by Ecclesin Bishop of Rome; and that he ordained Servan Bishop of Orkney, and Tervan Bishop of the Northern Picts. Page 11. he telleth of a Bishop about Aldham, but (saith he) the story doth not express his name: For answer, the Histories shew that such men were in Scotland; but that they were not Prelates, or Bishops, (in that sense, as of late the name was used) is very certain. For first, All who have written the History of Scotland, do testifie, that the Church was governed without Bishops, and by Teachers, who were called Culdees; that is, The worshippers of God; or who taught the worship of God: and these were called sometimes Monks, for their strictness of life; and Priests, or Presbyters; and sometimes they were called Bishops; either in the sense of the Scripture, or according to the Custom of other Nations; but by that term, declaring them to be lawful Teachers, or Pastors, Boeth. li. 6. c. 5. calleth them by these three names, Culdees, Monks, and Priests: and Laurentius the second, Bishop of Canterbury, calleth them Frates Episcopos & Abbates. And Bishop Jewel, in defense of the Apolo. page 122. saith, These three names, Bishop, Priest, and Presbyter, were all one. And it is certain, that at Icolmkil was a Colledge of Students; and there was one, who is sometime called Abbas, and sometime Doctor, and sometime Episcopus; as in that Epistle written by the Clergy of Rome, after the death of Pope Severin, which is directed unto the Bishops, Presbyters, Doctors, or Abbots: These Titles are knit with the particle sive. Likewise about the year 600. Columba was the Church-man which was most respected in Scotland; and he was the Doctor of Icolmkil: for as the King Aidan did use his counsel; so when he fought against the Picts, Columba did call his Colleagues together, and exhorted them to turn their supplications into thanksgiving, because the King had had got the victory, albeit the place of the battel was distant from Jona (where Columba lived, and was at that time) 200. miles at least, saith Bishop Spotwood: And the same Bishop calleth Convallan Governor of that Monastery after Columba. And Buchanan l. 6. in the life of King Kenneth III saith. The ancient Bishops of the Scots, were chosen out of the Monasteries; and these Monasteries were not for Monks, in that sense as they speak afterwards; for in l. 7. Buchanan, speaking of King Malcolm, and the Colledge at Scone, saith, Malcolm turned the Colledge of Priests, that was there, into a Monastery of Monks. Secondly, That the Church of Scotland was not subordinate to Rome; and that they loved not the Discipline, nor Rites of Rome, is most certain, by that Contestation which was in Century VII. Thirdly, That testimony of the Synod at Celicyth, in England, about the year 816. is without all contradiction, that at that time were no Prelates in Scotland; seeing they testifie, that the Scots gave no honor to Metropolitans, nor other Bishops; and therefore they forbid the Scots to have any Function in England. But in the contrary, Bishop Spotwood telleth of Wiro, and Plechelm, which were consecrate at Rome Bishop of the Scots, in the year 632. as it is written (saith he) in Baron. Annal. ad ann. 632. and he addeth, But, by the Cardinals leave, our Church had no such Custom before that time; nor will it be shewed, that before these two, any did go to Rome, either to be consecrate, or confirmed. And then he addeth, We find him [Wiro] shortly thereafter turn Confessor to King Pipin. But if he was Confessor to King Pipin, he was not Bishop of the Scots: nor was Pipin King of France till the year 750. and so Wiro must have been above 160. years old, ere he was Confessor. I have looked on that place of Baronius, and he shews his Author to be Surius, ad Maj diem 8. and all, both Papists, and others, hold Surius to be a most fabulous writer: as in that particular he writes fabulously; for he saith, Wiro was Confessor unto Duke Pipin, and that Pipin was wont to come unto him with bare feet, when he made his Confession. This (I say) is fabulous; seeing it is marked as an unmeasurable shew of humility, that Justinian II. Emperor, made such obedience unto Pope Constantine, in falling down at his feet, and did not cast off his shoes. Nor can it be shewed, that any Writer of that Century, hath the word Confessor in that sense; or that such an Office was at that time: In the days of the Emperor Theodosius, some such thing had been in use upon a particular occasion; but upon a vile scandal it was forbidden. Socrat. Hist. l. 5. c. 19. And then Baronius ad ann. 697. calleth Wiro Episcopum Deirorum, when he speaks of the Synod at Utrecht. Now it is clear in the life of Pope Gregory I. (prefixed before his works) that a part of England was at that time called Deira: therefore Wiro was not a Bishop of Scotland; and therein Baronius Plechelm, is called de Candida Massa, or Casa. But Bishop Spotwood, page 4. saith, No Bishop in Scotland had any Diocye before King Malcolm III. and so that phrase, de candida casa, sheweth that Plechelm was born at that place. and not that he was Bishop there. Likewise Bishop Spotwood, page 20. speaks of two Bishops, Sedulus, and Pergustus, who having assisted in a Synod at Rome, called by Gregory II. in the year 721. after their return, made great disturbance in the Church for erecting of Images. It is true, in the subscriptions of that Synod, such names are there; and the one, Sedulus, is called Episcopus Scotorum, and the other is called Episcopus Pictorum. And so every Presbyter, who went out of Scotland, was called a Scotch Bishop: but that he was a Prelate of Scotland, it is contrary to that testimony of the Synod at Celicyth, in Century IX. which was near a 100. years after Gregory II. And then see what he did; he pressed the worship of Images; and the Culdees denied it to be lawful, saith Io. Bale Cent. XIV.

and therefore many of them were deposed; such was the fruit of their gading to Rome. And Bishop Sportwood, page 26. saith expressly, that Kellach was the first Bishop of this Kingdom who went to Rome to seek confirmation, and that was about the year 904. This instance condemneth what he hath said before, of all those others whom he calleth Scotch Bishops: Neither was this the Custom of Scotland onely, to Govern the Church by common consent of Culdees, or Presbyters, which in Scripture are called Bishops; see § 11. but in the primitive times it was the Custom every where. For first, They had an Ecclesiastical assembly, which Origenes contra Celsum li. 3. calleth, a Church Senate: for when he compareth the Christian Churches at Corinth, Athens, and Alexandria, with the multitude of other People there: he addeth also, If you compare the Church Senate, unto the Senates of those Cities, you shall finde some Senators of the Church worthy to govern any place, any Commonwealth established by God; but these Senators, who now every where do govern, have nothing excellent in their maners beyond the common multitude; and in like maner if the Church-Magistrates be compared with the Political Magistrates, &c. And after eight pages, he saith, Christians do so much as they can, first examine the minde of them which desire to be their hearers, ere they receive them into their number; they try them first privately, and when they appear to have made such progress, that they are desirous to live honestly, then they bring them in by distinct degrees--- and some are appointed to watch over their lives and maners, that if any of them do things unlawful, they debar them from the Society; and others they embrace heartily, if they by dayly progress become better: and how severe is our discipline against them which are faulty, especially who are defiled with uncleanness? our Church casteth them out of our Commonwealth--- and again, when they repent, we receive them no other way, then as if they were raised from death; but after a longer trial, then when they were at first received to learn the Religion; but upon this condition, that because they have fallen, they shall thereafter be incapable of all Dignities, and Church-Magistracy. So far Origen. Hence we see, the primitive Churches had their Judicatories, and their Rulers; and how they did censure the scandalous persons. Secondly, Who were these Rulers? Ambrose teacheth on 1 Tim. 5. saying, Among all Nations, old age is honorable; whence the Synagogue, and then the Church had their Elders, without whose Counsel nothing was done in the Church: which form, by what negligence it hath failed, I know not, unless by the laziness, or rather the pride of Teachers, while they onely will seem to be something. Therefore the Rulers of the Church were not onely Teachers, but with them were Elders, which were not Teachers; and these were out of use in Italy before the days of Ambrose, about the year 400. But see whether they were in the days of Cyprian, who lived about the year 250. In lib. 3. epist. 10. he directeth it unto the Presbyters and Deacons; in the beginning he lamenteth, that many of the Presbyters were dispersed in time of the persecution: and near the end he saith, I am sorry when I hear that some walk disorderly, and wickedly, and jarring with discord; even the members of Christ, which have openly confessed Christ, to be defiled with unlawful lust; nor can be governed by the Deacons, and Presbyters [or Elders] that by the bad maners of some few, the honest credit of many, and good confessions, is stained: they should fear, lest being condemned by their own testimony and judgement, they be deprived of the Society of the godly; for he is a true and famous confessor, of whom the Church afterwards hath not cause to be ashamed, but to rejoyce: As for that particular which our Com-Presbyters Donate, Novate and Curdius have written unto me, I being alone can write nothing, seeing from the begining of my Episcopacy [I have resolved to do nothing by my private judgment for sentence] without your counsel, and without consent of the people: but when by the grace of God I shall come unto you, then as common honor requires we shall together treat of these things which are done, or are to be done. Hence it is clear that though Cyprian was a renowned Bishop, yet he never did any thing in point of government by himself, or without counsel of Elders and Deacons, and without consent of the Church; no, not to give advice in that that they did require of him; and these Elders and Deacons did rule and censure when he was absent; and he was sory that the people did not obey their Sentence. Whatsoever exception may be taken against the word Presbyter, certainly Deacons had place in giving Counsel, and the Bishop had not the sole power of Censure. This is put out of doubt in the life of Augustine; when c. 4. Possidius (Arch-bishop at the same time) shews that he was chosen one of the Presbyters for ruling the Church of Hippon; and then c. 5. the Bishop Valerius having experience of Augustin's gifts, gave him power to preach; and (saith Possedo) this was contrary to the use and custom of the Affrican Churches: and therefore other Bishops did revile him, that he had given an Elder leave to preach; but the good man was content that the people were instructed, seeing he could not deliver his mind so freely as Augustine could, because he was a Greek; and he knew that the Eastern Churches had that custom at that time. Behold a Church with one Bishop & no Elders, and the Bishop was the only Preacher; and Augustine was the first Preaching Elder in the Affrican Churches. 3. That the Bishops had not the whole power, it is clear as the light, if we will believe the writings of the Ancients, as is easie to be shewed by many testimonies. I will name but a few: Basilus (surnamed the Great, about the year 380) in Moral summ. 71. c. 1. expounds the texts 1. Tim. 3. and Tit. 1. Conjunctly of Bishops and Presbyters as having the same office. Sedulius (when Hen. Oraus in Nomenclator calleth Presbyter Scotus about the year 440) on Tit. 1. saith, Before that factions by instinct of the Devil were in Religion, and it was said among the people, I am Paul's, and I am Apollo's; the Churches were governed by the common counsel of the Presbyters: then he brings testimonies of Scripture, proving (as he concludes) that among the Ancients was no difference twixt Bishops and Presbyters. To the same purpose writes Ierom. on Tit. 1. At greater length, and concludes thus; let Presbyters know that by custom of the Church they are subject unto him who is their Prelate: and let Bishops know, that by custom rather then by the Lords appointment, they are greater then Presbyters & that the Church should be governed in community, & in Epist. ad Evan. 1. he saith; Whereas one was chosen to preside among others, it was done in remedie of scisme, lest each one drawing the Church unto himself, it were rent asunder: for in Alexandria from Mark the Evangelist unto Heraclas & Dionisius Bishops (these were in the dates of Ierome) the Presbyters do alwaies chuse one of themselves, & call him Bishop when he is set in a higher degree--- for except ordination; what doth a Bishop what a Presbyter may not do? Both France and Britannie and Africa, and India, & all the Nations do worship one Christ; and observe one Rule of Truth: If you ask for Authority, the World is bigger then a City &c. And because they had another custom at Rome, Ierom saith there, why speak ye of one City? why stand ye for a few, from whom Arrogance hath risen upon the laws of the Church? Gratian hath these words of the Epistle, in Dec. Diff. 43. and there the Glosse saith, in the Primitive Church both the office and name of Bishops and Presbyters were common: but in the second Primitive Church both names & offices began to be distinguished--- therefore these names of Bishop, and Presbyter, were altogether of the same signification, and the administration was common; because the Churches were ruled by the Common Counsel of the Priests. This is confirmed by Ambrose Bishop of Millan 1 Tim. 3. saying, After the Bishop, he speaks of the Deacon: why? because the office of the Bishop, and of the Presbyter, is one; for they both are Priests; but the Bishop is first; so that every Bishop is a Priest, and every Priest is not a Bishop; for he is a Bishop who is first of the Priests. And on Eph. 4. he saith, What the Apostle writeth, doth not altogether agree with the present Order of the Church; for these things were written at the ground-laying: for he had created Timothy a Presbyter, and he calleth him a Bishop; for the first Presbyters were called Bishops, that when the first departed, the second might succeed: and as yet in Egypt, the Presbyters do ordain, if a Bishop be not present: But because thereafter the Presbyters began to be unworthy to have the first place, that order was changed; a Council providing, that not by succession, but by merit the Bishop should be created; and he should be appointed by the judgement of many, lest an unworthy man attain the place, and be a scandal unto many. And to the same purpose Chrysostom (though a Patriarch) writeth on 1 Tim. 3. Why doth the Apostle omit the Presbyter? because there is no difference almost twixt a Bishop and a Presbyter, seeing the care of the Church is committed unto the Presbyters also: and what he speaks of the Bishops, doth agree unto the Presbyters also; and they are above them in Ordination onely; and they seem to have onely this more then the Presbyters. Here it is to be marked, that what Jerom, and Chrysostom speak of that one prerogative, Ordination, is to be understood, not that the Bishop onely had power to chuse and enter a Presbyter, (for it was otherwise, as follows presently) but that the Presbyter, being chosen, and approved, the Bishop onely laid hands on him, and thereby Ordained him: even as at this present in Low Germany, the Classis, or Presbytery, appointeth one of their number to lay on hands in the name of them all; and yet at that time, both Bishop, and all the Presbyters, did lay on their hands in the Churches of Affrica; as it is commanded expressly in that great Council of Carthage. Ge. Cassander in Consulat. art. 14. saith, All men do consent, that in time of the Apostles was no difference between Bishops, and Presbyters; but thereafter for keeping of Order, and eschewing Schism, a Bishop was preferred unto Presbyters; and unto him alone the power of Imposition of hands was reserved. It is also certain, that onely Deacons, and Presbyters, are the holy Orders; because, as we do read, the primitive Church had not others, as Pope Urban testifieth, &c. Thus we see the parity of Bishops and preaching Presbyters in the primitive Church, by testimonies; now behold the practise of those ancient times: In a Provincial Council of Numidia, and Mauritania at Carthage, in the time of Cyprian, were about eighty Subscribers, and they are called Bishops; and the ninth Subscriber calls them Catum Consacerdotum. But certainly at that time, there could not be so many Diocies in these two Provinces; unless by the word Dioccy, a Parish (as we speak) be understood. And in another Council, in the same Town, in the days of Augustin, were 214. Bishops, besides some Correspondents from other Nations. The number of Christians, and Parishes, might be increased at that time; but there could not be so many Diocies (as we were wont to speak) in these two Provinces; wherefore these Bishops must be so many Pastors of several Congregations, as it also appears there: for in the Title of Ca. 4. it is said, De Cellula Sacerdotis; and in the Ca. it is said, Episcopus non longe ab Ecclesia Hospitiolum habeat. There a Priest, and a Bishop, is but one; as Cellula, and Hospitiolum: and the like change of these names, is in the next

Title,

Title, and Chapter. We see the like in Cyprian, lib. 3. Ep. 13. ad Stephan. saying, The copious body of Priests, is conjoynd with the glue and bond of mutual unity, that if any of our Society would attempt to spread an Heresie, and divide or waste the flock of Christ, others may contribute their aid, and as profitable and merciful Shepherds, may gather the Lord's sheep into the flock. Here a Council is a copious body of Priests, and howbeit one cannot command another, yet each one is subject unto the Society; as Cyprian speaketh in the beginning of that Council. And in the same Epistle he speaketh of Novatian, that he was condemned by the Council of many Priests. And li. 1. Ep. 4. ad Feli. Presbyt. and others, he useth the words Præpositus, Sacerdos, and Episcopus, as signifying the same Office; saying, The People, obeying the Lord's commands, and fearing God, should separate themselves from a wicked Overseer [Præposito] nor meddle with the Sacrifices of a sacrilegious Priests, seeing they [ipsa, plebs] especially have the power of choosing worthy Priests, or refusing the unworthy; which we see to flow from divine Authority, that a Priest should be chosen in the presence of the People, before them all, that he who is worthy, and fit, may be approved by publique judgement, and testimony---- God doth instruct, and shew, that Ordination of Priests should not be, but with the knowledge of the People assisting; that the People being present, the faults of the wicked may be discovered, and the worthiness of the good may be proclaimed; and so there may be a just and lawful Ordination, when it is scanned by the judgement and suffrage of them all: as was observed in the Acts of the Apostles, by Divine direction, when Peter spoke unto the People concerning a Bishop to be chosen in the place of Judas--- and we observe to have been done, not onely in choosing Bishops, and Priests, but of Deacons also----- therefore it is to be observed diligently, according to Divine tradition, and the practise of the Apostles; which is also done among us, and almost through all Provinces, that all the neighbor Bishops of the Province do convene, and a Bishop be chosen, the People being present; for they do best know the life of each one: as also we have seen it lately done in the Ordination of our Colleague Sabinus, that by the suffrages of all the Fraternity, and the Bishops meeting together, and by their judgements which sent Letters unto us, the Episcopacy was conferred on him, and hand was laid on him in place of Basilides. So far he. Hence it is clear, that first these above-named titles, are given unto a Pastor of a Congregation. Secondly, Such Pastors meeting together for ordering Church-affairs, are indifferently called a Council, Society, Fraternity, Synod, copious body of Priests, &c. Thirdly, Ordination was done in presence of the People, and specially by their suffrage. Fourthly, A hand was laid on the elected, manus imponeretur; and this was all the Rites that were used at the Ordination of a Bishop, as is clear also elsewhere. But in Scotland, after the division into Diocies (as they spoke) was much business for Ordination, or (as they called it) Consecration, or running to York, or Canterbury; and after the year 1200. they must all go to Rome for Consecration, or else it was not reputed valid; which maner practised at Rome, or places subject thereunto, yet was no where else. And as it was unworthily (and, I may say, superstitiously) done, so it is unworthy to be reported; albeit that kinde of men have taken pleasure in practising, and writing such fooleries, as if none were lawfully called, without these lately devised toys. Now to knit all this purpose together, I add from Bishop Spotswood, Hist. pag. 51. that before the Abbey of St. Andrews was founded, the Culdees were the onely Electors of the Bishop; and thereafter they were excluded by a Bull of Pope Innocent II. and the election was committed to the Prior, and the Canons; whence arose a great strife among them, which by the Authority of good King David, was agreed in those times, that so many of the Culdees as would be Chanons, and enter into the Monastery, should have voice with them. But (saith he) to elude this appointment, a Mandate was obtained from the Pope, to admit none into the Convent, without the advice of the Prior, and most part of the Chanons: and thus the Culdees were held out, and deprived of all voice in the election. In the year 1298. William Cumine, Provost of the Culdees, supposing to get some advantage in those troublous times (this was after the death of King Alexander III.) did oppose the election of William Lamberton, and the matter by appeal was drawn to the Court of Rome; both parties went thither; Lamberton did prevail, and was consecrate by Pope Boniface VIII. This turned to the disgrace of the Culdees, so that after that time, we have no more of them, saith he. And thus by Authority of Antichrist, the ancient Government of this Church was extinguished, and Episcopacy set up: Is not therefore Episcopacy a branch of Antichristian Hierarchy? As for England, since the Saxons, or Englishes receiving the faith by Augustine, they had always Bishops; for they had their pattern from Rome, as it was then: But if we look up to the ancient Britans in that Land, we shall finde it otherways. I have said in Century VII. Chapter IV. that seven Bishops, and one Arch-Bishop, came from the Britans unto Augustin; and there I followed the words of Bishop Jewel, in the defence of the Apology, page 14. Edit. ann. 1570. where he quoteth Beda, Hist. lib. 2. cap. 2. and in the same page he repeateth these words, and citeth Galfrid. lib. 8. cap. 8. What I wrote then upon trust, I have afterwards examined; and I finde that Beda speaks not so: for in the Edition, in fol. at Cambridge ann. 1643. he saith, Loc. Cit. Augustin called the Bishops, or Doctors, of the nearest Province of the Britans; and in the same page, he, speaking of the same persons, saith, A blinde English boy was brought unto the Priests of the Britans; and again, They said they could not depart from the ancient Customs, without the consent and license Senorum. In the margent it is said, in the Saxon Language it is, without the permission and license of their Nation. Then speaking of the second conference, he saith, Then came seven Bishops, (as they said) and more very learned men, especially of that famous Monastery, of which the Governor at that time was Dinooth. In a word, Beda hath not one word of an Arch-Bishop; nor in all his History, nameth he a Bishops See, nor any Bishops name: and whom he calleth Bishops of Britan, he calleth them Doctors, or Teachers, and Priests, yea he calleth them oftner Priests; nor calleth he them simply Bishops, as he calleth them simply Priests; but Bishops, as they say, or Bishops, or Teachers. Certainly Beda could distinguish between a Bishop, and a Priest; for lib. 3. cap. 3. speaking of Aidan, and other Scots, who came at the entreating of Oswald, King of Northumberland, he saith, They were especially Monks that came; and Aidan himself was a Monk, for he was sent from the Isle of Hij; the Monastery of which [Isle] was the chief of all the Monasteries of the Northern Scots, and of all the Pichts---- and the Doctor of that Isle was not a Bishop, but a Presbyter, and a Monk. Then cap. 4. he saith, Laurence [Arch-Bishop of Canterbury] with the other Bishops, sent unto the Priests of the Britans, to confirm them in the Catholique unity; but how they did prevail, the present times do declare, saith he. He meaneth, the Priests would not yield unto the Bishops, or the Britans continued in their old Custom; What can be concluded out of all those words, but that no Bishop, or Prelate, was among the Britans, other then Priests? As for Galfrid, it is no marvel that he wrote according to the style of his own time; that is, the year 1150. But if we will ascend higher then Beda, none can be had but Gildas, a Britan Presbyter; he lived after the coming of the Saxons, and before the coming of Augustin: and he saith, If his Countrey-men have written any thing at all, it cannot be found; but was either burnt by the enemies, or carried away with the Captives. He shews, that in the days of Iiberius Cæsar, the Son of righteousness sent into that Land his beams, that is, his Word: and the Prince did forbid the preaching of it; but the Council would not consent unto him; and so the Gospel was spread there without impediment, until the persecution of Dioclesian: and after that, the Christians gathered again out of their Caves, and lurking-holes, and kept the truth in simplicity, until the pest of Arianism (which infected all the world) came over the Sea into this Island; semper aliquid novi audire gaudenti, & nihil certi firmiter retinenti. Beda lib. 1. cap. 8. repeateth the same words. Then Gildas rebuketh the vices of the several degrees of men; first of the Princes, and Civil Estate, in his Book De excidio Britannico; and then of the Churchmen, in the Book Castigatio in Ecclesiasticum Ordinem: he distinguisheth Church-men into Bishops, or Priests, (as he speaketh) and the Clerks: of the first sort, he expoundeth the first part of the third Chapter of 1 Tim. and he expoundeth the second part of the Clerks; and from that Chapter he convinceth them both. He nameth no other degree of Church-men; but certainly he had named them, if any other had been among them, because he speaketh so distinctly of the several ranks of men, both in State and Church. He calleth the first sort oftest Sacerdotes simply; but never Episcopos, unless he add five Sacerdotes. The book is in Bibliotheca Patrum de la Bigne. We may conclude then, the ancient Britans had no Church-men above the degree of Priest-hood. Now if that were added, which followeth in this Chapter, concerning Ireland, we have found four National Churches that have been governed without Prelates, to wit, the Affrican, ancient Britan, the Scots, and Irish, some for the space of 500. years; yea, until the Britans were subdued by the English: and some for the space of 1000. or 1100. years. And we have found, that there was a Church-Council, consisting partly of Rulers, who were not Teachers; besides that, Ambrose, and others testifie, that such were every where. Yea, and in Rome it is most probable, that the first Teachers were of equal Authority; I say, probable; because Histories are not clear in this point. Epiphanius Hæres. 27. saith, Peter, and Paul, were the first Bishops there; but whether Linus, and Cletus, were Bishops there while the Apostles were alive, I cannot well say: It may be (saith he) because the Apostles went into other Nations to preach, and Rome could not be without a Bishop; for Paul went into Spain, and Peter did oft visit Pontus, and Bithynia: and possibly when Clemens had refused (I cannot say it certainly) and Linus, and Cletus were dead, he was compelled to take the Bishoprick. So conjunctuarly writeth Epiphanius. Jerome in Catalog. Scriptor. saith, Clemens was the fourth Bishop; and he nameth Peter, [but not Paul] Linus, and Cletus; but (saith he) many Latins say, Clemens was next unto Peter. Theodoret on 1 Tim. 4. saith, They say Linus did succeed unto great Peter. Io. Naucler in vol. 2. Generat. 3. saith, In the year of our Lord 70. Linus succeeded unto blessed Peter, although blessed Peter had ordained that Clemens should succeed; but Clemens considering that it was an ill example, that one should succeed his Successor, he renounced the Papacy, and Linus was chosen, then Cletus, and fourthly Clemens. Rufinus in præf. before Clemen. Recognit. saith, Some do ask, seeing Linus, and Cletus, were Bishops of Rome before Clemens, how could Clemens, writing unto James, say, that Peter had given unto him the Chair of Teaching? we have this reason of it, Linus, and Cletus, were Bishops of Rome before Clemens; but while Peter was alive, they had the charge of the Bishoprick, and Peter fulfilled the Office of Apostleship. Dion. Petavius, a Jesuit, in Rationa. par. 1. lib. 5. cap. 5. saith, When Peter was killed by Nero, Linus governed the Church of Rome, as ancient writers affirm--- and they assign unto him eleven years, two moneths, and some days; so that he died in the year 78. Unto him succeeded Cletus, whom Irenæus calleth Anacletus; and he sat twelve years, and seven moneths; and suffered martyrdom ann. 91. and Clemens was his Successor. The Jesuit Io. Hart in Collog. cum Io. Reynold, c. 6. se. 4. affirmeth, That Peter, before his death, ordained onely Clemens to be his Successor. Others have other opinions; as it is in Collog. ca. cit. se. 3. therefore I said, Histories are uncertain in this point, albeit a great part of the Romish faith is grounded upon it; but it is most probable, that Clemens, Linus, Cletus, and Anacletus, were Sympresbyters: and the writers in following Ages, speaking conformable to their own practice, do name, some one, and some another; But it is more certain, that others were the first preachers of equal Authority at Rome, then that any of these four were the first preachers there. That Peter, or Paul were Bishops of Rome, it is not probable, because they were Apostles, and did the work of their Apostleship; and the Scripture sheweth their diligence from time to time: and it is certain, that in the mean while other preachers were at Rome, whom Paul saluteth, Rom. 16. Aquila, Epenætus, Andronicus, Junias, &c. these he calleth of note among the Apostles, and his fellow-laborers in the Lord. Sedulius saith, Whom he calleth fellow-laborers, he meaneth, in the work of teaching; and it is not without reason thought, that the Romans believed by their teaching. Ambrose (or whoever was the Author of the Commentaries) saith, Those were not idle at Rome; for they were zealous in devotion: And it is understood, that all those whom Paul saluteth, came for confirmation of the Romans: for which cause he saith, that not onely He, but all the Churches of the Gentiles give them thanks; and he admonisheth the Romans to obey them. In 2 Tim. 4. Paul mentioneth Linus to have been at Rome at that time; and in the same verse he nameth others before him, to wit, Eubulus, and Pudens, which he would not have done, if Linus had been their Prelate. Wherefore there was a Church at Rome before Peter, or Paul, came thither; as Paul writeth unto them as a constituted Church, and testifieth, that their faith was spoken of throughout the world, c. 1. 8. and their obedience was come abroad unto all men. It is certain also, that they had many Preachers, and other Officers, to whom he directeth chap. 12, 6, 7, 8. nor can any man prove, that those Preachers had superiority one over another: therefore it deserveth consideration, Whether the Roman Church was not once constituted with purity of Teachers? and, Whether the Church of Antioch was not of the like constitution? See and consider Acts 13. 1. and many Elders, or Bishops, were at Ephesus, Acts. 20. 17, 28. and so at Thessalonica, 1 Theff. 5. 12. The word, ὁ ἀρχιεπίσκοπος, in Revel. 2. will not prove any imparity, seeing it is attributed unto all Priests generally, Mat. 2. 7. and the the particle ὁ, ὁ, τῷ, is too weak a foundation for such a building; seeing it implieth not always a singularity, but often an indefinite thing; and answereth unto our particle a, or, an, oftner then unto the particle the; and so it may well be translated there, To an Angel, seeing many Bishops were at Ephesus. And this putteth the question out of all doubt to me, that as the Scripture is the first and main foundation, commanding to Ordain Elders, or Bishops (these are one in Scripture-language) in every Church, Acts 14. 23. or in every Town, Tit. 1. 5. Or κατὰ πόλιν, saith Clemens Bishop of Rome, in his Epistle ad Corinth. So for Practice, and History, it cannot be shewed, that when the constant Moderators were appointed, under the name of a

Bishop,

Bishop, that any Bishop (so called) had any Jurisdiction without, or larger then one Town, within the space of the first 300. years. Rhegium, a little Town, had a Bishop of as great power, within his Town, as the Bishop of Rome had within his Town; as witnesseth Jerom ad Evangr. and neither of them had power in the others Town. And therefore if men will leave the direction of Scripture, and follow the first declination of Antiquity, every Town should have its own Bishop. We have read of more Bishops in one Town; but for the first 300. years, two Towns were not under one Bishop. Or who will shew it, Erit mihi magnus Apollo? Object not a Canon of Nice; I crave a testimony within the first 300. years: and if the word ἀρχαία, in that Canon, be taken in the Apostles sense Acts 15. 7. for a good while ago; certainly it carrieth not a long space of time. In sum, every Town should have their own Church-Council, whether the Præses be per vices monthly, or quarterly, or yearly, or ad vitam, or ad culpam; and so, that the Church-Council may act without the Præses, being necessarily, or wilfully absent; but not he without his Colleagues: as Cyprian testifieth of himself, in Epist. 10. ad Presbyt. & Diacon. edit. Basil. ann. 1521. Let this be understood without the prejudice of larger Synods, which Antiquity did ever acknowledge. Now, because I would joyn all this purpose together; for the more clearing of it, I add three particulars; First, Of the ground and platform of the first Bishops. Secondly, Of the Election, and Consecration of them. Thirdly, Of the rise and growth of their Jurisdiction. Concerning the first, Lombard li. 4. Di. 24. §. 9. teacheth thus, The Canons judge excellently, that onely two Orders are holy, Deacons, and Priests: for the primitive Church had onely these, so far as we read; and we have the commandment of the Apostle concerning them onely: for the Apostles ordained Bishops, and Elders, in every City: we read also, that the Apostles ordained Levites, of whom the chief was Steven; but afterward the Church ordained Sub-Deacons, and acolythi. And in se. 11. he saith, The Order of Bishops is four-fold, to wit, Patriarchs, Arch-Bishops, Metropolitans, and Bishops--- This distinction seemeth to have been brought from the Heathens, who called their Priests, some Flamines simply, others Archy-Flamines, and others Proto-Flamines: for the Heathens called their Priests Flamines, &c. Lombard was a Bishop, and knew Antiquity; if he could have said more for the credit of his Order, he would not have been deficient. For the second, Pope Vergil. de inven. rer. li. 4. cap. 6. saith, Of old, in Consecration of a Bishop, was no other Ceremony but the people, which for that end (as Cyprian witnesseth, not in one place onely, especially in Epist. 4. ad Felic. Presby.) were always present at the Election of Bishops, did pray, and the Presbyters laid on their hands; this was the Consecration used at first by the Apostles, and Fathers -- Left any be mistaken, the priestly Order can no way be said, to proceed from the Bishop of Rome, unless it be understood among the Italians onely, &c. In c. 10. he saith, The power of choosing Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, from the beginning, did belong unto the Apostles, and then unto the Priests of the Cities; yet not without the suffrage of the people, and the judgement of neighboring Bishops. Cyprian witnesseth, not in one place onely, especially in Epist. 4. ad Felic. that this Custom continued a long time; and there he discourseth of this clearly: but seeing that Law is long since out of date, it is to no purpose to repeat his words. When a Bishop was chosen so, the other Bishops did initiate him; and this was done by a Decree of the Synod at Nice; where it was ordained, that a Bishop should be entered, if possible, by all the Bishops of the Province; but if that could hardly be, at least by three, and not without the Authority of the Metropolitan: But now both those belong unto the Roman High Priest; for he createth a Bishop, and initiateth him; or according to the Nicen Order, he commandeth him to be initiated, that is, consecrated. But afterwards the creation of Bishops was turned into another form by Boniface the Third, He ordained that they should be chosen by the people, and Society of Priests, the Prince of the place not gain-saying, and the Roman High Priest consenting, with these words, Volumus & jubemus. But this Decree, as too good, went soon out of use, all things falling into worse: then they began to advise with the Emperor; but Lewes, Son of Charles the Great, renounced unto the High Priest Paschalis the right, which Hadrian had given unto the Father Charles: but now many Princes gripe fast to this; yea, not onely declare, and call Bishops, as they please, without the suffrage of Priests, and people; but, by their onely Seals, give inferior Benefices; which Simplicius, and Gregory, did altogether forbid. So far he. In these days some plead much for Antiquity in Government of the Church; and yet their pretences go not higher then the corrupt times: It may be truly thought, if some questions (much stood upon now) had been asked of Cyprian, he had answered, I know not; as, What difference between the Ordination of a Minister, and the Consecration of a Bishop? what is a Presentation? what is a Patent? what difference between Ordination, Institution, and Collation? what is a Chappel, where Ministers are Ordained, and not one of his flock present? and many such others. As to the rise and growth of Episcopall Jurisdiction, Pe. Soave in Hist. Concil. Trident. li. 4. sheweth it fully, saying, This place requirerth (saith he) to shew the original of this Jurisdiction, that it may appear by what degrees it hath come unto this power, which is envied by Princes, and feared by all Nations: When Christ did commit unto the Apostles the preaching of the Gospel, and administration of the Sacraments, he gave unto them, in the person of all Believers, a great commandment, that they should love one another, and forgive wrongs mutually; commanding each one, to mediate twixt dissenting brethren, and to compose jars: and as the last and highest remedy, commanding that charge unto the body of the Church, with this promise, that it should be bound, or loosed in heaven, what they should binde, or loose on earth; and the Father will give, what they with mutual consent do crave: to wit, this pious duty of Charity, in procuring satisfaction unto the injured party, and pardon unto the offender, was the continual work and exercise of the primitive Church. And according to this commandment, Saint Paul exhorteth, that when Civil questions arise twixt brethren, they should not go to the Benches of Infidels, but suffer their controversies to be judged by wise men, chosen among themselves. This had a form of Civil Judicatory, as the other was like a Criminal Court; both which were different from worldly Courts, in that the one had execution by the Authority of a Judge, forcing men unto obedience; and the other by the onely willingness of submitting parties: which if they refuse to obey, the Ecclesiastical Judge could do no more, but commit the cause unto the judgement of God; which, as it pleaseth God, shall be executed in this life, or that to come. And upon good ground was the name of Charity given unto the Ecclesiastical Judicatory, because by it only was the defender moved to submit unto the Church, and the Church to judge, with so great sincerity of the Judge, and obedience of the offender, that there was no place left unto corrupt affection in the one, nor of repining in the other: and this great love, made the punishment of chastising seem the more grievous, even unto the chastiser; so that in the Church was never any censure inflicted, without great mourning of the people, and greater of the Rulers: and hence it came to pass, that at that time the word mourning, was used for chastising. So St. Paul, rebuking the Corinthians, that they had not censured the incestuous man, said, And ye have not mourned, that he that hath done this deed might be taken away. And in the other Epistle, I fear, lest when I come, I shall not finde you such as I would -- and lest I shall be wail many which have sinned already. Now it seemeth, the judgement of the Church (as is usual in all Societies) was ordered by some one which was President, and propounded things, and after deliberation gathered the suffrages; which part, seeing it is most convenient unto the most able and fit man, without doubt was conferred on the Bishop; But when the Churches were multiplied, the propositions, and deliberations, were done by the Bishop, first in the Colledge of Presbyters, and Deacons, which were called the Presbytery; and there purposes were brought to ripeness, that they might have the last stroke in the publique meeting of the Church. This was yet the Custom about the year 250. as is clear in the Epistles of Cyprian, who writing of them who had sacrificed unto Idols, unto the Presbytery, saith, It is not his maner to do any thing without their advice, nor without consent of the people: and he writeth unto the people, that when he shall return, he will in their presence, and according to their judgement examine the causes, and merits: and unto the Priests, which by themselves had received some delinquents, he writeth, that they give account unto the people. Because of the ingenuity, and charity of the Bishops at that time, it came to pass, that all men almost did rest on their opinion: and the Church, when charity became cold, and the charge that Christ had laid on them was carelessly performed, left all unto the Bishop; and ambition (which is a sly affection, and ready to creep into the heart with the shadow, and shew of vertue) did perswade the Bishops to accept it gladly. But that alteration came not to the height, till the persecutions were ceased; for then the Bishops did as it were set up a throne unto themselves, which became most frequent, by the multitude of pleas, with the accession of temporary riches: And this form of Judicatory, albeit differing from the former, wherein all things were carried with consent of the Church, did yet continue in the same sincerity. And therefore the Emperor Constantine, having tried the fruit of this Court in deciding controversies, and how the vertue of Religion was able to discern many tricks, and guiles, which the Judges had not perceived, made a Law, that there should be no appealing from the Bishops sentence, and the Judges should put them in execution. Yea, and when a cause was begun before the Secular Judge, whatsoever was the state of it, if either of the parties, howbeit the other were unwilling, did appeal unto the Bishop, the cause, without delay, should be referred unto his consideration: And then the judgement of the Bishop began to be Courtly, and when he had the Magistrate to be the executioner of his Decree, he taketh unto him the names of Episcopal Jurisdiction, Episcopal Audience, and such Titles. Likewise the Emperor Valens, thought good in the year 365. to enlarge this Court, by giving unto them the inspection of the prices of things set forth to be sold; which business was not acceptable unto the good and moderate Bishops: for Possidonius reporteth, that when Augustine had been taken up with such work untill noon, and sometimes till night, he called it Angaria, a forced toil, whereby his minde was distracted from things more properly belonging unto him; and for these rustling broyls, he left more useful things undone: as neither did Paul go about these things, which were not suitable to a Preacher, but left them unto others. Nevertheless, when not a few of the Bishops did abuse that Authority, that was granted unto them by Constantine's Law, the same Law, after 70. years, was recalled by Arcadius, and Honorius, and it was ordained, that Bishops should judge in causes of Religion onely, and in Civil no other way, but with consent of parties: and also it was declared, that they had no Court of Judgement. This Law was little regarded in Rome, because of the great power of the Bishop: therefore in the year 452. Valentinian, living in the City, did renew that Law, and caused it to be put in execution. But the succeeding Princes did ratifie unto them again that power, as Justinian did establish the Bishops Court, and Audience, and assigned unto them, not onely the affairs of Religion, but the Ecclesiastical faults of the Clergy, and several powers over the Laicks. By these degrees, Correction, which was appointed by Christ upon the account of Charity, was turned to Dominion, and was the occasion of losing the ancient reverence, and obedience, wherewith Christians were wont to regard their Bishops. I know well, that in words they will deny their Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction to be Dominion, like the Secular; but I cannot see what real difference they can shew: Certainly St. Paul, writing to Timothy, and Titus, sheweth a clear difference, Let not a Bishop be given to lucre, not a striker: But now it is most usual to pay unto the Bishop the expences of Law, and at his command to put into prison, even as in Secular Courts. But when the Provinces in the West were divided, and the Empire was made up of Italy, France, and Germany, and Spain became a Kingdom, in these four Countreys the Princes made choise of Bishops to be their Counsellors; and then by the confusion of spiritual, and temporal power, oh how the Authority of the Bishops Court augmented! within 200. years they drew unto them all criminal and Civil power over the Clergy, yea, and over the Laicks in many particulars, pretending that the cause is Ecclesiastical. Then they forge a mixt Judicatory, wherein either a Bishop, or a Magistrate, which of the two, shall first intend the Action against a Laick; and on the account of this Court, they are most attentive unto their own gain: and, leaving nothing unto the Seculars, they usurp upon all men, as under their reach: Or if any escape this snare, there remaineth one jin to catch them, to wit, a general Rule for the foundation of faith, Every Action belongeth unto the Ecclesiastical Court, if the Magistrate will not do right, or if he delay to do it. And if the pretensions of the Clergy had held within these bounds, the condition of the Christian Republique had not yet been undone; for it had been in the power of Nations, and Princes, when they tolerably exceeded the bounds of equity, to have reduced them by Laws into some tolerable measure, as in time of extreame necessity it had been done. But he who hath laid the yoke upon Christians, even he hath taken away all way of shaking off the yoke; for after the year 1050. when all the Actions of the Clergy are made proper unto the Bishops Court; and so many Actions of Laicks, under the pretence of spirituality, and almost all others, upon the account of the mixt Court, do some way belong unto that Court: and lastly, They have made Secular Power subject unto them, under colour of delayed right. At last they are come so far, as to affirm, That the Bishop hath so large, and wide power of judging, neither by connivance, nor grant of Princes, nor by the will of the people, nor by ancient custom, but it is the very property of Episcopal Dignity, and essential unto it, and gifted by Christ himself. And albeit there be extant many Laws of the Emperors, in the Books of Theodosius, and Justinian, and in the Books of Charles the Great, and Lewes the Godly, and other Princes after them, both in the East, and West, whereby it is clear, after what maner, at what time, and by whom that power was granted: and all Histories, both Ecclesiastical, and Civil, do agree in the report of these Grants, and Customs, and in their causes, and reasons; nevertheless, this so manifest a truth, could not hitherto have place, and is fallen before a naked, contrary, and groundless assertion; even so far, that the

Doctors of the Canon-Law, have openly declared them Heretiques, who will not suffer themselves, as blinde men, to be led into the ditch: Nor do they contain themselves within these limits, but they do also add, That no Magistrate, nor the Prince himself, may meddle with any of these Actions, which are proper unto the Clergy, seeing they be spiritual, whereof Laicks are altogether incapable. And nevertheless, the truth was not so unknown, but that even at the beginning of this error, the learned and godly did oppose it, and did convince both the parts of this assertion, of manifest falshood. First, They maintain, that the major Laicks are incapable of spiritual things, is absurd, and impious: seeing they are adopted by the heavenly father, called the children of God, the brethren of Christ; made partakers of the Kingdom of Heaven, and worthy of divine Grace, of Baptism, and communion of the flesh of Christ; for what be spiritual things, if these be not? And if there may be any other, should there be any question concerning him which is partaker of these highest, and most excellent things, as if he were incapable of spiritual things? And they said, The minor is as false, The proper causes of the Bishops Court, are merely spiritual, seeing faults, and contracts, which belong unto this Jurisdiction, if we consider these qualities, that the Scripture attributeth unto spiritual things, are as far distant from them, as heaven is from the earth: But the opposition of the better part, could not hinder the greater. And after the same manner concerning the spiritual power of binding and loosing, which Christ gave unto the Church; and concerning the exhortation of St. Paul, for composing differences among Christians, and not appearing before Infidel-Judges; by progress of time a temporal throne was set up, by many degrees more gloriously then any now, or that hath been at any time; and in the midst of every Civil Government is another set up, no way depending thereon; so that they which at first did prescribe the forms of that administration, could not possibly imagine such an Idea of a Republicque: neither is it my purpose to report, how they are not content to have attained their aim in building a Court independent any way from the Civil Government; and have likewise attained another end unexpectedly, and have made up an Empire, by a new, and strange opinion, which in a moment of time hath made wondrous progress; now they ascribe unto the Roman Pope alone, which so many Bishops in the space of 1300. years, had been purchasing for themselves, by so many admired wiles: and they made the foundation of his Jurisdiction to be (not as before) in the power of binding, and loosing, but a power of feeding, and by vertue thereof, they hold, that all Jurisdiction was given by Christ, in the person of Peter, unto the Pope alone, in these words, Feed my sheep; I say, I have not purpose to speak more of this, &c. So far in the History of that Synod at Trent. Here I add, how the Canons began, and how they were distinguished into several sorts: Ge. Cassander sheweth this in Consultat. Artic. de Canonis, saying, In ancient time a Monastical life was private, and distinct from all Ministry of the Church, so that at first they had need of a Presbyter from some other place, to administer the Sacrament; and thereafter it was granted, that one of their Order should be ordained a Presbyter, by whose Ministry they did receive the Sacraments: And so the Orders of Monks, and Clerks, were altogether distinct; for Monkery (as Jerome saith) was the office not of a Teacher, but of a Mourner. But then Religious men, in imitation of the Monastical life, did also appoint Colledges of Presbyters, and Canons, where Clerks, that were aiming, or appointed unto the Ministry, and Priests, that were already placed in the Ministry, should live according to a prescribed Rule; which, albeit it was a little more free then the Monkish, yet was tied to certain Canons; hence that life was called Canonical; and they who professed it, were called Canons; and the Society, or Colledge, was called a Monastery: which name continueth in some most famous Colledges. And so in some ancient Councils, is mention of the Monasteries of Monks, and of Clerks; a Bishop was Governor of the one, and an Abbot of the other. Blessed Augustine is said to have been the chief Author of this Institution, who when he had gathered a Society of godly men, to live without a Town, and apart from the multitude of men, thereafter was made a Bishop, and he would have within his Bishoprick; a Monastery of Clerks, and Presbyters, with whom he might live in a community. Some say Urban I. was the beginner of this Canonical life, because it is written, that he did appoint, that all Bishops should furnish all things necessary unto all that would live in community, out of the Revenues, and Goods, that were given unto the Mother Churches. When this Canonical life became loose by degrees, the Canons were in the Council of Mentz, under Charles, reduced to observe their Rules: in Chap. IX. of that Council, the Laws of a Canonical life, are comprised briefly; That they should observe the Divine Scripture, and the Doctrine of the holy Fathers; they should not presume to do any thing, without the knowledge of their Bishop, and Master; they should eat, and sleep together; they should abide within their Cloyster, &c. And because this constitution was not observed, in the Council at Aken, under Lewes, the whole way of a Canonical life was prescribed more exactly, and fully, out of the Books of the holy Fathers; and it was enjoined unto them that did profess that life. But when their wealth did increase, and piety did decrease, they did shake off all yoke almost, and broke all ties of ancient constitutions, so that now is scarcely any hope to reduce them into the bounds of a little more strict life, as their Regular Order did prescribe; albeit we do read, that about 300. years since, a certain Legate of the Romish Pope, willing to draw away the Clerks, and Canons of Luik, from the company of their Concubines, which were called their Cooks, did command them, that they should dwell together, eat together in their parlors, sleep in their dortures, and keep their turns in the Churches both day and night: this was in the year 1203. but how these things did succeed, the present age declareth. Nevertheless, some foot-steps of that common, and Canonical life may be seen as yet, but in the houses, and names onely; for as yet many Colledges have the name, and shew of a Cloyster, that is, of a retired place; and in them are places for eating, sleeping, and little rooms that were allowed unto every one. Therefore when their life was far changed from their Rule, another sort of Canons began, who, because they came nearer to the prescribed Rule, were called Regular Canons; and for distinction, they who had forsaken the Rules, were by an absurd and monstrous name called Secular Canons, that is, Regular Irregulars. Therefore not without cause did Albert Crantz call a Secular Canon, a Monster without example, a Regular without a Rule, and a Canon without a Canon. But when such Colledges were appointed in famous places, where Bishops did govern, and learned men did live there, the ancient custom of the Church, whereby in the more famous Churches, as in Alexandria, and Antiochia, were Schools of Liberal Sciences, and of Divinity, was maintained in these Colledges; for, for a long time such Colledges were publique Seminaries of Learning, wherein the most eminent Men, for Godliness, and Learning, were employed, until at last, this so useful, and godly work, was also neglected; and then godly Princes, and Magistrates, for supply of this want, were moved to bestow maintenance, and erect publique Universities; of which (as Albert Crantz witnesseth, and is certainly known) none was in Germany before an hundred years: And so,

although there is no hope now to restore that ancient institution of a Canonical life, yet, seeing as yet, even unto this day, many famous, both in Nobility and Learning, are of that profession, it should not be altogether despised, nor forsaken, but rather some remedy is to be used, as the time will permit: Yea, and it seemeth, Luther hath not written absurdly of it, when he said, That Bishopricks were Schools at the first; as these ancient words do testifie, Præpositus, Decanus, Scholasticus, Cantor, Canonici, Vicarii, Cuscos: I wish they would do such things, continue their ancient worthiness, and dignities; abide in their possessions; were eminent and great Lords; at least they would restore some teaching, and compel the Canons, Vicars, and Choristers, to hear one Lesson at least every day, and in these Lessons the holy Scripture were expounded: so Bishopricks were in some measure like unto Schools; and as occasion shall require, Pastors and Bishops might be more readily had. And the advice of William Duranti, Bishop of Mimata, is not much different, who thought it an expedient remedy against the sloth of the Clergy, that according to the appointment of the universal Council at Lateran, the Church, which as a pious Mother, should provide, that some of the poorer sort, being unable through poverty of their parents, should not want opportunity of instruction, would appoint Masters in every Cathedral Church, and other Collegiate, and honorable places, and these Masters might teach the Clerks, and secular poor ones of the City, or Dioc, and accept nothing for their teaching; but should have Ecclesiastical Benefices, or stipends, from the Bishops, or Chapters, or Collegiates, or other Prelates. So far Cassander.

5. After the death of Malcolm Cammore, the Scots receive a Reformation More Rites in Scotland. (I would say, Deformation) according to the Rites of Rome; and that by procurement of Queen Margaret, saith Autumn. par. 2. Hist. cit. 16. c. 8. & Joh. Bale Cent. 2. c. 58. in appen. The Bishop understandeth the Romish Mass, and other superstitions, which were brought hither at the first rise of the Bishops. Likewise the same Margaret did agree with Pope Urban, that the Kings of Scotland should be anointed with oyl: and her Son Edgar, was the first anointed King of Scotland. Boet. l. 12. c. 13. But he, and his Successors, by that oyl, had no accession to his power; howbeit, Popish writers have more esteem of anointed Kings, as being more their own, or bearing the mark of the Beast.

6. As in the days of the Emperors Maurice, and Phocas, the Patriarchs strove for primacy, (for preferment was their aim, more then the teaching of souls, or Christ's flock) so in this Century we read of debates among the Bishops of England, Spain, and France, and other Nations, which of them should have the precedency; as in England twixt the Bishops of Canterbury and York. Ambition of Bishops.

7. About the year 1059. Aldred being presented unto the See of Worcester, went to Rome for his Palle, (as the custom was) but could not obtain it, for some misdemeanor in his words, as they did alledge: wherefore he did turn home; and by the way he was robbed; he went back, and made his complaint unto Pope Nicolaus, but all in vain: Then Toftius Earl of Northumberland, (which had gone with the Bishop) told the Pope to his face, that his person was not to be respected in far Countreys, seeing (as he saw) his neighbors, even vile vagabonds, despised him at home; and he requireth the Pope to restore Aldred his lost goods, or else he would make the truth known, that by his means and craft, it was taken away: and more, it will come to pass, that the King of England hearing this, will refuse to send St. Peter's Tribute, and understand it as an indignity unto himself, and his Realm. The Pope was moved with the argument of his purse, and restored the Bishop to his own, Avarice of a Pope.

and gave him a Palle. Such was the custom in those days, and until this present time in Germany, France, and Spain, that albeit the Prince do principally name the Bishops, yet they cannot be admitted, unless they go to Rome for their Palle; which custom is a burden to the Nations, and bringeth no small gain to Rome. Cum. Ventura in Thes. Polit. Discepta. de Vrbe Rom.

Laws.*

8. In this Century (as reckoneth Sir Hen. Spelman in Concil.) were compiled the Ecclesiastical Laws, which go under the name of Ælfrick, unto Wulfen Bishop, among which are these; I say unto you Priests, I will not suffer your negligence in your Ministry, but in truth I tell you what is ordained for Priests; Christ himself hath given an example of Christian institution, and purity of life, or chastity; therefore all who will walk with him, in his way, have forsaken all earthly things, not looking unto their wives: wherefore he saith in his Gospel, Who hateth not his wife, is not worthy to be my disciple. C. II. After the ascension of Christ, & the departure of his Venerable Apostles, so great a persecution was raised on earth, that the Ministers of God could not meet in a Synod, because the heathens lay in wait for them, until Constantine, having the Government of the earth, became a Christian. In many words, there is condemned the marriage of Bishops, and Priests, and also second marriage: and then C. X. it is said, There be seven degrees in the Church, Ostiarus, Lector, Exorcista, Acoluthus, Sub-Diaconus, Diaconus, Presbyter. C. XVII. Presbyter is the Missal Priest, or Elder; not for his age, but ancient wisdom; it is his office to consecrate the body of the Lord in the Sacrament, even as our Savior hath ordained; he should lead the people into the faith, both by preaching, and exercising the holy Ministry chastely; being a pattern unto Christians, and not living after the manner of Laicks. There is no difference twixt a Bishop, and a Priest, but that a Bishop is appointed to give ordination, and to visit, or have care of things belonging unto God, which may not be permitted unto the multitude; they have both the same Order, albeit in this respect the Bishop is more worthy. C. XVIII. There is no other Order in the Ministry of the Church, but these seven; Monks, and Abbots, are of another sort, and not to be reckoned with them, nor have they the name of any order: and nevertheless they are called holy Orders, and they lead the souls of their Priests unto blessedness, if they abide holy. C. XXIII. A Presbyter, or Mafs-Priest, should on Sundays, and Mafs-days, teach the People in English, the understanding of the Gospel, and the Lord's Prayer, and the Creed; and that they learn the Creed, or Christian Confession, by heart; as the Lord commandeth by the Prophet, saying, They are dumb dogs, that cannot bark; they must therefore bark, and exhort the People, lest we destroy them for want of teaching. C. XXVII. A Presbyter should not sell his Ministry. C. XXVIII. Nor pass from one Church to another for gain. C. XXIX. Nor be a drunkard. C. XXX. Nor a Merchant, nor a Lawyer, nor bear weapons. The same Author hath a Letter of Pope Nicolaus unto King Edward (called the Confessor) where it is said, It is clear, that the Kings of England, for their reverence and devotion which they have given to blessed Peter, have flourished in glory and honor, and by his defense, they have obtained glorious triumphs; by the merits of which blessed Apostle, the Almighty God may bring to pass your desire, and confirm unto you the Empire of your Fathers Kingdom----- We commit unto you, and the Kings your Successors, the advocacy, and maintaining of that place [speaking of the Abbey of Westminster, that Edward had re-built, and enlarged] and of all the Churches in all England, that, in our place, [Vice Nostra; Note here, He would have the King to be his Vicar, and not alone, but] Ye, with the advice of Bishops, and Abbots, may ordain every where things that are just, knowing that for these things, you shall receive reward from Him, whose Kingdom and Empire shall have no end. The same Author page 571. saith, The Ecclesiastical Laws of Maccabæus, King of Scots, [Note here an error in the name Maccabæus, for Macbeth; of whom Buchanan saith, lib. 7. In the beginning he made good Laws, both many, and useful, which now are not known, or are neglected] taken out of his Register, are these; One who is entered into Orders, call thou not before a profane Judge; if he be summoned, and appear, do not thou judge him, but remit him unto the holy Rulers. Give willingly the tenth part of all the fruits of the ground, unto the Pastors of the Churches; and worship God continually, with vows and oblations. Who, being accused, shall condemn the Authority of the Church for a whole year, and shall not reconcile himself, let him be accounted an enemy of the Realm; and if he continue two years in that contumacy, let him be forfeited of all his goods. If any shall accompany (as a servant) another man, by whose charges he is not daily sustained, either unto the Church, or publique Convention, or a Market, let him want the head. Poet. Hist. li. 12. hath these, and others of his Civil Laws.

9. Anselm, an Italian, was transported against his will (as saith M. Fox. in Act.) from the Abbey Becheloin in Normandy, unto the See of Canterbury: This is he, who said, He had rather be in hell without sin, then in heaven with sin: A man of special note in his time; for as Gul. Malmesbu. de gest. Anglo. pontif. li. 1. reporteth, when the Greeks disputed at Barri against Pope Urban, concerning the procession of the holy Ghost, the Pope cried aloud, Father, and Master Anselm, where are you? come now and defend your Mother the Church: And when they brought him into presence, Urban said, Let us take him into our world, as the Pope of the other world. He wrote many books, which to this day are commonly in hands, and declare the doctrine of the faith, as it was then professed. In the general is a remarkable passage in lib. 1. epist. 68. (according to the Edition of the Jesuit The. Reynaud.) directed unto Lansfranc, saying, Concerning those things which are said in that little book, you do by a wise and wholesome advice, admonish to consider more exactly in the ballance of the minde, and to confer with the Learned in their holy books; and where reason faileth, to confirm them by divine Authority: I have done so, both before, and since I have received your fatherly, and loving admonition, so far as I could; for that was my intention, through all that disputation, to assert nothing at all, but what I saw undoubtedly might be defended by the Canonical Scriptures, and the sayings of blessed Augustine. Observe here, he whom the Pope calleth his Father, and Master, dependeth upon the Canonical Scriptures, and upon Augustine, and not upon the Pope; nor thinketh upon that which now they call, The casket of the Pope's breast. I have also observed in his Epistles written unto the Popes, Urban, and Paschalis, that he calleth them, the Reverend high Priest of the Catholique Church; and he saith, your Highness, your Majesty; but he never saith, your Holiness; he calleth them the Vicar of St. Peter, but never the Vicar of Christ: nor in any place can I finde, that he speaketh of any priviledge of Peter, above the other Apostles: and in the contrary in Comment. on Mat. 16. he saith, It is to be noted, that this power was not given to Peter alone, but as Peter answered, one for all, so in Peter, he gave this power unto them all. On Rom. 9. Seeing by the free-will of the first man, all men fell into condemnation, certainly it is not to be ascribed unto mans righteousness, which is not before grace, but unto the onely mercy of God, that any of them are made vessels of honor; but that any of them are vessels of wrath, it should not be imputed unto the iniquity of God, which is not, but unto his justice; He is Potter, which of the same lump, (altogether corrupt in Adam) maketh at his own pleasure, some vessels unto honor in his mercy, and others unto shame in his justice. On 1 Cor. 1. The grace of God is given unto us, through our Lord Jesus Christ, and not through Peter, or Paul: grace is given by Jesus Christ; because it is so appointed by God, that whosoever believeth in Jesus Christ, shall be saved, not by works, but by faith only, and freely receive the forgiveness of his sins. On Rom. 10. Seeing hearing is of grace, another grace is also necessary, which may move the heart, because the word of the Teacher outwardly availeth nothing, if God do not inwardly touch the hearers heart. On Chap. 14. He shall stand, because God is able to make him stand; for not he himself, but God is able to make him stand: for he who falleth, falleth by his own will; but by the will of God he standeth, who standeth; and riseth, who riseth. On 1 Cor. 4. Who hath discerned thee? he saith this, because of the mass of corruption, which was by Adam; none but God discerneth man that he is made a vessel unto honor: But a man who is carnal, and vainly puffed up, when he heareth, who hath discerned thee? might answer by voice, or thought, and say, My faith, or my prayer, or my righteousness hath discerned me: The Apostle preventeth such thoughts, and saith, What hast thou, that thou hast not received? ---- God was the cause why thou wast, and art thou the cause why thou art good? Away! for if God hath been the cause why thou wast, and another hath been the cause why thou art good, he is better which hath made thee good, then he who made thee: But none is better than God; therefore thou hast received from God, both that thou art, and that thou art good. On Hebr. 10. This true Priest ---- did not offer often, or many sacrifices, but one offering, which alone is sufficient for the sins of all believers; after that he had fulfilled the obedience of his suffering, sitteth ---- his sacrifice was of such perfection, and efficacy, that it is needless to be offered again for the sins of any; and albeit we offer it daily, that is but the remembrance of his suffering. The Jesuit Raynaud denieth these Commentaries to be Anselm's, albeit he cannot deny, that in many Editions they go under his name; nor can he bring any argument out of the Commentaries, to prove what he saith: and once he alledgeth, that the Commentary on Matthew is Anselm's Bishop of Laudun; and again he guesseth it to be Willielm. Parisiens. but this is an easie way to reject any Book. But these testimonies agree with his other works, which the Jesuit acknowledgeth, and hath published; That on Matth. 16. I finde not in them; yet whereas he hath said in li. 1. ep. 68. that he accordeth with the Canonical Books, and with Augustine; see then what Augustine saith on Iob. Tract. 124. As for Peter himself properly, he was but one man by nature, one Christian by grace, one and the first Apostle by more abounding grace; but when it was said, I will give unto thee the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt binde on ---- he did signify the whole Church --- which is founded upon the rock, from which Peter had his name; for the rock was not named from Peter, but Peter from the rock; as Christ was not named from a Christian, but a Christian from Christ ---- therefore the Church, which is founded on Christ, received from him the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven, that is, the power of binding and loosing sins; for what the Church is in Christ by propriety, Peter is in the rock by signification. And ibi. Tract. 7. In the name of Peter the Church was signified. In many other places doth Augustine speak in that maner, denying that power to have been given to Peter, but as a member of the Church; and at that time speaking in the name of all the Apostles, or Church, as that Commentary saith. Concerning free-will, and grace, Anselm speaketh often and copiously; I shall name but one in Tractat. de Concordia. grat.

grat. & lib. arbi. c. 13. Without doubt the will willeth not rightly, unless it be right; for as the sight is not quick, or sharp, because it seeth sharply; but therefore it seeth sharply, because it is sharp: so the will is not right, because it willeth rightly; but it willeth rightly, because it is right: Now when it willeth righteousness, certainly it willeth rightly; Therefore it willeth not righteousness, but because it is right. I deny not that a right will willeth righteousness; which it hath not, when it willeth more then it hath; but this I say, it cannot will that righteousness, if it have not righteousness by which it may will it. Let us now consider, whether any, not having this righteousness, can in any way have it of himself? Certainly he cannot have it of himself, but either by willing, or not willing; but by willing, no man is able to attain it of himself, because he cannot will it, unless he have it; and that any, not having the righteousness of will, can by himself attain it by not willing, no mans minde can conceive: therefore a creature can by no means have it of it self; but neither can a creature have it from another creature; for as a creature cannot save another creature, so it cannot give that by which it may save it: It followeth then, that no creature hath that righteousness of will, but by the grace of God. But I have proved before, that this righteousness may be kept by free-will; therefore by the gift of God, we have seen that his grace to save a man, agreeth with free-will; so that grace alone can save a man, though his free-will can do nothing; as in Infants, and in them which have not understanding; for grace doth continually help natural free-will (which without grace, can do nothing unto salvation) by giving unto the will righteousness, which it may keep by free-will: and albeit he give it not unto all men, because he sheweth mercy on whom he willeth, and whom he willeth, he hardneth; yet he giveth it unto none for any preceeding merit, because, who hath given unto God, and it shall be repayed unto him? But if the will keep by free will what it hath received, it attaineth either increase of received righteousness, or power according to good will, or some reward: All these things are the fruit of the first grace, even grace for grace; and therefore it is all to be imputed unto grace, because it is neither of him which willeth, that he willeth; nor of him which runneth, that he runneth; but of God which sheweth mercy; And therefore, except God onely, it is said unto all others, what hast thou, that thou hast not received? why gloriest thou, as if thou hadst not received? So I have translated that Chapter word by word; one may quarrel that I have translated attaineth, for meretur; but I have done so according to the use of the word, as I have marked in other places; and because it so agreeth with the words following, All these things are the fruits of grace, even grace for grace. In the next Chapter Anselm saith, As none hath righteousness but by preveening grace, so none keepeth it but by following grace; for howbeit it be kept by free-will; yet it is not so much to be imputed unto free-will, as unto grace, when righteousness is kept, because free-will hath, and keepeth it not, but by grace preveening, and following----- Lastly, seeing all things are according as God disposeth, whatsoever a man hath that helpeth free-will to accept, or keep his righteousness, whereof I speak, it is to be imputed unto his grace. In these particulars then, the former testimonies are according to the minde of Anselm: As for that testimony concerning the sacrifice of Christ, he hath a Treatise De Sacramento altaris, wherein he speaketh much of the change of the bread, and seemeth to be puzzled in reconciling the sentence of Pope Nicolaus II. with the ancient Fathers: but in c. 12. he speaketh of the maner how the things of the Sacrament are to be judged; thus, seeing the things of the Sacrament are so, we should think of the things, as they are spiritual things, in a spiritual maner; and when we receive the flesh of Jesus from the altar, we should be solicitous, that in our thoughts we rest not on the flesh, and be not quickned by the Spirit; for if we be not quickned by the Spirit, the flesh profiteth nothing; for if in our thought we rest on the flesh of our Saviour, we not onely shall not be quickned by the Spirit, but neither can we understand, how the flesh of Christ, a man, can be eaten by man; but as those which were hard in heart, understood it, unto whom the speech of Christ seemed hard, and they went back; for they understood it carnally; for they thought he would cut off pieces of his flesh, and give them to eat: therefore we should think of that body of the Lord spiritually, and in a divine maner, and discern it humbly; that is, we should think it diverse from all other food, and eat the spiritual flesh of Christ, in a spiritual maner; that is, it is received in a Sacrament of his true flesh on the altar: And again, we should think, that the very flesh which was crucified, and buried, is not also torn in the Sacrament, nor broken, nor devoured after the maner of common flesh, but under the similitude of bread to be broken, and offered, and never consumed; for it is not after a wicked maner killed by us, but holily sacrificed; and thus do we set forth Christ's death till he come again: For we do now this humbly upon earth, what he, as the Son, doth for us in heaven, where he, as our Advocate, intercedeth with the Father for us: To intercede for us, is to present for us, in some maner, before God the Father, the flesh which he took for us, and of us: Therefore we do sacrifice the body of Christ, when by certain piety of faith, we believe it to be certain, and do sanctifie it; and we do hold fast this faith unto his honor, by whom he who sanctifieth, and they who are sanctified, are all one. For the death of Christ needeth not to be done again, because when it is once done, it is sufficient to everlasting salvation. Ambrose saith, Christ hath died once, and was made an oblation for our sins; what do we then? do we not offer every day? yes, we do offer, but in remembrance of his death; and there is but one sacrifice, and not many; How one, and not many? because Christ was offered but once, and this sacrifice is the example thereof; it is the same, and the same continually; therefore it is but one sacrifice; else because he is offered in many places, there be many Christs; no, no, but one Christ every where; here he is full, and there he is full; for as what is offered every where, is one body, and not many bodies, so it is but one sacrifice; but the Priest is he who offered the sacrifice which cleanseth us, and we now offer the same sacrifice, which being offered then, cannot be consumed: What we do now, is done in remembrance of that which was done; as he saith, Do this in remembrance of me; we offer not another sacrifice, but the same continually; or rather we do this in remembrance of that sacrifice, and unto him we do vow, and render our selves, and his gifts in us; and on the solemn feasts, and on certain days, we do dedicate, and consecrate the remembrance of his benefices, lest time bring upon us ungrate oblivion thereof. What was Anselm's judgement in the doctrine of justification, appeareth by an Admonition pro moribundo, where he ordereth the Priest to ask the dying man, Brother, art thou glad to die in the faith of Christ? Ans. Yea, Brother. Hast thou a purpose to amend thy life, if God will give thee space to live? Ans. Yea, Brother. Believest thou that thou canst not be saved by thy own merits, or any other way, but by the death of Christ? Yea. Givest thou him thanks for the same with all thy heart? Yea. Then go on, and so long as thou livest give him thanks, and hide thy self in his death; role thy self on it, and put thy trust in no other thing; and if the Lord would judge thee, say, O Lord, I put the death of Jesus Christ betwixt thee and me, and otherwise I will not contend with thee. If he say, Thou hast deserved condemnation; say thou, I lay the death of my Lord

Jesus

Jesus Christ betwixt thee and my wicked merits; and I offer the merit of his most worthy passion, for the merit that I should have had, and alas, I have it not. Say again, O Lord, I lay the death of my Lord Jesus Christ betwixt thy wrath and me. Then let him say thrice, Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit. 1a. Vsser. de succes. Eccles. c. 7. sheweth from Cas. Vlenberg. lib. causar. caus. 14. that all Christendom received this form of questioning the sick, from this Anselm: but it hath been changed from time to time. In the Book, Institutio baptizandi, aliaque Sacramenta--- administrandi, ex decreto concilii Tridenti. restituta, printed at Lions, ann. 1598. at that part de recommendatione anima, are the same questions and answers; but there are set first these, Believest thou, dear brother, all the Articles of the Faith, and all the holy Scripture, according to the exposition of the holy and Catholique Doctors? Ans. I believe. Dost thou detest, and refuse all Heresies, and Superstitions, which are damned, and disallowed by the holy Mother, the Catholique Church? Ans. I do disallow. Instead of these two questions, the above-named Jesuit reporteth, ex Bibliotheca Vaticana, thus; If he be a secular man, he should be demanded so, Believest thou these things that belong unto Christian faith, in so far as they be determined by the Church? Ans. I believe. And in the end he saith, These things being finished, Anselm saith, Without doubt the sick man shall be saved. Observe, Here is no word of Purgatory, nor of saying Masses for him after death. But the most remarkable difference is in Index Expurgat. set forth by Cardinal Quiroga; there it is ordered to blot away, or leave out these questions; Believest thou that our Lord Jesus Christ died for our salvation? and that none can be saved by his own merits, or any other way, but by the merit of his passion? And where it was said in Ordo baptizandi, printed at Venice ann. 1575. at the end of these questions, We need not despair of his salvation, which with his heart believeth, and with his mouth confesseth these questions; that Index ordereth to leave out these words also. By this form, and the changes of it, we may see how the Papists have changed their faith, especially in this main cordial for a sick soul. The same Anselm wrote two Books, entitled Cur Deus homo, against some whom he calleth Infidels: And it appeareth (certainly unto me) these have been the Fore-fathers of the Socinians; and that Socinus have gathered the most part of their quirks out of these Books: but as the man hath been wickedly minded, he hath not taken to heart what Anselm hath answered unto these Infidels; I studying brevity, will onely repeat some of the answers, except onely the first objection. Lib. 1. c. 2. The Objector saith, As right order requireth, that we should believe the profound things of Christian faith, before we presume to search them by reason; so it seemeth to be negligence, if after we be confirmed in the faith, we endeavor not to know what we do believe; wherefore, as by the preveening grace of God, I think that I know the faith of our redemption, so that albeit I cannot comprehend by reason what I do believe, yet nothing shall be able to pull me away from the certainty thereof: I crave, that thou wouldest declare unto me (which many others do crave, as thou knowest) upon what necessity, and reason, hath God (seeing he is Almighty) assumed the baseness, and weakness of humane nature for the restoring of us? This is the main objection, and the preamble of it condemneth implicate faith. Anselm answereth cap. 3. We do neither wrong, nor reproach to God, but giving thanks with all our heart, we do praise and set forth the unspeakable altitude of his mercy, that how much the more wonderously, and above all imagination, he hath restored us from so great, and so deserved wickedness, wherein we were, unto so great, and so undeserved benefits, which we had lost, he hath set forth the greater love, and pity toward us: for if they would diligently consider, how conveniently the restoration of man is procured after this maner, they would not jeer at our simplicity, but with us they would commend the wise bountifullness of God; for it was necessary, that as by the disobedience of a man, death entered into mankind; so by the obedience of a man, life should be restored: and as sin, which was the cause of our damnation, had its beginning from a woman, so the Author of our righteousness, and salvation, should be born of a woman: and as the diuel overcame man (whom he perswaded) by eating of a tree, so a man should overcome him by suffering (whereof he was the author) on a tree. Cap. 4. Is not this a necessary reason, why God should do these things, seeing his so precious a work (mankind) was altogether lost; nor was it fitting, that what God hath propounded concerning man, should be altogether annulled; nor could his purpose be brought to pass, unless mankind had been delivered by the Creator himself. Cap. 5. Whatsoever other person had delivered man from everlasting death, man might be judged to be a servant unto that person; and if it were so, man had not at all been restored unto that dignity which he had had, if he had not sinned; seeing he which should have been the servant of God onely, and equal unto the good Angels in every respect, should have been a servant unto one which is not God, and whose servants the Angels are not. C. 8. The will of God, when he hath done a thing, should be a sufficient reason unto us, albeit we see not why he hath done so: nor should any think it contrary to reason, when we confess that God hath done these things which we believe of the Incarnation: And they understand not what we believe; for we affirm, without any doubt, that the divine nature cannot suffer, nor in any respect can be brought from his Celsitude, nor hath any difficulty in whatsoever he will do. But we say, that our Lord Jesus Christ, is very God, and very man; one person in both natures, and two natures in one person: wherefore when we say, that God was humbled, and suffered weakness, we understand it not according to his insuffering nature, but according to the infirmity of humane nature, which he had assumed; and so it is clear, no reason is against our faith: for thus we do not understand any humiliation of the divine substance, but we declare that there is but one person of God and man: nor did God the Father deal with that man so as you seem to understand, or give an innocent unto death for the guilty; for he did not force him unto death against his will, nor suffered him to be killed; but he himself did willingly suffer death, to the end he might save us from death. Cap. 9. And it seemeth, thou distinguishest not betwixt that he did in obedience, and that which was done unto him; because he would still be obedient, and he did suffer, howbeit obedience did not require it: God requireth obedience of all reasonable creatures, and the creature oweth obedience unto him; so that man did owe obedience unto God the Father, and the Father did require it of him: Thus for his obedience; and if man had not sinned, he should not have suffered death; nor would God have required it of him, seeing he was made reasonable and holy, and to the end he might be blessed in the fruition of God: Now thou wilt not think it fit, that the creature which he made holy unto blessedness, he should force it to be miserable without a fault; for it is a miserable thing, that man should die against his will: and so God compelled not Christ to die, in whom was no fault; but he willingly suffered death, not by his obedience of forsaking life, but for his obedience of keeping righteousness, wherein he continued so stoutly, that therefore he suffered death. Likewise it may be said, that the Father commanded him to die, seeing he commanded him to do that for which he suffered death; and therefore as the Father gave him command, so did he, and he

drunk the cup which the Father gave him, and he became obedient unto the Father, even to the death, and so he learned obedience by what he suffered, that is, how far obedience should be kept. But the word he learned, may be understood two ways; either for that he made others to learn; or because what he was not ignorant of, in respect of knowledge, he learned by experience: But what the Apostle, when he had said, he humbled himself, and became obedient, even unto the death of the cross; subjoyneth, therefore God exalted him, and gave him a name--- whereunto it is like what David saith, He shall drink of the brook in the way, and therefore he hath lift up his head. It is not so meant, as if he could not have come unto exaltation, but by this obedience of death, and this exaltation was not conferred on him, but in payment of his obedience; for before he did suffer, he said, All things are delivered unto me by the Father; and, All that the Father hath, is mine. But as he with the Father, and the holy Ghost, had decreed that he would shew unto the world his great power, no other way but by death; seeing it was by death, it is not unfitly said, to be for death---- for he was exalted after death, as if these things were done for death: But when he saith, I came not to do my own will, but the will of him who sent me; it is like unto that, My doctrine is not mine; for what one hath not of himself, but from God, that is not so much his own, as it is God's; for none hath truth which he teacheth, or a good will of himself, but from God: therefore Christ came not to do his own will, but his Father's; because the holy will which he had, was not of his manhood, but of his God-head: for God spared not his own Son, but gave him for us; that is no other, but that he did make him free; as we finde many such words in Scripture. And whereas he said, Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; yet not as I will, but as thou wilt: and, If this cup cannot pass---- it signifieth the natural desire of life, according to his own will, whereby humane flesh did flee the pangs of death. And he calleth it the will of the Father, not because the Father would the death of his Son, rather then his life; but because the Father would not that mankind should be restored, unless man had done so great a thing as was that death, because it was not reason that another should do it: Therefore the Son saith, that he would his death, which himself would also suffer, rather then mankind should not be saved; as if he had said, Because thou wilt have the reconciliation of the world no other way, I say, thou wilt have my death; therefore let thy will be done; that is, let me die, that the world may be reconciled unto thee. Cap. 10. Because in this question thou undertakest the person of them which will not believe unless they see reason, I will indenture with thee, that we accept no inconvenient unto God, not the least; and that no reason, not the least, be refused, if a greater reason hinder not; for as impossibility followeth upon any inconvenient unto God, so a necessity followeth upon whatsoever reason, if it be not overthrown by a greater. Now the question is onely of the Incarnation, and of the things which we believe of the assumed manhood; Let us now suppose that the incarnation of God had never been, nor these things which we speak of that man; and let us hold this sure, that man was not made unto blessedness, which he could not have in this life, nor could any man attain it but by remission of sin; nor could any man pass thorow this life without sin; and such other things, the faith of which is necessary unto salvation. And here we finde, that the remission of mans sin is necessary, that he may attain unto salvation, as we all do hold. Cap. 11. Then let us try by what way God forgiveth men their sins; and to this end, see first what is sin, and to satisfie for sin: if Angels, and men, had continually given unto God what they owe him, they had never sinned: therefore to sin, is no other thing but not to render what is due unto God. Now the will of all reasonable creatures, should be subject to the will of God: this is the duty, or debt, which Angels, and men, owe unto God; and if he do this, he sinneth not; and who-soever doth it not, he sinneth: This is righteousness, or uprightness of will, which maketh righteous, or upright in heart, or will; this is the onely, and all the honor which we owe unto God, and which God requireth of us; for only such a will doth works acceptable unto God, when he can do; and when he cannot do, onely the will doth please God by it self; because without it no work pleaseth God: he who giveth not his dutiful honor unto God, taketh from God what belongeth unto him, and he dishonoreth God; and this is to sin: and so long as he rendereth not what he hath taken away, he is under guiltiness; nor is it sufficient to render what is taken away, but for the wrong he hath done, he must render more then he hath taken away---This is also to be marked, that when one rendereth what he hath unjustly robbed, he should give what could not have been required of him, if he had not robbed: after this maner should every one which sinneth, render honor unto God; and this is satisfaction which every sinner should do unto God. Cap. 12. Now let us consider, Whether it were fitting, that God should forgive sin through mercy onely, and without all payment of that honor which was taken from him? To forgive sins thus, is no other, but not to punish; and because to order sin rightly, without satisfaction, is no other but not to punish; if it be not punished, it is past without order: but it is not fit, that God should let sin pass without order; therefore it is not fit, that God should let sin pass without punishment; and moreover, if sin pass unpunished, both the sinner, and the not-sinner, do fare alike with God, which is not convenient unto God: Yet more, we all know that the righteousness of men is under a Law, that according to its quantity, the measure of retribution should be recompensed: and if sin be neither paid, nor punished, it is under no Law; and therefore if unrighteousness were let pass through mercy onely, it were more free then righteousness is, which were very inconvenient; and this inconvenience were yet more, that it would make unrighteousness equal unto God, because, as God is liable unto no Law, so were unrighteousness. And albeit he command us to forgive one another, yet that is but because he so ordereth us, that we take not in hand what belongeth unto him alone, seeing to revenge is proper unto him who is Lord of all; and when earthly powers do it rightly, God doth it, seeing they are ordained by him for the same effect: As for his liberty, and bountifulness, we should think so reasonably of them, that we destroy not his honor; for liberty is but in things expedient and fitting; nor can that be termed bountifulness, which worketh any thing unfit for God. And where it is said, What God willeth, is just; and what God willeth not, is not just: that is not to be understood, as if God would any inconvenient thing, and it were just, because God willeth it; for it followeth, if God will lye, it were just to lye, but rather that he were not God; for a will cannot lye, but such wherein truth is corrupt, or rather which is corrupt by forsaking truth: therefore when it is said, If God will lye; it is no other, but if God be of that nature which can lye: for this cause it followeth not that a lye is just, unless it be understood as of two impossible things; we say, if this be, that is; because neither the one, nor the other is: as if one would say, If the water be dry, the fire is moist, for neither of them is true: And so it is true onely of these things, which are not unbecoming that God will them, to say, If God will this, it is just. Cap. 13. Nothing is less tolerable in the order of things, then that the creature take away the honor which is due unto the Creator, and pay not what he taketh away: but nothing is suffered more unjustly, then which is intolerable; and therefore I think thou wilt not say, that God should permit that, which is unjust to be permitted; as, that the creature should not repay what he hath taken from God: also seeing nothing is better then God, nothing is more just then strictest justice, which preserveth his honor in the dispensation of things; and this justice is no other thing but God himself: therefore God keepeth nothing more justly, then the honor of his own excellency; And think you that he keepeth it wholly, if he suffer it to be taken from him, so that it be neither paid, nor he which hath taken it away be punished? and if you dare not say so, it followeth necessarily, that the honor which is taken must be paid, or punishment follow; or else God were not just unto himself, or that he is unable in both, which to think were impiety.

Cap. 15. If you will say, Why doth God permit his honor to be minced in the least? certainly the honor of God cannot really be increased or minced; for he is his honor incorruptibly, and no way changeable: nevertheless, when each creature doth either reasonably, or naturally keep its order which is commanded unto it, it is said to obey God, and to honor him; and this is the reasonable creature especially, to which is given to understand what it oweth, which when it doth what it oweth, it honoreth God; not because it conferreth any thing on him, but because it submitteth it self willingly unto his will and dispensation; and so far as it may, it continueth its order in the universality of things, and the comeliness of that universality: but when it willett not what it should, it dishonoreth God so far as it can, because it will not submit it self willingly unto his dispensation; and it confoundeth the order and beauty of the universality, so far as it may; howbeit it cannot in the least do harm, or defile the power and honor of God: For if the things that are within the compass of heaven, would not be under heaven, or depart from heaven, they cannot be but under heaven; nor flee from heaven, but by drawing nearer unto heaven; for from whence, and what way, and whithersoever they go, they are still under heaven; and the more they go from any part of heaven, they come the nearer unto the opposite part: So albeit a man, or bad angel, will not be subject unto the will and dispensation of God, they cannot flee from it; because, if they will flee from his commanding will, they run under his punishing will. And if you ask, What way can they flee? not but by his will permitting; and what they will, or do wickedly, his infinite wisdom turneth it to the order and beauty of the forenamed universality: for the same willing satisfaction of their perversity, or requiring of punishment on them that satisfie not willingly (besides that God doth many ways bring good out of evil) have their place, and continue the beauty of order in the same universality. Cap. 19. This then is most sure, if God could let sin go unpunished without satisfaction, that is, without willing payment of the debt, a sinner could not attain unto blessedness, at least that which he had before he sinned; for in that way a man could not be restored such as he was before sin. And whereas all nations do pray, Forgive us our sins, he who payeth not, saith in vain Forgive; and he who payeth, prayeth, because this belongeth unto payment, that he doth supplicate: for God is debtor to none, and every creature is indebted unto him; wherefore it is not fit that man deal with God, as one with his fellow. Cap. 20. Neither will you doubt (I think) that the satisfaction should be according to the measure of the fault; Then what will you pay for your fault? if you say, repentance, a contrite and humble heart, abstinence, and such toil of the body; mercy in giving, and forgiving, and obedience; In all these, what give you unto God? when you give any thing that you owe, howbeit you had not sinned, you may not reckon that for payment; but all these you speak of, you do owe unto God.

Cap. 22. Man was set in paradise without sin, as it were for God, and betwixt God and the Divil, that he might overcome the Divil, by not consenting to his advice of sin; and for the excuse and honor of God, and for the confusion of the Divil; when he who was weaker did not sin on earth, though the Divil bade him, who being stronger, had sinned in heaven without any adviser; and seeing man might easily have done so, being straitned with no force, he willingly, upon onely perswasion, did suffer himself to be overcome at the will of the Divil, and contrary to the will and honor of God: Now judge thou, if it be not contrary to the honor of God, that man be reconciled unto him with the contumely of such dishonor against God, unless first he shall honor God, by overcoming the Divil, as he hath dishonored God when he was overcome by the Divil: Now the victory must be such, that as he being strong, and immortal in power, did easily consent unto the Divil to sin (whereby he justly fell under the punishment of mortality) so being infirm, and mortal, as he made himself by the difficulty of death, he should vanquish the Divil, that he commit no sin, which possibly he might have done, so long as he is conceived from the wound of sin, and born in sin: and because this is reason, and seemeth impossible, learn one thing more, without which man is not reconciled in righteousness, and yet is not impossible. Cap. 24. You have sought a reason, now hear a reason; I deny not that God is merciful, he saveth man and beasts; but we say of this highest mercy, whereby he maketh man blessed after this life, that he should give this mercy unto none, but onely unto him whose sins are forgiven; and this forgiveness should not be granted, but by payment of the debt which is owed for sin, according to the greatness of the sin; I think I have proved this sufficiently before: Now if you ask, How can man be saved, seeing he is not able to pay what he oweth? nor can he be saved, if he pay it not; or how can we maintain that God, who is rich in mercy, cannot shew his mercy above the reach of mans understanding? I say, you shall ask this question from them, who believe that Christ is not necessary unto the salvation of man; let them, in whose person you do speak, shew what way a man can be saved without Christ; and if they cannot do it, let them not jeer us any more, but come and joyn with us, who do not doubt but man may be saved by Christ; or let them despair that this can be done any way: and if this be horrible unto them, let them believe in Christ, as we do, that they may be saved, &c. This is a taste of these books, concerning the reasonableness of mans salvation by Christ, and of the doctrine professed in the days of Anselm.

Contentions
Kings and

10. Some things are remarkable in the conversation of this Anselm, he fell at variance with King William II. he sheweth the causes in an Epistle unto Hugo Bishop of Lions. First, He would seek a Palle from Pope Urban; and the King would not suffer him, seeing he did not acknowledge Urban for Pope. Secondly, Then Anselm craveth that a Synod of the Nation might be called, for reformation of some abuses in the Church; or that the King would cause some things to be amended, which in his judgement were wrong: the King did refuse both. Thirdly, The King required from the Bishop some Lands, non parvas, which Lanfrank had in possession for the use of Soldiers, and sub occasione cujusdam voluntariae justitiae; and at that time the Soldiers were dead, without children. The Bishop refuseth to render the Lands unto the King, nor will he, placitare, acknowledge the King for them. In these particulars he asketh Hugo's advice; and for his own opinion, he declareth, that seeing according to the decree of Rome, the Pope may deprive him, if he seek not his Palle within a year; and seeing the King is the Advocate of that Church, and now himself is the keeper of it, if he would consent consent unto the King in giving away these Lands, or in paying for them, his Successors were to be prejudged in time coming; therefore he chooseth rather to suffer the King's violence, and forsake his Bishoprick. In an Epistle unto Pope Paschalis he repeateth the same causes, and sheweth that all the Bishops of England did advise him to obey the King, and he would not, for respect unto the Apostolical See: and in time of his banishment, the King had taken all his goods, and the revenues of the Bishoprick, so that he was necessitated to live by the liberality of the Bishop of Lions: and he saith, that some had advised him to excommunicate the King, but the more prudent & rectum habentes consilium had dissuaded him, because he could not be both party and Judge; and he was advertised by his friends about the King, that the King would condemn his excommunication. So far there. The ancient Historians write, that this William turned Monasteries into Parks, and places of pleasure; and robbed Churches for his private gain; and often said, The bread of Christ is sweet unto Kings. In the year 1100. when he was hunting in a new Forest, a Soldier (whether by chance, or of purpose, it is uncertain) killed him with a dart, that he died immediately. Pa. Iov. in Angl. Reg. Chron. His Brother Robert was then at Jerusalem; and the younger Brother Henry was crowned. He wrote unto Anselm, excusing himself, that necessity had moved him to accept the royal blessing from another Bishop, and inviting him to return; and so Anselm did return: But their peace stood not long time; Pope Paschalis wrote unto Anselm, that it was decreed in his Consistory, that no Clergy-man should do homage unto a Lay-man, nor receive a Church, or any Church-benefice from the hand of a Lay-man, because it is the root of Simony. Upon this advertisement Anselm would accept no presentation from the King; and he degradeth all the Bishops, and Abbots, whom the King had promoted. The King said unto him, I have as great liberty in my Kingdom, as the Emperor hath in the Empire; and whosoever violateth the custom of the Realm, is a Traitor, and enemy unto me. Anselm fled away again to Rome; and when he was returning with warrant of Paschalis, the King's Attorney meeteth him in Flanders, and in his Masters name forbad him to enter the Land, unless he would faithfully promise to keep all the customs, both of his Father William, and his Brother. Mat. Par. in Hen. 1. At that time they were reconciled. Again, when Gerard Bishop of York died, Henry giveth that See unto his Chancellor Thomas: Anselm will not consent, unless he will acknowledge him as the onely Metropolitan; and he chargeth him to give Ecclesiastical obedience, according to former custom, or else he would discharge all the Bishops of the Kingdom, that they shall not consecrate him; nor acknowledge him, if he shall be consecrated by foreigners. Thomas would not acknowledge him in that maner, and sought consecration from Rome. Then Anselm wrote an Epistle unto Paschalis, praying that Thomas be not consecrated, until he profess due obedience unto him; and that the Pope would not give him a Palle; not (saith he) that I do envy him a Palle, but if he get one, he thinketh he may deny profession of obedience unto Canterbury; and so the Church of England shall be divided, and the rigor of Apostolical discipline shall be weakened, and he shall not abide in England. Shortly thereafter Anselm died. ann. 1110.

11. Moreover I have noted three Epistles of this Anselm; one unto Alexander King of Scots, wherein, after congratulation of his Succession, he saith, I know that your Highness loveth me, and desireth counsel; therefore first, I pray God that he would so direct you by the grace of his holy Spirit, and give you counsel in all your actions, that after this life he may bring you into the heavenly kingdom: And my counsel is, that you indeavor to hold fast

the fear of God, (by his help from whom you have received it) and those good maners which you began to have in your infancy, and youth-hood; for Kings do reign well, when they live according to the will of God, and serve him in fear; and when they rule themselves, nor are subject unto vices, but overcome the importunity, or tentations, by constant fortitude; for constancy of vertue, and royal fortitude, are not inconsistent in a King: for some Kings (as David) have lived holily, and ruled the people (committed unto them) with rigor of justice, and meekness of holiness, according to the exigence of things: do you so carry your self, that evil men may fear you, and the good may love you; and that your conversation may please God always; and you at all times remember the punishment of the wicked, and reward of the godly after this life. The Almighty God commit you, and all your actions, unto none other but his own dispensation. This is a rare counsel given by a Bishop (especially in these days) unto a King. In another Epistle unto Muriardach King of Ireland, he exhorteth him to amend with all earnestness, whatsoever he knoweth that in his Kingdom hath need to be amended, according to the Christian Religion, seeing God hath exalted him unto that Royal power for the end, that with the rod of righteousness he should govern his Subjects, and strike with that rod, and remove whatsoever is contrary unto righteousness: especially he lamenteth, that in that Countrey, men did put away their wives, and change one with another, each as they do exchange their horses, or any other thing at your pleasure. Another, that their Bishops had not Diocies, or appointed bounds; and were ordained one by one, even as any Presbyter; which (saith he) is contrary unto the holy Canons, which ordain certain bounds of superintpection, and that a Bishop should not be ordained by fewer then three Bishops. Out of this Epistle it appeareth, that first, The Magistrate is not excluded from Government of the Church, as the Popes did afterwards exclude them. Secondly, That all abuses could not be rooted out with the first plantation of Religion; and what is tolerated, at a time should be amended. Thirdly, That the Church of Ireland had not Diocesan Bishops (as they were wont to be called) from their first Reformation, nor was subject unto Rome at that time, but had such discipline as was then in Scotland. For confirmation of these points, add here by the by from Bernard in Vita Malachie in c. 6. he saith, At that time the Irish paid not Tithes, nor first-fruits; they had not lawful marriages; they made not confessions, nor did any seek or enjoyn penance; there were very few Ministers of the Altar. And in c. 7. he saith, A Bishoprick was not content with one Bishop, but every Church almost had its own Bishop; until (as it followeth there) Malchus, an Elder of Lesmore, and Gislebert (the first Legate of the Apostolical See in Ireland) perswaded the Bishops, and Princes there, to change their ancient custom. It is true, Bernard speaketh there of Ireland, as barbarous at that time; but, excepting that of the marriage, in all the other particulars, though they were not conformable unto the Church of Rome, yet they have many Reformed Churches conformable unto them at this time, even though the corrupt Romanists call them barbarous. But I return unto Anselm, in another Epistle unto Waleran Bishop of Nuemburgh, who had written, admiring what way so great diversity of Ceremonies had entered, seeing there is but one faith, one baptism, and one spouse of Christ; especially he admireth of the Rites in the Sacrament, diverse not onely from the perpetual custom in Germany, but likewise different from the ancient Roman order, &c. Anselm answereth (in Thesi. concerning indifferent ceremonies) well, saying, Your reverence complaineth of the Sacraments of the Church, because they are not administred in all places after one maner:

Ireland.Of Ceremonies.

Truly it were good and laudable, if they were performed through all the Church after one maner, and with one minde; but because there is great diversity, nor differing in the substance of the Sacrament, nor in the vertue thereof, nor in the faith, nor can they all be brought to one custom, I think they should be tolerated in peace, and love, rather then be condemned with jars, and scandal: for we have learned from the holy Father, if the unity of love be kept in the Catholique faith, diversity of custom hindereth not. But where you ask, Whence hath that variety of custom come? I know no other but the diversity of mens opinions; which albeit they differ not in the substance of things, and in unity, yet agree not in the expediency, and decency of administration; because one judgeth this fitter, another thinketh it not so fit; nor think I, that difference in such things, is any straying from the truth.

12. William the Conqueror wrote unto Pope Gregory VII. thus; Hubert your Legate, Religious Father, coming unto me, hath admonished me, as from you, that I should do fealty unto you, and your Successors; and that I should bethink my self of the money which my predecessors were wont to send unto the Church of Rome: I have accepted of the one, and not the other: I would not acknowledge fealty, nor will I do it; because, neither have I promised it, nor do I finde, that my predecessors performed it unto yours. The Pope returned answer unto his Legate, which is in Gregorii VII. Regist. li. 7. ep. 5. tom. 5. concil. edit. Binii. Where after signification how little he doth value money, without due honor, he saith of the King, There be many things the holy Roman Church may lay to his charge, seeing no Pagan King hath attempted that against the See Apostolique, which he hath not been ashamed to do. Hence it appeareth, that the Popes were always busie to seek their advantage in troubled waters, and sometimes with little speed. Whereas before the Sheriff, and Bishop, kept their Court together, King William gave unto the Bishops an entire jurisdiction by themselves, to judge all causes relating to Religion. This was the first Spiritual Court in England; and henceforth the Spiritual Power began to transcend the Secular Courts.

CENTURY XII.

CHAP. I.

OF EMPERORS.

1. HENRY V. after the death of his father, inviteth Pope Paschalis to come unto Ausburgh, for redressing some former tumults: Now Paschalis becometh the more haughty, and in the way assembleth a Synod at Guardistella, where, preveening the Diet at Ausburgh, he reneweth the Acts of Pope Gregory VII. concerning the Investiture of Bishops; he setteth up, and putteth down Bishops at his pleasure, because (said he) in the casket of the Roman high Priests breast, all Laws are contained; and now men must speak more considerately with him, and account all his words as Laws; whatsoever dare lift up it self against the high Priest, must be beaten to dust. This was strange news unto the Emperor, who was confident that the Pope would make no novations without his advice. Paschalis got intelligence of this disgust, and therefore stayed his journey, and appointeth another Synod at Treca, intending to accurse the Emperor. The Emperor preventeth him, and assembleth a Synod at Mentz, for staying the Pope's attempts. In the mean time Paschalis requireth oath of all the Bishops assembled at Treca, that they shall continue constant with the Roman See; and he excommunicateth particularly, and by name, all the Bishops at Mentz. On the other side Henry alledgeth, that the Scepter was come into his hand from God; and therefore, according to the custom, and Laws of his Ancestors, he would not suffer the prerogatives of the Republique to fail in his person: but these Popes think on nothing but the ruine of the Empire, and the drawing of Christian people under their yoke; they had deceived him in his rude and tender years, in setting him against his dearest Father, and now they conspire against himself; nor will they stay their ambition, until they have robbed all others of their dignities and honors: These and other reasons he caused to be published; and concluded thus, Albeit I be able, both by right and arms to defend all these customs, that have been established by so many holy Fathers, and maintained through so many ages, yet I would willingly acquit my self of the Papal Synods, if Monks, Priests, and Bishops, would restore unto me the sinews of the Empire, to wit, the Revenues, Cities, Towns, Regalities, Castles, and in a word, give unto Cæsar what appertaineth unto Cæsar, and they remain contented with their Tithes, serving God, and caring for his people. Paschalis demandeth, that the whole matter continue undiscussed till the next year 1110. and in the mean time that there be no innovation, that is, the Emperor shall meddle with nothing then in controversie. The next year Henry goeth with 30000. horse, besides Italians, towards Rome; wheresoever he came, he was received as Emperor: At Sutrio the Legates of Paschalis shew him, that the Pope is willing to Crown him, if he will establish the Liberties of the Church, discharge all Laick Investitures, and take from the Church all the Dukedoms, Marque-ships, Counties, Advocations, Coyns, Taxes, and other Royalties: The Emperor consenteth, (saith Naucier after Gosfred) and with joy marched to Rome, and kissed the Pope's foot, at St. Peters, on the steps, and went in together. When all were set, and the Emperor came unto the altar, to receive the Communion from the Pope, he saith, Lord Emperor, the body of our Lord, that was born of the Virgin Mary, and suffered for us on the Cross, as the Church believeth, I give to day unto thee, for confirmation of true peace betwixt me and thee. Some days thereafter, the Emperor intreateth the Pope, that he would not deprive the Bishops, who had before received Investiture from him: The Pope refuseth: they come to hotter words; and then was such a stir, that if the Emperor had not defended himself with his own hands, he had been slain: in the end (as it pleased God) among many Romans that were slain, and taken, he taketh the Pope, and carrieth him out of the City, and indenteth with him, both for his Coronation, and the Investitures in times following; especially, that all Abbots, and Bishops, should take their Investiture from the Emperor, per virgam & annulum, and their consecration from other Bishops as formerly; and no Bishops shall be consecrated, until first they have received Investiture from the Emperor; except onely those, who formerly were wont to receive Investiture from the Roman Bishop, or any other Archbishop. Both parties did swear thus, As this part of the lively body is divided, [they were at Mass] so let him be divided from the Kingdom of Christ, who shall violate these articles. The Emperor was crowned in Rome, and returned with joy into Germany. Within a few moneths, Paschalis calleth a Synod at Lateran; he revoketh the former articles, and affirmeth that agreement to have been made onely for the freedom of some captives; and he went about to excommunicate the Emperor: wherefore Adelbert Bishop of

Mentz;

Mentz, and sundry others in Germany rebelled : But the Emperor prevaieth, and held Adelbert in prison three years. In the year 1118. Henry went towards Rome; Paschalis hearing that he was approaching, and having offended some chief Citizens, fled unto Pulia : In his absence, the Emperor would be crowned again by Maurice Bishop of Bracara, to shew unto the world, that he acknowledgeth not his Crown to be received from the Pope. Then he returned into Germany, and Paschalis into Rome, where within few days he died. Gelasius renewed the sentence against the Emperor; wherefore he marched the third time to Rome : the Pope flieth, and the Emperor causeth to be choose Gregory VIII. and recommendeth him unto the family of Frangepanes. At this time the Bishops of Germany stir up the Saxons against the Emperor, in behalf of Pope Gelasius, and then of Calixtus, and fought an open battel in February ann. 1122. At last Henry, despairing of peace, unless he would yield unto the proud Prelate, he renounceth his former priviledge of Investitures, in the time of Calixtus. All this time he had hard fortune, and did acknowledge Divine Justice in revenging his rebellion against his Father; He reigned twenty years, and died without succession. In the days of Henry IV. Alexius Comnenus was Emperor of Constantinople; at first he envied the expedition of the Latins, yet their first victory may be (under God) ascribed unto his aid. His Son Calo Johannes was an excellent Prince, liberal, a lover of justice, and victorious in Europe against the Scythians, and Huns; and in Asia against the Turks, and Saracens; and recovered many Lands, which his Ancestors had lost : The Venetians took sundry Islands in the Archipelagus from him; and from that time they keep Creta. Pe. Maxia, when he was sick, he calleth his friends, and Nobles together, and setting his yonger Son Manuel before them, he said, I had other hope, then now you see, O Romans, when I came into Syria; I thought to have gone beyond the limits of my Ancestors, and to have washed securely in Euphrates, and to have seen the river Tigris, and to have subdued all the adversaries about Cilicia, or who have made apostasie unto the Agarenes; and I thought to have, like an eagle, (this may seem a presumptuous word) flown into Palæstina, (where Christ, having stretched forth his hands on the Crofs, hath by his death restored the ruine of our nature, and by his drops hath united all the world) and to have gone up unto the mountain of God, as the Psalmist speaketh, and to have stood in that holy place, and to have invaded the enemies round about it; as sometimes the Barbarians had taken the Ark, so they have often taken the Lord's sepulchre : But because I am disappointed, (for what cause, the Lord knoweth) I can do no otherwise; nor am I unwilling to yield unto the things which ye see approaching; for who is wiser then God? who shall fathom his minde? or change his judgements, by adding, or impairing? for the thoughts of men are changeable, but God's purpose is not vain, or variable : And seeing God hath bestowed many benefits on me, yea, which scarcely can be told; in your audience, as my witnesses, I with a thankful heart do proclaim the bountifulness of God toward me. My Father was Emperor, I have succeeded in the throne, and have lost nothing that I received; but whether I have encreased the talent which God hath committed unto me, I leave that to the censure of others; howbeit, without offence, and ostentation, but to the praise of God's miraculous providence, I may say this, Both West, and East, have seen me in arms; I have not been afraid of the Nations in both the Continents: short while was I in my Palace; I have spent my time, for the most part, under pavilions, and have delighted under the vault of heaven: this Land where now we are encamped, hath seen me twice: for a long time the Persians, and Arabans, have neither feared nor seen a Roman Army; but, as it hath pleased God, they have given over many Cities unto us his servant, which as yet we do possess, and they do obey our commands. God grant that I, who have fought for Christian people, may attain the eternal inheritance, which the humble, and those who are accepted of God, shall possess; and the same God give strength, and success unto your endeavors against these bloody people, which call not on the holy name of our God: And so it shall be, if you acknowledge that the success is in the hand of the most High; and by his blessing ye shall have a Governor, who shall not be cruel, vain-glorious, fullen, nor a slave to his belly; or who cannot be drawn from his palace, more then a painted image from its colours; for as is the disposition of the Ruler, so are all things almost ruled, seeing he hath a great influence on them; if he be naughty, they decay; or if he have spirits, they do flourish: because, as David teacheth, God blesteth the godly, and with the froward, he dealeth frowardly. And seeing I am to speak of the Successor of the Empire after my death (which now inevitably approacheth) I wish ye may hearken unto me; To shew how the Empire came unto me, it is not more necessary to declare, then to hold up a lamp at noon; for seeing ye have consented unto the Father's will, and ye are equally affected toward my Sons, being ready to obey one of the two, Isaacius, and Manuel; and they also have submitted themselves unto my will: It is true, Nature is wont to bestow the Government on the eldest; but I have observed, that in designation of Kings, God hath often taken another course. Ye know that Isaac was yonger then Ismael, Jacob came forth after Esau, Moses was yonger then Aaron, David was the yongest of his Brethren, and many more; for God is not a respecter of persons, after the maner of men, nor judgeth he by years; but he regardeth the frame of the heart, and especially humility, and meekness: And therefore in many occurrents, I have not followed corrupt nature, but, despising the custom thereof in more weighty affairs, I would rather follow God, who is free from all depraved affection. Now, if without all scruple, the Government were to be given unto my elder Son Isaacius, it were needless to speak of their conditions; but seeing I incline unto my yonger Son Manuel, to prevent the wrong suspicions of the vulgar sort, that I do prefer the yonger before the elder, through affection rather then judgement, it is requisite I speak a word of my motives: There is no more unity of affections, then of forms; which have great variety, though we all are men equally; some are thus set, and all do not take pleasure in one thing; seeing otherwise, neither God would accuse any of us, nor could we be blamed one by another, for we would all be necessitated unto the same conceits, and follow the same purposes: So my two Sons, though they have one Father, yet have they not the same minde; albeit they both be eminent in strength of body, comeliness of countenance, and gravity of carriage, yet unto me it seemeth, that Manuel is fitter for the Government; for Isaacius hath been rash in my sight often; and being commoved upon a light occasion, could not rule his passion; and such anger is a great enemy to wisdom, yea, hath undone many (otherwise) good men: But the other, besides a multitude of other vertues, which Isaacius also hath, can yield at a time, and follow the command of reason; and therefore, seeing in the uprightness of heart, which the King, and Prophet David doth commend, we think men should obey a judicious minde, rather then a strong hand. I have determined that Manuel shall be Emperor; wherefore accept ye the yonger man as Emperor, ordained of God, and entring into Government by my sentence; as ye have many predictions, that he is advanced, and ordained of God--- which if ye will consider, ye shall finde, that I have not without reason designed him to succeed unto me, but hereby have answered unto his vertue, &c. Nice. Chronat. Annal.

2. CONRADE III. the Sister-son of Henry V. and Duke of Suevia, strove for the Empire; but many Papalines in Germany (as they had been enemies to Henry) were against him; and Pope Honorius causeth Lotharius Duke of Saxony to be chosen Emperor; and he prevailed, and was Crowned by Pope Innocentius. He subdued many Cities in Italy, which had usurped liberty; as also he overthrew Roger King of Sicilies, he drove him out of Italy; and gave his Lands of Pulia, and Calabria, unto his Cousin Reynold, with the Title of Duke. The Pope was not content, and pretended that these Dominions appertain unto St. Peter: so variance was like to arise betwixt Lotharius, and the Pope, but the difference was composed; so Reynold took his badge, and Title from them both. This Lotharius caused the Civil Laws to be reduced into a method, which were almost forgotten; he commanded them to be read in Schools, and pleas to be determined by them. Since the days of Charles the Great, no Emperor had done greater exploits in Italy; he suppressed the rebellious in Cremona, Pavia, Bononia, &c. he had curbed the Popes, and had recovered the privilege of Investing Prelates, if he had not been perswaded by Bernard. He died not far from Trent, ann. 1138. Then Conrade was sole Emperor, against the minde of the Pope, and was confirmed by his Legate. He was vexed by Henry Duke of Bavier, who had married the onely Daughter of Lotharius, and aimed at the Empire. At that time the fourth King of Jerusalem, Fulco, was in great danger of the Persians, who had taken the famous City Edessa; and the Saracens were besieging Antiochia: wherefore Pope Eugenius by his Letters, and Bernard by words, perswade the Emperor to go into Palestina: as Lewes King of France was ready, they both went, but did no good unto Baldwin the Successor of Fulco. Manuel the Eastern Emperor was blamed for their unlucky success; he promised them victuals, but disappointed them; and sent traitorous guides with them. At this time began the long continued, and troublesome factions of Gwelphs, or Welphs, and Gibelines; that is, Papalines, and Imperialists: the one faction had their name from Welpho, a Duke of Bavier, and Brother of Henry, with whom the Pope conspired; and the other from Henry, Son and General to the Emperor; and so named from a Village where he was born. By the procurements of the Popes, these factions waxed so, that all the Towns, and people of Italy, bragged in one of these two names. Ann. 1152. Conrade was poysoned by his Physician, hired thereunto (as was suspected) by Roger King of Sicilie; he gave the Imperial Ensigns unto his Brothers Son Frederick; and recommended his yong Son unto him, the elder Brother Henry being desunct.

3. FREDERICK I. (surnamed Barbarossa, or Red-beard) attained the Crown without any contradiction; he was endowed with all excellencies of body and minde. The Romans were taking of their ancient liberty, and of a free Government under Consules; and they sent unto the new Emperor, promising to consent unto his Coronation, if he would consent unto their former liberty; seeing they should not be subject unto Germans, who had received their honor from the Romans. The Emperor, partly in anger, and partly in disision, writeth, saying, They had been Romans, as they boast, but now no footsteps of their ancient State appeareth, it being altogether wasted, [behold the wound of the first Beast!] first by Charles, and then by Otho the Great; and that old Common-wealth was translated into Germany, and there are Consules, Senatores, & Equites: They were deceived in thinking the Germans had received the Empire from them; for it was not given by the Romans, but conquered by the arms of Charles, whom certainly they in their necessity had implored for their defense from the Tyrants Desiderius, and Berengarius, [it was not therefore a gift of the Pope] and therefore it was not convenient, that they prescribe unto their Emperor. This Letter exasperateth them, so that the Emperor must march toward Rome. Pe. Maxia. Pope Hadrian was ill intreated by them, and vexed by the Castellanes; and now hearing of his coming, went to Sutrio to meet him. When the Emperor saw the Pope, he lighted from his horse to receive him; and held his stirrop and bridle on the left side; the Pope sheweth himself a little angry, because he should have done it on the right side: when the trench-men reported his words unto the Emperor, he laughingly excused himself, that he was not accustomed to hold stirrops; and seeing he had done so much of curtesie, and not of duty, less matter it was what side he held. The next day, to make amends unto the Bishop, he inviteth him, and received him, holding the stirrop on the right side. When they came to Rome, the Pope sheweth how his Ancestors had left some special token unto the See of St. Peter: and he intreateth him to take in from William, King of Sicilie, the Dutchy of Pulia, especially Beneventi, Ceperano, and Banco, unto the See; which if he would promise to do, he was ready on the other side to perform all duty unto him; The Emperor being advised by the Princes, promiseth to do all that was required, and the next day was Crowned: In time of the Coronation, the Citizens shut the gates, and slew a great number of the Germans within the City: the Emperor was called out of the Church, he brake open the gates, brought in his army, slew many Romans, and took others captive: by intercession of the Pope, a reconciliation was made, and the Captives were set free. Platin. Then the Emperor returned into Germany, and having prepared an army against Sicilie, he promised to make speed again. In the mean time the Greek Emperor Manuel had covenanted with the Pope to expel William out of Sicilies, and Manuel should have the three Sea-ports of Pulia. He sent an army, and William overthrew them, and the Pope's forces, both together, and took the Pope captive, and caused him to confirm his Title of both Sicilies, upon condition that he should not trouble the Church-Lands in time coming. Platin. Then the Emperor began to consider, how the Popes had abused his Ancestors, had extorted from them the privilege of Investing Prelates; and now this Bishop had deluded himself, in confirming King William in that Land, which appertaineth unto the Empire; therefore he began to require homage, and oath of fidelity of all the Bishops: and he commanded, that none of the Pope's Legates be received without his licence; and that none of Germany make appealation to Rome. What more stir was then, may be gathered from the Pope's Letter, accusing and threatning, and Frederick's Answer. The Pope wrote thus, Hadrian Bishop, the servant of God's servants, unto Frederick the Roman Emperor, greeting, and Apostolical blessing; As Divine Law promiseth length of days unto them which honor their parents, so it denounceth death unto them who curse father, or mother; and we are taught by the voice of truth, that each who exalteth himself, shall be made low: wherefore, beloved Son in the Lord, we admire not a little at your prudence, that thou seemest not to give that reverence unto blessed Peter, and the holy Roman Church, as it becometh thee; For in thy Letters sent unto us, thou putttest thy name before ours, wherein thou art guilty of insolency. I will not say arrogancy. What shall I speak of thy fidelity, promised and sworn unto blessed Peter, and us? how dost thou observe it, when thou requirest requirest homage of them which are God's, and all the children of the most High, to wit, the Bishops? of them thou cravest fidelity; and their sacred hands doest thou tie unto thy hands; and being openly contrary unto us, thou shuttest not onely the Churches, but the Cities of thy Kingdom against the Cardinals that are Legates from our side. Repent therefore, repent, we advise thee, because, seeing thou hast received from us Consecration, and the Crown, we fear thy nobleness, that thou shalt lose what is granted, while thou huntest after what is not granted. The Emperor replieth thus, Frederick, The Emperors reply. by the grace of God Roman Emperor semper Augustus, unto Hadrian high Priest of the Catholique Church, that he may cleave unto all things which Jesus began to do and teach. The Law of righteousness restoreth unto each one, what is his own: We derogate not from our parents, unto whom, within this Kingdom, we render all due honor; from whom, to wit, from our Ancestors we have received the Dignity, and Crown. It is known, that in the days of Constantine, Silvester had not any Royalty; but by the grant of his godliness, liberty was given unto the Church, and peace restored: and whatsoever Royalty your Papacy is known to possess, you have attained by the liberality of Princes. Therefore when we write unto the high Priest of Rome, by right, and according to custom, we set first our name; and according to equity, we yield the like unto him writing unto us: turn over the Histories, and if you have forgot what you have read, you may finde there what we assert. And from these which are God's by adoption, and possess our Royalties, why should we not require homage, and regal oaths? seeing he, which is our and your teacher, though he received nothing from any man, or King, but gave all good things unto all; gave unto Cæsar tribute for himself, and for Peter; and gave unto you an example that ye should do so; and hath taught you, saying, Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart: therefore let them leave the Royal things unto us, or if they think them profitable, let them render unto God what is God's, and unto Cæsar what is Cæsars. Unto your Cardinals indeed the Churches are shut, and the Cities are not open; because we see, they are not Preachers, but plunderers; not seekers of peace, but robbers of money; not reformers of the world, but insatiable rakers of gold; but when we shall see that they are such as the Church requireth, bringing peace, enlightening the Countrey, and helping the humble in equity, we shall not fail to sustain them with necessary stipends, and provision. As for humility (which is the mother of virtues) and meekness, ye are guilty, when unto secular persons you propound such questions, as concern not Religion: wherefore let your fatherhood provide, lest while you move such things which we think not fitting, you give offence unto such, as are ready to shut their ears against your words, as they which are wearied of unreasonable rain. We cannot but answer unto these things that we have heard, when we see the detestable beast of pride to have crept into the seat of Peter. Provide better for the peace of the Church, and ever farewell. Naucler. gener. 39. This answer did so sting the Pope, and the Cardinals, that they conspire with the forenamed William, and many Cities of Italy, and endeavor by all means to make the Emperor odious unto all men: Especially the Pope wrote unto the Bishops Electors, that the German Emperor had received his Title from his Predecessors, and now he had power over all Nations, to throw down, and build up, and give and translate Kingdoms, &c. And he made a league among the Cardinals, that after his death, none should be chosen but one of them, who shall be obliged to pursue the Prince with excommunication, and arms, till they got the upper hand; and that none should seek the Emperors favor, without the consent of them all. On the other side the

Emperor sent Letters throughout the Empire, regranting and accusing the pride of the Pope, as being contrary unto God (who hath ordained two Governments, one spiritual, another temporal) and unto Peter (exhorting all men to fear God, and honor the King) & now, by setting himself above the Emperor, would make a Schism in the Church; and therefore they would so look to the Imperial Dignity, that it be not prejudged by the new presumption of the Pope, as he himself was careful of the liberty and unity of the Church. The Pope fretteth the more, and wrote anew unto the Princes of Germany, willing them to work against the Emperor what they could. Arnold Bishop of Mentz, and Eberhard Bishop of Salisburgh reply, submitting themselves unto the Pope, but excusing the Emperor, exhorting him to use more modesty in his Ambassies: What stir there followed in the election of the Pope, I refer unto its place. Frederick had much ado with the Gwelph Cities (as the Papalines were then called) and subdued many of them; especially he brought Millain to ruine. Pope Alexander finding no security in the Continent, fled unto Venice. Here followeth variance among the writers; Platina, and some others say, that the Emperor was forsaken by his own Army, that he was necessitated to go into Venice, and kiss the Pope's foot. Di. Peta. in Rati. par. 1. lib. 8. saith, He was discomfited unawares, and so brought under. Others write, that the Emperor had purpose to follow the Pope, but first he would be secure of Rome; and in the mean time he sent an Army under the command of his Son Otho, against the Venetians, and charged him to attempt nothing until he himself came; nevertheless, the young man, more hardy then wise, joyneth with the Venetians, and being taken, was carried unto the Pope, at Venice. The Pope would not dismiss him, unless the Father would submit himself; and so the Emperor, for love of his Son, yieldeth. Then (as all the writers agree) in St. Marks at Venice, Frederick kneeled at the Pope's feet, expecting no new insolency from the humble servant of servants; but the man of pride setteth his foot upon the Emperor's neck, and said, It is written, Thou shalt walk upon the Serpent, and upon the Basalisk. The Emperor saith, Not unto thee, but to blessed Peter; The Pope again, Both to me, and to Peter: The Emperor fearing a new jar, held his peace; And they agreed, That first Alexander should be acknowledged as only Pope. Secondly, That the Emperor should restore all that he had purchased in time of the Schism. Such was the fatal superstition of these times, holding mens mindes in darknes; and now the Bishop is where he would be, not (as before) on mens shoulders, but upon the Emperor's neck; and hath got it, not by piety, but---- And the Emperor being made subject in this maner, returneth into Germany, bewailing his misfortune ann. 1177. In the year 1184. he brought Constantia, the onely childe of William King of Sicilies, into Germany, and married her to his Son Henry: when they were Crowned at Mentz, there was so great conflux of people, that the City was not sufficient to contain them; and the Emperor caused to be set up a spacious house, for the time, without the walls. The Pentecost was the day of the solemnity; When the Emperor was in the Church, with many Princes of both Estates, and had set the Bishop of Mentz on his right hand, and the Bishop of Colein on the left, the Abbot of Fulda demandeth the seat on the Emperor's left hand, where the Bishop of Colein was sitting: Many (saith Al. Crantz. in Saxon. lib. 6. c. 46.) do remember that this was done in that place: The Elector thought it a disparagement to give place unto an Abbot; The Emperor being required to determine the matter, said, We do approve, as we should do, the ancient customs of the Empire, but for this purpose we think it indifferent. The Elector hearing him, riseth up, and saith, Seeing, O Sovereign Majesty

Bishop and an Abbot.

Majesty, your will commandeth so, I, an Arch-Bishop, give place unto an Abbot; an Electoral Prince, unto a Monk: but, by your leave, I will be gone: And when he had so said, he went away. The Count Palatin of Rhine, the Emperor's Brother, and the Count of Nassau followed him, but first said, Sovereign Emperor, by your leave, we follow him, and do acknowledge his benefits, which we have received. Lewes, Prince of Thuringia, said unto the Count of Nassau, (because he held something of the Abbot) You deserve well of your Lord, who forsaketh him to day, and followeth another. He answered, For the benefit which I hold of him, I will give obeysance in due time; and to day I will follow him with whom I came hither, and is equally the Lord of a few which I have; The same did the Duke of Brabant. When so many seats were emptied, King Henry was displeased, and embracing the Arch-Bishop in his arms, entreating him earnestly, that he would not begin so solemn a day with sadness, nor move a stir in so great a convention of the Princes; that he would continue in his seat, and not darken the joy of the Coronation with such a cloud of wrath. Then said the Emperor, Seeing one word doth so offend you, I wish that I had not spoken it; albeit I acknowledge not that I have spoken anything otherwise then became my place; but take heed, lest by healing of a little ach, you make a deeper wound in the body; for such is your wisdom, you know what it is to divide such an assembly. Then the Arch-Bishop said chafingly, Your Imperial Majesty would have rewarded me well to day, for the many services that I have followed, and performed for you; I am become hoar-headed in your pitched pavilions; I have vexed Italy; I have fought against Lombardie; I have caused Brunswick to sweat, and bleed: this is my great reward, that in the assembly of the Princes, I should be dashed for an Abbot, who had not attempted such a thing, if he knew not the secret favor of the Cæsarean Majesty: But if you, O Cæsar, and the King, will have me to remain, let our seats be as they were; if the Abbot will displace me, let him climb up into the clouds, and set his seat in the north, and be like unto the most High. But the Bishop, having notice of what the Abbot intended to do, brought with him 4,000. armed men, and more; and certainly they had fallen to blows, if the stir had continued. Then said the Emperor, Arch-Bishop, seeing you have taxed me of secret correspondence in this business, with the Abbot, I am ready to give my oath, that I am not accessory to this fault. And when it appeared that he was ready to give his oath, the Bishop said, The word of your Cæsarean Majesty, is unto me sufficient for an oath. Then the Emperor turning unto the Abbot, (because he saw, that not a few Princes were ready to draw swords for him) said, Father, you must have a little patience, without prejudice of your right, lest any more trouble do overcloud this solemn day. The Abbot was a little ashamed, and took the lower seat. Then was the King and Queen Crowned. About that time Saladin, Sultan of Egypt, prevailed mightily in the East, and

ann. 1187. he took Jerusalem: The Christians kept the Title, King of Jerusalem, and some Towns in Asia, the space of 100. years, and more; and many Princes went thither, but never possessed Jerusalem, except that short time when the Emperor Frederick II. was in it, as followeth. Barbarossa was moved to go thither: he was hindered by Isaacius the Greek Emperor, and therefore did sundry affronts unto him, both in Thracia, and Asia; as also he conquered Iconium from the Turks; and so great was his glory, that his Army was called Invincible; and none durst resist him, saith Nicetas li. 2. de Isaac. Who also testifieth, that this Emperor did forbid the worship of Images; and did use unleavened bread in the Sacrament; for which causes, and some other such things, the Armenians did welcome the Almans into

Asia as their friends. On a day, when he was hunting with the Lord of Armenia, he went into an unknown river to water his horse, he fell into the water, to the irreparable loss of all Christendom, saith Naucler; for Saladan was so afraid of him, that he left Syria, and intended to retire with all the Turks into Egypt. Thus (saith he) died that Emperor ann. 1190. one so glorious, and who had in his time enlarged the Empire, that after Charles the Great, none was to be compared unto him in honor of exploits. His Son Conrade took the Government of the Army, and recovered Antiochia, Cœlosyria, Laodicea, &c. and died ann. 1191. Manuel in the 38. year of his reign, left his young Son Alexius Emperor, and recommended him unto his Cousin-German Andronicus; at first he shewed himself a good Tutor of his Pupil; then he carried equal sway; and lastly, like a shameless Traitor, murdered him within three years after his Fathers death: but the Princes took him, and punished him many ways: and Isaacius Angelus, next in kindred, was Emperor. In the time of this Andronicus, the Sicilians came into Greece; without resistance they possessed Thessalie, Amphipolis, and made towards Constantinople. Isaacius sent Branas against them, and he came upon them unawares: at first the Greeks were unwilling to fight; but being encouraged by Branas, they partly slew, and fully chased all the Sicilians out of Greece. Nicet. Choni. Likewise at that time the Turks had invaded the Eastern part of that Empire; and the Myfi usurped liberty: as also the Bulgarians, and the above-named Branas, made an insurrection, aiming at the Empire, but was killed: And after him others did usurp the Title; so unfortunate, and worthless, was Isaacius. And one Isaacius Comnenus usurped the Kingdom of Cyprus; nor was the Greek Emperor able to expel him, until Edward King of England (intending for Jerusalem) came and took him, and gave him as a Captive to one of his Subjects: he possessed all the Island, and at his returning home, he gave it as his proper gift unto the King of Jerusalem, Nicet. li. 2. de Isaac. Isaacius was dethroned by his Brother Alexius ann. 1190.

4. HENRY VI. the second Son of Frederick, hearing that his Father was dead, and fearing that his elder Brother would return unto the Crown, fought the Empire miserably. First, He restoreth unto Henry Duke of Saxony, and others which had rebelled against his Father, all that his Father had taken from them: Then he sent unto the Pope Clemens, and Cardinals, promising in all things to confirm the Laws, and Liberties of the Church, if they would grant him their consent. Clemens, with advice, assigneth him the time of Easter in the next year to his Coronation; but Clemens died sooner. When Henry came at the appointed time, with his new Empress Constantia, the Romans receive him with a few persons, but would not admit his Army. Then Pope Celestin standing on the steps, before the door of St. Peter's, took an oath of Henry, that he shall defend the See of St. Peter, he shall repair whatsoever hath been diminished from it, especially he shall surrender unto the Church of Rome, the Cities Tusculo, &c. and expel Tancred, the base Son of Roger, out of both Sicilies, (which Kingdom appertained unto his Wife, the onely Daughter of King William) reserving the pension that belongeth unto the Pope, in the name of few. These Articles being so granted, they go into the Church, and Henry was Crowned in this manner; The Pope sitting in his Chair, held the Crown betwixt his feet; the Emperor boweth down his head unto the Pope's feet; the Pope setteth on the Crown with his feet, and by and by struck it off again with his foot to the ground; thereby declaring, that he had power to take it from him if he shall so deserve: Then the Cardinals took up the Crown, and set it on the Emperors head. And thencethenceforth the Emperor is but the image of the old Emperors, as Cumm. Ventura in Theſor. Polit. at that Title, Quomodo Imperium à Pontifice dependet, ſaith, They do ſtray very far, who diſtinguiſh not the now Empire, from the old Roman Empire; for the old received no beginning from the high Priests, but the Pope was revered as the Vicar [or rather Minister] of Chriſt, and head of the Church: and they do erre (ſaith he) who diſcern not the preſent Empire, from the Empire of Charles the Great, &c. When the Coronation was ended, the Pope ſent immediately unto Tuſculum, and made it level to the ground, to be example unto others, that they preſume not againſt the Chair of St. Peter. Platin. Henry undertook wars againſt Tancred, but ſoon left off, becauſe the plague had entered into his Army: After two years Tancred dieth; and Henry got the Kingdom after ſome ſkirmiſhes, and ſeverity uſed againſt ſome rebellious. At that time the truce of five years, which Richard King of England had made with Saladin, were expired; wherefore Pope Coeleftin did ſolicite the Princes, eſpecially the Emperor, that they would not forget the Conqueſt of Jeruſalem, ſeeing ſo fit an occaſion of peace at home was offered, and Saladin was lately dead. The Emperor pretendeth infirmity, and ſent a great Army with the Dukes of Saxony, and Auſtria, and ſome Biſhops. At this time Almarik King of Cyprus married Iſobel the Widow-Queen of Jeruſalem, and he was called King of Cyprus, and Jeruſalem: He had no minde to the wars, and therefore the Title, King of Jeruſalem, was given to John de Bregna, a man of great valor, and Son in Law unto the ſame Iſobel: The Germans joyning with him, were Maſters of the field for a ſpace; they took Berito, and re-edified Japha, or Joppe. In the mean time Henry made greater Conqueſts in Italy, then the Pope deſired, taking ſome Lands, and Cities, which the Pope did alledge to appertain unto his See. Then he became ſick at Meſſina, and cauſed his Son Frederick (aſyet lying in the cradle) to be elected King of the Romans, and of both Sicilies; and recommended him unto his Brother Duke of Suevia, and unto Pope Innocentius; and he died ann. 1198. Alexius reigned at Conſtantinople with great miſfortune.

CENTURY XII.

CHAP. II.

Of P O P E S.

1. PASCHALIS II. was choſen ann. 1099. at his Election the people cried, St. Peter hath choſen good Rainer (that was his name;) then he put on a purple veſture, and a tiare on his head, and riding on a white palfrey, was led unto the Lateran Palace, by the people and Clergy; there a Scepter was given him, and a girdle put about him with ſeven keys, and ſeven ſeals, in token of his ſeven-fold power, to wit, of binding, looſing, ſhutting, opening, ſealing, reſigning, and judging. He had open field of his Anti-Pope Clemens III. and put him to flight. Not long after Clemens died, when he had ſat 21. years. Then Richard Earl of Campania, cauſed Albert to be inſtalled for Clemens; but he ſaw no appearance of quietneſs, and forſook his Papacy within four moneths. At Preveſte another was ſet up, whom they called Silveſter III. he deſpairing of ſo great honor, would be an Anchorite within 105. days. A fourth Roman was ſet up; but he was alſo forſaken. So Paſchalis, being alone, ſet his heart to enlarge Peter's patrimony: he besiedgeth some Cities belonging unto the Emperor; and raised the Son of Henry V. against the Father. The Popes were wont to date all their Writs, from the year of the Emperor; but now Paschalis beginneth with the year of his Papacy: He sate eighteen years, and six moneths, in continual sedition.

2. GLASIUS II. had his neck thrown, and was trampled under foot, before he was Crowned; for Cincius Patricius Romanus would have had another elected; and the Emperor set up Gregory VIII. and went to de-thrown Gelasius; who fled from place to place, till he came to Cluniak, where he died within a year.

3. CALLISTUS II. was set up by the Cardinals at Cluniak, but would not accept till he knew the consent of the Cardinals at Rome: Before he entered the City, he sent a Nuntio to excommunicate the Emperor in Germany. He had many bouts with Gregory VIII. and at last thrust him into a Monastery. Then began the controversie betwixt the Imperialists, and Papalines, whether the Emperor, or Pope, did excel in dignity? Reasons were alledged on both sides: but for brevity I omit the one; and that the pride of the man of sin may be known, here are the other in rime:

Sic dans regnare, quod Petro subjiciare:
Ius etenim nobis Christus utrumque dedit.
Spiritus & corpus mihi sunt subjecta potenter,
Corpore terrena teneo, caelestia mente,
Vnde tenendo solum, solvo liquoque polum.
Æthera pandere, cœlica tangere Papa videtur.
Nam dare, tollere, necesse, solvere cuncta meretur:
Cui dedit omne decus lex nova, lexque vetus.
Annulus & baculus, quamvis terrena putentur,
Sunt de jure poli quæ significare videntur.
Respice jura Dei, mens tua cedat ei.*

The Emperor was fain to yield, and triumph was made at Rome, when the peace was concluded, fifty years after the discord began betwixt Henry IV. and Gregory VII. Then Callistus assembled a Synod at Lataran, for the support of Jerusalem; and there was a Decree, that none may dissent from the doctrine of the Church of Rome; because, as the Son came to do the Father's will, so all Christians must do the will of their Mother the Roman Church. Then Callistus besieged Sutrio, where Gregory abode, and brought him unto Rome, sitting on a Camel, with his face backwards; such was the discipline in those days. Callistus sate five years, and ten moneths.

4. CELESTIN II. was chosen by the Cardinals; but Leo Frangepanis by force set up Honorius II. who hearing that Celestin had renounced his election, did also renounce, and then was accepted by the Romans; and he sate in peace two years; for now the people stood in awe of the Pope's curses.

5. INNOCENTIUS II. was chosen next; but the above-named Leo, with some Cardinals set up his own Son ANACLETUS II. for fear of him, and his friends, Innocentius fled into France; and in a Council at Claremont, he condemned Pope Anaclet, and all his followers. Bernard in epist. 124. calleth Anaclet, the Antichrist; and in epist. 126. he calleth him, the chief of Schismaticks; and there he witnesseth that others spoke so of Innocentius. From France Innocentius goeth unto Lotharius the Emperor, and promiseth to Crown him, if he will aid him against his Competitor.

Pope, should

At this time Pope Anaclet giveth unto Roger Duke of Sicilie, the Title of King, for siding with him. Lotharius and Innocentius come together into Rome, as is above: Anaclet lurketh until Lotharius returned, and then he forceth his Anti-Pope to flee into Pisa. Then Bernard wrote his 130. Epistle, saying, Pisa is assumed unto the place of Rome, and is chosen from among all the Towns of the world, to be the Supremacy of the Apostolique See [Why then do they now charge us, that we will not tie the Supremacy of the Church unto Rome? seeing he also addeth] nor happeneth this by chance, or counsel of men, but by heavenly providence, and bountiful favor of God, which loveth them that love him; and hath said unto his Christ, Dwell in Pisa, and I will abundantly bless her; I will dwell there, because I have chosen her, &c. There a Council was called, and the Pope of Pisa accurseth the Pope of Rome; and sent again for the Emperor, who came with a greater Army then before. The first place he set upon, was the Abbey of Cassino, and commandeth Abbot Raynold to forsake Pope Anaclet, and he would reconcile him unto Innocentius, and maintain the priviledges of the Abbey, as his Ancestors had done. On the other side, Innocentius commandeth the Abbot, and all his Monks, to come bare-foot before him. Raynold chooseth the Emperor as his Patron; therefore Innocentius became jealous of the Emperor, who went on to judge Raynold's cause; and commandeth them both to compear by their Proctors before him, and his Bishops assembled. Gerard a Cardinal appeareth for the Pope, and Peter a Deacon for Raynold. Gerard objecteth, One who is excommunicated by the head of the Church, should not sit at the feet of the Churches Son. Cæsar answereth, That excommunication is the question; therefore he may sit till he be heard. Gerard saith, The universal Church hath ordained us, and our predecessors, Rulers of the world [He alledgeh no power from Christ's Institution] The Emperor replieth, We received from the Apostolique See not the Empire, but the token thereof. Gerard saith, But Monks should swear obedience unto us. Peter replieth, By the Imperial Laws we are not tied to such an oath. Behold here the Pope at the Emperor's Bence; howbeit thereafter he gave Raynold unto the Pope's pleasure. Among the Epistles of Bernard, the 114. was written by this Innocentius against Peter Abaillard, where he saith, By the testimony of the Apostle, as there is but one Lord, so we know but one faith, on which, as an unmoveable foundation, (beside which none can lay another) the certainty of the Catholique Church standeth unviolated: hence blessed Peter, Prince of the Apostles, for his excellent confessing this faith, did hear from our Lord and Savior, Thou art (said he) Peter, and upon this rock will I build my Church; signifying by this rock, the certainty of faith, and the solidity of Catholique unity----- Martian, a most Christian Emperor---- writing unto our most holy Predecessor Pope John, against them who presume to profane holy mysteries, saith, Let no Clerk, or Soldier, or any of whatsoever condition, attempt in publique to treat of the Christian faith; for he wrongeth the judgement of the most reverend Synod, who attempteth to canvase, or dispute again the points that are once judged, and rightly determined; and the contemners of this Law, shall be certainly punished as the sacrilegious. Observe how a Bishop in those days expounded the word rock, otherwise then the Jesuites do now, but as the Reformed Church doth. Secondly, He acknowledgeth the Civil Magistrates power in Ecclesiasticks, without mention of the Pope, but expressly with relation unto a Synod. This Pope did first ordain, that the Pope should sit at Mass, when others do kneel; as if a religious gesture were too base for the Pope, when he holdeth his Savior in his hand, according to their doctrine. He hoped to enjoy peace, when after eight years Anacletus died;

but the Romans did reject him altogether, alledging that Church-men should live by tithes, and offerings, and other Revenues do appertain to the Commonwealth. In the mean time the Emperor was incumbred so in Germany, the Romans set up their old policy, and create new Governors to rule the City: Innocentius will oppose, but first in a Synod ordaineth, that whosoever shall smite a Clergy-man, shall be summarily excommunicated, Gratia. c. 17. q. 4. Siquis. Then he excludeth the people à comitiis Pontificalibus from all the Pope's Councils. Platin. & Onuphr. but neither his menaces, nor gifts, could prevail: When he saw the opposite forces wax strong, he died in sorrow ann. 1143. when betwixt prosperity, and adversity, he had sate thirteen years and seven moneths.

6. CELESTIN III. was chosen first by the Cardinals onely; they had the advantage, that the people were in a stir; and thereafter it turned to a custom, that the Cardinals sought not the consent of Prince, nor people. Nothing is found memorable of him in his five moneths, say Platin. and Onuphr. in Innoc. II. but Bernard, though he intended not to write an History, yet informeth us of the Popes, and the Court, and of the Church in his time; and the Romanists will not deny his testimony, seeing he is a Canonized Saint: Unto him he wrote Epistle 192. the inscription is, Unto Master Guido de Castello, who was a disciple of Peter--- and afterwards was Pope Celestin: In the Epistle he calleth him, a Cardinal Presbyter of the Roman Church; and his salutation is, that he decline not to the right hand, nor to the left: then he saith, I were injurious unto you, if I do believe that you love any man so, that you love his errors also; for whosoever loveth thus, knoweth not as yet in what maner he ought to love; for such love is earthly, sensual, divelish, and hurtful both to the lover, and to the loved--- Mr. Peter bringeth us profane novelties of words, and meanings; disputing of the faith against the faith; by the words of the Law, he impugneth the Law--- when he speaketh of the Trinity, he is an Arrian; when he speaketh of grace, he is a Pelagian; of the person of Christ, he is a Nestorian: It is not presumption, if I intreat you, that in the cause of Christ, you prefer none unto Christ. In the next Epistle unto Cardinal Yvo, he saith, Peter Abailard is a Monk without a Rule; a Prelate without a charge; neither keeping order, nor can be kept in order; he is unlike himself, without a John, and within a Herod--- when he speaketh of the Faith, of the Sacraments, and of the holy Trinity, he addeth, impaireth, and changeth at his pleasure--- he is condemned with his work at Soisson, before the Legate of the Roman Church--- but he is careless, because he braggeth, that Cardinals, and Clerks of the Court are his disciples; and for defense of his by-past, and present errors, he chooseth them to be his Judges, by whom he should fear to be judged, and damned. Bernard in Epistle 196. saith to the same Guido, Arnald of Brixia, whose conversation is honey, and doctrine is poyson; who hath the head of a dove, and venom of a scorpion; whom Brixia hath spewed out, Rome hath abhorred, France hath refused, Germany holdeth abominable, and Italy will not receive, is said to be with you; beware, I pray thee, that he do not more harm by your authority--- To favor him, is to contradict the Lord Pope, yea the Lord God; for by whomsoever a just sentence is justly pronounced, surely it cometh from him which saith by the prophet, I speak righteousness, &c. Hence we may guess what a man Celestin was, and what many of the Court were before he was Pope. Then in Epistle 234. he writeth unto the same Celestin, saying, Who knoweth not that the cause of the Bishop of York was decided by Pope Innocentius? but oh that it were not known how that sentence is put in execution! oh that it be not told in Gath, nor in the streets of Ascalon! &c. And in the next Epistle unto the Roman Court, he saith, All men should write of that which concerneth all; nor fear I to be taxed for presumption, because, albeit I be the least of all men, yet I think the injury of the Roman Court toucheth me; we are vexed, I say unto you, we are vexed without measure grievously, so that we are weary of our life: we see horrible things in the house of God, and because we cannot amend them, we do at least advertise them which should: if they shall amend, it is well; and if not, we have delivered our souls, and ye have no cloke for your sin. Ye are not ignorant, that sentence was pronounced by the Lord Pope, of good memory, Innocentius, with the general consent of you, and the Roman Court, that the election, or rather intrusion of William Bishop of York is null-- and ye know, that this sentence was full, not onely of judgement, but of mercy--- but oh! that the sentence might stand, and what is done contrarily might not stand--- oh! that Phinehas could go with his sword against this fornication; or that Peter were alive in his seat, to consume these wicked ones with the breath of his lips--- I say unto you, it will be a great scandal in the Church; and I fear, lest the Authority of the Roman See suffer a very grievous loss, if he be not punished who hath transgressed their general sentence, that others may fear. But what meaneth that which is reported, that this William hath privy and dark Letters, I wish from the Princes of darknes, and not from the Princes of the Apostles; and behold, the children of the uncircumcised have heard it, and do jeer at it, that against a publique sentence, contrary Letters are come from Rome. What shall I say to you?--- If the Roman Court will compel these men, against their consciences, to bow down unto Baal, the Lord see and judge it, and the Court of Heaven look to it, where judgement cannot be wrested by any ambition, &c. Here we see one Pope against another, and the Court at one time, against it self in a short time, to the great scandal of the Church, and derision of the enemies; and this was sharply told them by their own Saint.

7. LUCIUS II. sate eleven moneths; He was vexed by the Romans, The Romans would be free. and sent humble Letters unto the Emperor, representing the oppression of the Church, and of all Italy, and inviting him to come unto their defence; But, saith Naucler. generat. 39. the Emperor could not at that time: So the Romans do (besides their Senators) create Jordanes their Patricius; they go unto the Pope, and take from him all badges of Royalty, as well within, as without the City, as belonging unto the Patricius; and they bid the Pope be content with the first-fruits, oblations, and tithes, after the custom of the ancient Priests. When Lucius began to oppose them, they drave him out of the City, and threw stones at him, that thereafter he was not able to do any thing, and died. Ibid. Alfonso Duke of Lusitania, made his Land tributary unto Peter's See. Baron. Annal.

8. EUGENIUS III. was chosen, and because the City was not quiet, he went forth to the Monastery Farven, and was consecrated by the Cardinals, and then dwelt at Viterbio. In the mean time the Romans throw down the houses of the Cardinals, and Clerks, and of some Nobles, plundering their houses, not sparing St. Peter's Church. Eugenius accurseth them, and by the power especially of the City Tibur, he compelleth the Romans to seek peace; and they promised to have no Magistrate without the Pope's consent. In time of their perplexity, they sent unto the Emperor Conrade, beseeching him, as Lord of the City, and Emperor of the world, to come and possess the City, as Constantine, and Justinian had done, and from thence to rule all Italy, and Germany; and they complain, that the Clergy had conspired with Sicilie against the City; and they promise all manner of obedience and loyalty : The sum of their sute was comprised in few verses.

Imperium teneat : Roma sedeat, regat orbem Princeps terrarum, cœu fecit Iustinianus :
Cæsaris accipiat Cæsar, quæ sunt sua, præsul, Vt Christus iussit, Petro solvente tributum.*

The whole Letter is in Otho, Frising. de gest. Frider. l. 1. c. 28. But Conrad was so pestered with wars in Germany, that their imploration was in vain. When Eugenius was come into the City, he understood of plots against him, and fled down the river in a ship; the Citizens pursue him with weapons, and darts, as once they did with Gelasius, saith Naucier. He went to Pisa, and thence to France. This is the sum of the Historians; now hear Bern. in l. 4. de consider. he saith unto Eugenius, Name but one man in all the great City, who hath accepted thee for Pope, without price, or hope of price. When he was chosen, Bernard wrote unto the Roman Court the 236. Epistle, saying, The Lord forgive you, what have ye done? one which was buried, ye have brought again among men; one that was fleeing from cares, and troubles, ye have pestered with cares and troubles; ye have made the last first, and behold, his last condition, is more perilous then his first; he who was crucified to the world, is by you revived unto the world---- hath he left Pisa, that he might have Rome? he who could not manage the Vicounty of one Church, was he seeking the Government of the whole Church?---- But seeing it is so, and many say, It is of God; it is your duty, oh most dear, that it be diligently cherished by your fervent endeavors, and faithful obedience, which certainly is wrought by your hands; and therefore if any consolation be in you, if any vertue of charity in the Lord, if any miseration of piety, if any bowels of compassion, do ye aid and work with him in the work, whereunto he is assumed of the Lord by you. And in the next Epistle unto Eugenius, he saith, I was expecting that some of my sons would come, and lighten the father's sorrow, and say, Joseph thy son is living, and ruleth in all the Land of Egypt; therefore have I now written, not so much of mine own accord, as of necessity, being constrained by the intreaties of friends, unto whom I cannot refuse the residue of my life: And seeing I have begun, I will speak unto my Lord, for now I dare not call thee my son; because the son is turned to be the father, and the father is the son; and he who came after me, is preferred before me; but I do not envy it, because, what was deficient in me, I am confident that I have it in him, who came not onely after me, but even by me; for (if you offend not) I have begot thee, by the Gospel: what then is our hope, our joy, and the hope of our glory? is it not you before God? In a word, a wise son is the glory of his father. And henceforth thou shalt no more be called son, but a new name shall be given unto thee, which the mouth of the Lord hath named; this is the change of the right hand of the most High, and many shall rejoyce in this change: for as of old, Abram was turned unto Abraham, and Jacob unto Israel; or rather (to speak of thy predecessors) as Simon to Cephas, and Saul to Paul; so my son Bernard, into my father Eugenius, by a very joyful, and, as I hope, profitable change: This is the finger of God, raising the needy out of the dust, and the poor from the dung, that he may sit with the Princes, and possess the throne of glory. It followeth, that this change being made of you, that the Bride of thy Lord, which is committed committed unto thee, be also changed into the better; [note] and that she be no more called Sarai, but Sarah: understand what I say, and the Lord giveth thee understanding. If thou be the friend of the Bridegroom, call her no more my Princess, but, the Princess; usurping nothing as thine in her, but that it is be needful, thou shouldest give thy life for her: if Christ hath sent thee, thou wilt think that thou comest not to be served, but to serve; and to minister not onely thy means, but even thy life, as I have said; A true successor of Paul, will say with Paul, Not that we domineer over your faith, but we are helpers of your joy; An heir of Peter, will hear Peter saying, Neither as Lord over the people, but we were examples of the flock: for so now, not a servant, but the free-woman, and the fair one of the most fair Bridegroom, shall by thee come unto his long wished for arms; for by whom other, shall this so necessary freedom be hoped, if you also (which God forbid) seek in God's inheritance your own things; who even before had learned, I will not say, not to possess any thing as your own, but not to be your own: therefore she having such confidence in you, as she seemed to have in none of your predecessors in many ages before; [note] all the Church of the Saints every where, is justly glad, and glorieth in the Lord, and especially she whose womb hath born thee, and whose breast thou didst suck. What then? may I not rejoyce with them that rejoyce? shall I onely not be of the number of them which are glad? I confess, I have joyed, but with fear; I have joyed, but in the very moment of my exaltation, fear and trembling hath come upon me: for albeit I have laid aside the name of father, yet have I not laid down fear, nor care, nor solicitation and bowels of a father: I consider the height, and fear a fall; I consider the pinnacle of honor, and I behold the surface of the gulf below; I look up to the top of dignity, and I fear danger approaching; as it is written, Man when he was in honor, did not understand: which (in my judgement) reareth to the cause, and not to the time; that it is so meant, as if it were said, Honor swalloweth understanding, &c. When Eugenius fled out of Rome, Bernard wrote unto the Emperor Conrade thus; The Kingdom, and Priest hood, could not be more sweetly, more friendly, yea, more fruitfully conjoynd, and complanted one in another, then when they were both together in the person of our Lord, which was made unto us of both the tribes, according to the flesh the highest, both Priest, and King; yet not onely so, but hath commixed, and coupled them together in his body; which is the Christian people, and he the head thereof; so that this sort of men, are by the Apostolical word called, a chosen royal Priest-hood; and in another Scripture, so many as are predestinated unto life, are they not called Kings, and Priests? therefore what God hath conjoynd, let no man put asunder; but rather, what divine Authority hath ordained, mans will should endeavor to fulfill; and they should joyn in hearts, who are conjoynd in ordinances; let then cherish one another, defend other mutually, and bear one anothers burthens; The wise man saith, A brother aiding a brother, both shall be comforted; but if they bite one another, (which God forbid) both shall come into desolation. Let not my soul come into their counsels, which say, That either the peace, and freedom of the Church, is hurtful unto the Crown; or the prosperity, and exaltation of the Crown, is hurtful unto the Church: for God, the Author of them both, hath conjoynd them not to destruction, but to edification. If ye know this, how long will ye disseemble common contumely, and common injury? Is not Rome as the Apostolical Seat, so also the head of the Empire? therefore though I would not speak of the Church, is it the honor of the King to have an headless Empire? know not what the wise men, and Princes of the Kingdom, do advise you herein, but though I speak imprudently, I will not be silent in what I do judge. The Church of God, from the beginning, even till these times, hath been oft afflicted, and oft delivered---- it is her voice. They have often afflicted me, from my youth, but they could not prevail against me---- Be sure, O King, that neither now will the Lord leave the rod of the wicked, upon the back of the righteous; the hand of the Lord is not shortened, nor become unable to help; At this time he will deliver his Spouse, which he hath redeemed by his blood, endowed with his spirit, furnished with heavenly gifts, and nevertheless enriched with earthly things: He will deliver, I say again, he will deliver, but if by the hand of another, let the Princes of the Kingdom consider, whether this be to the honor and advantage of the King? certainly not: Wherefore gird thy sword, O most mighty, and let Cæsar recover unto himself, what is Cæsar's, and unto God, what is God's. Vtrumque interesse Cæsaris constat; undoubtedly both these appertain to Cæsar, to maintain his own Crown, and to defend the Church; the one becometh the King, and the other the Advocate of the Church. The victory, as we trust in the Lord, is at hand; the Romans are more arrogant, then potent; for what? did ever any great or mighty Emperor, or King, presume so vile a thing, both against Crown, and Priest-hood? but this cursed, and tumultuous people, which cannot measure their strength, nor think on the end, nor consider the event, in their foolishness, and fury, durst attempt so great sciledge; the temerity of the multitude, cannot stand for a moment before the King's face, &c. I will not here add observations. Bellarmin. de Ro. Pont. l. 2. c. 31. I alledgeth, That Bernard did first give unto the Pope the Title, Vicar of Christ. It was not from the beginning so; but the Cardinal mistaketh it, Bernard was not the first, if Platina do truly report the words of Gregory VII. he used this Title before him; and according to the language of the Court at that time, Bernard giveth this Title unto all Priests, even from whom all iniquity proceedeth, as he speaketh in sexto Convers. Pauli ser. 1. and giveth unto Eusebius both this, and loftier Titles; for lib. 2. de Consider. he calleth him, The Great Priest, the Prince of Bishops, the Heir of the Apostles; Abel in Primacy, in Government Noah, in Patriarchship Abraham, & Order Melchisedek, in Dignity Aaron, in Authority Moses, in Judging Samson, in Power Peter, in Vocation Christ; here is a rhapsody of glorious Titles; and he addeth these passages of Scripture, that are wrested, to maintain the ambition of the man of sin; but whether he speak so in derision, or according to his own minde, it may be judged by his words following immediately: but first see what he said a little before. What hath the holy Apostle left in legacy unto thee? he saith, What I have, I give thee. What is it? One thing I know; it is not silver, nor gold; seeing he said, Silver and gold have I not. If thou happen to have it, use it according to the time, and not at thy pleasure; so use them, as not abusing them; seeing these (in respect of the souls good) are neither good, nor ill; but the use of them is good, the abuse ill; the care of them is worse, and seeking is filthier: by whatsoever way thou may have them, certainly thou hast them not by title of the Apostle; for he could not give what he had not; what he had, that he gave, the care of all the Churches. Gave he Lordly power? hear himself, Not domineering over the people, but being an example of the flock. And lest you think he said so in humility onely, and not in truth, the Lord saith in the Gospel, The Kings of the earth have dominion--- but not ye so. It is clear, dominion is forbidden unto the Apostles. Go then, and take (if thou darest) either Apostleship, if thou be a Lord; or dominion, if thou be Apostolical: thou art clearly forbidden to do either of the two; if thou wilt have them together, thou shalt lose them both or else think not thy self to be excepted from those, of whom God complaineth, saying, They have reigned, but not by me; they were Princes, and I knew them not: And if thou wilt reign without God, thou hast glory, but not with God. We see what is forbidden, now hear what is commanded; Who is the greater among you, let him be as the yonger; and he that is chief, as he that serveth: There is the model of an Apostle; dominion is forbidden, and serving is commanded; which is commended also by example of the Law-Giver; for it followeth, I am in the midst of you, as he who serveth. Bernard there hath many things to this purpose, and after he hath mentioned these former Titles, and prerogatives, he saith, I have spoken of who thou art, but forget not what--- consider what thou wast, and now art; why wilt thou not behold, what thou canst not cease to be? Indeed it is one thing what thou wast, and art, and another who thou art become; the one must not be forgot in searching thy self; for thou art what thou wast, and thou art not less, after thou art become such, and perhaps more; thou wast born that, and changed this, but not changed into this; the former is not cast off, but this is added. If thou consider what, remember thy nature, thou wast born a man; if thou ask, who thou art? a Bishop; this thou art made, and not born: which of these thinkest thou nearest, or chiefest unto, that thou art made, or that thou wast born? is not that thou wast born? therefore I advise thee to consider most, what thou art most; to wit, a man, even as thou wast born: And thou must consider, not onely quid, sed qualis natus. what, but what an one thou wast born--- take away therefore in thy predication, the cover of these leaves, which hide the shame, and heal not the wound; blot away the false colour of fading honor, and the glance of counterfeit glory, that thou mayest nakedly consider thy self naked, because thou camest naked out of thy mothers womb: Wast thou born with a mitre, or glancing with Jewels, or shining with silks, or crowned with feathers, or burthened with metals? if thou blow with thy meditation these things, as a morning cloud, thou wilt see thy self a naked man, poor, wretched, miserable, lamenting that thou art a man, ashamed that thou art naked, weeping that thou art born of a woman, and therefore with guiltiness, and therefore with fear, and filled with miseries both of soul and body; for what calamity wanteth he, who is born in sin, a frail body, and barren soul?--- A modest man will moderate his cares, abstain from superfluities, and not fail in things necessary: a just man will not presume on things higher then himself; but will say with that just man, If I be just, I will not lift up my head; therefore in thy meditation walk warily, that thou neither ascribe unto thee more then enough, nor deny more then is just; and thou ascribest unto thy self more then truth, not onely by arrogating any good thou hast not, but by ascribing what thou hast, &c. In lib. 3. he saith, Thy fathers were ordained to overcome, not some nations, but the whole world; for it was said unto them, Go into all the world; and they sold their coats, and bought swords, to wit, zealous eloquence, and a vehement spirit, weapons powerful through God: Whither went those famous Conquerors?--- occumbebant, non succumbebant; these mighty warriors did die, but never gave over; they triumphed when they were dead--- Thou hast succeeded into their inheritance; so thou art the heir, and the world is thine inheritance; but it is to be seriously considered, how this inheritance concerneth thee, and how it did concern them? for I believe not every way, yet in some way; I think a dispensation is committed unto thee, and possession is not given thee; if thou wilt usurp this too, he contradicteth thee, who saith, The earth is mine, and the fulness thereof: Thou art not he, of whom the Prophet said, All the earth shall be his possession: This is Christ, to whom the possession belongeth by right of creation, merit of redemption, and by gift of the Father--- What sayest thou? wilt thou deny me power? and forbid me to rule? yea plainly, as if he had not power, who hath care--- Præsis ut proßis : So govern, that thou do good; so govern, as a faithful, and wise servant, whom the Lord hath set over his house: Unto what? to give them food in season; that is, to steward, and not to command, do this: and thou, being a man, affect not to rule over men, lest unrighteousness rule over thee--- I am afraid, for no poison unto thee, and no sword more then this desire of ruling: certainly, albeit thou think much of thy self, yet if thou be not much deceived, think that thou hast not received more then the great Apostles; remember therefore that word, I am debtor to the wise, and to the unwise; and if thou think that belongeth to thee, remember also, that the grievous name of a debtor, agreeth to a servant, rather then to a ruler--- therefore if thou acknowledge thy self a debtor to the wise, and unwise; thou must earnestly consider, how both they who are not wise, may be wise, & they who are wise, become not unwise; and how they who are become unwise, may grow wise again: But no kinde of foolishness, is worse then infidelity; therefore thou art a debtor to Infidels, Jews, Greeks, and Gentiles; therefore it should be thy work, that Infidels may be brought unto the faith; the converted, be not turned away; and who are turned away, may return; who are perverted, may be made straight: according to rectitude; and the subverted may be recalled unto the truth; the subverters may be convinced with unvincible reasons, to the end that themselves may be amended, if possible, or if not, they may not have power, and authority to subvert others--- Albeit the Apostle excuse thee concerning the Jews, seeing they have a term, which cannot be prevented, the fulness of the Gentiles must come in. But what sayest thou of the Gentiles themselves? yea; what answerest thy consideration unto this question? thinkest thou, that the Fathers have set bounds unto the Gospel, and suspended the word of faith, while infidelity continueth? by what reason think we, hath the word, which did run so swiftly, come to a standing? who did first hinder the running of salvation? possibly some cause, which we know not, or necessity might hinder them; but what reason have we to dissemble? by what confidence, or what conscience, do we not so much as tender Christ unto them which have him not? do we withhold the truth of God in unrighteousness? But certainly, the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in sometime: do we expect that faith shall fall upon them? who hath ever believed by chance? how shall they believe, without a Preacher?--- I add concerning the pertinacy of the Greeks, who are with us, and not with us, joynd in the faith, and severed in peace, albeit in the faith they do halt from the right paths. And also of heresie, which spreadeth quietly every where almost, [note] among some doth rage openly; for it devoureth quickly the babes of the Church every where, and openly. You ask, Where is this? Yours which visit the South so oft, behold, they know, and can tell thee; they go, and return thorow the midst of them, or pass by them, but as yet we have not heard, what good they do among them; and possibly we had heard, if they had not made more account of Spanish Gold, then of mens souls. It is thy duty to provide a remedy unto this malady; but there is a foolishness, which in these days hath almost made foolish even the wisdom of faith; [note] How hath this poison envenomed almost all the Catholique Church? for, while even in her each one seek our own things, it is come to pass, that by mutual envying, and contention, we are taken up with hatred, encouraged to injuries, ready unto strifes, use cavillations unto guile. carried to slanders, break out into curses, are oppressed by the mightier, and do oppress the weaker. How worthily, and laudably, might the meditation of thy heart be exercised, against so pestilentious a kinde of foolishness, which thou seeest to possess the very body of Christ, which is the multitude of believers. Alas! ambition, the cross of the ambitious, how doest thou vex all men, and please all men? nothing doth vex men more bitterly, nothing disturbeth them with more turmoil, and nevertheless, nothing is more frequent among miserable men, then the affairs thereof. Doth not ambition haunt the houses of the Apostles, more then devotion doth? doth not your Palace resound all the day over with its voice? doth not all the discipline of the Laws, and Canons, serve unto its gain? doth not all the pilling, and polling of Italy, wait with unsatiable greediness on its spoils? doth it not onely interrupt, but even cut off thine own spiritual studies? &c. Here Bernard continueth, reporting the iniquity, and gross abuses of the Roman Court in appealations, exemptions of Bishops, of Abbots, the priviledges of Monks, Simony so openly maintained, that when a poor, or honest Bishop, was sought by the people, he could not attain it, till the Pope himself gave the poor man money to give for his investiture; so yielding unto the maner of the Court, and saving the poor man from the malice of them who love gifts; on the one side, respecting conscience, and on the other, providing to the fame of the man, saith he. Yea, he saith plainly, The Lord is angry, seeing the house of prayer, is become a den of thieves. Nor spareth he the Pope himself, saying, A wise man will preveen his work with a three-fold consideration, whether it be lawful, decent, and expedient? for albeit in Christianity it is certain, it cannot be decent, which is not lawful; nor expedient, which is not decent, and lawful; yet it followeth not that all is decent, and expedient, which is lawful. Now apply these three unto thy work; How? is it not undecent for thee to use thy will for law? and because there is none to whom thou canst appeal, therefore to follow thy will, and despise reason? Art thou greater then thy Lord, who said, I come not to do mine own will? Albeit it is not more base then arrogant, as if thou wert void of reason, to do not according to reason, but after thy pleasure; and to be led, not in judgement, but after thy appetite, what is so beastly? and if it be unworthy to any rational man, to live as a beast, who can endure so great reproach of nature, and injury of honor, in thee the Governor of all? By degenerating in this maner (which I wish were not) thou hast made the common reproach proper to thy self, to wit, Man being in honor, and understandeth not, he is compared unto the unwise beasts, and is become like unto them, &c. In lib. 4. he propoundeth unto the Pope's consideration, the Clergy, and People of Rome, and when he hath shewed what they should be, and what they are for the time, and howbeit they may be incorrigible, yet Eugenius should not cease to endeavor a reformation, (seeing he should endeavor, though he cannot amend them) he then saith, I pray bear with me a little, yea, give me leave, I speak not rashly, but with fear; I am jealous over thee, with a godly jealousy; oh, that it were as profitable as earnest; I know where thou dwellest, incredulous and rebellious people are with thee; (and on the margin he addeth Eze. 2.) they are wolves, not sheep; and nevertheless of such art thou the shepheard: a profitable consideration, whereby possibly thou mayest finde how to convert them, lest they subvert thee: why should we despair, that they can be turned into sheep, from which they have been turned into wolves? in this, in this (I say) I spare thee not, that God may spare thee: either deny thy self to be a shepheard unto this people, or shew it indeed; thou wilt not deny it, lest thou deny thy self his heir, whose Chair thou possessest; this is Peter: But it is known, that he never pranked in jewels, nor silks, nor was covered with gold, nor was carried on a white palfrey, nor convoyed with Soldiers, nor environed with clamorous lacquies, and yet he believed, that without such things, that gracious command might be fulfilled, If thou love me, feed my sheep. In these things thou hast succeeded not unto Peter, but unto Constantine: I advise thee, to bear with these things for the time, and affect them not as due unto thee; I had rather excite thee unto these things, whereof thou art a debtor: albeit thou be clothed with purple and gold, yet shun not thou (who art the heir of a shepherd) thy pastoral care and work; be not ashamed of the Gospel--- Thou wilt say, I bid thee feed dragons, and scorpions, not sheep: I say, the rather set upon them with the word, not the sword; what? shouldst thou take a sword into thy hand again, which thou wast once commanded to put into its sheath? &c. In a word, thorow all these five Books of Consideration, Bernard useth not one argument from these lofty titles, to prove the dominion of the Pope, but in the contrary disproveth it; and adviseth him to bear with these things for the time, and neither affect, nor exercise dominion; yea, he presseth stewarding, and serving, so hardly, that he maketh dominion, and stewarding, or pastoral office, inconsistent, and dominion can no way stand with an Apostolical title. And he sheweth the estate of the Church in his time, that it was degenerated from her self in former times; and that these, who should have been shepherds, were become scorpions, and wolves; so that all the Catholique Church almost, was envenomed with the poison of heresie; which was occasioned by the ambition, avarice, and simony of the Papal Court. Eugenius was reconciled to the Romans, and died at Rome An. 1152. and in the eighth year of his Papacy.

9. ANASTASIUS IV. did nothing worthy of memory; he gave a great cup of gold to the Lateran Church, and repaired the old Pantheon, or St. Maries, Jo. Bale. He fate scarcely two years.

10. HADRIAN IV. an English Monk, was not inferior to Hildebrand in pride: In his first year he was solicited, partly by promises, and partly by threats, to leave free administration unto the Consuls; he would not. The Clergy did often entreat him to go unto the Lateran Church; he would not, unless Arnold of Brixia (who was condemned by Pope Eugenius) were banished the City. The people took these in ill part, and one day, when the Cardinal of St. Pudentiana was going unto the Pope, they fall upon him, and wound him: for which cause the Pope, in anger, did accurse them, until they did banish that Arnold, and gave over the Government of the City into the Pope's hands. N. aucler. Shortly after he had excommunicated the Emperor, he was walking with his Cardinals to refresh himself, in the fields of Anagnia, and coming to a spring of water, he would taste of it, and with the water, a flie entereth into his throat, and choaketh him, Platin. and so a flie killeth him, who had despised all the power on earth. In the later end of his days, he was wont to say, There is not a more wretched life, then to be Pope. To come into the seat of St. Peter by ambition, is not to succeed Peter in feeding the flock, but unto Romulus in paricide, seeing that seat is never obtained without some brothers blood. Mat. Parisien. He fate four years, and ten moneths.

Anti-popes call one another
the Antichrist.

11. VICTOR IV. and ALEXANDER III. were set up together, and strove against one another, as sometime did Romulus, and Remus; the one alledged the priority of suffrages, and the other pluralities; for Victor was chosen by nine of the Cardinals, the rest being present, and not contradicting; and after twelve days, fourteen Cardinals, departing the City privately, nor calling the others unto a new election, did choose Alexander: but besides the priority, Victor was set in St. Peter's Chair, with the applause of the City and Clergy. Neither of the two abode at Rome; Victor abode at Sena, and Alexander at Anagnia. Both seek the Emperor's favor, who was lying

lying at the siege of Crema in Lombardie, and intreat him to remove the Schism. They did excommunicate one another with solemnity of ceremonies, and gave one another unto their author Sathan. Radevius (as Ph. Mornay in Myster. citeth) hath these words, as spoken by Alexander of the other, He, prefiguring the time of Antichrist, is so exalted, that he sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself as if he were God; and many with their bodily eyes have seen the abomination of desolation, standing in the holy place, not without shedding many tears. We may think that Victor spoke no less, so that they both in others judgement were the Antichrist; wherefore others are to be blamed the less, if they give that name unto the Popes. Alexander bought the favor of the Romans with his money. The Emperor Frederick wrote unto them both, that he would not judge in so weighty a cause, but permit it unto the judgement of the Church; and, after the example of former Emperors, he summoneth a Council, not of the Bishops of the Empire onely, but he inviteth the Clergy of France, Brittain, Spain, Hungary, and Denmark; and he summoneth both the Popes to compear before the Council at Pavia. Fastings and prayers were made unto God, to grant a good success unto the Assembly. The Emperor began thus, Albeit the right of calling Councils appertaineth unto Us, as it is written of Constantine, Theodosius, Justinian, and in later days of Charles the Great, and Otho, and other Emperors; nevertheless I refer unto your wisdom, the authority of determining this most high and weighty business, seeing God hath made you Priests in these things that concern him; nor is it my part to judge of you, unto whom God hath given power to judge of us; onely we exhort you to shew your selves such, as who look for the judgement of God upon your selves. All the Bishops, Abbots, and Legates, did solemnly swear, to receive undoubtedly whatsoever the Synod shall decree; and then the Emperor did remove from the Council. Alexander would not appear, but sent them word, that he who is the judge of them all, should and can be judged by none. The Fathers were the more offended, and condemned Rowland, [this was the name of Alexander] and they consecrate Pope Victor. The Emperor approveth the Decree; and all the persons of the Council, without exception, subscribe it: and the Presidents sent Letters unto all the forenamed Nations, that they should acknowledge none other Pope but Victor. Nevertheless, Pope Alexander accuseth the Emperor, and all the Cities which submitted themselves unto Octavian, or Victor: but despairing to have a Synod assembled in Italy, he passeth into France, and in a Council at Claremont, An. 1162. he reneweth the former curse. The next year Pope Victor dieth.

12. PASCHALIS III. was chosen by the Cardinals, with the general approbation of all the Princes, and Bishops, in an Assembly at Wirtzburg An. 1165. In this Synod it was decreed, That none should be Pope, but he who shall be elected according to the ancient custom, and with consent of the Emperor; and a Messenger of Christ, and Successor of blessed Peter, and not be emulous of the Imperial Dignity. All who were present, took an oath, that they should never acknowledge any Pope, who was chosen another way. Christian Bishop of Mentz, did first subscribe. Avent. lib. 6. In the mean while Pope Alexander ceaseth not to treat by his Nuntio John, a Cardinal, with the Romans, and promised them the liberty of their Consuls, and other Officers, if they would aid him against the Emperor. Upon these conditions he was received, and then he inticed other Cities to usurp liberty. When the Emperor had levied an Army, he went with Paschalis towards Rome, as is touched before. Pope Alexander fled into Venice, one of the Cities which had usurped liberty, and had made a confederacy with other Cities. The Emperor left Paschalis in Rome; but ere he was soiled, the Romans had received Pope Callistus III. and maintained him in contempt of Alexander, until the reconciliation was finished between Frederick and Alexander. Then this Pope made a new agreement with the Romans, and was received by them An. 1178. There in a Council he enacted, That if the Cardinals could not accord in the election of a Pope, whomsoever the two parties shall choose, he shall be received by all; and if any person, leaning to the election of the third part, shall demean himself as Pope, he shall be accursed. He did annul the acts of Victor, Paschalis, and Callistus. Bellarmin. de Sanctor. beat. lib. 1. cap. 7. testifieth, that in the days of this Alexander, a soul did appear, and rebuked some persons for worshipping a man that was killed in drunkenness: as also he testifieth, that before that time a soul had appeared unto St. Martin, when he was praying for it, and confessed it self to be the soul of a damned robber. Because these things were frequent, Pope Alexander ordained, That none should be worshipped as a Saint, unless he were canonized by a Pope. Po. Verg. de inven. rer. lib. 2. cap. 8. He canonized Thomas Becket, who (as the Sorbonists then maintained in their publique disputes) was justly condemned for rebellion. Before that time the Clergy paid tribute, Gratian. cau. 22. qu. 8. c. Tributum. but Pope Alexander exempted all Church-mens goods, whether Benefices, or proper heritage, from all tribute of temporal Lords. Bellar. de Cler. lib. 1. cap. 24. prop. 4. And in Proposition 5. of the same Chapter, he saith, The exemption of the Clergy, as well concerning their persons, as their goods, was brought in by the law of man, and not of God: This is against the Canonists, saith he. In the same Council it was ordained, That manifest usurers, should not be buried among believers. This Pope gave the title of King unto Alfonso Duke of Lusitania, for his valiantness against the Saracens there. Baro. Annal. He sate twenty and one years.

shipped.

13. LUCIUS III. had peace with the Emperor; but because he would have taken off the new liberty, and name of Consuls, the Romans forced him to flee to Verona. Unto him a King of Armenia did submit himself, because of a variance between him and the Greek Emperor: and the Pope embraced him for his homage, albeit neither he nor his people were conformable in Religion. Naucler saith, Lucius ordained, That a Priest, having a concubine, might say Mass, and others might receive a Sacrament from him, if his Bishop did tolerate him. He sate four years, and died An. 1185.

14. URBAN III. had peace at home: but in his time Saladin conquered Jerusalem by dissension of the Christian Princes there. He sate one year and ten moneths.

15. GREGORY (IX. called the) VIII. by Letters, exhorted the Princes to send aid unto the distressed Christians in Asia; and died on the 57. day.

16. CLEMENS III. condescended unto the Romans concerning their Magistrates; that strife had continued fifty years. In his time was the greatest expedition into Asia; then went the Emperor Frederick, Philip King of France, Richard King of England, Ortho Duke of Burgundy, with many Bishops from Italy, Flanders, Denmark, &c. but all in vain; for after the death of Frederick, when they should have been supplied with victuals, Clemens was busie in conquering Sicily from Tancred, who had furnished them. Platina. He spoiled sundry Cities; and when he, despairing of victory, turned to Church affairs, he ordained, That onely a Pope hath power of transporting a Bishop from one seat to another; that Bishops should be in honor above Princes. He sent Peter, Cardinal of Capua, into Poland, to reform reform the Clergy; to wit, to discharge all married Priests; for until that time, that liberty was not taken from them. The same Cardinal attempted to do the like in Bohemia, but they had almost killed him An. 1196. Spalat. de Rep. Eccles. lib. 2. cap. 10. §. 47. He went also into Denmark, but the Clergy would not obey him; so he did excommunicate them all. Clemens sat five years.

17. CELESTIN IV. gave the Romans liberty to raze Tusculo, because that City, in a kinde of emulation, had been offensive unto Rome; yet gave he the people license to abide in the suburbs. Now with Tancred, and then with Henry VI. he had continual wars; and died An. 1198. In that Century the strange pride of the Popes was apparent, and it was strongly opposed by the Emperors, and manifestly manifested unto the world, even by themselves, one condemning another in open Councils; and ye shall anon see it contradicted, and bewailed, by some Bishops, Abbots, and others.

CENTURY XII.

CHAP. III.

Of divers Countreys.

1. MAny and fearful signs were seen in the beginning of this Century; bloody Armies appeared in the air; two Suns were seen in heaven; the Stars seemed to fall as thick as rain; many Comets were seen, one of them was marvellous in bigness, continuing in the evening the space of eighteen days, and with great light. A marvellous earthquake is reported to have been in the year 1117. so that Churches and Towns fell to the ground in Italy, and other Nations; the sea in some places overflowed 1000. paces. Platin.

2. Fluentius Bishop of Florence, preached that these signs did portend great miseries, and that Antichrist was then reigning in the world. Platina saith, Paschalis was not fearful, and said, All these things have natural causes: but he would not let Fluentius pass without a censure: he convened a Council of 340. Bishops at Florence, and made a shew of despising him as a broacher of new opinions, and enjoyed him silence. Bellarmin. de Ro. Pont. lib. 3. cap. 3.

3. Arnulph, a singular preacher of Christian Religion, in a Sermon at Rome, reprov'd the dissolute wantonness, incontineney, avarice, negligence, and immoderate pride of the Clergy: he said, they should follow Christ and his Apostles in purity of life. Many Nobles did reverence him as a true disciple of Christ, saith Platina in Honor. II. Others write no less of him. Naucler calleth him Bishop of Lions. In the second Tome of Councils is a Book under his name, where he complaineth of the multitude of holy days, as the occasions of many vices, namely, incontineney; he complaineth of curious singing, in learning whereof, much precious time was spent, which might be better employed; of the multitude of idle Monks, and Nuns, of the corrupt promotion, and negligence of Prelats; of the lascivious apparel in the families of Bishops; of their non-residence at their Churches; of the negligence of the Clergy, in not perusing and observing the Acts of ancient Councils; of the unchaste lives of Priests, &c. P. Mornay in Myſter. ex Chro. Hirſaug. sheweth, that this Arnulph said, He was sent by an Angel to preach at Rome, and the Angel told him, that he was to glorifie God in suffering for his cause; and therefore he said publicly, I know that ye will kill me; but wherefore? because I tell you the truth, and rebuke your pride, coverousness, and luxury. I call heaven and earth to record, that I have told ye what God hath commanded me; but ye contemn me, or rather your Creator. Neither is it a marvel, that ye will kill me, a sinner, for telling you the truth, seeing if Peter would rise again, and tell you of your faults, ye would not spare him. I am ready to die for the truth; and I tell you, in the name of the Lord, that the Almighty God shall not spare your filthiness, ye shall go into hell; God is a revenger of such wickedness, &c. The people loved him dearly; but the Clergy laid wait for him, and murdered him in the night. All the Clergy was defamed for his death. The Pope took it ill, but he revenged it not, Platin.

4. Paschalis II. sent a Palle unto the Bishop of Panormitan, in Sicily, and craved of him an oath of fidelity: both the Bishop, and the King Roger was offended, and said, It is a new usurpation; for it was never decreed in any Synod, that Bishops should be tied unto the Pope by an oath. Catal. test. ver. lib. 15.

5. Moses, a Jew, was baptized on the feast of Peter, and Paul; from that feast, he would be called Peter: and because Alfonso King of Spain answered for him at his baptism, he was called Petrus Alfonsus, in the 44. year of his age. In a book against the Jews, he saith, All the sacrifices of the Law, are fulfilled in the sacrifice of Christ, once offered on the Cross: after his death, the Church useth no sacrifice, but one of thanksgiving in bread and wine; as David had prophesied, when he sang, Will I eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats? offer unto God the sacrifice of praise: where he intimateth, that all sacrifices should be abolished, and onely this of thanksgiving should continue. There also he saith, Christians have no images for adoration; and as no account was made of the stones, whereof the altar had been made, so we make no reckoning what become of the reliques of the cross, or of any image that had been set upon it, Catal. test. lib. 14.

6. Hildebert Bishop of Towers, about the same time, wrote many Epistles; in one unto an Earl, going a pilgrimage, he condemneth pilgrimages for visiting of Monuments: amongst other things, he saith of the Roman Church, This is proper unto the Romans, to infer calumnies, to deser persons; to bring menaces, and carry away riches: Such are they, whose business thou mayest hear to be commended in ease; whose prey, is in peace; whose fighting, is in fleeing; and victory, in cups: they regard no man, nor order, nor time: they are in judgement, Scythians; in chamber, vipers; at feasts, Peasants; in understanding, stones; in discerning, prattling daws; to anger, fire; to forgive, iron; in friendship, pards; in deceit, foxes; in pride, bulls; to devour, minotaur, &c. He wrote to Honorius II. refuting the appellations to Rome, because it was a novelty contrary unto the Scriptures, and very hurtful unto the Church. He sheweth the condition of Rome briefly in two verses;

He was apprehended, and imprisoned at Rome. Mornay in Myster.

7. Honorius Augustodunensis was famous for his learning and godliness, about the year 1110. Gesner testifieth of many of his books, as yet extant: he wrote one De Papa & Imperatore, against the Pope. In Dialog. de prædesti. & libe. arbit. he writeth of the Roman Church in this maner, Turn thee to the Citizens of Babylon, and behold what they are, and how they walk! behold! come to the top of the mountain, that thou mayest see all the houses of the damned City : Look to the Princes and Judges of it, that is, the Cardinals and Bishops, amongst them is the seat of the Beast ; at all times they are prone to ill, and ever insatiable intangled with the things of iniquity : they not onely practice wickedly, but teach others to do the like ; they sell holy things, and buy wickedness ; by all means they endeavor, that they go not alone to hell : Turn thee to the Clergy, and among them thou shalt see the pavilion of the Beast ; they neglect divine service, but they are busie in the service of gain ; they defile the Priesthood with filthiness, and deceive the people with hypocritie ; by their wicked deeds they deny God ; they cast aside the Scriptures ; and how can they who are blinde, lead blinde people unto salvation ? Behold the Convents of the Monks, and among them thou shalt see the tabernacle of the Beast ; by feigned profession they scorn God, and provoke his wrath ; with their habit they deceive the world--- Look to the habitations of the Nuns, and amongst them thou shalt see a bed strawed for the Beast ; from their tender years they learn luxury ; they are more shameless then any bordeller, and she will have the palm of victory, who exceedeth others in wickedness, &c. In the same dialogue he saith, Because some are predestinated, the grace of God preveeneeth them, that they have a will, and it followeth them, that they may do ; but seeing predestination is unchangeable, the wicked being justly forsaken, neither will nor can do good ; they hear admonitions with deaf ears, because none cometh unto the Father, unless the son by grace, that is, by the holy Ghost drawing them ; and in his mercy he loveth whom he willeth, and in his justice he reprobateeth whom he willeth ; neither can they say, Why doest thou so ? --- The kingdom of heaven is not according to merits, but of grace ; for what deserveth man but ill ? In the same dialogue he had said, Degrees of glory shall be according to the diversity of merits ; but then he addeth, We receive grace for grace ; we receive grace when God preveeneeth us, that we have will, and followeth us, that we may do ; according to this grace, he giveth another grace, when he rewardeth with glory. In Pf. 6. Save me according to thy mercy, and not according to my merits. In Ser. de Natal. Dom. All men, before and under the Law, and under Grace, are saved by the nativity of Christ.

8. Rupert Tuitienfis was Abbot of that Monastery near to Colein, about the year 1112. Gesner hath a large Catalogue of his works. In his Commentary upon John, lib. 1. cap. 1. he saith, By onely grace are we brought into the Kingdom of Heaven, which we can conquest not by merits of our own works. Ibid. lib. 2. cap. 2. Christ buildeth his Church on a sure rock, to wit, on himself ; Cephas had his name changed, and was called Peter, from this rock ; whereby is signified, that upon all which are built on that foundation, which is Christ, shall be named a new name (as the Prophet saith) which the mouth of the Lord hath named. Ibid. lib. 12. cap. 15. The Church of the elect, sojourning in this world, abideth not always in one estate, but sometimes shineth with the graces of the Spirit, sometimes it is obscure, and shineth less, being under oppression, until the mutability of this world be finished. And cap. 16. It is the rule of the Catholique Church, to direct her prayers unto God the Father, through Jesus Christ our Lord, because there is no other door, nor way, but by him--- his name onely is the necessary chariot of all prayer. And De Vict. Verbi. lib. 12. cap. 11. What, and how many are the chief Sacraments of our salvation ? the holy Baptism, and the Eucharist of the body and blood of our Lord ; these both are the gifts of our Lord, the one for remission of sins, and the other for distribution of many graces. In Prolog. in Apocalyp. he saith, Blessed are the meek (saith the Lord) for they shall inherit the earth ; both of them who shall enjoy, and who shall not enjoy, we have a remarkable example in the spies----- for among those, Joshua and Caleb were meek, that is, they acknowledged the truth, and were not repugnant unto it--- What is the holy Scripture, but the very Land of promise? and what it was to them to go bodily out of the Land of Egypt, and to enter into the Land of promise, is unto us to go out of the land of darkness, or ignorance, and to enter into the knowledge of God by the truth of the Scriptures----- When we read or hear the Scriptures, we see not God face to face, but the vision of God, which certainly will be perfected, is begun here by the Scriptures. Ibid. lib. 2. cap. 2. Neither do they promote the sons of the Church for their virtues, but the daughters, that is, the effeminate and vicious persons for their gifts unto the offices of the Church: Do not they who are so promoted, hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitans? for Clemens reporteth, that Nicolaus was rebuked for his jealousy towards his wife, and that he answered, Let any man have her who listeth: And from this answer, the unbelievers inferred, that the Apostles permitted unto all men the common use of women. Is not this like unto that doctrine, that they will not have lawful marriage, because it is forbidden by the laws of the Church? and nevertheless they live incontinently; yea, they do worse, imitating the married when they please, and though they have not a lawful bed, they are lecherous in such a manner, that they have not broken any bond of marriage. Ibid. cap. 3. It is not possible that any of these whom God hath predestinated unto the Crown, can lose their Crown; it may be, and it hath come to pass, that some lose the Crown, whom God hath called by a visible calling, or which might have been heard by man. Ibid. lib. 6. cap. 11. Excepting the Apostles, whatsoever other thing afterwards is said, let it be cut off, neither have any authority; therefore albeit after the Apostles there be any holy man, how wise soever he be, let him not have that authority, seeing the Lord speaketh in the Scriptures. Ibid. lib. 11. cap. 20. Possibly one will say, Since Christ overcame death, and ascended into the heavens, doth he descend thence again? surely he descendeth, but invisibly----- all the world hath heard his descending--- when a sound was heard from heaven as of the Spirit coming, and filled the house where they were sitting, did not Christ then descend from heaven? Is the substance, or Majesty of the Son, separated from the Spirit, that when the holy Ghost descendeth, the Son of God descendeth not also? certainly he descendeth not in the form of his manhood, yet undoubtedly he descendeth in his uncircumscribed Deity, or in the Spirit that he giveth; and he descendeth to visit the Nations, by his Messengers whom he inspireth.

9. Bernard in Epist. 56. ad Gaufrid. Episco. Carnot. writeth, that Notbert Præmonstratenfis did teach, that Antichrist was before the doors, and to be revealed in the same age: Within these few days (saith Bernard there) I obtained to see this mans face, and I learned many things from an heavenly fistule, to wit, from his mouth. Behold what account this Author made of him, who spake thus. Hen. Oram in Nomenclat. saith, this Notbert was the beginner of the Order of Monks in the Diocly of Magdeburgh. Pol. Vergil. de inven. rer. lib. 7. cap. 3. calleth him a Priest of Lorrain; and saith, that he began that most exact Order after the rule of Augustinians; as also in that Chapter, and the preceeding, he sheweth, that sundry others, seeing (about that time) that the Monastical institutions were not observed, men becoming always worse and worse, and godliness was corrupted by riches, (quæ [pietas] ut mater illas à principio Ordini pepererat, & quotidie sunt qui ignavia sua potius quàm religioni consulant) therefore they would reform the Order, and added some new Rites, for distinction from others of the same Order, who were become looser; and by these means, the number of Orders were multiplied.

10. Theodoricus Abbot of St. Trudo at Leodium, about the year 1120. said, Simon Magus now reigneth at Rome, and not Simon Peter; and Simony is in place of the Gospel; what may we not have, if we have money? In Catal. test. verit. lib. 14. are some of his verses; concerning the Government of the Church, he saith, Vt Mosso Nisa, corvo datur ecce columba: Qualis pullus erit, quem fert commixtio talis. Hence it appeareth, that good men at that time bewailed the wretched condition of the Church.

11. Hugo de S. Victore, by Nation a Saxon, and Abbot of S. Victor at Paris, was in great account about the year 1130. His works are extant in three Tomes. In one place he saith, The Clerks of our time know not the Law, nor learn they it; but they study vanity, ease, surfeiting and drunkenness; they are often in the streets, seldom in the Churches; slow to search the faults of sinners, and ready to follow the trace of hares; they give more bread to dogs than to the poor; their beds are better arayed then the altars--- the barking of dogs, and lowing of oxen, is more pleasant unto God then the singing of such Clerks---their preaching may be dispised, whose life is condemned. Of our communion with Christ, he saith on Iohn 6. The Lord, shewing a difference betwixt the bread he gave, and which they did eat in the wilderness, saith, I am the bread of life: for he is the bread wherewith an hungry soul is refreshed, which is, when true faith embraceth him; for by faith we love him, and by love we are united unto Christ, which is our life; therefore this spiritual bread is eaten by faith, even without Sacramental eating, and is profitable unto salvation dayly; we have need of this bread, while this present life endureth: and so said Augustine, Why preparest thou thy teeth and stomach? believe, and thou hast eaten. On Chapter 20. he saith, Whose sins ye forgive, i. e. whose sins are forgiven by you, God also forgiveth them: this is spoken generally, not onely unto the Apostles, (as some say, this is the prerogative of the Apostles) but it is spoken and granted unto all their successors. On Rom. 2. The written Law is called the Law of works, because men under the Law, thought that all their righteousness was in the works of the Law; but the Law of Faith and Grace, is so called, because men under Grace, set the sum and efficacy of their salvation on Grace onely, knowing, that as no man is saved by righteousness of his works, so none is justified by works of his righteousness; for righteousness is not of good works, but good works are of righteousness. On Chapter 4. If man had not sinned, he should have had perfect righteousness, which consisteth in the perfect fulfilling of God's commands; so that he should have had no lust against reason, and he might have loved God with all his heart; but after sin, and for sin, man cannot have this perfect righteousness, unto which eternal life is justly due; but God of his grace giveth faith unto man, and of the same grace reputeth it for that perfection, as if he had the perfection of righteousness. De Scriptura & Scriptor. Sacris cap. 1. he saith, That Scripture onely is truly called Divine, which was from the Spirit of God, and written by those who spoke by God's Spirit; that maketh a man divine, and reformeth him according to the image of God, by teaching to know him, and by exhorting to love him; whatsoever is taught therein, is truth; whatsoever is commanded, is good; and whatsoever is promised, is blessedness; for God is truth without falshood, goodness without wickedness, and blessedness without misery. In cap. 6. & 7. All Divine Scripture is contained in the Old and New Testaments: and when he hath divided the Old Testament into the Law, Prophets, and Hagiographa, and hath reckoned the Books that are in the Hebrew Canon, he addeth, There be also other Books, as Wisdom, the Books of Syracides, Judith, Tobias, and the Maccabees, that are read indeed, but are not rolled in the Canon.

Catol. test. ver. lib. 15. Likewise De Sacramentis fidei lib. 1. cap. 28. If it be asked, What is original sin in us? It is a corruption, or vice, by which in our birth we draw ignorance in our minde, and concupiscence in the flesh. And cap. 19. In the estate of innocence, the flesh as a weak beast, did bear the Spirit sweetly, having neither spur nor bridle; or if there was any bridle then, wherewith the flesh, which cannot go by it self, was ruled, yet it had not need of a bridle to restrain it, because it was not impetuous. Lib. 2. cap. 11. Some Fathers have said, That the Saints see all things, because they see him who seeth all things: I dare say no more but this, they see as much as pleaseth him-- it is hard to judge any more. But thou wilt say, If they hear me not, I speak in vain unto them which neither hear nor understand. Behold, let us say, Saints hear not the words of them that pray unto them; nor doth it impair their blessedness, that they know not what is done abroad: Let us say then, they hear not. But doth not God hear? Why art thou solicitous then, whether they hear, or how much they hear, seeing God heareth, for whose sake thou prayest? he seeth thy humility, and will reward thy devotion. Ibid. To. 5. cap. 10. The Sacrament is given in both kindes, to the end we may believe, that thereby a twofold effect is signified; for it hath the vertue (as Ambrose saith) to preserve both body and soul. Ibid. par. 15. cap. 7. It is more probable, we should believe that every soul suffereth punishment in those places especially where they have sinned; but if there be any other place of these punishments, it is not easie to prove.

12. Bernard Abbot of Clarevaux, or Clareval, was famous in that time. He oft complaineth of the defection of the Church; as in sesto Convers. Pauli Ser. 1. he saith, The whole multitude of Christians seemeth to have conspired against thee, O Christ; from the least to the greatest, from the sole of the foot to the crown of the head, there is no soundness. Iniquity proceedeth from the Priests, thy Vicars, which seem to be Governors of thy people--- alas! alas! O Lord God, they are first in pursuing thee, who seem to desire and have the primacy in thy Church--- Now holy Orders are given for filthy gain; they seem to abound in godliness, while they take on them the charge of souls, but their least thought is of the safety; and can any persecution be more grievous unto the Savior of souls?--- many Antichrists are in our days--- Christ seeth this, and is silent; our Savior suffereth, and dissembleth; and we must also be silent, and dissemble, especially concerning our Prelates, and Masters of the Church--- The Ministers and Vicars of Christ think it necessary to observe what they command, but they will not consider what is the will of their Master, &c. In a word, none can more sharply rebuke the vicious lives of Bishops and Abbots, then Bernard did in his time; as appeareth especially in his Epist. 42. albeit not with open hostility, nor would he make a Schism in the Church. Yea, he did not spare the Popes, as appeareth partly by what he wrote unto Eugenius, and in Epist. 178. unto Innocentius II. he saith, It is the one voice of all, who have any faithful care of people among us, that righteousness perisheth in the Church; the keys of the Church are not regarded, the authority of Bishops is despised, because none of them endeavor to revenge the offences committed against God; nor can any correct unlawful things in his own Dioc; they lay all the blame upon you, and the Court of Rome; they say, that ye throw down what they have lawfully built, and ye have established things which they have justly condemned. Yea, for his liberty in speaking against the Errors of his time, he was detested and reproached, so that he was necessitated to publish Apologies; namely, see that Apologia ad Willerm. Abbat. where he saith, that they called him, the most miserable of men; one who durst presume to judge the world, and by the shadow of

of Bernard.

He was

of his baseness insult over the lights of the world; yea, not a ravenous wolf in a sheeps skin, but a biting flea, or a base moth: and he saith there, that he was like to be killed every day, and was judged as a sheep for the slaughter: and nevertheless, he was not afraid to speak of their vices, because (saith he) Melius est ut scandalum oriatur, quam veritas relinquatur. And he continueth telling them, that at that time a small train was called avarice; sobriety was thought austerly; and silence, sadness: but looseness was called wisdom; prodigality, liberality; babling, affability; jeering, mirth; softness of clothes, and pride of horses, honesty; superfluous ornaments of beds, cleanliness; and when one doth so unto another, that is called charity; and so charity destroyeth charity, and discretion confoundeth true discretion; and such mercy is full of cruelty, because thereby the body is served, and souls are killed---- Who at the beginning, when the Order of Monks began, could think that Monks would become so naughty? O how unlike are we unto those in the days of Antonius! ---- Did Macarius live in such a maner? did Basilus teach so? did Antony ordain so? did the Fathers in Egypt carry themselves so? ---- I will speak, I will speak, though I be called presumptuous, yet I will speak truth; How is the light of the world become darkness? how is the salt of the earth made unsavoury? they whose lives should have been a pattern of life unto others, are become blinde guides of the blinde, when they shew example of such pride---- I am a liar, if I have not seen an Abbot having above sixty horses in his train: when ye saw them riding, ye might say, these were not Fathers of Monasteries, but Lords of Castles; not feeders of souls, but Princes of Provinces: they must have carried after them, their table-cloths, cups, basins, candlesticks, and portmanteaus stuffed, not with straw, but ornaments of beds: scarcely will any of them go four miles from his house, but he must have all chattels with him, as if he were going into a leagure, or through a wilderness, where necessities could not be had---- O vanity of vanities, but not so vain as mad! the walls of Churches are glorious, and poor folk have necessity; the stones are covered with gold, and the children are naked, &c. One may say, yet Bernard was a serious follower of the Popes; yes, he gave them all the titles that the flatterers could, or were wont to give: but see what blows he gave them, as appeareth by what he wrote to Innocentius, and what is here above in Eugenius II. he layeth on them the blame of all the wickedness in the Church; and he proveth, that they had not right to usurp as they did. In Rites he was carried with the sway of the times, and these were the lesser things; but behold his doctrine of faith, how different it was from the tenets of Rome now; and if you will know the Giant by his foot, note these passages. In the Sermo. de multipl. utilis. verbi Dei, he saith, The word of God, sounding in the ears of the soul, doth trouble, terrifie, and judge; but anon, if you observe, it quickeneth, meltereth, warmeth, enlighteneth, and cleanseth: briefly, it is our food, and sword, and medicine, confirmation and rest; it is also our resurrection, and consummation. And think it not a wonder that God's word is called now, all in all in respect of justification, seeing it shall be all in all unto glorification: Then let a sinner hear it, [note] and be afraid; a carnal soul shall tremble at that voice, for that word is lively and efficacious, it searcheth all the corners of the heart; so that though thou wert dead in sin, if thou wilt hear the voice of the Son of God, thou shalt live; for the word that he speaketh, is spirit and life: If thy heart be hard, remember how the Scripture saith, He sendeth forth his word, and it melteth them; and, My soul melted when my beloved spoke. If thou be lukewarm, and fearest to be cast out, go not away from the word of God, and it will warm thee, for his word is hot as fire; and if thou

bewailest the darknes of ignorance, hearken diligently what the Lord will speak in thee, and his word shall be a light unto thy feet, and a lantern unto thy steps; and if thou be the more sad, that the more thou art enlightened, thou seest the more clearly, even thy least offences, the Father will sanctifie thee by the truth, which is his word, that thou mayest hear with the Apostles, Now ye are clean, for, or through the word that I have spoken unto you: and when thou wasest thy hands, behold, he hath prepared a table before thee, that thou shalt not live by bread onely, but by every word that proceedeth from the mouth of God, and by the strength of that food, thou mayest run the way of his commands; if an army were set against thee, and a skirmish of tentation, take unto thee the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, and thereby shalt thou easily triumph; or if it shall happen (as in battels it is usual) that thou be wounded, he will send forth his word, and heal thee; and he shall deliver thee from death, that in thee also it may be verified what the Centurion said, Lord, onely say the word, and my servant shall be healed: But if yet thou stumblest, confesse and cry, My feet are almost gone, and my steps are well nigh slipt; and by his word he will strengthen thee, that thou shalt learn experimentally, that even the heavens are made strong by the word of the Lord, and all their power is by the breath of his mouth. In Epist. 91. ad Abbates Suefioni congreg. I would be in that Council, where the traditions of men are not obstinately defended, nor superstitiously observed, but where they search diligently and humbly, what is the good, acceptable, and perfect will of God; thither am I carried with all my desire, and there would I abide devoutly---- God onely willeth not to be better then he is, because he cannot: Let them be gone both from me, and from you, which say, We will not be better then our fathers; protesting that they are the children of the lukewarm and dissolute; the remembrance of these is with a curse, for they have eaten four grapes, wherewith the childrens teeth are set on edge: or if they do glory in holy parents of good memory, let them follow their holiness, while they stand for their dispensations, and connivences, as for a law. And in Tract. de Præcept. & Dispens. Many things were devised and ordained, not because they might not be otherwise, but because it was so expedient, and certainly but for conserving charity; therefore so long as the things do serve charity, let them stand without change; nor can they be changed without offence, no nor by the Rulers: But contrarily, if they be contrary unto charity, in the judgement of such onely unto whom it is granted to see so, and unto whom it is committed to foresee, is it not clearly most righteous, that what things were devised for charity, should also be omitted, or intermitted for charity, when it is so expedient, or at least that they be changed to another thing more expedient: as on the other side, certainly it were unjust, if these things that were ordained for charity, be held against charity. Let them therefore hold fast what is immoveable---- nor do I onely think so, or first speak so, the Popes have so spoken---- Leo saith, Where it is not needful, change not the institutions of the holy Fathers; but if there shall be necessity, for the benefit of the Church, let him who hath power dispense with them; for a law is changed upon necessity: Now by necessary, or unviolable, I understand not what is delivered by men, but what is proclaimed by God, that they may not be changed but by him which gave it; for example, Thou shalt not kill---- and all the other commandments of that Table; albeit these can no way be dispensed with by men, nor was it ever lawful, nor shall it ever be lawful unto any man to loose one of these any way, yet the Lord hath loosed them when he pleased; as when he commanded the Hebrews to spoil the Egyptians----- and therefore when we read that any good man hath done any time otherwise, and the Scripture doth not witness that God hath commanded him, we must confess that they have sinned as men, or that they have received a particular warrant from God, as some Prophets did---- But what will I have to be thought necessary, and unchangeable? truly that onely which is confirmed by Divine and eternal reason, so that is changed no way, not by God himself: under this kinde is all which our Lord did teach in that Sermon on the mount; and whatsoever is delivered in the Old and New Testaments concerning love, humility, meekness, and other vertues to be observed spiritually; for these are such, that it is not lawful, nor expedient to do otherwise at any time--- At all times, unto every person, these things bring death if they be despised, and life if they be observed, &c. Behold how these Abbots had a purpose of Reformation, but were hindered by others upon that ground of former practice, or ordinances; and how Bernard excuseth former practices, and yet would have had a change; and still maketh the word of God to be the rule. In the same Treatise he saith, True obedience knoweth no law, nor is restrained to any bounds--- by vigor of free, and a glad minde, it considereth not measure, but is enlarged into infinite liberty--- this is the property of the just man, for whom the law is not made; not that he should live without a law, but because he is not under the law, and is not content with the vow of any profession, which he overcometh by the devotion of his minde. In Traict. de Gra. & lib. arbit. This work [of sanctification] cannot be done without two, one by whom, and another in, or to whom it is done. God is the Author of salvation, and free will is capable onely--- we have will from free-will, but not the power to do what we will; I say not, will to do good, or will to do evil, but onely will; for to do well is increase, to do ill is decrease; to will simply, is that which increaseth, or decreaseth: Creating grace made free-will, saving grace maketh it to increase, but it prostrateth it self to decrease: so free-will maketh us willing, and grace maketh us to will well. Near the end he saith, What hast thou, that thou hast not received? thou art created, healed, saved; Man, which of these hast thou of thy self? which of these is not impossible unto free-will? thou which wast not, could not create; nor being a sinner, couldst thou justifie; nor being dead, couldst raise thy self: I do pass these good things, that are necessary unto them which must be healed, and laid up for them that shall be saved; but what I say, is clear for the first and last, as none doubted of the middle thing, but he who knoweth not the righteousness of God, and would set up his own, not being subject unto the righteousness of God. And he concludeth there, Without doubt it is of God both to will and to do, according to his good will; therefore God is the Author of thy good work; he both applicth the will unto work, and maketh the work easie unto will; or if we will speak properly, these which we call our merits, are some seeds of hope, proofs of love, tokens of hid predestination, presages of future felicity, the way of the Kingdom, not the cause of reigning: In a word, whom he justifieth, not whom he findeth just, doth he glorifie. In fest. omnium Sanct. Ser. 1. What can all our righteousness avail before God? shall it not be reputed as a filthy rag? saith the Prophet; and if it be narrowly examined, all our righteousness shall be found unrighteousness, and naught; and if our righteousness cannot stand for it self, what shall become of our sins? therefore we must pray with the Psalmist, Lord, enter not into judgement with thy servant; and with all humility let us flee unto mercy, which onely can save our souls. And Ser. 2. Who can say, I have a clean heart? who can say, The snare is broken, and my feet are safe from falling, seeing the Apostle saith, Let him who standeth, take heed lest he fall? and of himself he saith, O wretched man! who shall deliver me?---

In Annunt. B. Mariae Serm. 1. Thou must first believe, that thou canst not have remission of sin, but by the mercy of God: next, that thou canst not have any good work, unless he give even that: thirdly, that thou canst by no works merit eternal life, but that it is given freely--- for the Apostle saith, We are justified freely by faith---- Who is a better man then the Prophet? of whom God witnesseth, I have found a man according to mine own heart; and nevertheless he had need to say, Lord, enter not into judgement with thy servant; therefore let no man deceive himself. In Feria 4. Heb. Dom. Panos. Worthy is the Lamb which was slain, to receive power for doing that he came for, to take away the sins of the world; I mean, a three-fold sin waxing on the earth; think ye that I will say, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life? indeed that is a three-fold cord which is not easily broken--- but I intend to speak of another threefold sin, which also the vertue of the Cross doth overcome, & possibly that may be heard with more profit; the first is original, another is personal, and the third is singular. Original sin is the greatest of all sin, which we all have from the first Adam, in whom we all have sinned, and for which we all do die; certainly it is the greatest, which hath so defiled all mankind, that there is none free, none save one; it is extended from the first man, until the last; and this poison in each one, runneth from the sole of the foot, unto the top of the head; yea also, it is spread abroad through every age, from the day when each man is conceived by his mother, until that day when the common mother receiveth him--- and certainly that original sin is very grievous, and infecteth not onely the person, but even nature; and yet personal sin is more grievous unto every one, when with loose reins we give our members, as weapons of unrighteousness, unto sin, being guilty now, not so through the fault of another, but by our own fault; the singular fault is the most grievous, which is done against the Lord of Majesty, when wicked men kill a just man unjustly---- How wilt thou, Lord, make the thirsty drink of the river of thy pleasure, who so doest pour the oyl of thy mercy on them who crucifie thee? It is clear then, that this passion is most powerful to take away all sorts of sins. And in the next Sermon De cana Dom. A Sacrament is a holy sign, or a holy secret thing; for many things are done for themselves onely, but other things are done to sanctifie other things, and these are called, and are signs: for to take example from usual things; a ring is given simply for a ring, and there is no signification; and it is given for investing into an inheritance, and then it is a sign; so that he which receiveth it may say, This ring is little worth, but the inheritance was I seeking. After this maner, when the Lord was to suffer, he would invest his disciples in his grace, that invisible grace was given unto them by a visible sign: For this end were all the Sacraments ordained, as the Eucharist, the washing of feet, and Baptism, the first of all Sacraments, wherein we are com- planted to the similitude of his death--- What is the grace into which we are invested by Baptism? certainly cleansing away of sin; for who can bring a clean thing out of unclean, but he onely who is clean, and on whom sin falleth not, even God? and indeed the Sacrament of this grace before, was circumcision---- I have often said it unto you, nor should ye ever forget it, that in the fall of our first parents, we all did fall; and we have fallen upon a heap of stones, and among clay, so that we are not onely defiled, but wounded and broken grievously; we may be washed soon, but we have need of much dressing ere we be healed; we are washed in Baptism, and thereby is the hand-writing of damnation blotted away; and this grace is given unto us, that lust should not hurt us, if we do not consent unto it; and so the corrupt matter of that old ulcer is removed, when damnation is taken off; and the answer of death proceedeth from it. But who can endure the itching of that ulcer? be of good chear, that in this also grace will help; and that ye may be assured, ye have the investiture of the Sacrament [note] of the Lord's precious body and blood; for that Sacrament worketh two things in us, it diminisheth the feeling in the smaller sins, and taketh away the consent in the more grievous. If now any of you do not feel so oft so bitter motions of wrath, envy, lechery, and such others, let him give thanks unto the body and blood of our Lord, because the vertue of the Sacrament worketh in him, and he should rejoyce that the wretched ulcer is like to be healed. But what shall we do, seeing so long as we are in this body of sin, and in this evil time, we cannot be without sin? shall we despair? God forbid: Blessed John saith, If we say, we have no sin, we deceive our selves, and the truth is not in us; but if we confess our sins, God is faithful to---- In many things we all offend; yet none should despise, or think little of that, for it is impossible to be saved with these, and it is impossible they can be washed away, but by Jesus Christ, and unless he wash them; I say therefore, let none be perniciously careless, and use the words of wickedness to excuse his sins; for (as he said unto Peter) unless Christ shall wash them away, we shall have no part with him: and yet we should not for them be too solicitous, he will forgive as readily, and gladly, if we acknowledge what we are; for in such sins, as inevitable, both immoderate fear, and carelessness, is worthy of blame; hence it is, that he hath taught us to pray dayly for the forgiveness of sins; for as I said of lust, he hath taken away the damnation of it, as the Apostle saith, There is no damnation unto them that are in Christ; nevertheless, for to humble us, he suffereth it to live in us, and to afflict us grievously, that we may know what grace doth unto us, and that we should always run unto him for help; so doth he with us in these lesser sins, by a pious dispensation, that they are not altogether taken away, but by them God will teach us, that seeing we cannot shun these lesser things, we might be sure we do not overcome greater sins by our own strength, and so we should be ever in fear, and watchful, that we lose not his grace, which we see to be so many ways necessary unto us. Super. Cant. Ser. 13. Hearken what God saith, My glory I will not give unto another. Lord, what wilt thou give unto us? he saith, Peace I give unto you, peace I leave unto you: It is enough for me, I take it thankfully what thou leavest, and I leave what thou reserveest; so I am content, and I doubt not but it is for my advantage. I do altogether abjure glory, lest if I do usurp what is not given, I do miss that which is offered, and lose it justly; peace I would have, and I desire no more; he who is not content with peace, is not content with thee; for thou art our peace, who hast made both one; this is necessary, this is enough, to be reconciled with thee, and to be reconciled with thy self; for since I became an adversary unto thee, I have been grievous unto my self; and now I am more wary, and I would not be ingrate for the benefit of peace which thou givest, nor a sacrilegious usurper of thy glory: unto thee, Lord, unto thee be glory wholly, happy am I if I have peace. Serm. 14. The Law (which never brought any man to perfection) is a yoke that neither they, nor their fathers could ever bear; but the Synagogue is strong, and careth not for a light burthen, nor a sweet yoke, she is whole, & needeth not a physician, and trusteth in the Law. Ser. 22. Whosoever being grieved for his sins, hungreth and thirsteth for righteousness, let him believe in thee, who justifiest the ungodly, and being justified by onely faith, he hath peace with God. Ser. 61. Confidently will I take what I have need of, out of the bowels of the Lord, they abound in mercy---- the piercing nail is unto me an opening key, that I may see the Lord's will; why should I not see through these holes? the nails cry, the wounds cry, that verily God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself--- therefore the mercy of the Lord, is my merit; I shall not have need of merits, so long as he wanteth not merits, and if the mercies of the Lord be manifold, I have merit enough-- Shall I sing of thy righteousness? Lord, I will mention thy righteousness only; for it is also mine, seeing that thou wast made, even of God, to be righteousness unto me: Shall I fear that it be not sufficient for us both? it is not a short mantle--- the righteousness of the Lord endureth for ever: What is longer then eternity? it will cover both thee and me sufficiently, it is a large and eternal righteousness; and indeed in me it will cover a multitude of sins, but in thee, Lord, what will it cover but treasures of piety, and riches of bountifulness. Ser. 62. The vine of the Lord, is the Church of them who are predestinated. Ser. 63. What is so powerful to heal the wounds of conscience, and to purge the sight of the minde, as the frequent meditation of Christ's wounds? Ser. 65. By the vine, I mean her which filleth the earth, whereof we are a portion; that large vine planted by the Lord's hand, redeemed by his blood, watered with his word, propagated by his grace, and made fertile by his Spirit. Ser. 66. The Spirit saith manifestly, that in the last days some shall depart from the faith, giving heed unto the spirits of errors, and doctrines of devils--- certainly he speaketh of these men now; for they forbid to marry, and abstain from meat which God hath created; but see now whether this be not properly the craft of the devil, and not of men, as the Spirit hath foretold. Ask the Author of that Sect, they can give you none: What Heresie hath not a principal Author among men? the Manichees, had Manes---- each of these pests had their master, from whom they had their beginning and name; but what name or title will ye give these? none, because that Heresie is not from men; and yet we will not say, that it is by the revelation of Christ, but rather, and without doubt (as the Spirit hath foretold) by the fraud of devils, speaking lyes in hypocrisie, and forbidding to marry: certainly they speak so in hypocrisie, and guile of the fox, faining that they do it for love of chastity, which they have devised to increase and multiply filthiness. The matter is so plain, that I admire how a Christian could ever be perswaded thereunto, except they are so beastly, that they could not perceive, how he that condemneth marriage, looseth the bridle unto all uncleanness; or certainly they are so full of wickedness, and devilish malice, that though they know it, yet they dissemble, and rejoyce in the destruction of men: Take away honorable marriage from the Church, and ye do fill her with whores, incestuous--- and all kinde of uncleanness: choose which of the two, that either all these monsters of men shall be saved, or the number of them that shall be saved, is restrained to the few which are continent. How sparing in the one, and how wide in the other! nothing less becometh the Author of honesty; shall all be condemned, but these few continent persons? this is not to be a Savior: Continence is rare on the earth; nor did he who is fullness, make himself of no reputation for so small advantage, &c. In Ser. de Triplici Gen. Honor. he exhorteth to have pity, and to pray for them who are departed, not having perfected their repentance. But in Lib. Sententiar. c. 9. he saith, There are three places, heaven, earth, and hell, and these have their own indwellers; heaven hath onely the good, the earth hath of both sorts, and hell the bad onely. And in cap. 14. he saith, Place is necessary and profitable unto repentance, to wit, the Church of this present life; in which whosoever neglecteth to repent, while he is in the body, he can finde no remedy of salvation hereafter. In Epist. 190. contra Abailar. he saith, Abailard defineth faith to be an opinion; then faith (saith he) is wavering, and our hope is vain; he who saith so, hath not as yet received the holy Ghost. Augustine saith better,

Faith

Faith is not in the heart by ghueffing or trowing, but it is a sure knowledge, the conscience also bearing witness; it is the substance of things hoped for, and not a fantasie of conjecture: by the name substance, a thing sure and certain is meant; doubtings belong unto the Academicks, which doubt of all things, and know nothing. Bernard died in the 63. year of his age, Ann. 1153.

13. The same Bernard De Consider. ad Euge. lib. 3. teacheth us, that then was a Council held at Rhems, where the Pope was also President; and with Bernards works are many Sermons, which are said certainly not to be his; among these is one, Sermo cujusdam ad clerum in Concilio Rhemensi congregat. unto me it seemeth certainly to be Bernard's, seeing the most part of it is Sup. Cant. Ser. 33. and also on Psalm. Qui habitat Ser. 6. so that either another hath borrowed it from Bernard, or he from another: This Sermon is for the most part historical, I mean, serveth to give knowledge of that time, and therefore I will transcribe it for the use of some, who (possibly) have not that Book. A weighty charge is laid upon me, to teach the Teachers, and instruct the Fathers, especially seeing it is written, Ask the Fathers, and they will declare unto thee, Deut. 32. but that Moses commandeth me, whose power is great, and must be obeyed, not by me onely, but by all; and he is greater then Moses, for unto Moses was but one people of Israel committed, and unto this the whole Church; and he is greater then an Angel, for unto which of the Angels hath God said at any time, Whatsoever thou shalt binde on earth, shall be bound also in heaven? Matth. 16. I speak in respect of office, and not of merit; if ye except God, none is like unto him in heaven, nor on earth; [ergo he is Antichrist] This is Peter, which cast himself into the sea, when all the other disciples did sail unto Jesus, Job. 21. every one of you is content with his own little ship, i.e. his Arch-Bishoprick, his Abbey, his Provestry, but he casteth himself into all the Arch-Bishopricks, Abbeys, Provestries; this sea is wide, and there the fishes cannot be told. And unto you I say, my Brethren the Bishops, God hath exalted you highly, ye are the salt of the earth, as the Lord saith in the Gospel, Matth. 5. ye are the light of the world, ibid. I have said ye are gods, and all are the children of the most High; but ye shall die as men, and shall ye not fall as one of the Princes? Psalm. 81. Where is the wise man? where is the scribe? where is the Conqueror of this world? 1 Cor. 1. shall they not die as men? and shall they not fall as one of the Princes? whence shall they fall, and whither? from the side of the Lord into the bottom of hell. Brethren, two great evils are coming, death and judgement; for hard is the condition of death, and therefore few would die; but what preparation is made for death, albeit it be the way of all flesh? alas! whither shall I go from thy Spirit? and whither shall I flee from thy face? Psalm. 138. seeing the Apostle saith, We must all appear before the throne of Christ, that every one may receive according to what he hath done in the body, whether good or ill, 2 Cor. 5. Brethren, I tell you of another Synod, where the Lord God will sit in judgment, and there we all must stand; and there will God judge all the world. Here [on earth] unrighteousness is shut up in a bag; but in that judgement, God will judge righteously; and there we must all appear (unless the Apostle hath lyed, which is a sin to say) whether he be a Pope, or a Cardinal, or an Arch-Bishop, or a Bishop, or poor, or rich, learned, or unlearned, that every one may receive according to what he hath done in the body, whether good or ill. And seeing account must be given of those things that every one hath done in the body, alas! what shall become of those things that every one hath done in the body of Christ, which is his Church? [hear] The Church of God is committed unto you, and ye are called Pastors, but are robbers.

And

*A Sermon in the Councell
at Rhems.*

And alas! we have few to feed, but many to excommunicate: and oh that ye were content with the wool, and the milk, but ye thirst after the blood. Nevertheless, four things (I think) are necessary in them, which especially are set over the Church of God; to wit, that they enter by the door; that they keep themselves in humility; that they flee avarice; that they endeavor to cleanness both of heart and body. But what availeth it that they be chosen canonically (which is to enter by the door) if they live not canonically? The Lord said unto the twelve, Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil? Ioh. 6. Lord Jesu, seeing that election was in thine hand, and there was none to contradict thee, why didst thou choose a devil to be a Bishop? good Jesus, why didst thou not choose a good, just, and holy man, as Peter was good, just, and holy? or if thou chocest a devil, why talkest thou that thou hast chosen him? Brethren, to day Jesus doth the like, he chooseth many devils to be Bishops. Alas! alas! where shall we finde Bishops, that after they have come to Dignity, keep themselves in humility? yea, pride moveth them to aspire unto so great Dignity, that they will break into the fold of Christ impudently; albeit the Lord hath said in the Psalmist, A proud man shall not dwell in my house. But Jesus is in the midst of it, and not in a corner, as he saith Matth. 18. Where two or three are gathered in my name, I am there in the midst of them. And Luke 4. Jesus passed through the midst of them. And Eccles. 15. In the midst of the Church God openeth his mouth. And again Luke. 24. Jesus stood in the midst of his disciples. Wo unto me Lord Jesu, if I be with thee in thy house, and be not in the midst of thy house. But these are not so, they are indeed with Jesus, but not in the midst of his house; because they love pride, and do the works of pride, exalting their parents, neglecting and oppressing the poor; they live wickedly, and they will have their subjects to live wickedly; therefore are they compared to the apostate Angel, which said in his heart, I will set my seat in the north, &c. Isa. 14. What is it that the devil will set his seat in the north, but that he desireth some proud and wicked man to have the Government over others like unto him, far from the heat of love, or light of wisdom? or that such an one keep the Government when he hath gotten it? Such was Absolon over the children of Israel, 2 Reg. 15. disobedient to his father, and ambitious of Government. Such was Jeroboam, he sinned, and caused others to sin with the golden calves, 2 Reg. 12. Such were the Scribes and Pharisees, to whom the Lord said, wo to you, ye shut the Kingdom of Heaven before men; ye enter not, and ye suffer not others to enter, Matth. 23. Moreover, how can the Bishops of these times flee from avarice? for (which cannot be spoken without sad sighs) the reproaches of Christ, the spits, thongs, nails, spear, cross and death, all these do they melt in the furnace of avarice, and send them abroad to purchase filthy gain, and quickly put up the price of all in their own pockets; differing truly from Judas Iscariot in this onely, that all his gain was reckoned to be some pennies, but they with a greedier voracity of gain, do gather infinite sums: On this do they gape with unsatiable desire; they are afraid to want them, and if they miss them, they are sorry; they do rest in the love of these so far onely, as they have free-will of heaping together, or care to make them more; the decay, or salvation of souls is not thought upon. These certainly are not mothers, seeing albeit they are become very gross, fat, and rich upon the patrimony of him that was crucified, yet they have not pity on Joseph's affliction. The Arch-Priest goeth about his bounds, and to fill his sack, he giveth the blood of the just; for he selleth murders, adulteries, incests, fornications, sacriledges, perjuries, and so he filleth his pockets to the brim. The report of such gain cometh unto the Bishop; the Arch-Priest is sent for; Give me my part, saith the Bishop. He answereth, I give thee nothing. Then saith the Bishop, If thou wilt not give me my part, I will take all from thee. Then followeth chiding, and discord, through avarice. Yet thereafter, the Arch-Priest considering with himself, that by the authority of the Bishop he hath that power, and without his favor he cannot have it, then (repenting wickedly) he saith, I am sorry, take your part, and also of my part what you please. So they are reconciled alas, as Herod and Pilate were reconciled, and Christ is crucified; yet they are reconciled, and Christ's poor ones are spoiled. Behold these times, so filthy with these works of darkness! wherefore wo unto this generation, for the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy, if it can be called hypocrisy, which now cannot be hid, it is so frequent, and which seeketh not to be hid, it is so shameless. And this rotten Imposthume now, now spreadeth thorow all the body of the Church the broader, the more desperately; and the more inward, the more dangerously: for if an open Heretick were rising, he might be cast forth, and wither; if a violent enemy, one might perhaps hide himself from him; but now, how shall he be cast out? or how can one hide himself? all are friends and enemies; all are familiars, and none peaceable; and all do seek themselves. They are the servants of Christ, and do serve Antichrist; they walk in honor with the goods of the Lord, but give him no honor; And hence is this (which ye see dayly) whorish glittering, stage-habits, royal robes; hence is the gold on the bridles, saddles, and spurs; their spurs are more costly then the altars; hence are their cup-boards so glorious with plates and cups; hence are their surfeits and drunkenness; hence are their harps, flutes and pipes; their full wine-cillers, and garners flowing one into another; hence are their barrels for painting, and full purses. The Provosts, Deans, Bishops, and Arch-Bishops, are and will be such; neither come they by these things through their deserving, but by these works of darkness: It was foretold in former times, and now it is come to pass; Behold, in peace is my most bitter bitterness, Isa. 21. Bitter before in the death of Martyrs, more bitter thereafter in the conflict with Hereticks, but now most bitter with the manners of Domesticks; they cannot be put out, they are so strong, and so many without number. The wound of the Church is within, and incurable; and therefore in peace is my bitterness most bitter: But in what peace? peace there is, and no peace; peace from Heathens, peace from Hereticks, but truly no peace from the Children. It was a voice of one, mourning in time of Israel, I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me, Isa. 1. They have rebelled, and become strong for their filthy use, their filthy gain, their filthy merchandise, and that business, walking in darkness; there remaineth, but that from the midst of them should appear that noon-dive to deceive, if there be any as yet in Christ, continuing in simplicity, seeing he hath swallowed the floods of the wise, and the rivers of the mighty, and he is confident that Jordan (i. e. the humble, and the simple that are in the Church) may flow into his mouth, Iob 40. for he is that Antichrist, which falsely saith, that he is not day onely, but the noon-day; and is exalted above that which is worshipped as God, whom the Lord Jesus will kill with the spirit of his mouth, and destroy with the brightness of his coming, 2 Thes. 2. Behold, I have told you what Pastors we have in this way wherein we walk, and not what Pastors they should be. They are all the friends of the Bridegroom, who are now the Bridegrooms of the Church; they are seen to stand round about her. & (as it is commonly said) to stand on her right hand, but few are those that seek not themselves in all things that are dear unto her. They love gifts; nor can they likewise love Christ, because they lift up their hands to mammon. Behold how they walk glancing and attired, clothed with various colours, as a bride coming out of her chamber; if unawares you saw one of them walking far off, would ye not say, it were a bribe, and not the groom? whence (think ye) can flow this abundance of things, splendor of clothes, prodigality of tables, heaps of gold and silver vessels, but of the brides goods? and in the mean time she is left poor, needy, and naked; in her face, to be pited, rough-haired and pale: this is not to adorn, but to spoil the bride; not to keep, but to destroy her; not to defend, but to cast her out; not to instruct, but to prostitute her; not to feed the flock of Christ, but to kill and devour her; as the Lord saith of them, Psalm 52. They eat up my people as they eat bread. And again Psalm 78. They have devoured Jacob, and laid his land desolate. And in another Prophet, Hof. 4. They eat the sins of my people. As if he had said, They crave the prices of sins, and have no care of the sinners. Whom will ye name among all the Bishops, who is not more careful to empty the peoples purses, then to root up their vices? who is he that will soften his wrath? where is he that preacheth the acceptable year of the Lord? therefore let us leave these, which are not Pastors, but Traitors, and let us follow them, who while they did live, have planted the Church with their blood; and indeed these have come into the place of their Ministry, but not in their zeal; all would be successors, but few are their followers. O that they were vigilant in their charge, as they run gladly into their chair, then they would watch diligently, and take heed unto the Church which is committed unto them; yea, they would take heed unto themselves, lest it be said of them, My friends and neighbors gathered against me, and stood afar off, Psal. 37. certainly it was a just complaint, and can be applied to no age more justly then to ours. It is a small thing that our Pastors do not keep us, unless they also destroy; for they being grievously drowned in the sleep of oblivion, are awakened with no thunder of divine threatning, so much as to fear their own danger; hence it is that they save not their people, because they save not themselves, but do kill and perish together. And what shall I say more? the Bishops and Priests of these days, how diligent are they to keep the holiness (without which none shall see God) of chastity both of soul and body? truly the Lord saith in the Gospel, Luc. 12. unto Bishops, without doubt in the primitive Church, Let your loins be girded; not approving onely, but commanding chastity. The holy Ghost witnesseth also in the Law, 1 Reg. 21. None might eat the shew-bread, but they who were clean, and namely from women: and therefore Achimelech would not give that bread unto David, craving it for himself and his Soldiers, until he knew that they were clean from women; as David said, If you speak of women, these three days they have been clean; The holy Ghost at that time shewing, that none should come unto Christ's table, and unto that bread of Angels, unless he be pure both in minde and body; lest that which the grace of God hath prepared unto believers for their salvation, be turned into judgement and condemnation unto them that take it unworthily. But how do these keep the badge of chastity, which are given over into a reprobate minde, and commit things not convenient? for it is filthy to speak the things that the Bishops do in secret; therefore I think it better to dissemble this, and delay, rather then to speak that which may offend the innocent; but why should I blush to speak, what they do not blush to do? yea, and what the Apostle spareth not to write and preach? for the excellent Preacher saith, Rom. 1. Men with men wrought filthiness, and they received the wages of their error. Brethren, I am unwise, but ye have compelled me. So far there. Here were bold rebukes; but what followed thereupon, I have not read in any History: but I observe somewhat from Bernard De Consider. lib. 3. where he writeth unto Pope Eugenius, saying,

Did

Did not thy mouth pronounce these following Articles in the Council at Rhems? who hath kept them? who keepeth them? thou art deceived, if thou think that they are kept; if thou thinkest not, thou hast sinned, either in ordaining what should not be kept, or in dissembling when they are not kept. Thou wilt say, We have commanded that both Bishops, and Clerks, should neither in superfluity, nor in variety of colours, nor in the cutting of their clothes, nor in raising give offence unto beholders (unto whom they should be a pattern) but rather by their actions condemn faults, and by their conversation shew forth the love of innocence, as the dignity of the order of Clerks requireth. And, if being admonished by the Bishops, they do not obey within fourteen days, let them be deprived of their Church-Benefices, by the Authority of the same high Priest. And if the Bishops shall neglect to execute the foresaid punishment (because the faults of inferiors, can be imputed unto none more, then unto the idle and slothful rulers) let them abstain from the Pontifical Office, until they do punish their Clerks, as is now ordained by us. This also we thought good, that none be an Arch-Deacon, or Dean, but a Deacon, or Priest. And the Arch-Deacons, Deans, and Provests, who are under these Orders, if they be negligent to keep in order the disobedient, let them be deprived of their honor. We forbid also that these foresaid honors be confirmed on yong men, or that are below these holy Orders, unless they be remarkable in wisdom, and merit of conversation. Thou didst ordain these things, but what hath been done? as yet yong men, and who are below these holy Orders, are promoted in the Church. As for the first head, prodigality of clothes was forbidden, but it is not restrained; punishment was appointed, but it hath not followed. Now there be four years since we heard that Order given, and we have not lamented for any Clerk deprived of his Benefice, nor from any Bishop suspended from his Office: but it deserveth most bitter sorrow what hath followed; what is that? impunity, the daughter of carelesness, the mother of pride, the root of shamelessness, and the nurse of sin, &c. Mr. Fox in Act. & Monim. saith, That in this Council at Rhems, it was ordained, that no Monk should baptise, nor be a witness at baptism, nor hear confessions, nor visit the sick, nor be present at burials. Hence it appeareth, how impudently the Jesuit Duræus did sometime scold with W. Whitaker, for saying, that good men did resist to far as they could, until the mystery of iniquity had overtaken all the Church, and gone through all the parts thereof. Did not Bernard, or whosoever was the Author of that Sermon, say unto the Council, That the Imposthume was spread through all the body of the Church, from the sole to the top, the Bride was spoiled, and even they which were called the Bridegrooms of the Church, were not the friends of the Bridegroom? And did not the Council so far take with this rebuke, that some Acts were made for Reformation, but no Reformation did follow?

14. Before I do leave Bernard, here I do add an History from P. Soave in Histor. Conc. Triden. lib. 2. concerning the degrees of the worship which is given unto the Virgin Mary. After the impieties (saith he) of Nestorius, dividing Christ, making two sons, and denying that he, who was born of the Virgin Mary, is God; the Church, desirous to ingraft this Catholique truth in the mindes of believers, thought good to repeat often in the Churches, both of the East and West, these two words, Μαρια Θεοτοκον, i. e. Mary the Mother of God: This indeed was appointed for the honor of Christ; but by little and little, it was communicated unto the Mother, and at last referred altogether unto her alone. Upon the same ground, when the use of Images became frequent, they were wont to paint the babe Christ in the arms of his Mother the Virgin, to testify the worship which was due unto him even in that age; but quickly they began to worship the Mother, without the Son, and he was added as a pendicle of the picture. Thereafter Writers and Preachers, especially who were given to speculation, being miscarried with the wilfulness of the people (which is powerful in such things) as with a land-flood, did omit the remembring of Christ, and with earnestness strove to devise new praises, epithets, and sorts of religious worship, unto the blessed Virgin: So that about the year 1050. they devised for her honor, the dayly Office, which is distinguished into seven Canonical hours, after the same manner as in former times it was wont to be done to the honor of God. In one hundred years next following, the veneration grew so, that it seemed to have come unto the height, those titles being given unto her, which in the Scriptures are spoken of the Divine wisdom. Among the priviledges then devised, was that of universal freedom from original sin; which opinion had been in the mindes onely of some private persons, but was not yet come among the Ceremonies of the Church, nor into the mindes of the learned. About the year 1136. the Canons of Lions durst first bring it into the Service of the Church; S. Bernard flourishing at that time, for piety and learning, before all the Divines of that age, and so immoderate in the praises of the blessed Virgin, that in some place he calleth her, The neck of the Church; as if by her, all grace did flow from the Head: nevertheless, he sharply writeth against these Canons, that without reason, and without example of former times, they had brought in so dangerous a novelty; he confesseth, that they had matter enough to commend the blessed Virgin, but such ambitious novelty (which is the mother of fondness, the sister of superstition, and daughter of levity) could not please her. In that Epistle of Bernard, it is remarkable (which P. Soave toucheth not) that the Canons did alledge, they had a writ of revelation for them. Bernard dispiseth that, saying, Even as if any man could not produce a writ, wherein the Virgin may seem to command, to give the same worship unto her parents, according to the word of God, saying, Honor thy father and mother; I perswade my self easily to give no credit unto such writs, that are not confirmed by reason, nor certain Authority, &c. I say this is remarkable, that Bernard did reject their pretended revelations, as a means whereby they might have been deceived, not in that onely, but in other things; and so I return unto the former History. In the next age (saith P. Soave) the Scholastick Doctors of both Orders, Franciscans and Dominicans, did by their writs refute this opinion, until the year 1300. when Iohannes Scotus, a Franciscan, having examined the reasons of this question diligently, did at last flie unto the power of God, and said, God could do, that she was never in sin, or that she was obnoxious unto sin for a moment of time onely, or for a short time; and onely God knoweth which of the three was true, but the first is most probable, unless it be against the Authority of the Church, or Scriptures. The doctrine of this School-man (famous in his time) did all the Franciscan Friars follow for the most part; but in this singular article, they having boldly entered the gate that was opened by this Author, they held it simply and absolutely to be true, that he said, might be, and had propounded it as probable, under a doubt and uncertain condition, unless it be contrary unto Orthodox faith. The Dominicans do fight constantly against it, under the safeguard of Thomas, a famous Doctor of that Order, both for his excellent doctrine, and for the commendation of P. Iohn 22. For he, to hold down the Order of the Franciscans, who for the most part, did partake with Lewes the Emperor, after his excommunication, did commend that Doctor, and advance his doctrine [Behold upon what reason the Pope did ground his doctrine.] The shew of piety and Religion did prevail so, that the opinion of the Franciscans did please almost them all; it was accepted by the University of Paris, which in the conceit of excellent doctrine, went before all others; and thereafter by the Council of Basil, after much disputation, was approved; and it was forbidden to preach, or teach the contrary opinion, which had place in these Nations, that did approve that Council. At last Pope Sixtus IV. a Franciscan, did publish two decrees of this point; in the first, Ann. 1476. he confirmed a new Officium, that was gathered by Leonard Nogarol Protonotary, and Indulgences were granted unto such as did keep that, or did entertain it by their presence. In the other he condemned, as false and erroneous, the assertion of such as say, That the defence of her conception is heretical, or thought that the celebration of that Office was a sin; and all preachers, and all others, were denied of all holy things, who held either this, or the contrary opinion to be heretical, because that controversie was not determined by the Roman Church, and Apostolical See. But here was not an end of the contention, hatred swelling more and more twixt these two Orders, and yearly renewed in the moneth of December; so that Pope Leo X. putting to his helping hand, thought to have ended the strife, and for that cause did write unto many; but the change of Religion in Germany, changed his thoughts unto other weightier things; and, as they are wont in a besieged City, they leave factions, and all joyn together against a common enemy, so it was in the combat of the Friars. The Dominicans did lay the grounds of their opinion on Scripture, and doctrine of the Fathers, and of ancient School-men: And the other party, when they could not finde the least taste of Scripture for maintaing their cause, they have their refuge unto miracles, and consent of the multitude. Against them F. Iohannes, de Vdine à Dominican, useth this dilemma, S. Paul, and the Fathers, (said he) either did believe as ye do, that the blessed Virgin was free from the common law of men, or they did not believe; if they did believe it, and spoke not at any time, but universally, without any mention of this exception, why follow not ye their example? but if they did believe the contrary, then your opinion smelleth of novelty. But F. Ierom Lombardel, a Franciscan, did affirm, That the Church now, hath no less Authority then the Primitive; and therefore, if by consent of the ancient Church, the Fathers without exception spoke so, we should invite an universal consent unto this exception, from the common condition, which opinion sheweth it self at this time by the celebration of this festivity. So far P. Soave.

Mother

15. Peter, Abbot of Cluniac, was in great account with Pope Eugenius II. Bernard wrote many Epistles unto him: In Epist. 277. he calleth him a vessel for honor, full of grace and truth, and endued with many gifts. In an Epistle unto Eugenius, he saith, Albeit your person be set over Nations and Kingdoms, to pull up and destroy, to kill and scatter; yet seeing you are neither God, nor are you Jeremiah, unto whom this was said, you may be deceived; you may be deceived by them, who seek not Jesus Christ, but themselves; and lest this be, if there be any faithful Son, he should shew unto his Father faithfully what things he knoweth, and which may be unknown unto you; and he should forewarn, and forearm you, lest they, of whom it is said, the poison of asps is under their tongue, be able to corrupt your sincerety by their poison. Here he professeth unto the Pope himself, that he may err, and be deceived. Adversus Iuda. lib. 1. If as you say, and as the Apostle teacheth, all men are condemned, and all die in Adam, then, as the same Apostle teacheth, all are justified in Christ, and all are quickened; for it is true what he saith, As by one man, sin came on all to condemnation; so by one, righteousness came on all to justification of life--- God by his essential goodness having pity on lost man, and willing to save him, but unless justly, neither willing nor able, while he sought in his eternal counsel, how he might shew pity on the wretched, and save his own justice; this especially he thought most convenient, whereby justice might be saved, and man be delivered, and grace be enlarged, and God be glorified: so God sent his own Son unto the sons of men, that putting on mans nature, and healing mans vices, he should take in the assumed flesh, not sin, but the punishment of sin, even bodily death; and so by his single and temporary death, he should deliver from a two-fold, and that everlasting death; by which dispensation, mercy sheweth mercy, and no prejudice done to justice; when for the everlasting punishment of man, a temporal punishment of God-man is offered; which certainly is of great weight, even in the ballance of justice, that for rightly ordering the sins of the world, the transitory death of the Son of God is more weighty, then the everlasting death of the sons of men--- This is our sacrifice; this is the burnt-offering of the Gospel, of the new people, which was offered once on the Cross by the Son of God and of man, even by God. Lib. 2. cap. 4. As before the Law, and under the Law, you see that many are honored with the title of righteousness, even without legal customs, so know thou, that after the Law, not onely many, but all are justified by the onely grace of Christ. Contra Petrobrus. lib. 1. ep. 2. When he said, Do this, he addeth, in remembrance of me; therefore the remembrance of Christ is the cause of the Sacrament--- and therefore lest it be forgotten, which especially should be in our heart, remembrance is tied unto the heart by this suitable sign, as an unsoluble cord, by which strong tie, the redeemed should always think on the price of redemption, and being thankful unto the Redeemer, by faith working by love, he should shew himself no way ungrateful for so great grace--- And the matter is of such worth, that the mindes of men should be stirred up, not dully, but duly to think on it, to love and embrace it. It was expedient and just, that the remembrance of Christ's humanity and death should be preserved, not onely in the ears by hearing, but also unto the eyes by sight--- Therefore to the effect that men might not onely learn by words, but even familiarly feel by deeds, that they die continually while severed from Christ, and that they cannot live perpetually, unless they be conjoynd and united unto Christ; after the similitude of bodily meat and drink, they receive Christ's body, and drink Christ's blood, not given by another, not received from another, but from Christ himself, which will be after this life their food, i.e. eternal life and blessedness. Ibid. I hear that you say, The Church of God consisteth in the unity of believers gathered together, and this is clear unto us all; unto this Church hath God the Father, by the intercession of his Son, given the holy Ghost, that he may abide with her for ever, to comfort her in this life, and to glorifie her in that to come--- unto all the Churches of Christ, which by their number make up the body of the one and Catholike Church, we do owe honor and love by the bond of charity. Lib. 5. cap. 16. Seeing thou art under one shepheard Jesus Christ, seeing thou dwellest in the same fold of the Churches, seeing thou livest in the one faith, and hope of eternal things, as well thou white, as black Monk, why pratest thou foolishly of divers fleeces? why contend ye for no cause, or for so foolish a cause? why for so childish occasion do ye rent the chief garment of charity?--- take heed, lest that name of innocence, whereby ye are called sheep, cause that you be not of the number of these whom the great Shepheard will set on his right hand. Catal. test. ver. lib. 14.

16. Peter de Bruis, a Priest of Tolous, preached in sundry places against

the Popes, and the doctrine of Rome, calling the Pope, the Prince of Sodom, and Rome he called Babylon, the mother of whoredoms and confusion; he preached against the bodily presence of Christ in the Sacrament, against the sacrifices of the Mass; he condemned the worship of Images, prayers to Saints, the single life of Priests, pilgrimages, multitude of holy days, &c. Phi. Morna. in Myfter. iniq. The new named Peter, Abbot of Cluniac, wrote against him, and imputeth these as errors unto him. 1. Altars should be broken down. 2. Sacrifices for the dead are foolishness and impieties. 3. Priests and Monks should have wives, rather then burn in filthiness and whoredom. 4. Crosses should not be worshipped, and should be removed as superstitious. 5. Churches should not be so sumptuous, but seeing they are not necessary; should rather be cast down. 6. God is but mocked with the songs that Monks and Priests do chant in the Churches. 7. The forbidding of meats on certain days, is but superstitious. 8. We should believe onely the Canonical Scriptures, and the writings of the Fathers have not the like Authority. Albeit this Abbot did write bitterly against him, and imputed other things unto him, yet he sheweth not obscurely that wrong was done unto him, and he saith, Because it is not manifest unto me, that he thinketh or preacheth so, I will suspend my answer, until I shall finde undoubted certainty----- I should not rashly assent unto that deceitful monster of report. Ex lib. 1. Ep. 1. & 2. He began to preach about the year 1126. After him his disciple Henry, a Monk, continued preaching the same doctrine. Guilerm, an Abbot, writing the life of Bernard, lib. 3. cap. 5. saith of this Henry, He denied the grace of baptism unto infants; he dispised the prayers and oblations for the dead; the excommunications of Priests; the pilgrimages of believers; the [sumptuous] buildings of Churches; the idleness of festival days; the consecration of chrisme and oyl; and all the Ordinances of the Church. He sheweth there; that the people sent for Bernard to come against him; but he refused, until Albericus, Bishop of Ostia, was sent Legate against him, and he perswadeth Bernard to go with him unto Tolouse: And then Bernard wrote his 240. Epistle unto Hildefonsus Count of S. Giles, against this Henry; and complaineth, that by that mans preaching, Churches were without people, people without Priests, Priests without reverence, and Christians without Christ; the Churches were accounted Synagogues, Sacraments not holy things, and holy days wanted solemnities; men died in their sins without penance, nor guarded with the holy communion. He writeth against his life, and calleth him an apostate, because, being a Monk, he had returned to the lusts of the flesh, as a dog to his vomit, and a player at dice. It is certain (as the proverb is) Bernard saw not all things; and howbeit he writ bitterly against him, yet he commendeth him as a learned man; and calleth him a wolf under a sheeps fleece; he had then the shew of godliness, yea, and he was so revered, that the people did follow him; and though the man might be truly so blotted in his life, yet we see that some errors were taxed by him, and he was allowed and followed by the people for taxing these errors. Debruis was burnt at Tolouse, and Albericus carried Henry into Italy. Their books were burnt, that we can finde nothing of them, but by the hands of their adversaries, who may be thought to have dealt with them, as the Heathens and Jews dealt with the Primitive Church; that is, bely them.

17. Potho, a Priest of Prumia, wrote De statu domus Dei, where are these passages. Lib. 1. Liberty of will is lost, and we are brought into captivity. Lib. 2. With us is but one word, to wit, the word which was made flesh; and one sacrifice, which was once offered by the Mediator of the New Testament, and doth make perfect for ever them who are sanctified. Lib. 3. The holy Church is built on a rock, and continueth in all adversities with immoveable certainty. And after he hath largely rebuked the hypocrisie, ambition and avarice of the Clergy, he concludeth, saying, Seeing ambition reigneth in them, how can they adorn the profession of Christ by word or works? Catal. test. ver. lib. 14.

Waldenses.

18. The poor men of Lions began a new Sect of Monckery, (as Bellarmin speaketh, De Monach. cap. 4.) and went to Rome to have their Religion confirmed by Pope Alexander III. but because it was mixed with sundry Heresies (as he speaketh) they were rejected, and their Religion was condemned. The History of these men is worthy of knowledge, as many have written against them, and others for them. About the year 1150. was a rich Merchant at Lions, of good reputation for wealth and prudence, Peter Waldius, or Waldensis, so surnamed from Waldy, a Village in the East borders of France, afterwards called Vandra: It happened on a day, when the elder men of Lions were assembled, that one fell down and died suddenly; this spectacle gave occasion unto this Peter of thinking upon the frailty of this life, and the vanity of mens cares forso brittle a thing, wherefore he resolveth to be more mindeful of that eternal life: First, to this end he purchaseth a Bible, (which in those days was not forbidden, yet very rare in the hands of either Laicks or Clergy) and like the man desirous to buy the jewel, he spent the rest of his days in seeking the water of life; that which he learned, he imparted it unto his family, and catechised them. His maner of instructing was so familiar and effectual, that sundry of his neighbors were desirous to hear him; he was no less willing to teach them, and informed them, not of private fantasies, but expounded the holy Scriptures, and translated some parts thereof into the French Language, 1a. Thuan. ad Ann. 1550. The Priests were offended, and (like dogs, who neither can eat hay, nor suffer the oxen to eat) they charged him to leave such work, and put not his hand into their harvest, unless he will bring worse upon himself. The man cared more for conscience than their menaces, and followed his course, nor did the people abstain from his company. Some made better progress with him then they had done before, and became his colleagues in teaching others. Wherefore John, Arch-Bishop of Lions, excommunicated him and all his followers, and did confiscate all their goods. So after five years they were scattered, some seeking place of residence in one Countrey, and some in another. Wheresoever they went, they purchased the praise of good conversation, and by way of pity, were called the poor men of Lions, as indeed they were deprived of their goods; and not professors of poverty, as our adversaries speak of them. They were also called Leonistæ, from the same City which by some is called Leon: and they were called Infabbatati, or Inzabbatati, not because they kept not the holy days, nor because they followed the Jewish Sabbath, but from Zabata, or Zabati, which is an up-land shoe, (as 1a. Vsser. de Eccles. statu. cap. 6. sheweth from Nic. Eimeric. in par. 2. direct. Inquisit.) because upon their shoe they had a certain sign, whereby they knew one another. Afterwards other names were given unto them from the places of their abode, as Tolosani, Albigenfes, Caprariefes, &c. and from their Teachers they were called Waldenses, Josephini, Peronistæ, Arnoldistæ; and because they joyned with the hearers of Peter Bruse, they were called Petrobrusiani, Henriciani; and because the Heresie of the Manichees waxed about that time (as was touched in the former Century) in France and Italy, some through malice, and others through ignorance, called them Manichees, Gazari, &c. When they were thus scattered by persecution, the Church of God was gathered; for they were persecuted by the Bishops

Bishops Arelaten. Narbonen. Aquenf. and Albinen. and some suffered constantly, and others fled; so that Popliner. in Hist. Francor. lib. 1. (whom Genebrard in Chronol. lib. 4. testifieth to have told all things simply according to truth of History) saith of them, About the year 1100. maugre all Christian Princes, they spread their doctrine little differing from the Protestants at this day, not through France onely, but through all the bounds of Europe almost, for the French, Spaniards, English, Scotch, Italians, Dutch, Bohemians, Saxons, Polonians, Lithuanians, and other Nations defended the same stubbornly until this day, saith he. Reynerius (an Italian Inquisitor under Pope Innocent III.) in his Book Contra Haret. cap. 4. printed Ingolstadt. An. 1613. writeth of them thus, Among all the Sects that ever were, or now are, none is so hurtful to the Church as these poor men of Lions, for three causes. First, Because it continueth longest; for some say, it hath been from the days of Pope Silverster I. and others say, from the days of the Apostles. Secondly, Because it is most general, seeing there is no Nation where it spreadeth not. Thirdly, Whereas all others are conjoynd with blasphemy against God, this Sect of the Leonists hath a great shew of godliness; for they live justly before men, and believe all things concerning God, and all the Articles of the Creed; onely they blaspheme the Roman Church, and hate her, and the multitude is ready to accept such things. This testimony giveth occasion to search deeper for their original. All Historians (almost) agree, that Peter de Waldo lived about the year 1150. and that these were called by those foresaid names; the difference is, Poplinerius saith, The Waldenses were about the year 1100. Sigonius de Regno Ital. lib. 9. saith, Eriald did persecute the Patareni in Millain about the year 1058. And Reynerius saith, No Heresie continued longer time---But from the year 1150. until the year 1215. (when Reynerius lived) is not so long a space as some Heresies have waxed; yea, he expressly saith, that some bring their original from the days of the Apostles. Wherefore it may well be said, That some of that profession had been in all ages, to whom the Waldenses did associate themselves. Among them were the Henriciani, Berengarians, Bertram, &c. Reynerius speaketh of their number, saying, None durst hinder them, both for the multitude and power of their abettors; I was oft present in the Inquisition, and at their examinations; there were accounted forty Churches defiled with this Heresie; and in one Parish they had ten Schools: So he. Gretser, a Jesuit, in Prolog. contra Walden. saith, It may be truly said to have waxed, because scarcely any Countrey hath been free of this pest, and it did so spread it self into sundry Provinces. Truthem. in Chron. Hirsau. and after him P. Mornay in Myster. say, If any of them had been passing from Coleinto Millain, he did lodge in one of their houses every night; as they marked their houses above the doors, that their own fellows might know them. Vernerus in Fascic. tempor. at. 6. sheweth their condition, saying, Of old the Catholique faith was oppugned by mighty Princes, by subtil Philosophers, and sly Hereticks, and other men of note; but in those days it was not a little quelled by contemptible Laicks, and most poor Idiots: to wit, as the Apostle saith, God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise. Again Vernerus saith, Yet there were some most subtil persons, who endeavored to maintain the Heresie of the Waldenses. And Jac. de Rebiria (cited in Catal. test. ver. lib. 15.) saith, Because they who were called Priests and Bishops at that time, were almost ignorant of all things, it was easie unto the Waldenses, being most excellent in learning, to gain the first place among the people; some of them disputed so accurately, that the Priests permitted them to preach publicly. As for the continuance of this Heresie (as the Romanists call it) in following times, we are informed by testimonies both of Papists and Protestants. Ort. Gratius in Fascic. rer. expetend. having inserted the confession of faith, which they sent unto the King of Hungary An. 1508. faith, It differeth not much from these things that are now taught by some, [meaning Luther] so that these may seem to have learned from the others. And he admonisheth ingeniously, that the Waldenses may be better known from that confession, then by the Catalogue of Hereticks set forth by Bernard de Lutzenburgh. John Naucler in Generat. 47. faith, The Hussites followed the Sects of the Waldenses. Ja. Thuan ad An. 1550. writeth more fully, saying, Peter de Valdo, leaving his Countrey, went into Belgio and Picardy, (as it is now called) finding many followers; he passed thence into Germany, abiding a long space in the Cities of Vandalia; and lastly he settled in Bohem, where to this day (faith he) they who embrace that doctrine, are called Picards. His companion Arnold took another course into Aquitania, and abode in Albium, whence were the Albigei, who quickly went among the Tolosates, Ruteni, Cadutci---- King Lewes VIII. would have killed the Albigenes, if he had not been taken away by sudden death; albeit, from that time they were scattered hither and thither, yet always arose some to hold their doctrine on foot; as John Wickliff in England, John Huss, and Jerome of Praga: and in our time, when the doctrine of Luther was received with the applause of many, the residue of them who were scattered every where did gather, and with the name of Luther were encouraged, namely about the Alpes; and when the Waldenses in Merindol and Cabriers, heard of what was done in Germany, they were glad, and sent for some of German Teachers, and then they shew themselves more then they had done before. And after three pages (Edit. Offenbach. An. 1609.) he faith, The Caprienses were at that time molested with wars by them of Avenion, and in the common danger, they wrote the sum of their Religion, agreeing almost with the doctrine of Luther, and they presented it unto Francis I. and he sent it unto Ja. Sadolet Bishop of Carpentoraet, who was of a pious and meek disposition, and received the suppliants bountifully---- what things were spread of them besides those heads, he declareth ingeniously to have been forged through envy, and to be meer lyes, as he knew by Inquisition that he had taken of them before. And Serrarius in Tribares. faith, Who to day are Calvinists, were anciently Berengarians. Wendelstin in praesa. in cod. can. & Decret. printed An. 1525. faith, The Lutherans are new Waldenses; and sometimes he calleth them German Waldenses. To come unto the judgement of the Reformed; Bishop Ridley, sometime Bishop of London (who suffered martyrdom Ann. 1555.) giveth them this testimony; Those Waldenses were men of far more learning, godliness, soberness, and understanding of God's Word, then I would have thought them to have been in that time, before I did read their books: if such things had been published in our English tongue heretofore, I suppose surely, great good might have come to Christ's Church thereby. The Letters of Martyrs, printed Ann. 1564. pag. 78. Hier. Zanchius doubteth not to say, When Religion decayed in the East, God established it in the valley of Angronia and Merindol, Tom. 4. co. 720. and having seen their confession, he faith of it, in an Epistle unto Crato, I read attentively and diligently, with much delight, the confession of the Brethren Waldenses, which thou sentest unto me; for I saw not onely all the doctrine agreeable unto the holy Scriptures, but I think also, I see the sincere and truly Christian godliness of their hearts; for they seem to have had this onely scope in their confession, not to destroy all whatsoever is in the Church of Rome, as the Arrians do, but to edifie their Churches according to the true and Apostolical, and so the saving rule of godliness, casting away what should be cast away, and retaining what is to be retained, which is the right and lawful form of reformation; Oh that we were all prone unto the same study, after the example of these good Brethren. George Abbot contra D. Hill, in answer to the first reason, sect. 29. saith, For this cause Bellarmin in præs. generali Controversi. joyneth these together as Hereticks, the Berengarians, Petrobrusians, Waldenses, Albigenes, Wiclifists, Hussites, Lutherans, &c. And Lewes Richcom, another of that Society, in his defence of the Mass against the Lord Plessis, saith, That the Ministers, for confirming their figurative sense in This is my body, have none for their Doctors, their Ancients, and their Fathers, but Berengarius, Zuinglius, Calvin, Carolstad, Wicliff, the Albigenes, and the Waldenses. The Waldenses then (saith Abbot) and Albigenes are ours, by confession of our adversaries; and of these were no small company; for as du Haillan Hist. lib. 12. in the life of Philip III. King of France, speaketh, being driven from Lions, they withdrew themselves into Lombardie, where they so multiplied, that their doctrine was spread through Italy, and came as far as Sicily. As the same Author writeth, Philippus Augustus came to his Kingdom An. 1180. (which is now more then 400. years since) and in his time it was that the Albigenes did so increase in France, that the Pope and Princes were afraid of their number; he who readeth the story of them, shall see that they are reported to have held many gross, wicked and absurd opinions mingled with their true doctrine; but du Haillan, the best and most judicious Chronicler of France, and no partial witness on our behalf, (since his profession touching Religion was such, that he was employed to write that story by Henry III.) had not so little wit, but that he perceived these imputations to be laid on them in odium, and of purpose to procure their defamation; see how wisely he speaketh truth, and yet so toucheth it, that his fellows might not justly be offended at his words. Although (saith he) those Albigenes had evil opinions, yet so it is, that those did not stir up the hate of the Pope, and of great Princes against them, so much as their liberty of speech did, wherewith they used to blame the vices and dissoluteness of these Princes and of the Clergy, yea, to tax the vices and actions of the Popes; this was the principal point which brought them into universal hatred, and which charged them with more evil opinions then they had. So far Abbot from Haillan. It cannot therefore be ignorance, so much as perverseness of the Papists, when they glory of the antiquity of their Religion without opposition, and upbraid us with late original; they cannot deny that our Religion is older then Luther; and according to the testimony of the before-named Reynerius, the doctrine of the Waldenses, was even from the days of the Apostles. And for clearing that which du Haillan saith, concerning their taxing the vices of the Clergy, I shall shew out of their Apology (which the Waldenses of Bohem wrote unto their King Ladislaus, about the year 1509.) the occasion of their first separation from the Roman Church; there they say, We with your Majesty knew for what cause we did long ago forsake that Roman crew; truly the execrable wickedness of the Prelates (by the instigation of the Devil, whose work it is to sow discord and contentions among brethren) compelled us to leave them; for they through blinde malice, and insolent pride of the power of darkness, were debauching one against another, and dispised the laws of peace & Ecclesiastical love; and they being void of all humanity, did rattle one against another publikely, not only with scurvy words, but reproachful & contumelious writings, and were shamelesly stirred up one against another like Atheists; they forsook the power of Ecclesiastical keys, wholesome truth, religious worship, gracious piety, sound faith, the gifts of the Spirit, and all maner of good works; and moreover in their profane pulpits, when multitude of men were about them, they endeavored to prove both by Authority of Scriptures, and by strong reasons, and by most firm examples and arguments, yea, and by alledging the Canons of the Ancients, that they were Schismatics, Hereticks, sacrilegious, false prophets, ravenous wolves, the beast and whore of the Revelation; they did so prophanely preach one against another, and at that time they did so vex the whole Kingdom, that they fought one against another, and with bloody destruction of men, they dyed both Land and Rivers, and so the gracious and golden peace of ancient times was gone. Wherefore our Ancestors being most desirous of peace, and with sorrowful hearts beholding such calamities in this Kingdom, did lament with deep groans for these miseries, whereof Church-men were the Authors; and did dayly pray unto God most earnestly, that he would have pity on this Kingdom, and send better days: at last, when they saw that no good was to be expected of them, which should have been the leaders and shepherds of Christ's Church, and unto whom the word of reconciliation was committed to have been preached (as beautiful are the feet of these which bring the glad tidings of salvation) they did justly forsake such Prelates as unsavory salt, which did neither clear themselves of these vile imputations, nor purge themselves by publique satisfaction before the people. So far there. And they did offer to prove what they had said by particular instances, if the King would be pleased to hear them. This testimony teacheth what was the condition of the Church at that time, and what moved the people to hearken unto the people of Lions, when they were scattered. As for their Doctrine, it may be partly known by their Confession, which followeth in Century XVI. Part I. Chapter III. Section IX. and partly by the Articles that were imputed unto them by their adversaries, some truly, and some in odium, as du Haillan speaketh. Io. Nauwer. generat. 47. speaking of the Hussites, saith, They, departing from the Catholique Church, did follow the wicked Sect of Waldenses; the opinions of that pestiferous Sect were, The Roman Bishop is but equal unto other Bishops; no difference should be among Priests; not dignity, but excellency of life maketh one Priest better then another; souls departing out of the bodies, go immediately into everlasting punishment, or attain unto eternal joyes; there is no Purgatory; it is idle to pray for the dead, and a fiction of Priests avarice; the Images of God, and of the Saints, should be thrown away; the hallowing of water, and of palms, is but a scorn; the Religions of begging Monks, is the invention of the Devil; priests should be poor, and content with alms; the preaching of God's word should be free unto all; no deadly sin should be tolerated, even for eschewing never so great ill; who is guilty of mortal sin, is not capable of Secular nor Ecclesiastical Dignity, nor should others obey such; confirmation and extreame unction, are not to be reckoned among Sacraments; auricular confession is but trifling, it is sufficient that every one confess their sin unto God; baptism should be used with water, and not be mixed with hallowed oyl; the custom of Church-yards is devised for gain, and it is to little purpose where bodies be buried; all the world is the Temple of God every where present; they would enclose his Majesty, who build Temples, Monasteries, and Oratories; Priestly vestiments, ornaments of altars, palls, corporals, chalices, platters, and such vessels, are not to be respected; a Priest may administer the Sacrament in any place, and at any time, if people require; it is sufficient if he say onely the Sacramental words; time is vainly wasted in seeking aid from the Saints reigning with Christ, and in singing or saying the canonical hours; men should cease from working on no day, but that which is called the Lord's day; the feasts of Saints should be dispised; there is no merit in keeping the fasts that are enjoined by the Church. These are the faults which Naucier, and before him En. Sylvius in Hist. Bohe. c. 35. can lay unto their charge, albeit they both despitefully call them, a wicked Sect and damned faction. Ph. Mornay in Myster. iniq. reciteth their Articles from Iac. de Riberia in Collectan. de urbe Tolosa, thus; 1. Onely the holy Scriptures are to be believed in things belonging to salvation, and no mans writings besides. 2. All things necessary to salvation are contained in them; and nothing is to be admitted in Religion, but what is commanded in God's word. 3. There is but one Mediator, and Saints are not Mediators, nor should be invocated. 4. There is no Purgatory, but all men are either justified unto life in Christ, or without Christ are to be condemned, and beside these is neither third nor fourth place. 5. All Masses, specially these that are said for the dead, are wicked, and to be abrogated. 6. There are but two Sacraments, Baptism and the Communion. 7. All mens traditions are to be rejected, at least not to be reputed necessary unto salvation; therefore all singing, and superstitious chanting in the chancel, should be left off; constrained and set fasts, tied to times and days, difference of meats, such variety of degrees and orders of Priests, Friars, Monks and Nuns, superfluous holy days, so many Benedictions and hallowing of creatures, vows, pilgrimages, with all the Rites and rable of Ceremonies, are to be abolished. 8. The Supremacy of the Pope, usurping over all Churches, and over all Politique Realms and Governments, or to occupy and usurp the jurisdiction of both the Swords, is to be denied; nor is any degree to be retained in the Church, but Priests and Deacons. 9. The Communion under both kinde is necessary unto all the people, according to the institution of Christ. 10. The Church of Rome is the very Babylon mentioned in the Revelation; and the Popes are the fountains of all errors, and the very Antichrist. 11. The marriage of Church-men is lawful, and necessarily to be permitted in the Church. 12. So many as hear the word of God, and have true faith, are the true Church of Christ; and unto this Church the keys are given, to drive away all wolves, to institute true Pastors, to preach the word, and administer the Sacraments. 13. The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was ordained to be eaten, and not to be shewed or worshipped; for a memorial, and not a sacrifice; to serve unto present ministration, and not for reservation; to be received at the table, according to the custom of the primitive Church, when they were wont to communicate sitting, and not to be carried out of doors. Now some Papists do object unto us, that albeit some of their doctrines agree with the common Tenets of Protestants, yet in divers other Articles they disagree, and therefore the Churches of the Waldenses cannot be one; and for proof they alledge nine Articles. 1. The Waldenses held, that all carnal lust is lawful. 2. All oaths are unlawful. 3. It is not lawful to punish a Christian to death. 4. The Creed of the Apostles is not to be regarded. 5. Christians should use no prayer but the Lord's prayer. 6. The power of consecrating the Lord's body, and of hearing confessions, is left by Christ not unto Priests onely, but to Laicks also if they be godly. 7. Priests should live onely by alms. 8. The Sacrament should be administred once onely in the year, to wit, on the fifth day of the week before Easter, because Christ suffered that day. 9. For the words of consecration, they should be seven times, Our Father which art, &c. The most part of these are contrary unto the above-named Articles, and unto their confession: and Ia. Vsser. (which hath written this History most accurately) sheweth cap. 7. particularly and clearly, that these are so many calumnies, and that by testimony of their adversaries; so that albeit many have written against them, yet their testimonies are contrary. As for the first, He sheweth from M. Freher in Eochem. ver. Hist. printed at Hanoue, pag. 231. The Leonists are chaste; and pag. 232. they eschew whatsoever things are filthy. 2. In the same place Freher saith, In their language they are sparing, they eschew lyes, swearing, and all things that are filthy; so that they did forbid all swearing in common talk, or for light causes, which was frequent in these days, saith he there. And Reynerius in Summa de Cathar. & Leonist. printed at Paris An. 1548. saith, They dispence with oaths for eschewing death. Hence it appeareth, they granted that in some cases an oath is lawful; but in that he addeth, for eschewing death, it is but a misinterpretation; as is clear by what we have heard from Æn. Silvius and Naucler, that they held, No deadly sin should be tolerated even for eschewing, &c. 3. The above-named History, pag. 222. saith, When an Heresiarch, a Glover in Cheron, was lead unto death, he said, Ye do well to condemn us now; for if our estate were not born down, we would do unto the Clerks and Monks as they do unto us. 4. In pag. 232. it is said, They believe all the Articles of the Creed, but they say, Ave Maria, and the Creed, are not prayers. As for the fifth and ninth, in the same page it is said, They pray seven times a day; an elder beginneth the prayer, and maketh it long or short as he thinketh expedient, and the rest follow him. Whence it is clear, that they used other prayers, or were not tied to prescribed or stinted forms. The sixth and eighth are contrary unto the above-named Articles of Æn. Sylvius and Naucler. That the seventh is a calumny, appeareth by that they did condemn the begging of Friars; and Freher, pag. 231. saith, their Teachers are Weavers and Taylors; they heap not up riches, but are content with necessities; and pag. 253. he hath an answer of theirs unto Augustin Olomucen. where they say, we are not ashamed of our Priests, for that they purchase their livings by their handy work, because so the doctrine and Apostolical example teacheth us, &c. And it is clear, that their condition did so require; and they did judge that the truth of the Gospel, and reproaches for Christ, were greater riches than the treasures of Egypt. It is objected also, that Peter Waldo was a Lay-man, and so wanting a call or orders, he could not confer it on others. But Matth. Parisiensis ad An. 1223. testifieth, that many Bishops turned unto them; and that they had an Arch-Bishop Bartholomew, who consecrated other Bishops and Ministers. So albeit at the first, the man began to teach his own family onely, yet afterwards, their number increasing, they wanted not lawful teachers. Some object, that they refused Baptism unto Infants; and others say, They despised the Old Testament; but those are contrary unto their confession. It may also be objected, that in their confession they acknowledged seven Sacraments; but consider the description and use of those which they call Sacraments, and the difference shall be found of no great weight; all those things being well weighed, we need not doubt to joyn hands with the Waldenses, as with our elder Brethren; nor can the Papists deny, that our Church is older then Luther; I say, with Brethren, not as Fathers, because their doctrine and ours, is not originally from them, but from Christ and the sacred Scriptures.

The persecu-
Waldenses.

19. It remaineth to shew, how the Waldenses were persecuted. In the year 1163. Ecbert a Monk had disputed at Colein, August 2. with Arnold Marsilius, and Theodorick, who had come from Flanders; because they would not yield, Arnold, with seven men and two women, were burnt the next day. When they were in the fire, Arnold was heard to say unto his Brethren, Be constant in the faith, ex Casari. Heisterb. lib. 5. cap. 19. Theodorick escaped at that time; but afterwards he with some others was burnt at Binna.

The

The same year Pope Alexander III. in a Synod at Towers, accurseth them all, without any special mention of their doctrine; and he accurseth all that bought or sold with them. Ann. 1170. the same Pope sent a Cardinal unto Tolouse, to persecute them there; at that time two left their profession, and he gave them places of Canons. Hovedan Annal. par. 2. testifieth, that Oliverius, and some others which were called good men, were brought into Inquisition in the Province of Tolouse by Peter Arch-Bishop of Narbon. Girald Albien, and others, all the people beholding the spectacle. Their preachers were called in Lombardy Consolati; in Germany and France, Boni homines. Ann. 1178. Peter Cardinal of S. Chrysogono, was sent again to Tolouse, where he, and Lewes King of France, and Henry King of England, against the Albigenſes, but there came little or no speed. Continuator Rob. Monteu. and from thence they sent Reginald Bishop of Bathonien, and Henry Abbot of Clareval, in the Diocy of Albia, in the Legate's name, to charge Roger Lord of that Land, to purge his Territories from those Heretiques; because he would not give obedience, nor his presence, they accursed him. Rog. How. loc. cit. The next year the same Pope in a Council at Rome accurseth them all; the decree is in Tom. 4. Concil. printed at Rome, neither is any mention of their errors in it. After two years, that Abbot being made Bishop of Albanen, and a Cardinal was sent into Gascony, but in vain, saith Alisiod. Cronol. ad An. 1181. for so soon as the poor men had liberty, they returned unto their profession. An. 1183. in the Village Bituricen. 5000. were killed in one day, whom they called Catharelli, or more contemptuously Ruptarii. Guil. Armorica. in Gestis Philippi. Frumald Bishop of Atrebat, imprisoned Adam and Radulph, with other two; because he was sick, William Bishop of Rhems, came thither with the same Philip, and caused them to be burnt. The next Pope Lucius, in a Council at Verona (where the Emperor Frederik was present) accursd all the Waldentes; so did Urban III. and Clemens III. as witnesseth Andr. Favyn. in Hist. Navar. lib. 5. and we will hear more of their persecution hereafter. 1a. Vsser. in Eccles. statu cap. 8. & 10.

20. Radevic a Canon Frising wrote two Books of the life of the Emperor Frederick I. lib. 1. cap. 10. he (speaking of Pope Adrian) saith, Let us hear the beast, that hath a face like a lamb, and speaketh as a dragon.

21. William Arch Bishop of Senon, wrote unto Pope Alexander III. thus, Let your Excellency, most holy Father, hear patiently what we say; for our soul is in bitterness, and so is your devoted son, the most Christian King of France, how all the Church of France is troubled with scandals, flowing in time of your Apostleship from the Apostolical See; Seeing (as our Nation saith) Satan is let loose there to the ruine of all the Church; where Christ is crucified again, and manifestly sacrilegious persons and murderers go free. Baron. ad An. 1170. ex Manuscrip. Vatic. At the same time Stephan. Tronac. in epist. 86. ad Ioh. Pictaru. (which is printed with the Epistles of Gerebert) said, I know not, Father, whether the 1000. years be expired, when Satan should be loosed; but we see his servants so loose, that they binde God's servants. Vsser. lib. cit. cap. 3.

22. Peter a Parisian Monk, being of great age, died Ann. 1167. in his Book De Verbo Abbreviat. he commendeth God's word, and taxeth the idleness and impieties of Priests, the curiosity of School-men, the multitude and abuses of Masses; the multitude of mens traditions, whereby the precepts of God are made void; he calleth Indulgences, a godly deceit: He sheweth how Lucas, a Bishop of Hungary, had excommunicated a Lay-man for a crime; the man ran to Pope Alexander III. and obtained absolution for money; but the Bishop regarded not the Pope's threatnings, but did excommunicate the man again, and the third time for his obstinacy : wherefore the Pope did excommunicate the Bishop ; but Lucas dispised his curses as unjust, and never sought absolution ; nevertheless, this Bishop was highly accounted after his death, and was called St. Lucas, Catal. test. ver.

23. Bernard Clunien. about that time, wrote a large satyr, not sparing the Pope nor Cardinals, of which are here some passages ex Catal. test. ver. lib. 14.

*Pontificalia corda carentia corde probavit,
Pontificalia corda pecunia contenebravit
Pontificum status ante fuit ratus, integer ante
Ille statum dabat ; ordine, nunc labat ille, labante.
Qui super hoc mare debuerat dare se quasi pontem
In Ston omnibus est via plebibus in Phlegetontem.
Stat sibi gloria, pompa, superbia divitiarum,
Hoc prope tempore nemo studens fore pons animarum.
Qui stat in agmine primus in ordine Presbyteratus,
Est vitio levis, officio brevis, inguine fractus.*

Then of the Prelates and Clergy, he saith,

*Vos volo credere quod volo dicere, Pseudopphetas, Nulla feracius ac numerosius hac tulit ætas :
His sacra nomina, sacraque tegmina, corda superba, Agnus eis patet in tunica, latet anguis in herba.
Quilibet improbus extat episcopus : Abba creatur
Vi, precio, prece : Dignus homo necesse sceptra lucratur.
Nullus ei timor, haudque sui memor, est aliarum
Non sine Simone, sed sine canone dux animarum.*

When he hath hinted at the manifold impieties of the Clergy, he striketh again at the head :

*Per sibi pervia Pastor it ostia, fur aliunde :
Lex mala furibus, his subeuntibus, intrat abunde.
O mala secula ! venditur Insula Pontificalis :
Insula venditur : haud reprehenditur emptio talis, Venditur annulus, hinc lucra Romulus urget & auget.
Est modo mortua Roma superflua : quando resurget ?
Roma superfluit, arida corrui, affluta, plena
Clamitat & tacet, erigit & jacet, & dat egena
Roma, dat omnibus omnia dantibus : omnia Roma Cum pretio : quia juris ibi via, jus perit omne.
Fas mihi scribere ; fas mihi dicere, Roma peristi.
Obruta mœnibus, obruta moribus occubisti.
Aurea pectora, castaque pectora jam perierunt ;
Tempora pessima, scilicet ultima jam subierunt.
Stat simulatio, corrui actio Religionis, Heu sua propria deputat omnia Rex Babylonis.*

Behold ! here he calleth Rome Babylon, and the Pope the King of it.

24. In that Century were many pamphlets and rhimes written in all languages almost, against the errors and vices of Popes, Bishops and Clergy : namely, a book was written having the picture of Christ casting buyers and sellers out of the Temple, and another of the Pope sitting upon his throne ;

above each were some rhimes written, shewing the maners of the times; above the Pope thus,

*Curia vult marcas, bursus exhaurit & arcas :
Si bursa parcas, fuge Papas & Patriarchas,
Si dederis marcas, & eis impleveris arcas,
Culpâ solveris, quacunque ligatus eris.
Intus quis ? tu quis ? ego sum. quid quæris ? ut intrem.
Fers aliquid ? non. Sta foris. Fero. Quid ? Satis. Intra.*

25. In Tom. 2. Concilior. printed at Colein An. 1551. is a little book with this title, Opusculum Tripartitum, de negotiis Ecclesiæ. In the third part thereof are noted many filthy abuses in the Church, and faults of the Clergy, and Prelates are noted. Cap. 1. It is commonly heard, how wicked women say, That they have more gain by their sin on one festival day, then in an whole week, or fittēen working days. It is also sure of many other sins, that they be innumerable more committed on festival days, then in other days; and therefore it seemeth, it were more acceptable unto God, that there were fewer festival days in the Church, or at least that workmen might after the hearing of the Service, go about their work, seeing many have not maintenance to themselves and their families, but by their work; and the wealthier sort do waste more on festival days in tap houses, then in other days----- In some Cathedral Churches is a custom, that when some Canons will not pay unto the Clerks what is due, the Clerks suspend them from the Service, and so in these Churches is no Service, and sometimes for a very naughty occasion; it were better that other punishments were laid on these Canons----- In many Cathedral Churches, so few Clerks are present at the Canonical hours, that sometimes they be scarcely four or six, albeit in these Churches a great multitude of them have their entertainment for that Service onely: now all these abuses might be helped---- and especially that men be not compelled unto new festivals. Cap. 2. Because no inferior dare speak against the Roman Church, it were very decent that the Lord Pope, and the Lords the Cardinals, would diligently observe what things are to be reformed in the Roman Church; and that they would begin there, to the end the reformation (which belongeth unto them) of others may have the better success; for behold how great mischief and scandal hath flowed through all the world (that I speak not of other things) in so many vacations of Popes that have happened in our days. Cap. 3. All the world is offended, and speaketh against the multitude of poor religious men, who are not now called Religious, but Trutannii; this turneth to the great contempt of that Religion: Albeit that Order may be called good, and there be some good men among them, yet it seemeth expedient that they be not multiplied, except onely in so far as the world may be able conveniently to bear them---- Cap. 4. Seeing bad Prelates are the cause of innumerable evils, there should be greater diligence in their admission, by a prudent trial of the person, by them who are not accustomed to lye. Again, there is so great difficulty in the deposition of Prelates, according to the laws, by the multitude of witnesses which is required, that none of them, how wicked soever they be, is feared for deposition; and therefore innumerable Churches, lying many years under a pestiferous Prelate, are destroyed both temporally and spiritually: therefore it seemeth expedient that a Law were made for removing wicked Prelates more easily; whence a double benefit would follow, to wit, the deliverance of the Churches which perish under them, and a fear in other bad Prelates; It seemeth also that there is not so great reason of keeping this difficulty now, as was of old; because then all the Prelates (almost) were good men, and their adversaries rose wickedly against them; but now none accuseth a Prelate, but they which are good men, and are moved with the zeal of God against bad Prelates--- There is so great negligence of Prelates in correcting, that seldom any is heard to correct, even they who are reputed to be good men; and seeing many evils follow upon this, some remedy should be provided--- There is so great vanity and prodigality in the families of many Prelates, in their clothes cutted, watered, flowered, and their shoe-ties of gold, and such other many things, that in the Court of any secular Prince or King is not found so great vanity; and it were decent, that in the families of the Successors of the Apostles, stricter discipline were seen in their habit or accoutrement, as was ordained by Laws. Cap. 6. Rich Benefices are bestowed (for the most part) on such persons which never reside there; and scarcely will ye finde a Bishop, which dispenseth not easily with their non-residence, to the great damage of souls!--- When a Curate putteth a Vicar in his Parish, there is no respect unto the qualification of his person, for the most part, but onely who will be content with the least wages; and then these Vicars devise many ways to extortion the people-- Parishes are bestowed for the most, not in a godly way, but upon entreaties, and acquaintance, unto persons that are altogether unworthy, and are not able to rule souls: and which is worse, there is great slackness in many Prelates, that they do not chastise Parish-Priests, albeit in their uncleanness, and notorious crimes, they be bad examples, and occasions of perdition unto their Parishioners; or if they do censure them in the purse, they suffer them to continue in their sin. Cap. 12. Because many Prelates are lukewarm (alas!) in these things that belong unto God, yea, and are contrary unto all good almost, it seemeth that they are no way expedient--- In late times two Emperors were deposed in Councils, for temporal damage they had done unto the Church--- how then can the Church dissemble, that a Prelate which doth innumerable evils unto the Church, and is altogether unfit for government of souls, should be deposed solemnly? it is greatly to be feared, that for their dissembling and tolerations, the wrath of God will be poured on the Church. The Compiler of the Councils, thinketh this book was written in the twelfth Century, and some of these passages seem to agree. Catalo. test. ver. lib. 14.

26. Henry Arch-Bishop of Mentz, was dilated at Rome for speaking against the tyranny of the Popes: he sent Arnold, one of his Clergy, to make his Apology; and he turned his accuser, and did so by money prevail with two Cardinals, that they were sent to examine the cause. When they came into Germany, and had cited Henry, they would not hear his answer, but deposed him, and put the same Arnold in his See. Then said Henry unto the Cardinals, If I had appealed unto the Apostolical See against their unjust proceedings, the Pope possibly would not have regarded me, and nothing had accrewed unto me, but labor of body, loss of my goods, and grief of minde; therefore I do appeal unto the Lord Jesus Christ as the most righteous Judge, and I charge you to answer me there before the highest Judge; for ye have not judged righteously, but as it pleased you, being corrupted by money. They answer, When you go first, we will follow. Not long thereafter Henry dieth, and when the Cardinals heard thereof, the one said to the other merrily, He hath gone, and we will follow in time. Within few days, the one going to ease himself, all his bowels gushed out; and the same day the other began to bite his own fingers, and was choaked. These things were reported abroad, and every one said, Blessed be God, who hath avenged the injury that was done unto the innocent man. Immediately the same Arnold was killed in

27. Peter Abailard, trusting in Philosophy, spoke and wrote against the Trinity, and against the office of Christ. Bernard in Epist. 192. ad Guido. Abailard's heresies faith, That in the doctrine of the Trinity, he is an Arrian; of grace, a Pelagian; of the person of Christ a Nestorian. He was summoned to answer in a Council at Soisson; where he did appear, but would not answer; and onely did appeal unto the Court of Rome, and did glory that his books had found acception there. The Bishops did note and condemn his errors; and the sentence against his person they did refer unto the Pope Innocentius. Ibid. Epist. 191. His errors are more particularly (though not all) expressed in Epist. 190. thus; While he professeth to give a reason of all things, he adventureth above reason, against reason, yea, and against the faith; for what is more against faith, then that he will not believe what he cannot comprehend by reason? and expounding that of Eccles. 19. He that is hasty to give credit, is light minded, he saith, To credit hastily, is to give credit before reason; whereas Solomon speaketh it not of faith in God, but of natural credulity among men: for blessed Gregory denieth that to be faith, which hath experience in human reason; and the Apostles are commended, in that they did follow the Redeemer at his simple command; and Mary is commended for preveening reason by faith, as Zacharias was punished, that he would have reason ere he would believe.--- 2. He saith, God the Father is full power, the Son is some power, and the holy Ghost is no power; and that the Son is in respect of the Father, as species ad genus, or a man in respect of a living wight, or a brazen seal unto brass. Is he not here worse then an Arrian? who can endure him?--- 3. He saith, All the teachers after the Apostles agree in this, that the divel had power over man, because man of his own accord did yield unto the divel; for say they, If one overcome another, he who is overcome, becometh servant unto his victor; and therefore (said he) as the teachers say, the Son of God became man, that man, which could not be delivered any other way, might be made free again from the divels power by the death of an innocent: But it seemeth unto me (said he) that neither the divel had ever power over man, but as a Gaoler, by the permission of God, nor did the Son of God assume flesh to deliver man--- All men say so, saith he, but I say not so. What then?--- what hath the Law, what have the Prophets, the Apostles, and Apostolical men declared unto us, but that God was made man to deliver men? art thou not ashamed to say, that they all think contrary unto thee, when they all agree together? but though an Angel from Heaven shall teach another Gospel, let him be accursed---- Let him learn then, that the divel not onely had power, but just power over men, that consequently he may see also, that the Son of God came in the flesh to deliver men. And albeit I say, that the power of the divel was just, yet I say not that his will was just; wherefore not the divel invading, nor man deserving, but God delivering is just; for one is said to be just or unjust, not according to his power, but his will; wherefore this power of the divel, albeit it was not justly purchased, but wickedly usurped, yet was permitted justly. And so man was justly held captive, yet so, that justice was not in man, nor in the divel, but in God; and man was justly condemned, but was mercifully delivered; and yet so mercifully, that there wanted not justice even in delivering him; seeing such was the mercy of the Redeemer, that (which was suitable unto the remedy of delivering) he did shew justice rather then power against the invador; For what could man, the servant of sin, and slave of the divel, do of himself to recover righteousness that he had lost? therefore the righteousness of another is imputed puted unto him, which had it not of his own; and so it is---- But what necessity required, or what reason was there, that seeing the mercy of God could by his onely word have delivered man, yet the Son should assume flesh for our redemption, and suffer so much, even the ignominious death of the Crofs? We answer, The necessity was on our part, even the hard necessity of them who sat in darkness, and in the shadow of death---- And the reason was the good pleasure of him who did it. Who can deny that the Almighty had other ways to redeem; justifie and deliver? but this cannot priviledge the efficacy of this way which he hath chosen; and possibly this is better, by which we in this land of oblivion, and of our fall, are admonished the more powerfully and livelily, of so many and so great grievances of our Redeemer; and albeit we cannot fathom the mystery of God's counsel, yet we may feel the effect of the work, and perceive the fruit of the benefit---- It is a true saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that when we were yet sinners, we were reconciled unto God by the death of his Son---- And he concludeth all his railings and invectives against God; so that he saith, All that God did appear in the flesh for, was our instruction by word and example; and all that he suffered and died for, was the demonstration, and commendation of his love toward us. But what availeth his teaching us, if he hath not restored us? or are we not taught in vain, if the body of sin be not first destroyed in us, that we should not be the servants of sin? If all that Christ hath been profitable unto us, was the shewing a good example, it followeth also that we must say, All the harm that Adam hath done unto us, was the onely shewing of sin; seeing the plaster must be according to the quality of the wound; for as in Adam all do die, so in Christ shall all be made alive; therefore as the one is, so is the other---- Or if we will rest in the Christian faith, and not in the Pelagian Heresie, and confess that the sin of man was propogated by generation, and not by example; we must also confess, that by Christ righteousness is restored, not by example, but by generation, and life by righteousness; that by one sin came upon all men to condemnation, so by the obedience of one, righteousness came on all men unto justification of life. And if it were so, that the purpose and cause of the incarnation (as he saith) was onely the enlightening of the world with the light of knowledge, and the kindling of love, by whom is our redemption and deliverance? ---- God forbid that I should glory in any thing, but in the Crofs of our Lord Jesus Christ, in whom is our life, salvation and resurrection. And indeed I look upon three things chiefly in the work of our salvation; the example of humility, when God made himself of no reputation; the measure of his love, extending to the death even of the Crofs; and the mystery of redemption, whereby he destroyed death which he suffered: but the first two, without this last, are as if ye would paint in the air; truly the example of humility is great and very useful, and the example of love is worthy of all acceptance; but they have no foundation, and therefore no standing, if there be not redemption. I would with all my indeavor follow the example of Christ, and I desire to imbrace, with the mutual arms of love, him who hath loved me, and given himself for me; but I must also eat the Paschal Lamb, for unless I eat his flesh, and drink his blood, I shall not have life in me---- There be also many other Articles in his books, and no less evil, &c. As every one may understand, that upon these grounds follow the points of original sin, of free-will, of justification, &c. Pope Innocentius II. did condemn in a Council of Cardinals, at Rome, this Abailard, and all these his perverse Articles, and commanded perpetual silence unto him, as an Heretick; and ordained all who followed his errors, to be excommunicated, as is in his Epistle, which is among the Epistles of Bernard the CXCIV.

28. When Calo. Johannes was Emperor of the Greeks, was a Synod at Constantinople, where Anselm Bishop of Havelbergens. did dispute for the primacy of the Roman Pope, and alledged these reasons; 1. The Synod of Nice saith, Let all men know, and no Catholique should be ignorant, that the Roman Church is not preferred by decrees of Synods, but hath obtained the primacy by the Evangelical voice of our Lord and Savior, when he said unto Peter the blessed Apostle, Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it; and I will give thee the keys--- 2. Peter and Paul suffered martyrdom at Rome. 3. The first See of the Church is Rome, the second is Alexandria, and the third is Antiochia; which three are founded by Peter. 4. Onely the Roman Church hath continued in all ages without heresies, whereas all other Churches have been defiled with heresies. 5. Christ said, I have prayed for thee, Peter, that thy faith fail not, and when thou art converted, confirm thy brethren. 6. The Church of Constantinople hath been obnoxious unto many heresies, that have begun there, or brought thither, there was Arritus, Macedonius, Eutyches, Eunomius, Eudoxius: therefore all Churches should acknowledge the Roman as their mother. Nechites, a Greek answereth; The Roman Church was the first among the three Sisters; but the Bishop of Rome was never called the first of Priests, nor the first Bishop, but the Bishop of the first See; and he did first receive from Phocas, to be called the head of all Churches. Moreover these three Sisters were united together by some conditions, that neither the Bishop of Rome, nor of Alexandria, nor of Antiochia, might teach any things in their Churches which was different from the faith of the others, and so they all should preach one and the same; for this end it was ordained, that two Legates well learned, and sound in the faith or doctrine, should be sent from the Church of Rome, the one to abide at Alexandria, and the other at Antiochia, who should diligently observe, whether they did continue preaching the analogy of faith; and likewise two should be sent from Alexandria, one to Rome, and the other to Antiochia; and two from Antiochia, the one to Rome, and the other to Alexandria; and so they might aid one another, if any need were; and whatsoever was taught in any of these Churches, should be confirmed by the Authority and testimony of the others; but if any thing were contrary to the faith, and disagreeing from the truth and communion of these Churches, the Legates of the others should by brotherly charity, and humble admonition correct that; or if they could not correct it, and one as temerarious and presumptuous, would contentiously defend his error, by and by it should, by these Legates, be deferred unto the audience of the other Sisters; and if by Letters Canonically written, that Sister could be reduced unto the harmony of wholesome doctrine, it was well, but if not, a general Council might be assembled. 2. The Empire was translated from Rome to the East; and then it was ordained by 150. Bishops assembling in this City, when blessed Nectarius was ordained Bishop of this See, after the condemnation of Maximus Ennius (who was infected with the contagion of Apollinaris) then it was ordained (I say) with consent of the most godly Emperor Theodosius the elder, that as old Rome had obtained from the holy Fathers, in former time, the first place in Ecclesiastical causes, so then new Rome, for the honor of the Empire, should have the Ecclesiastical precedency after her, and should be called as the second Rome, so be called and be the second See; and should preside all the Churches of Asia, Thracia and Pontus, and treat of all Church-affairs, and determine them by her own Authority; And then such Legates, Wardens of the Catholique faith, as were sent to Alexandria and Antiochia, were sent also into this

Royal City, and likewise from hence unto them for the same ministry, that they all might teach the same, and differ in no point of truth. 3. When the Empire was divided, the Bishops were also divided; the decrees of the Roman high Priest, that were established in their Councils without the Greeks, let these Bishops, which belong unto him, look unto them; As for these Councils which in these days they hold, how should we embrace their decrees, which are written against our knowledge? For if the Roman Bishop, sitting in the high throne of his glory, will thunder against us, and as it were from above throw his commands, and will judge of us and our Churches, not with our counsel, but at his own pleasure, yea and will Lord it over us, what brotherhood, or what fatherhood can be in this? who can patiently endure it? for then we might be called the very slaves, and not children of his Church: And if these were necessary, and so grievous a yoke were to be laid on our necks, none other thing followeth, but that the only Roman Church should have that privileged which they hunt after; and she shall make Laws unto all others, and she her self be without Law; and so be not a pious mother of children, but an imperious Lady of slaves: To what purpose then were the knowledge of the Scriptures, the studies of learning, the doctrine and discipline of teachers, and the noble wits of the wise Greeks? the onely authority of the Roman high Priest, which as thou sayest, is above all, turneth all to nothing. Let him be the onely Bishop, the onely Teacher, the onely Commander, and let him onely, as the onely Pastor, answer unto God for all things that are concredited unto him onely; But if he will not have fellow-laborers in the Lord's vineyard, and if he be exalted in keeping his primacy, let him glory in his primacy, but not condemn his brethren, whom the truth of Christ hath begotten in the womb of the Church, not unto bondage, but unto freedom; For as the Apostle saith, We must all stand before the throne of Christ, that every one may receive as he hath done, whether good or ill. He saith, All; though he was an Apostle, he excepteth not himself; he excepteth no mortal: He said, All; he excepteth not the Roman high Priest. Nor is it found in any Creed, that we should believe specially the Roman Church; but rather we are taught every where to believe, that there is one holy Catholique Church. These things speak I of the Roman Church, with your favor, which I do reverence as you do, but will not follow absolutely, nor do I think that she should be followed in all particulars: whose authority thou hast propounded unto us as so excellent, that we must forsake our own customs, and receive her form and change in Sacraments, without examining by reason, and without authority of Scriptures, but we, as blinde men, should follow her leading us, whither she willet by her own spirit; which how safe or honorable it is for us, let both the Latin and Greek Sages judge. 4. Thou sayest, that the Lord said unto Peter alone, and not unto all the Apostles, whose sins ye forgive---- and, what thou shalt binde on earth---- But it is believed, that the Lord said that not unto Peter onely, but indifferently unto them all with Peter, or to Peter with them all: Nor did the holy Ghost come down on Peter onely at the Pentecost, but the Lord sent him unto them all in a like gift, and in a like measure as he had promised: therefore we do so acknowledge the power to be given of the Lord, and received by Peter, that we think the Authority of the other Apostles should not be minced, seeing certainly, they all equally, without any prejudice of another, or usurpation, as truly meek and lowly in heart, did receive the same holy Ghost, and by the same holy Ghost, did receive the same power of binding and loosing; nor can we think that the privilege was given unto Peter onely, which is common unto them all by the Lord's gift; therefore we may not take from others, which have the same power, and ascribe unto one, the Authority which is common to them all: Let Peter, as the twelfth Apostle, be honored, so that the other eleven be not excluded from the Apostleship, which certainly they did receive by an equal, and not different dispensation; not from Peter, but from the Lord himself, even as Peter did. 5. I grant there have been many heresies in Constantinople, but there also were they extinguished; as the heresie of Arius in the days of Constantine; the root of them all was Philosophia, which was planted in Constantinople, and which the learned have abused. So heresies have been condemned in the Churches of Calcedon, Constantinople, Ephesus, Antiochia and Alexandria, and it was commanded, that none should any more plead for these heresies: But now in this City are no heresies. As for Rome, haply no heresies began there, because they were not so witty and subtil, nor were they such searchers of the Scriptures as some here; and as the vain wisdom, wherewith some among us were mis-carried into heresies; is to be condemned; so the rudeness of the Romans is to be commended, whereby they said, neither this, nor that of the faith, but with an unlearned simplicity did hear others; which seemeth to have come either through too much sloth in searching the faith, or through slowness of judgement, or that they were taken up with the multitude and weight of secular affairs. Catal. test. verit. lib. 15. The Reader may judge of this reply unto these objections, and by these particulars understand what the Greeks did judge of the particulars that are omitted. It seemeth the Romans would wipe away that jeering blot in the last words, but they have done it wickedly, as will appear hereafter.

29. Gratian an Hetrurian, and Monk of Bononia, did out of the Canons of ancient Synods, and decrees of Popes, and sentences of Fathers, and some forged writings of late Monks compile and amass the volume of the Canon Law, which they call Decreta and Causæ. These were afterwards augmented by the Popes, adding the Decretals and Extravagants, and they are commented by the School-men. Gratian took this work in hand in imitation of Lotharius the Emperor, who had caused the Civil Laws to be digested into a method; and he gathered these books so, that by addition, subtraction, or changing of a word, or letter, one or more, he made all to serve the present times. For example, whereas Augustin de Doctr. Christ. l. 2. c. 8. saith, In Canonicis Scripturis, Ecclesiarum Catholicarum quamplurimum auctoritatem sequatur: inter quas sanè ille sunt, quas Apostolica sedes habere, & epistolas accipere meruerunt. Gratian Dist. 19. c. In Canonicis, hath them thus; Inter quas Scripturas Canonicas sanè illæ sunt quas Apostolica sedes, & ab ea alie accipere meruerunt epistolas. 2. In the sixth Council at Carthage, the Can. 165. saith, Ad transmarina qui putaverit appellandum; à nullo intra Africam in communione recipiatur. This Canon speaketh absolutely, and was made especially against appeals unto Rome. But Gratian repeating it Caus. 2. qu. 6. c. Placuit, addeth, Nisi forte Romanam sedem appellaverit. 3. Pope Gregory lib. 9. epist. 41. saith, Scriptis mihi tua dilectio piissimum dominum nostrum [speaking of the Emperor] reverendissimo fratri meo Iohanni primæ Iustinianæ Episcopo, pro agitudine capitis quam patitur, præcipere succedi. But Gratian Caus. 7. qu. 1. c. Scriptis, repeateth it thus; Scriptis tua dilectio me reverendissimo fratri Iohanni pi. Iust. epif. præcipere succedi. 4. That common saying, Petri successionem non habent, qui Petri fidem non habent; Gratian considering, that hereby the succession of Peter might be called into question, De pœnit. dist. 1. c. potest. saith, Qui Petri sedem non habent. Hear what a Papist judgeth of these Decrees. Corn. Agrippa, sometime Doctor utriusque Iuris, in his Book De vanitat. scient. cap. 92. saith, From the Civil Law hath flowed the Canon Law, which may seem unto many to be very holy; it doth so cover the precepts of covetousness, and forms of robbing, with the shew of godliness, albeit very few things in it belong unto godliness, religion, or the worship of God; besides that, some things are contrary, and fight against the word of God; and all the rest are nothing but chidings, pleas, prides, pomps, gain or lucre, and the pleasures of Popes, which are not content with the Canons prescribed by the Fathers, unless they do heap up Decrees, Extravagants--- that there is no end of making Canons, such is the ambition & meer pleasure of Popes--- The School of Paris did openly detest and reprove this erroneous & intolerable temerity, I will not say, heresie----- Out of these Canons and Decrees we have learned, that the patrimony of Christ is Kingdoms, donations, foundations, riches and possessions; and that the Priesthood of Christ, and primacy of the Church, is Empire and Kingdom; and that the sword of Christ, is temporal jurisdiction and power; and that the rock, which is the foundation of the Church, is the person of the Pope; and that Bishops are not servants or Ministers of the Church, but heads thereof; and the goods of the Church are not the doctrine of the Gospel, zeal of faith, contempt of the world, but tributes, tithes, offerings, collects, purples, mitres, gold, silver, jewels, lands, beasts, authority; it belongeth unto the Popes to manage battels, break covenants, loose oaths, absolve from obedience, and to make the house of prayer become a den of thieves; so that a Pope may depose a Bishop without a cause; he may dispose of other mens goods; he cannot commit simony; he may dispense against a vow, against an oath, and the law of nature, nor may any man say unto him, What doest thou? yea, and they say, that for a weighty cause, he may dispense against all the new Testament; he may thrust down to hell a third part or more of Christian souls. Agrippa in that place, hath more of the matter and scope of the Canon Law; and for instance, I will name Dist. 40. c. Si Papa, If the Pope be found to neglect either his own salvation, or his brethrens, be unprofitable and slack in his office, silent in that which is good, hurtful to himself and all others, yea, though he lead with him innumerable people in troops to the first slave of hell, yet let no mortal presume to finde fault with his doings. And nevertheless in these Decrees we may finde not a few steps of Antiquity, and some part of the doctrine and practise of the primitive Church even then remaining, as I have touched in some places, and more may be added; as Dist. 39. cap. 8. If, as the Apostle saith, Christ be the power of God, and the wisdom of God, and he which knoweth not the Scriptures, knoweth not the wisdom and power of God, then the ignorance of the Scriptures, is the ignorance of Christ. Dist. 9. c. he saith from Augustine, I have learned to give such fear and honor unto these books of the Scripture onely, which now are called Canonical, that I believe certainly none of their Authors could err in writing; and if I finde any thing in them that seemeth contrary unto truth, I doubt not but there is an escape in the Book, or the Translator hath not attained the right meaning, or that I do not understand it; but I do read other books so, that whatsoever was their holiness or learning, yet I think it not true, because they have thought so, but because they could perswade me by other Authors, or by the Canonical Scriptures, or by probable reasons. And Dist. 3. cap. Si consuetudinem, If you do object custom, it is to be observed, that the Lord saith, I am the way, the truth and life; he saith not, I am custom, but I am truth; and truly, to use the words of blessed Cyprian, whatsoever be the custom, how old soever, or common it be, it must not in any respect be preferred unto truth; and use, which is contrary unto truth, must be abolished. Dist. 16. c. Canones, These that are called the Canons of the Apostles, are known to be forged in the name of the Apostles by Hereticks; although some good things be in them, them, yet it is certain, that they are not from Canonical or Apostolical Authority. And c. Clementis, All the Fathers do reckon the book of Clemens, that is, the travels of Peter, and the Canons of the Apostles, among the Apocrypha. Dist. 36. c. Si quis, These be the two works of the high Priest, to learn from God by reading the Scriptures, and by frequent meditation, and to teach the people; but let him teach these things that he hath learned from God, and not of his own heart, or the mindes of men, but what the holy Ghost teacheth. Dist. 9. cap. 6. As the truth of the old Books is to be examined by the Hebrew Books, so the truth of the new craveth the rule of the Greek Language. Dist. 99. cap. 3. The Bishop of the first See, should not be called the Prince of Priests, nor the highest Priest, or any such way, but only the Bishop of the first See; but let not even the Bishop of Rome be called universal. Dist. 95. c. olim, In old time, he was a Bishop that was a Presbyter, and ere that by instinct of the devil, factions and schisms were in Religion, and it was said among the people, I am Apollo's, and I am Cepha's, the Churches were governed by the Common Counsel of the Presbyters----- so let Bishops know, that by custom, more then by truth of the Lord's dispensation, they are greater then the Presbyters, and that they should govern the Church in common. Caus. 1. qu. 1. c. Augustinus, Take the word from the water, and what is it but water? the word is added unto the element, and then it is a Sacrament; whence is this vertue unto the water, that it toucheth the body, and washeth the heart? the word doth it, not because it is spoken, but because it is believed; for in the word it self, the passing sound is one thing, and the abiding vertue is another. De Consecra. Dist. 2. c. Comperimus, We have found, that some when they have taken only the portion of the holy body, do abstain from the cup of the holy blood, who without doubt (because I know not by what superstition they are taught to be restrained) should either take the whole Sacrament, or be debarred from all; because the division of one and the same Sacrament, cannot be without great sacriledge. Ca. prima quidam; Till this world be finished, the Lord is above, and yet the truth of the Lord is also here with us; for the body in which he arose must be in one place, but his truth is diffused every where. C. Hoc est, The bread is after a maner called, the body of Christ, whereas indeed it is the Sacrament of his body; and the offering which is by the hand of the Priest, is called Christ's passion, death, and crucifying, not in truth of the thing, but in a signifying mystery. Where the Gloss saith, The bread, i. e. the Sacrament, which truly representeth the flesh of Christ, is called his body, but improperly, that is, it signifieth. Ca. In Christo. What do we then? do we not offer every day? yea, but in remembrance of his death; it is done in remembrance thereof what is done. Ca. Quia corpus; Because he was to remove his body from our eyes, and carry it above the Stars, it was needful that on the day of the Supper, he should consecrate the Sacrament of his body and blood; to the end it should be always revered in a mystery, which was once offered in payment. Many such passages are in these Decrees, which differing from the doctrine of the Church of Rome now, do prove that the Romish Church now, is not such as it was then. Pope Eugenius did approve all these Decrees, and ordained that these should be read in Schools and Universities, instead of all Canons and Decrees, that so he might the more easily draw them all under one yoke.

30. Peter Lombard, Bishop of Paris at the same time, followed the footsteps of Gratian, and gathered the sum of Divinity into four Books of sentences, out of the writings of the Fathers; but (as I said of Gratians Decrees) with adding, mincing, and changing of words and letters, and suitably unto

his time; and these sentences were authoris'd as the Text in all Schools, to the end, none from thenceforth should search antiquity and truth any more from Fathers or Councils, under no less danger then guiltiness of heresie. Hear what Cor. Agrippa De vanit. scient. cap. 97. saith of this Scholastick Theology, It is (saith he) of the kinde of Centaures, a two-fold discipline blown up by the Sorbon of Paris, with a sort of mixtion of Divine oracles, and Philosophical reasonings, written after a new form, and far different from the ancient customs, by questions and lies syllogisms, without all ornament of language, but otherwise full of judgement and understanding, and profitable to convince hereticks----- It cometh to pass, that the faculty of Scholastick Theology is not free from error and wickedness; these cursed hypocrites, and bold Sophists, have brought in so many heresies, which preach Christ not of good will, as Paul saith, but of contention, so that there is more agreement among Philosophers, then among these Divines, who have extinguish'd ancient Divinity with opinions of men, and new errors, &c. Here Barth. Gravius, a Printer at Lovane about the year 1565. giveth us some light; In his Epistle before his Edition of these Sentences, he telleth, that he had a purpose to reduce all the testimonies unto the first fountains in sincerity; but to his great admiration, he was informed by the Masters there; it could not be so, because albeit in other Editions innumerable places were corrected, yet many errors as yet were remaining, and these not little ones; and not a few things, as in the Edition at Paris, were changed, not according to the truth of the old books, but in conjecture, yea and the old words were corrupted oft times, through an immoderate desire of amending, and in not a few places the worse was put for the better; and (saith he) this may not be dissembled, that the genuine reading of the Master in quoting the testimonies of the ancient writers, is very oft changed into the truth of its original, especially no old Copy witnessing, that he had left it so written; for the Master was not so solicitous to repeat all their places wholly, but thought it sufficient to propound the matter briefly, and leave out many lines in the middle; and therefore it were not according to his minde, to fill up what he hath omitted; yea, they have found by sure arguments, that he had transcribed many things not from the very fountains, but from Hugo Victorian, and especially out of the Glossa Ordinaria; where these passages are not found in a continued context, as in their own Authors, but maimedly, and sometimes but in broken pieces, as it were out of sundry Books and Chapters, and mixed together as in a hotchpotch; and so if any thing be corrupt in the Master, it must not be reduced unto the first fountains; but rather unto the Books of the Glossa, because it was last taken thence; And also he was sometimes deceived in reading it wrong possibly, and lead into error; in which case to amend him according to the square of his Author, were most absurd and madness; they said also, that in quoting the Authors, he erroneously nameth one for another often, &c. By this ingenuoustestimony of the Printer, we may see what account they make now of their ancient Master; and seeing these books have been so oft changed, little credit can be given to any of their late Editions; and thirdly, that even the Master himself had not written soundly, according to the Fathers which he citeth. The Edition of Lombard at Paris An. 1550. hath in the end a catalogue of these which they call his errors, in quibus Magister non tenetur. I will shew some instances: In the Edition at Lovane An. 1568. lib. 4. Dist. 2. F. They who had not hope in the baptism of John, and did believe the Father, Son and holy Ghost, were not baptis'd thereafter, but the Apostles laid hands on them, and then they received the holy Ghost. Here on the margin it is, Erronea Magistri opinio. Dist. 5. C. Christ might give unto unto them [his disciples] power to forgive sins, yet not the same power that he himself had, but a created power, by which a servant may forgive sins, yet not as the author of remission, but as a servant, and yet not without God the Author. On the margin it is added, Hic Magister non recipitur. Dist. 13. A. It may be truly said, that the body of Christ is not eaten by the brute beasts, albeit it seem so; what then doth a mouse take and eat? God knoweth. In the margin it is said, Non probatur hac Magistri opinio. Dist. 17. B. It may truly be said, that without confession of the mouth, and paying outward punishment, sins are forgiven upon contrition and humility of the heart. In the margin it is added, Non rectè hic sentit Magister. Dist. 18. F. Unto the Priests he gave power of binding and loosing, that is, of shewing that they are bound or loosed. In the margin it is, Gravis Magistri lapsus. In many other particulars, though they have not put such a censure on him, he is no less adversary unto the doctrine of Rome now; as lib. 1. Dist. 1. A. Let the diligent and modest speculation of Divines, take heed to hold the Divine Scripture as the prescribed form in doctrine. Dist. 2. C. As Augustin lib. de Trini. teacheth, we must first shew, whether faith hold out so according to the authority of holy Scriptures; and then against babling disputers, which are more proud then capable, use Catholique reasons, and fit similitudes, for defence and asserting the faith, that so satisfying curiosity, we may the more fully instruct the modest; or if they cannot finde the truth which they seek, they may complain of their own minde, rather then of the truth, or of our assertion. D. Therefore let us propound the Authority of the old and new Testaments. Dist. 40. D. Seeing predestination is the preparation of grace, that is, Divine election, whereby he hath chosen whom he would before the foundation of the world, as the Apostle saith; on the other side, reprobation must be understood the foreknowledge of the iniquity of some, and the preparation of their damnation; for as the effect of predestination is that grace, whereby now we are justified, and helped to live well, and to continue in good, and whereby we are blessed in the future; so the reprobation of God, whereby from eternity, by not electing he hath rejected some, is considered in two particulars; whereof the one he foreseeeth, and prepareth not, that is iniquity; the other he foreseeeth, and prepareth, that is everlasting punishment. Whence Augustin ad Prosp. & Hilar. saith, This rule must be held without wavering, that sinners are foreknown in their sins, and not prepared, but that the punishment is prepared; for God in his presence (as Augustin in lib. de bone persever.) hath prepared his good things unto whom he would, and unto whomsoever he giveth, certainly he foresaw that he would give them. Dist. 41. A. If we seek the merit of obduration and mercy, we finde the merit of obduration, but we finde not the merit of mercy; because there is no merit of mercy, lest grace be made nothing, if it be not given freely, but rendered unto merits. So he sheweth mercy according to grace, which is given freely; but he hardeneth according to judgement, which is rendered unto merits; whence we may understand, that as God's reprobation is, that he will not shew mercy, so God's obduration is, that he sheweth not mercy; so that not any thing proceedeth from him, whereby a man is made worse, but onely it is not given, whereby he may be better. Hence it is clear (saith he) what the Apostle understandeth by mercy and hardening, and because mercy admitteth not merit, but obduration is not without merit; and by the word mercy here, is understood predestination, and especially the effect of predestination; but by the word obduration, is not meant the eternal reprobation of God, (because there is no merit thereof) but the privation or refusing of grace, which is some way the effect of reprobation; yet sometimes repro-

licence, and commandment to do rightly, and do it not, nor have a will to do it; and some do it, and nevertheless are culpable, because they do it not heartily, or with pleasure, but for some compulsion or by-respects, as it followeth there in the line. There is another liberty not true, and conjoynd with evil service, which is to do ill; when reason dissenteth from the will, judging that it should not be done, what the will would do; for to do good reason agreeth with the will; and therefore that is true and pious liberty. Whence it appeareth, that the marginal alteration is far different from the meaning of the Master, if it be not contrary. Diff. 27. A. Vertue is (as Augustine saith) a good quality of the minde, whereby men live rightly, and which none doth use evilly, and which onely God worketh in man. Therefore it is onely the work of God, as Augustin teacheth of the vertue of righteousness, upon that place of the Psalmist, I have done judgement and righteousness; saying, Righteousness is an excellent vertue of the minde, which none but God worketh in man. Therefore when the Prophet in the person of the Church saith, I have done righteousness, he understandeth not the vertue itself, which no man doth, but the work of it. Behold (saith he) here it is manifestly taught, that righteousness in man, is not the work of man, but of God; which is likewise to be meant of all other vertues. B. For the Apostle, writing unto the Ephesians of the grace of faith, affirmeth likewise, that faith is not of man, but of God onely, saying, Through grace ye are saved by faith, and that not of your selves, for it is the gift of God. Which is expounded by the Saints so, This, to wit, faith, is not from the power of our nature, because it is meely the gift of God. Behold, here it is clearly taught, that faith is not from the liberty of will, or of free-will; which agreeth with what is said before, that preveining and working grace is a vertue, which maketh free, and healeth the will of man. Wherefore Augustin in lib. de Spir. & lit. saith, We are justified not by free-will, but by the grace of Christ; not that it is without our will, but our will is shewed to be weak by the Law, that grace may heal the will, and the will being made whole may obey the Law. C--- Here it is clear, that the motion of the minde, whether unto good or ill, is from free-will; and therefore if grace or vertue be a motion of the minde, it is of free-will; but if it be of free-will, even but partly, then God alone without man worketh it not. Therefore some have said, not unlearnedly, that vertue is a good quality, or form of the minde, which informeth the soul; and it is not a motion, or affection of the minde, but free-will is helped by it, that it may be moved and set on good; and so out of vertue and free-will ariseth the good motion or affection of the minde, and thence the good deed proceedeth outwardly; as the earth is watered with rain, that it may bud and bring forth fruit; and the rain is not the earth, nor the bud, nor the fruit; and the earth is not the bud, nor fruit, nor bud of the fruit; So the rain of God's blessing is freely poured on the earth of our minde, that is, on free-will; that is, grace (which onely God doth, and not man with him) is inspired, whereby the will of man is watered, that it may bud and bring forth fruit, that is, the will is healed and prepared, that it may will good, in which respect it is said to work; and it is helped that it may do good, in which respect it is said to cooperate. And that grace is (not without reason) called vertue, because it healeth and helpeth the will of man. Because the Papists do wrest many passages of the Ancients, wherein they finde the word meritum, or meremur, here we may see how these words are to be expounded, and how Lombard did understand them in the Section E. Good will is both the gift of God, and also the merit of man, or rather of grace, because it is principally of grace, and it is a grace; wherefore Augustin ad Sixt. Presbyt. saith, What is the merit of man before grace, seeing nothing but grace worketh good merits in us? for from grace (as it is said) which preveineth and healeth the will of man, and from that freedom ariseth in the soul of man, the good affection, or the good motion of the minde; and this is the first good merit of man. As for example, from the vertue of faith, and from the freedom of mans will, is begotten in the minde some good motion, and remunerable, to wit, to believe; so from charity & free-will, another good motion proceedeth, to wit, to love; which is a very good one: and so it may be understood of other vertues. And these good motions or affections, are merits, and the gifts of God, whereby we attain (meremur) both the increase of them, and other things which consequently are given unto us here or hereafter. Here if we remember what was said before, from lib. 1. Dist. 41. A. there is no merit of mercy--- and then consider, how he here defineth merit to be a good motion of the minde, and remunerable; it is plain, that he thinketh not, man deserveth a reward, nor that the reward is given for the work, but that God of his mercy giveth more grace, and other things here and hereafter, unto them which being healed by grace, have good motions of minde. And this is the large and improper use of the word, which is not seldom among the writings of the Ancients since, and in the time of Pelagius. And in the Section G. he hath these words out of Augustine, When God doth crown our merits, he crowneth nothing but his own gifts; wherefore eternal life, which God rendereth unto preceeding merits, because even these merits whereunto it is rendered, are not of us, but wrought in us by grace; even that life is rightly called grace, because it is given freely or graciously; neither is it therefore graciously, because it is not given unto merits, but because even these merits are given by grace, unto whom it is given. But if the word merit be taken properly, it is a work not owed, for which a proportionable reward is given---- and in this sense, neither Lombard, nor any of the meer Ancients, did use that word, howbeit he useth it oft in that larger sense. Dist. 32. B. Behold, he (Augustin) sheweth clearly, that sin is dimitted in baptism; not that it abideth not after baptism, but because its guiltiness is abolished in baptism: and he sheweth also, that it is dimitted the same way, because by the grace of baptism, concupiscence it self is tamed and minished. Lib. 3. Dist. 25. A. That is sound faith, whereby we believe that no man, whether of riper or less age, can be freed from the contagion of death, and obligation of sin which he hath contracted in his first birth, but by the one Mediator between God and men Jesus Christ; by the most wholesome faith of which man (and the same being God) the righteous were saved, which did believe that he was to come in the flesh; for their faith and ours is one and the same; therefore seeing all the righteous before the incarnation, or after it, did not live, nor do live but by faith of the incarnation of Christ, certainly that which is written, There is no other name under heaven by which we must be saved, was powerful to save mankind from that time in which it was defiled in Adam. In lib. 4. he speaketh much of the conversion of the bread and wine in the Sacrament. And Dist. 11. he saith, But if you ask, what sort of conversion it is? whether formal, or substantial, or of any other sort, I am not able to define it; and I acknowledge it is not formal, because the kindes of things that were before do continue, both taste and weight. C. If you ask the way, how it can be? I answer shortly, the mystery of faith may be safely believed, but not safely searched. In Lombard's time transubstantiation was not an Article of faith. Dist. 12. It is asked, Whether that that the Priest doth, is properly a sacrifice? or if Christ be sacrificed dayly? or if he was once onely sacrificed? It may be answered shortly, That which is offered and consecrated by the Priest, is called a sacrifice and oblation, because because it is the remembrance and representation of the true sacrifice, and holy offering that was made upon the altar of the Cross; and Christ died once on the Cross, and there was offered in himself; but he is dayly offered in the Sacrament, because in the Sacrament is a remembrance of that which was once done. Wherefore Augustin saith, We hold it sure, that Christ rising from death, dieth not now; and nevertheless, lest we forget what was done, it is kept in our remembrance every year, to wit, so oft as the Pascha is celebrated. Is Christ killed so oft? but onely a yearly remembrance representeth what was once done, and so maketh us to be moved, as if we saw the Lord on the Cross. Here we may observe, that where it is said, sed tantum anniversaria recordatio --- the Masters of Lovane have turned that, tantum into tamen, the one is exclusive, but that they love not. In lib. 3. Dist. 22. D. It is asked, whether it may be said conveniently, that the Son of man, or that man came down from heaven, or be every where, as the Son of God, or God is said to have come from heaven, and to be every where? To this we say, if the meaning of that sentence be referred unto the unity of his person, it may be safely said; but if to the distinction of natures, it can be granted no way. Dist. 27. F. That command [Thou shalt love the Lord with all thy heart] is not at all fulfilled by man in this life, but in part, and not wholly, because we love in part, as we know but in part. Therefore Lombard did not believe perfection of mans obedience, nor works of supererogation. In many other particulars he is contrary to the Canons of Trent. It is true, he was the first that hath named seven Sacraments: the Fathers in former times took the name in a large sense; as Augustin calleth the sign of the Cross, a Sacrament, contra Faust. lib. 19. cap. 14. and on Psal. 106. he calleth the several mystical or allegorical sentences, Sacraments: and after this, the Gloss on Gratian; Dist. 100. c. Siquis, calleth the consecration of the altar, a Sacrament; and Dist. 26. c. Acutus, it saith, The Bishop is a Sacrament: and Tho. Aquinas Sum. par. 3. q. 6 giveth the name to sundry other things. If then we will reckon all that were called Sacraments, they will draw nearer the number of seventy then seven. But when the ancients speak more properly of the Sacraments of the New Testament, they do name but two, as I have noted in some already. But then first did Lombard make this reckoning, Lib. 4. Dist. 2. The Sacraments of the new Law, are baptism, confirmation, the bread of blessing, that is, the Eucharist, penance, extreame unction, order, marriage; whereof some give remedy against sin, and bestow helping grace; others are onely for remedy, as marriage; some do support with grace and vertue, as the Eucharist. And in the margin it is said, Nec hic recte sentit Magister. And there is no small controvertise among their School-men for five of them, to wit, who was the Author of them? in what part of the Scriptures have they any ground? what is their sign? Nevertheless the Council of Trent hath accursed all men, who hold that there be more or fewer then seven. Ses. 7. ca. 1. Likewise Lombard lib. 4. Dist. 21. hath the question, Whether sin can be forgiven after this life? and he speaketh of a fire of transitory tribulation, through which (he thinketh) some must pass; but he speaketh not of the place, nor time of continuance there, nor of sacrifice for the soules there, nor of any mans power to deliver soules out of it.

craments.

31. The Apostle Paul professed, that he knew not Christ according to the flesh; but in this Century they began to desire the sight of Christ's sepulchre, and frequent peregrinations thither, some in penance by injunction of Priests, and some of their carnal accord. Whence arose three Orders of religious Knights. 1. Hospitallarii, who received the pilgrims in lodging, and defended them from the Infidels. 2. Naucles in generall. 39. writeth, that Raymund their Master did many ways injure the Patriarch of Jerusalem, and other Prelates; for whosoever was accursed, or excommunicated by the Patriarch or others, Raymund did receive them into communion, and when they were dying, he gave them the Sacrament, and did many other things contrary unto the privileges of the Church; and when the Patriarch did complain, there arose a sedition among the Citizens, and they ran furiously into the Church of the Grave against the Patriarch: The Church of Rome (saith he) seemeth to have given the occasion of so great confusion; for she did exempt that Order from the jurisdiction of the Patriarch. Afterwards they left their hospitality, and became soldiers against the Turks, under the title of Knights of S. John, and then of the Knights of Rhodos, where they dwelt until the year 1523. when the Turks expelled them; and then they come to Malta, whence they now have their name. 2. Templararii, which was instituted by Fulco King of Jerusalem; and from them were named the Temple Land, that were dedicated unto them throughout Christendom, as they had their name from the Temple of Jerusalem; they were cut off for the most part, about the year 1305. and their means were given to the Knights of S. John. Platin. in Clemen. 5. of them we shall have occasion to speak again. 3. Teutonici, so named from their Nation; they professed both hospitality and warfar: when they were expelled out of Jerusalem, they abode at Ptolemais in Egypt, Pol. Virg. de inven. rer. lib. 7. cap. 5. and from thence they come into Prussia, as followeth. In this time began many sorts of Friers.

Conversion
Nations.

32. Some Nations were then turned from Paganism, as some in Pomerania, about the year 1106. and they returned to it again, until the year 1124. when Boleslaus, Prince of Poland, compelled Wartislaus, Prince of Pomer, and all his subjects to receive the faith; these were a sort of Wandals in Poritz, Stetine, Wolin, &c. Wencelm Bishop of Bamberg went thither, and was called, The Apostle of Pomer, Crantz. in Saxo. lib. 5. cap. 44, & 45. he preached among them thirty years. After his death, their Duke Pribislaus forsook the faith: and within six years Henry (surnamed the proud) Duke of Saxony, compelled them to receive the Gospel again: thereafter he continued in profession, but was little careful of the people, who continued in their Idolatry, until Woldemar, King of the Danes, did threaten them, that he would never cease from wars, until they would embrace Christianity. Norway received the Christian faith by the preaching of Hadrian, an English man, which thereafter was Pope Hadrian IV. The before named Boleslaus subdued the Pruteni, or Borussians, and compelled them to receive Christianity: yet thereafter they forsook it, until the Knights Teutonici conquered their Land, about the year 1317. There was also a new plantation of Rugani An. 1168. Jaremar their Duke went before the people, yea, and he preached the word unto them. 10. Papp. in Histo. convers. Gent. About that time, a ship of Lubert, going unto Livonia, the Merchants, took with them a Monk, Meinhard; when he saw the miserable blindness of the people, he caused a little cottage to be set up for him, and dwelt there until he learned their language; and then he taught them the grounds of Religion: thereafter he had great authority among them, and was the first Bishop of Riga. Berthold, a Monk of St. Paul's at Breme, was sent thither after him, by the Arch-Bishop of Breme; he found many Pagans still there; and because they would not believe the word, he thought to daunt them with the sword; as Alb. Crantz. in Saxon. lib. 7. cap. 13. saith, He sought from Pope Celestin, a Bull of remission of sins unto all Soldiers, which would go and fight against the Infidels of Livonia; and he was killed in the first fight, in the year 1198. Then Albert went through Saxony and Vandalia, and preached remission of sins to fight under the sign of the Cross, against the Infidels of Livonia: Many went with him, and bought that Land with their blood. At that time began a new Order of Fratres Crucegladiatores; and they did agree with the Church-men, that they should have the third part of the Land; this is called Conversio Vandalica: but afterwards they would be Lords of the whole Land, scarcely leaving the third part unto the Church. At that time the Danes conquered the City Revel, and the Bishop thereof was subordinate unto the Metropolitan of Denmark. When the Teutonick Knights came and possessed Prussia, the Crucegladiatores of Livonia joyned with them; but their Successors did repent it, for the Teutonicks made conquest of all, and that name did fail.

CENTURY XII.

CHAP. IV.

OF BRITANNY.

1. HENRY I. the third Son of William the Conqueror, began to reign in the year 1100. for his knowledge of the Liberal Arts, he was called, The Clerk. He paid Peter-pence unto the Pope; but he would not suffer his Subjects to appeal unto Rome, because the Popes have not continued in the steps of Peter (said he) and hunt after earthly lucre; they have not his power, seeing (as all may now see) they follow not his holiness. And when Pope Paschalis did challenge him, he returned answer, saying, Let your Holiness know, that while I live, by God's grace, the Prerogative and Customs of the Kingdom of England shall not be empaired; and though I would so far abuse my self (which God forbid) my Nobles, yea, all the Commons in England would not suffer it. Wherefore, most dear Father, let your bountifulness be so moderate toward us, that you do not inforce me (which I shall unwillingly do) to depart from your obedience. Matth. Parisien. And contrary to the Roman Canons, and without licence of the Pope, he married Maude (Daughter to Malcolm Cammore) being then a Nun in Winchester. In the year 1125, John, Bishop of Cremona, was sent from Rome, and in a Synod at London, he did urge the single life of the Clergy, and said, It is a vile crime, that a man rising from the side of his concubine, should consecrate the body of Christ: The same night he was taken with a whore; It was so notorious, that it could not be denied, saith the same Author.

2. DAVID (the third Son of Malcolm Cammore) did erect four Bishopricks, and seven Abbeys, and other religious places (as they called them) and repaired sundry decayed Monasteries; therefore the Clergy called him, Saint David: but his Successor called him, a good Saint to the Church, and an ill Saint to the Crown. The fruit of so large donations (saith Buchan. Hist. lib. 7.) was, As the use of the members failed in them, who stuff their bellies with too much meat, so from thenceforth the small sparks of wit being oppressed with luxury, did dayly decay, the study of learning failed, piety was turned into a formality and superstition, and as in untilld land, the seeds of all weeds and vices sprang up; And the Prelates shook off the care of preaching, as a work not becoming their Dignity; and because the Monks had the favor of the people for preaching, the Prelates gave unto them liberty above the Parish Priests, to the end, that the Monks might the more recommend them in their preachings.

Rome

3. When HENRY I. King of England died, without a Son, Steven, Earl of Bolonia, and his Sisters Son, usurpeth the Crown about the year 1135. His Brother Henry, Bishop of Winchester, procured the first Law that ever was in England, for appellations to Rome; (1a. Vsser. de stat. & succes. eccle. cap. 8. ex Hen. Hunting. Hist.) but Steven reserveth to himself the right and power of bestowing Benefices, and investing Prelates. In the beginning of his reign, William, Dean of London, Ralph Longford, Richard Belmeys, and others of the Chapter, did elect a Bishop without the King's recommendation; wherefore he causeth to be imprisoned (not their persons, but) their wives, until they had satisfied for their contempt. 1o. Bale ex Rad. de Dicet. Whence it appeareth, that as yet the Priests had wives, notwithstanding all former Acts. Thereafter Albericus, Bishop of Ostia, was sent by Pope Innocentius II. and in a Synod at Westminster, condemned the marriage of Priests again; and ordained that Christ's body (as they spoke) should not be kept above eight days, lest it become hoary and rot. At that time Robert Pully deserved commendation, for restoring, or creating the University of Oxford, and was Rector thereof.

4. HENRY II. (Nephew of Henry I. by his Daughter Maude) disclaimed all the Authority of the Pope, refused to pay Peter-pence, and interdicted all appealation to Rome. At that time Philip de Brok, a Canon of Bedford; was questioned for murder; he used reproachful speeches to the King's Justices, for which he was censured; and the Judges complained unto the King, that there were many robberies, and rapes, and murders, to the number of an hundred, committed within the Realm by Church-men. The King commanded that justice should be executed upon all men alike in his Courts. But Thomas Becket, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, would have the Clergy (so offending) judged in the Spiritual Court, and by men of their own coat; who if they were convicted, should at first be deprived of their Benefice; and if they were found guilty again, they should be judged at the King's pleasure. The King stood for the ancient Laws and Customs; and in a general Assembly at Clarendon, in the year 1164. with consent of the Arch-Bishop, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons and great men, was a rehearsal and acknowledgement of some ancient Customs and Laws: among which that were authorised (being sixteen in number) were these; 1. If between a Lay-man and a Clark were any strife for Church-goods, the plea should be in the King's Court. 2. No Bishop nor Clark should go forth of the Realm without the King's licence; and then he shall swear upon the Book, that he shall procure no hurt to the King, nor any of his Subjects. 3. None who holdeth of the King in chief, or in service, shall be accursed without the King's licence. 4. All the Bishopricks and Abbeyes, when they be vacant, should be in the King's hands until a Prelate be chosen; and he should be chosen out of the King's Chappels; and before he be confirmed, he should do his homage unto the King. 5. If any plea were brought to the Consistory, a party might appeal unto the Arch-Deacon, and from him to the Bishops Court, and thence unto the Arch-Bishop, and from him to the King, and no further. 6. All debts that were owing of truth-plight, should not be pleaded in Spiritual, but Temporal Courts. 7. The Peter-pence which were gathered for the Pope, should be collected for the King. 8. If any Clark were taken for felony, and it were so proved, he shall first be degraded, and then after judgement, be hanged; or if he were a traitor, he shall be drawn in funder. They did all swear, and by word of mouth faithfully promise to observe these Laws unto the King and his Heirs, simply and without fraud. Mat. Paris. calleth them, wicked and detestable Acts: But Tho. Becket's testimony is the

the stronger, de facto. Tho. Becket sent unto the Court of Rome, to signifye the grief of the Church and his own, for consenting unto these Laws, and asked absolution from the bond which he had unwisely entered into; and he obtained it. The same year the King required to have punishment of some misdoings among the Clergy: The Arch-Bishop would not permit; and when he saw (in his judgement) the liberties of the Church troden under foot, he, without the King's knowledge, took ship, and intended toward Rome, but by a contrary winde he was brought back: Then he was called to account for his receipts, that came to his hand while he was high Chancellor: He appealeth to the See of Rome; and under pain of excommunication forbad both Bishops and Nobles to give sentence against him, seeing he was both their Father and their Judge: Nevertheless they, without his confession, gave sentence against him. Then he, seeing himself forsaken of all the other Bishops, listeth the cross which he held in his hand aloft, and went away from the Court; and the next day got him over into Flanders, and so to the Pope. Matth. Parisien. hath many Letters betwixt the Pope and this King, and the King of France, and sundry Bishops of France and England, for reconciliation betwixt the King and this proud Prelate; but all to no purpose, till Henry of his own accord did cause his Son (Henry III.) to be crowned, and then he (being in Normandy) was content, by the mediation of the French King, to accept the Prelate. Thomas, returning into England, excommunicateth all the Bishops which had been at the Coronation of the young King, because it appertained unto him (forsooth) to inaugurate the King. The King sent unto him, and required to absolve them, seeing what was done unto them, was done for his cause. The Prelate refuseth. On Christmas day he solemnly excommunicateth two Gentlemen, for cutting his horse tail. On the fifth day four Gentlemen did kill him, in the year 1171. At Easter Pope Alexander canonized him as a Saint, and would have excommunicated the King for his death; but the King by his Ambassadors purged himself, that he knew not of his death: yet because he did carry grudge at him, he was forced to renounce the investiture of Bishops, and thereby his Kingdom became more slavish then before. And the Pope, in token of his victory, to the shame of the King, and credit of the Clergy, did pretend some miracles as done by this Thomas after his death, and commanded his feast to be kept throughout the Kingdom; and the Cathedral which before was called Christ's Church, was after that called St. Thomas Becker's: and to the end the King might suffer this infamy the more patiently, and also to make Ireland the more subject unto the See of Rome, Pope Alexander confirmed again unto King Henry the Lordship of Ireland; and ordained that the Bishops there, should obey the Laws of England. For in the year 1155. Murchard (or as some call him Dermot mac Morrog) King of Leinster, being exiled by O. Roricy King of Midia, sought aid from Henry II. he sent Richard Strongbow, Earl of Penbrok, (who had married the onely Daughter of Murchard) with a considerable Army into Ireland; and within a short space he restored his father in law, and conquered other Lands, so that Henry was jealous of his power, and commanded by open Proclamation, him and all his Army to return under pain of forfeiture. In obedience, Richard gave into the King's hand all his purchase, and his wives inheritance, and again received (as his vassal) Weisford, Ossoria, Carterlogia, &c. But in the year 1172 Henry went personally into Ireland, and the most part submitted themselves unto him, as unto their onely and lawful Sovereign, whereas in former times, that Nation was divided into four petty Kingdoms, and several Dukedoms, and one of them was chosen Monarch. The same Henry did claim the Lands of Northumberland, and----- from the Scots; Malcolm the maiden, and his Brother William, at two several times went to London, and did acknowledge the King for these Lands, whereas in former times the Heir of the Crown did onely perform that ceremony. But then Henry would have more, that all the Bishops of Scotland should be under the yoke of the Arch-Bishop of York as their Metropolitan. At the first meeting at Norham, the Scots put it off, but with slender delays. The next year Hugo, Cardinal de S. Angelo (sent into England) was for Henry in this purpose, and did cite the Bishops of Scotland to compear before him in Northampton; they went thither, and the Cardinal had a speech of humility and obedience, all to perswade the Scotch Bishops to submit themselves unto the Primate of York, who was a Prelate of great respect, and whose credit in the Court of Rome might serve them to good use. A yong Clerk stood up, and spake in name of the others; his speech is written diversly; I shall shew it, as I have copied it out of an old Register of Dunkel (by the favor of Bishop Alexander Lindsay) It is true, English Nation, thou mightest have been noble, and more noble then some other Nations, if thou hadst not craftily turned the power of thy Nobility, and the strength of thy fearful might, into the presumption of tyranny, and thy knowledge of Liberal Science, into the shifting Glosses of Sophistry; but thou disposdest not thy purposes as if thou wert lead with reason, and being puffed up with thy strong Armies, and trusting in thy great wealth, thou attemptest, in thy wretched ambition, and lust of domineering, to bring under thy jurisdiction thy neighbor Provinces and Nations, more noble, I will not say in multitude or power, but in lineage and antiquity; unto whom, if thou wilt consider ancient records, thou shouldest rather have been humbly obedient, or at least, laying aside thy rancor, have reigned together in perpetual love; and now with all wickedness of pride that thou shewest, without any reason or law, but in thy ambitious power, thou seekest to oppress thy mother the Church of Scotland, which from the beginning hath been Catholique and free, and which brought thee, when thou wast straying in the wilderness of heathenism, into the safe-guard of the true faith, and way unto life, even unto Jesus Christ, the Author of eternal rest; she did wash thy Kings and Princes, and people, in the laver of holy Baptism; she taught thee the commandments of God, and instructed thee in moral duties; she did accept many of thy Nobles, and others of meaner rank, when they were desirous to learn to read, and gladly gave them dayly entertainment without price, books also to read, and instruction freely; she did also appoint, ordain and consecrate thy Bishops and Priests; by the space of thirty years and above, she maintained the primacy and pontifical dignity within thee on the North side of Thames, as Beda witnesseth: And now, I pray, what recompence renderest thou unto her, that hath bestowed so many benefits on thee? is it bondage? or such as Judea rendered unto Christ, evil for good? it seemeth no other thing. Thou unkinde vine, how art thou turned into bitterness? we looked for grapes, and thou bringest forth wilde grapes; for judgement, and behold iniquity and crying. If thou couldest do as thou wouldest, thou wouldest draw thy mother the Church of Scotland, whom thou shouldest honor with all reverence, into the basest and most wretchedst bondage. Fie for shame! what is more base, when thou wilt do no good, to continue in doing wrong? even the serpents will not do harm to their own, albeit they cast forth to the hurt of others; the vice of ingratitude hath not so much moderation; an ungrateful man doth wrack and massacre himself, and he despiseth and minceth the benefits for which he should be thankful, but multiplieth and enlargeth injuries. It was a true saying of Seneca, (I see) The more some do owe, they hate the more; a small debt maketh a grievous enemy. What sayest thou, David? it is true, They rendered me evil for good, and hatred for my love. It is a wretched thing (saith Gregory) to serve a Lord, who cannot be appeased with whatsoever obeysance. Therefore thou Church of England, dost as becomes thee not; thou thinkest to carry what thou cravest, and to take what is not granted; seek what is just, if thou wilt have pleasure in what thou seekest. And to the end I do not weary others with my words, albeit I have no charge to speak for the liberty of the Church of Scotland, and albeit all the Clergy of Scotland would think otherwise, yet I dissent from subjecting her, and I do appeal unto the Apostolical Lord, unto whom immediately she is subject; and if it were needful for me to die in the cause, here I am ready to lay down my neck unto the sword: nor do I think it expedient to advise any more with my Lords the Prelates, nor if they will do otherwise, do I consent unto them; for it is more honest to deny quickly what is demanded unjustly, then to drive off time by delays, seeing he is the less deceived who is refused betimes. When Gilbert had so made an end, some English, both Prelates and Nobles, commend the yong Clerk, that he had spoken so boldly for his Nation, without flattering, and not abashed at the gravity of such Authority; but others, because he spoke contrary unto their minde, said, A Scot is naturally violent, and In naso Scotti piper. But Roger, Arch Bishop of York, which principally had moved this business, to bring the Church of Scotland unto his See, uttered a groan, and then with a merry countenance laid his hand on Gilbert's head, saying; Ex tua phareta non exit illa sagitta; as if he had said, When ye stand in a good cause, do not forethink what ye shall say, for in that hour it shall be given unto you. This Gilbert was much respected at home after that. And Pope Celestin put an end unto this debate, for he sent his Bull unto King William, granting that neither in Ecclesiastical nor Civil affairs, the Nation should answer unto any forain Judge whatsoever, except onely unto the Pope, or his Legate specially constituted. So far in that Register of Dunkel.

5. The above named Henry II. was so admired through the world for his prudence and prowess, that Manuel Emperor of the Greeks, Frederick Emperor of Germany, the French King, with many other famous Princes, sent unto him, as a School-Master of justice, for determination of obscure doubts. Alfonso King of Castile, and Saucius King of Navar, being at variance for some possessions, did of their own accord submit themselves unto his judgement, and he found an overture to both their good liking. This is to be marked, because the worshippers of Becker call him a vitious Prince. In the year 1181. the Patriarch of Jerusalem, and the Master of the Templars, having no King, and being distressed by Saladin, did profer unto the same Henry the Kingdom of Jerusalem, and brought unto him the keys of their Cities. He refused, because of his weighty affairs at home. They were oppressed by the Infidels; and he had no more prosperity; for his Son would have the Government, as well as the Title of the Kingdom; and the Father did the service of a Steward unto his Son; yea, and more disdainfully did the Son entreat his Father, till he was taken away by death; and his Brother Richard was also a grief unto his Father, and so was the third Brother, John. The true cause of all his woes, may be thought the oppression of some professors of truth; for Pol. Virgil, in Hist. Anglor. lib. 13. testifieth, that about the year 1160. thirty teachers came from Germany into England, and taught the right use of Baptism, of the Lord's Supper, &c. and were put to death. It is true, Virgil calleth them worshippers of Divels; but we shall hear anon, how all professors of truth were reviled; and John of Sarisbun, at the same time, wrote, saying, He who speaketh for the truth of faith, or sincerity of manners, according to the Law of God, is called superstitious, envious, and which is capital, an enemy of the King. After four years, others which were (in contempt) called Publicans and Waldenses, taught in England, that the Roman Church had left the faith of Christ, and was become the whore of Babel, the barren fig-tree; no obedience should be given unto the Pope, or his Bishops; Monks were dead carion; their vows frivolous; their characters were the mark of the Beast. 10. Bale. Cent. 2. §. 96. in Appen. And in the year 1166, the same Henry drew some professors unto judgement at Oxford, because they were said to dissent from the doctrine of the Roman Church; he caused them to be burnt with an hot iron, and banished them. 1. Fox in Act. & Mon.

*Married

6. At that time were many married Priests in Brittany. Ephleg left his Son Cedda to be his Successor in the Priesthood at Plinmouth. Arnold Dunprust left his Son Robert likewise, in the same County; unto Robert did his Son succeed. In Norfolk Wulkerel dimitted his Priest-hood at Dyssa, unto his lawful Son William. Hugh Howet in Sarisbury, John in Excheester, and Oliver in Nottingham, all succeeded unto their Fathers. 10. Bale Cent. 3. §. 10. in Appen. In Ireland fifteen Bishops of Ilesmore succeeded lineally and hereditarily, for the space of 200. years, and of them eight Sons succeeded unto their fathers (Bernard. in Vita Malac.) until the year 1121. when the Bishop Celsus, having no Son, did (as by testament) name Malachias Bishop of Connereth, to be his Successor; and his friends, as heirs, did resist for five years. Malachias had correspondence with Bernard of Claraval, and had two Monks sent from that Abbey, to begin an Abbey of that Order in Ireland; but they returned against the Bishops will; wherefore Bernard wrote unto him his 317. Epistle, exhorting that he would not leave off the purpose, but rather be more vigilant in that new place and Land, so unaccustomed with Monastical life; and excusing the Monks, that their returning was occasioned by the untowardness of these brethren, living in a Land without discipline, and especially not accustomed to submit unto such counsels. This Malchias did urge the single life of Priests in Ireland. He went to Rome, and became Legate, but died in the way beside Bernard.

7. John of Sarisbury, Bishop of Carnotum, was familiar with his Countryman Pope Hadrian IV. when they were alone in a chamber at Benevento, Hadrian asked him, what the world thought and spake of him and of the Church? After a little form of excuse, he said, I will tell what I hear spoken every where; they say, The Church of Rome, which is the Mother of all Churches, is become a stepdame unto them; and the Pope is called, a cross and grief unto all men, and intolerable for pride; as the zeal of their Fathers had erected Churches, so now they do decay; and the Pope was glorious not onely in purple, but in glancing gold; the Cardinals and Bishops are called Scribes and Pharisees, laying heavy burthens on mens shoulders, which themselves will not touch with their finger; their Palaces are glorious, and the Churches of Christ are polluted by their hands; they spoil the Nations, as if they would scrape together the treasures of Croesus: But the most High dealeth most wisely with them, for they become often a prey unto others; and I think, so long as they stray out of the way, they shall never want a scourge from God. Then said the Pope, What thinkest thou? He answered There is danger on every side: I fear the blame of flattering or lying, if I alone do speak contrary unto the world; and I fear, lose Majesty, lest it seem that I deserve the gibbet, as opening my mouth against the heaven; nevertheless, because Wido Cardinal of St. Potentiana beareth witness with the people, people, I dare not altogether contradict them; for he saith, There is a root of duplicity in the Roman Church: and I do ingenuously profess, I never saw more honest Clergy-men, then in the Church of Rome: but seeing you press and command me, and it is not lawful to lye unto the holy Ghost, I profess ye are not altogether to be followed in your works; for he who dissenteth from the truth, is a Schismatick and Heretick; but of the mercies of God, there be some who will not follow all our works; but I fear, lest while you continue asking these things, as you are pleased, you hear from your foolish friend, things that will not please you: Why is it Father, that you search other mens lives, and search not your own? all men rejoyce with you; you are called the father and Lord of all men, and all the oyl for sinners is poured on your head: If you be a Father, why cravest thou gifts from thy children? or if thou be a Lord, why causest thou not the Romans to stand in awe of thee? and having brided their presumption, bringest them not again into the faith? But thou wilt preserve the City unto the Church by thy gifts; did Pope Sylvester so conquer it? thou art a Father in the by-ways, and not in the right ways; it is to be conserved by such means as it was purchased, &c. The Pope told him the fable, of the members grumbling against the womb; and the same (said he) would befall unto Christendom, if they should not resort unto Rome their head. And then the Pope, smiling at the mans boldness, did require him, that how oft he heard any thing spoken amiss of him, he would presently advertise him. Without doubt this Bishop had more things in his minde, which he uttered not. P. Morn. in Myst. ex Io. Sarisbur. in Policrat. lib. 6. cap. 24. In the same work, lib. 6. cap. 16. he saith, The Roman Legates do so rage, as if Satan were come forth from the face of the Lord to oppress the Church; oft do they harm, and herein they are like the devil, that they are called good, when they do not evil; with them judgement is nothing but a publick reward; they do account gain to be godliness; they do justify the wicked for gifts, and vex the afflicted souls; they adorn their tables with silver and gold, and rejoyce in the worst things; seeing they eat the sins of the people, they are clothed with them, and in them do they riot many ways, whereas true worshippers should adore the Father in the Spirit; if any do dissent from them, he is judged a Schismatick or Heretick. O that Christ would manifest himself, and openly shew the way wherein men should walk! Lib. 7. cap. 10. We should be servants unto the Scriptures, and not domineer over them, unless one will think himself worthy to rule over Angels. Cap. 17. One cometh into the Church trusting in the multitude of his riches, and followeth Simon, nor findeth he any that saith, thy money perish with thee. Another feareth to come unto Peter with his gifts, yet privily Jupiter slideth in a shower of gold into Danae's bosome, and the incestuous wooer entereth so into the bosome of the Church. The Author of Catal. test. ver. lib. 14. sheweth, ex Petro Paris. Cantor. in Abbreviat. Verbo, how this John did oppose the Pope and the Cardinals, when they would enjoin some new Rites, and said, ye should be so far from enjoying new Rites, that ye should rather take away some ancient ones, albeit they were profitable; for Christians are much burthened with the multitude of these useful traditions; ye should rather endeavor, that the word of Christ may be kept; for now it may be objected unto us, that the commandments of God are made of no effect, in respect of mens traditions.

8. Edmond Rich Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, about the year 1181. was wont to say, By gifts that are given on the one side, and taken on the other, Christianity is already corrupted, and it will fall ere they be aware, unless they be so wise, as to cure themselves from this pest. By these gifts, some do understand not so much what was given by Intrants, as what the Popes and Bishops gave to stop the mouths of such as spoke against their vices and errors, to divert their reproofs. Catal. test. ver.

9. Petrus Blefenis, once Chancellor of Canterbury, and then Bishop of Rotomagum, for his learning and honesty of life, was in great favor with Princes and Prelates, saith Trithem. He did very sharply rebuke the manners of the Clergy, especially that they did abuse the power of the keys to satisfy their avarice. In Epistle 25. unto a friend, who was an official of a Bishop, he saith, Because I love thee affectionately in the bowels of Christ Jesus, I have decreed to exhort thee with wholesome admonitions, to come timely out of Ur of the Chaldees, and from the midst of Babylon, and forsake the ministry of that damnable stewardship; I know covetousness hath subverted thy heart, in so far as thou art become an official unto a Bishop; I think officials have their name, not from the nown officium, but from the verb officio; all the business of the official is in lieu of the Bishop, to strip and excoriate the silly sheep which are concredited unto him; these are the Bishops blood-suckers, spuing out other folks blood after they have drunk it; the riches which the wicked hath gathered, he shall spue it out, and God shall draw it out of his belly; these are as a sponge in the hand of a strainer--- what he hath gathered by oppressing the poor, goeth unto the Bishop's pleasures, but to the official's torment; as the bees gather honey not for themselves, but for others; so ye gather riches not for your selves, but for others: these are the privy doors, by which the servants of Bell do thievishly carry away the sacrifices which the King had laid on the table; so the Bishop taketh away other mens goods with long hands, and layeth the blame of the crime and infamy on the official; they have their eye on the reward, but look not to the fatherless and widow---- what is done under pretence of counterfeited Religion and justice, availeth not unto life, nor edifieth unto salvation. Saul did spare the fattest of Amaleks flocks, as if he would sacrifice unto God, and he did provoke God unto wrath--- I could the more patiently endure that damnable office, if thou wert not eminent in the knowledge of the holy Scriptures; these causes and judgements wherein thou hast entangled thy self imprudently, I will not say impudently, are fitter for a secular man; a learned and ecclesiastical man, should not meddle with secular affairs---- I wish that thou wouldest forsake these noisome things of the world, that the Prince of this world may not finde any thing that is his in thee, &c. He did oft call the Clergy, Syria, Edom, the calves of Bethel, Idols of Egypt, Priests of Baal, &c. In his other Epistles he saith, If thou hadst once tasted the sweetness of wisdom (i.e. of the holy Scripture) thou wouldest loath all other things in comparison; for this giveth abundantly the incomparable treasures of pleasure, and the grace of all gifts. And again, It is necessary to read the Scriptures, for that is the table of the tabernacle---- that is the food by which we breath and live. Certainly Christ did use the onely testimony of the word, against all the temptations of Satan in the wilderness; if therefore an host should come against you, guard yourself with the buckler of a good conscience, and with the sword of the Spirit. Again, The exhortation of man, without the grace of God, is but as sounding brass, and a tinkling cymbal; he onely can give a mouth and wisdom, which saith, Without me you can do nothing---- Lord, take thou away my stony heart, and give a new, humble, contrite, and a heart of flesh. In the last of his Epistles, he reckoneth the Books of Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Esdras III. and IV. Judesth, Tobias, Maccabees, among the Apocrypha. Catal. test. ver. lib. 14.

10. Richard de St. Victor, a Scot, was held for a learned and good man, about about the year 1140. He wrote much. On Cant. c. 2. The reading and meditation of the Scriptures do strengthen the minde, and weaken the enemy; so long as they keep this in minde, and do it, they are hereby most expert to encounter with the enemy. De statu. hom. inter cap. 12. How justly is free-will said to be dead, seeing by it self it is never moved unto any good? for what good can it do of it self, seeing it cannot say, Jesus is the Lord, but by the holy Ghost? and indeed it is often moved unto good, but never accept by the holy Ghost. De sacrif. Abrah. & Maria. If the grace and protection of God be withheld, man is thrown down at every suggestion of the enemy, and into whatsoever evil, and being once thrown down, he can never rise by his own power--- A man can bring forth no bud of good work of himself, without working grace; and when he hath begun to work, he can no way continue without its cooperation. Par. 2. in explanat. aliquot locor. Apost. The Law teacheth onely what we should do, and addeth not how we may obey; and therefore it can justifie none: the Gospel teacheth what should be done, how it may be done, and how that which is not done may be supplied. In Apocal. lib. 3. Onely that prayer is acceptable in heaven, which the Son offereth unto the Father. Catol. test. ver. lib. 15. He was the first which taught that the Virgin Mary was born without original sin, 10. Maior in gest. Scot. lib. 3. cap. 12.

11. Malcolm IV. King of Scots, did command Roger Arch-Bishop of York, and Roman Legate, to depart out of the Realm, and said, It was not reason that the Land should be oppressed by ungodly men, bearing glorious names. He. Boet. Hist. lib. 13. Again in the year 1188. Pope Clement sent another, and he had not better success, for all did refuse him, except John Bishop of St. Andrews; and therefore he was banished: and he had refuge unto the Pope, who by and by sent unto Henry King of England, and gave unto him the right of the Crown of Scotland, 10. Bale. Cent. 3. §. 26. in Appen.

12. It is recorded, that one Fulco came and said unto the English King Richard, with great boldness, O King, thou hast three very bad daughters; take good heed unto them, and provide unto them good husbands, lest by inconvenient bestowing of them, thou run not into damage onely, but utter perdition unto thy self. The King said, Thou art mad, foolish hypocrite, I have no daughter. Fulco replieth, I do not lye, O mighty King, for you have three daughters continually in your Court, and wholly possess your person; and such whores are they, that the like hath not been heard; I mean, mischievous pride, greedy covetousness, and filthy lechery; therefore I say again, beware of them, and out of hand provide marriages for them. The King then took his words in good part, & by and by calling his Nobles, declared unto them them the words of Fulco, whose counsel (said he) I intend to follow, not doubting of your consents, my Lords, thereunto: wherefore, here before you all, I give my eldest daughter, swelling pride, to wife unto the proud Templars; my greedy daughter, avarice, unto the Cister-tian Monks; and filthy luxury, unto the riotous Prelates of the Church; so severally agreeing with all their natures, that the like match is not to be found unto them. This was about the year 1198. saith 1. Fox in Act.

13. Here it shall not be amiss to remember the example of Simon Thurvey, an English man of Cornwall, for a warning to temerarious Students; He was a subtil Logician, and expert in all Liberal Sciences; he left his own Country, and was a Doctor in Paris many years; and trusting to his Philosophy, he vaunted that he knew all Christ's Law, and by force of disputation, he could disprove it all: on a suddain he became forgetful of all learning, and could not say the Lord's Prayer, nor knew the a, b, c. Mat. Paris.

reporteth, that when he was writing his History, Nicola. epi. Danelm. told him this, and had seen this Simon learning to read from his own bastard son, as if he had been a childe of six years onely.

14. King William went into England to congratulate the safe arrival of Richard from Judea, in the year 1199. at that time Harald Earl of Orkney, and Cairnes, took the Bishop of the Countrey prisoner (because he had stopped some suit he had demanded of the King) and bereft him of his eyes and tongue. William at his returning would revenge this inhumanity, and Harald would defend himself by force; but his forces were scattered, and he was apprehended; it was done unto him by the hangman, as he had unto the Bishop, and then strangled: all his male-children were gelded; and many of his friends (as accessories) were fined in money, Buchan. lib. 7. When this was reported unto Pope Innocentius III. he sent his Legate John Cardinal de monte Celio, with a sword richly set with precious stones, a purple hat in form of a diadem, and a Bull of large priviledges, exempting the Church of Scotland from all censures, except onely of the Pope, or Legate sent by the Conclave; the Bull was dated in the year 1209. H. Boeth. Hist. lib. 13. cap. 8.

CENTURY XIII.

CHAP. I.

Of P O P E S.

Begin this Century at the Popes, because the times are changed, and I must change with the times; in the former Century the Popes were first exalted above the Emperors.

1. INNOCENTIUS the III. being thirty yearsold, was chosen Pope Jan. 3. 1198. In his time the Empire was weak, and a great Schism in Germany, as followeth; whereupon the Pope made his advantage; and the Authority of the Papal Chair, and errors in doctrine waxed then wonderously. Frederick was young; Kings and Princes every where were at variance, so that there was none to stay the ambition of Innocentius. From the Empire he took Romandiola, Ravenna and other Lands, pretending that these did belong unto St. Peter. Io. Naucler. At that time he obtained two Decrees, which did much serve unto the advancement of the man of sin; one, So oft as Princes are at variance, or shall endamage one another, the cognisance of their cause shall appertain unto the high Priest of Rome. Another, So oft as the suffrages of whatsoever Electors shall be equal, and no greater agreement intervening, the Pope may determine as he pleaseth. These two were registred in the Decretals, lib. 1. tit. 6. de elect. c. Venerabilem. The former was made upon occasion of variance betwixt France and England, and the other in favor of Otho, Duke of Brunswick. P. Mornay in Myster. Unto these a third may well be joyned; When the Imperial seat is vacant, the Roman high Priest shall have the administration, and exercise the Imperial power until another Emperor be chosen. Clement. Pastoral. de sent. & re judic. near the end. Out of these the Canonists do conclude, that the Pope is Lord of Christendom. But the Jesuits say, Not so; for the Pope succeedeth not into the Empire in all things, but only in discerning in such causes as appertain unto the Emperor, and may not be delayed, Bellarmin. de Rom. Pont. lib. 5. cap. 5. The works and writings of Innocentius, shew yet more of his pride. In his first Sermon on the feast of St. Silvester, he saith, The Roman high Priest, in token of Empire, weareth a Globe, and in token of Priesthood, a Mitre; but he weareth the Mitre at all times, and every where, but not so the Globe, because the Priestly Dignity is first, and worthiest, and largest; for the Priesthood went before the Kingdom among the people of God, as Aaron was before Saul. God speaking of Priests and Kings, calleth the Priests, gods, and the Kings, Princes, saying, Thou shalt not rail on the gods, nor speak evil of the ruler of the people, Exod. 22. And whereas he saith of the King, Be subject unto all ordinance of man, whether the King, &c. he saith of Priests unto Jeremiah, I have set thee over Nations and Kingdoms, to pull up and to cast down, to plant and to build; and unto Peter in the singular number, Thou art Cephas; that is, Thou art the HEAD, in which are all the senses. The deep Sea, of which Christ said to Peter, Launch into the Sea, is Rome, which had and hath the primacy of all the world; as if he had said, Go to Rome. On the anniversary day of his Coronation, Sermon III. speaking on these, He is the Bridegroom who hath the Bride; and speaking unto his Cardinals, saith, Am not I the Bridegroom, and each one of you the Bridegroom's friend? certainly I am the Bridegroom, for I have a noble, rich, high, comely, chaste, lovely and sacred Bride, the Roman Church; which, as God hath ordained, is the Mother and Mistress of all believers: She is older then Sara, wiser then Rebeca, more fertile then Lea, more aimable then Rachel, more devout then Anna, more chaste then Susanna, more couragions then Judith, and fairer then Edissa; many daughters have purchased riches, but she surmounteth them all; with her is my sacramental marriage-----Have ye not read, that Abraham had a wife Sara, and she brought in her maid Agar unto him? nor did he for that commit adultery, but discharged his duty: so the Pope hath his wife, the Roman Church, which bringeth unto him other Churches that are subject unto her, that they may receive from him due provision, because how much is paid, the more is owed; but this is done in the spirit, and the other was done in the flesh; because the spirit quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing, &c. In another place he saith, The Church of Rome should give the debt of reverence unto none, but unto the Priest of Rome, who under God hath none above him [Behold the Beast, and the Roman distinguished] The high Priest of Rome hath the Roman Church for his Spouse, who bringeth unto him other Churches, that are subject unto her. Thus of all the Popes, Innocentius would be the first corrival of Christ. Bellarmin would excuse this blasphemy, by a distinction of the principal, and the subaltern husband. De Ro. Pon. lib. 2. cap. 31. But he considered not what Thomas de Corfellis (as Æ. Sylvius reporteth de Concil. Basil.) said publicly in that Council, We call the Church the Spouse of Christ, and the Pope his Vicar; but none appointeth such a Vicar, that he will subject his Spouse unto his Vicar. And the Author of the Book, De squalore Ro. Curie [Oræus calleth him Lurgius] printed with Petrus de Alliaco at Basil An. 1551. saith, The Church hath not two heads, but one, and this is Christ; and not his Vicar; whom Christ hath appointed to be an attendant on his Spouse, and not the husband. Vsser. de Eccles. statu. cap. 9. Behold yet the novations of his doctrine: In the year 1215. he assembled a Council at Lateran; there were (as Garanza saith) the Patriarchs of Constantinople and Jerusalem, Metropolitans 70, Bishops 400, Abbots 12, Priors 800, the Ambassadors of the Greek and Roman Empires, Orators of Spain, England and Cyprus: Here the Pope intended to establish many particulars, some good, and some bad; but (saith Platina) nothing could be openly established, because when the Canons were read, some called them tolerable, and others called them grievous. Mat. Parisien. (who was living at that time) faith, The general Council, which at the first had great shew after the Papal maner, ended in laughter and derision, and all that came thither were deluded. These Canons were inserted among the Decrees of the five Books of Decretals, after they had been reformed by himself, as Jo. Cocheleus testifieth in his Epistle before the Acts of this Council; he collected them, and first sent them to be printed by P. Quintel An. 1537. as if they had been the Acts of the Council; but there he sheweth, that these Acts were framed, or at least reformed after the Council; which (saith he) any man of judgement may perceive by the XXIX, XXXIII, and LXI Chapters, where is a reference unto the Lateran Council. We have seen, that under Pope Nicolaus the II. it was decreed, that the body of Christ is corporally present in the Sacrament. Whence it was questioned, Whether the bread evacuateth, or the substance of it be changed into Christ's body? Lombard could not define the question, and sheweth the different opinions of others. Lib. 4. Dist. 11. Innocentius setteth it as an Article of faith, that the bread and wine are transubstantiated into Christ's body and blood, cap. 1. In cap. 2. the doctrine of Joachim is condemned, but not himself. In cap. 3. all men are cursed, who hold not the faith which is in cap. 1. and they are ordained to be punished by the Magistrate; and if they be Laicks, their goods shall be confiscated; or if they be Clerks, their goods should return to the Church where they had their Benefice. He ordained, that all Magistrates should swear at their admission, to banish all who are discerned Hereticks by the Church; which if they be slack to do, they should be accursed; and if after excommunication, any shall continue a year, the Metropolitan should give notice unto the Pope, who shall absolve all the subjects from obedience, and give his Land unto others who will expel the Hereticks. Item, He who is declared an Heretick, should not be admitted unto the Sacrament, nor unto Christian burial; nor should alms nor oblations be received from such. Item, All Bishops should twice, or at least once in the year, visit all their Diocies, where is any suspicion of heresie, and cause three or more men of best account, or if need require, all of the bounds should be compelled to swear, whether they know any Hereticks there, or if there be any privy meetings, or any persons different in maners from the common conversation of others. Cap. 10. Because the food of God's word is necessary unto Christian people, and Bishops are hindered by many occasions from teaching their people, therefore they should employ sufficient men to preach and visit, and they should provide necessities unto such. This was a safe-guard unto unqualified and non-resident Bishops. Cap. 13. There should be no more religions or society of Monks, because there are too many already; if any will be a Monk, let him go to one of those sorts that are approved: and if any will found a new Monastery, let him take one of the former rules. Cap. 19. We will not let this pass without correction, that some of the Clergy adorn the Churches with their own and other mens goods, that they are more like to Laicks houses, then to the Churches of God. Ca. 21. All believers, when they come to the years of discretion, should confess all their sins unto his own Priest once a year, and accomplish the penance that shall be enjoined; and should communicate at least at Easter, unless his own Priest think good that he should abstain--- Neither may a Priest reveal unto others, what hath been confessed. These private confessions were in use before, but then made necessary; as also here it appeareth, that before were no confessaries but the Priests, until afterwards the Monks obtained this priviledge. Ca. 22. Because when one is sick, and the Physician biddeth send for a Priest, the patient often despaireth of health, and so falleth into greater danger, therefore the Physician shall at the first bid send for the Physician of the soul. Ca. 29. Plurality of Benefices is forbidden, unless the Pope think good to dispense with some persons, who are to be honored. Ca. 31. Because Patrons detain the Church-revenues, so that in these Countreys scarcely is found any Parish-Priest that hath but the least knowledge of letters; therefore we ordain, that a sufficient portion be assigned unto the Parish-Priest, who should serve not by a Vicar, but personally, &c. Ca. 42. As we would not that Laicks usurp the power of Clerks, so we will that Clerks usurp not the power of Laicks. Ca. 46. Magistrates should not exact taxations from the Clergy, unless the Clerks will willingly contribute, when they see the necessity of common burthens, and even then not without the advice of the Pope. Ca. 50. The prohibition of marriage should not exceed the fourth degree of blood, or alliance, because there are but four humors in mans body, or it consisteth of four elements. This is a fair pretence; but it was a remedy (saith Po. Virg. de inven. lib. 5. cap. 5.) against the Decree of Pope Julius, who had ordained, that marriage should not be within the seventh degree; by which severity it came to pass, that men could not finde marriage within their City; and this Decree is observed, saith he; but he might have added, unless men will pay for a dispensation; and so no degree hindereth marriage, as I have touched elsewhere, and experience sheweth. Likewise Pope Celestin the III. gave a judicial sentence, If a married person fall into heresie, the other spouse may marry another. But this Innocentius ordained contrarily, that heresie should not be a cause of divorce, Extra. de divor. c. Quanto. The election of the Pope was restrained unto the Cardinals, by Pope Celestin the II. and this Innocentius confirmed that Act; and added, that the holy Colledge of Cardinals should have jurisdiction in all places, and have authority over all men, and power of judging the causes of all Princes, and of bringing them into their Kingdoms, or depriving them. Cum Ventura in Thefor. Politic. pag. 388. printed at Frankford An. 1610. Peter King of Arragon, made his Realms of Arragon and Sardinia, tributary unto the Chair of St. Peter, for the salvation of his soul (forsooth) in the days of this Innocentius. He sat eighteen years and seven moneths. After his death he appeared unto Ludgardis; when she saw him compassed with so great fire, she asked, Who he was? He answered, I am Innocentius. She groaned and said, How is it, that our common father is so tormented? He answered, I am so tormented for three causes, which most justly had condemned me unto eternal punishment, if by the intercession of the most holy Mother of God, I had not repented at the last gasp; I have indeed escaped eternal death, but until the day of judgement I am tormented with most cruel punishments: and that I could come unto thee to seek thy prayers, the Mother of mercy hath obtained it from her Son: And having spoken so, he vanished. The Nun declared his necessity unto her sisters, that they would help him; and lamenting his case, she afflicted her self wonderously. Let the reader understand (saith my Author) that I am not ignorant of those three causes, which Ludgardis told me, but for reverence of so great an high Priest, I will not report them. Bellar. de gemitu. col. lib. 2. cap. 9. ex Suri. in vita Ludgar.

St. Sil-

2. HONORIUS the III. confirmed the Order of Dominicks, and gave them priviledge of preaching, and hearing confessions, albeit they had not cure of souls, or parishes. He confirmed also the Orders of Franciscans, Augustinenses and Carmelites. He ordained, that every one should bow their knee at the lifting up of the bread of the Mass; and that the Eucharist should be carried with lighted candls unto the sick. De celebrat. Miss. lib. 3. tit. 41. c. Sanè. It followeth to speak of his pride. He sat eleven years.

3. GREGORY

3. GREGORY the IX. (so soon as he was set in his Chair) sent a Nuntio, Steven, into England, to crave the tenth part of all movables, both of the Nobility and Clergy, for maintenance of his wars against the Emperor, but under the name of wars against the Infidels. Because they refused, he excommunicateth them all, until they obeyed. P. Mornay in Myster. The next year he sent his Legates through Europe, who by preachings, entreatings, and excommunications, purchased great sums of money, as if it had been for aid of the holy Land; but it could not be known into what gulf so vast sums were hid; but the care of the holy Land was forgot, and the charity of men grew cold, Mat. Paris. Behold the issue; it was to repress the Emperor Frederick; who is more execrable (said the Pope) then Pharaoh, Nero, or any Tyrant. He sent his Legate, Albert Beham, into Germany, to deprive all Bishops, and to excommunicate all Laicks adhering unto the Emperor, or who wished him well. But at that time none of the Bishops, nor Abbots, regarded that commission; and being assembled, they openly protested, That the Priest of Rome had no power in Germany, without consent of the Bishops there: Let the Priest of Rome feed his Italians, said they; we who are the dogs of this flock, will beat away the wolves lurking under lambs skins; what he will do to others, ye may know, seeing this disguised Vicar so dealeth with us. The Pope accursed Frederick Duke of Austria, as the chief of that Assembly; and Eberhard Bishop of Salzburgh presently absolved him. And all the Bishops, with one consent, accursed the Pope, as the enemy of Christian peace, a most damnable Arch-Heretic, and more pestiferous then the Turks, Jews or Tartars, seeing he doth such things, as those had never done the like. Mornay in Myster. ex Avent. lib. 7. Annal. Boio. Then Gregory sent unto the Canons and Monks, charging them to choose other Prelates. They would not. Therefore he charged some of them to compare before him for their rebellion. They contemned his summons. Then the Princes and Clergy of Germany assembled again: but the Pope died. This opposition had he abroad; neither wanted he enemies at home; for in his first year was so great variance between him and the Citizens, that he fled out of Rome about Easter to Viterbio, and then to Pirusio; and having no other means of revenge, he excommunicated them all. The cause of this sedition was, the Citizens claimed an ancient custome and law, that the Pope should not excommunicate any of them, nor suspend the City with any interdiction for any excess. He answered, The Pope is less then God, but greater then any man, consequently greater then a Citizen, yea, greater is he then any Emperor; and seeing he is their spiritual father, he may chastise his children, and reduce them so oft as they go astray. Moreover the Romans alledged, that their Bishops were tied to pay unto the Senate yearly tribute, both by ancient and late laws, of which they have been in use and possession until these days. Gregory replied, Albeit in time of persecution, the Church for her defence and cause of peace, had gratified the heads of the City with kindly rewards, yet that should not now be pleaded as a debt. This strife was not soon ended. Mat. Paris. ad An. 1234. It would seem incredible (almost) to read how vast sums of money this Pope did rake together by exactions, voluntary offerings, confirmations of Bishopricks, removing variances betwixt Bishops and Magistrates, and other Church-men, and especially for dispensing with oaths: by all which, what inconveniences did arise, it cannot be told, saith Matth. Parisien. ibid. for as there was nothing so hard or absurd, wherewith the Pope could dispense for money; so the people, trusting to dispensations, did little regard how great evil they did; As for example, Henry King of England, being desirous of a taxation, did swear in Parliament, that he would ratifie some ancient Liberties which they were suing; and after the tax was granted, he past from his oath by a dispensation. At another time the same Henry did sign himself with the cross, pretending and swearing that he would go into the holy Land against the Infidels; when the money was amassed for his journey, he gave over his journey, being assured that the Pope would acquit him for 100. or 200. pounds. From this sink of dispensations, did more and more abound the plurality of Benefices in one mans person; Bishopricks were bestowed on men without literature; children were made Parsons; kinsfolks were married within degrees; in a word, what kinde of iniquity was not committed under sure confidence of dispensations? Matth. Parisien. This Gregory made truce with the Emperor An. 1240. and within a few moneths he calleth for the Cardinals, John de Columna and Raymond, and said, I am ashamed of the truce made with the enemy of the Church; go therefore unto the Emperor, thou John who wast mediator betwixt us, and shew him, that I will not accept the articles, and that I am his enemy. John answereth, Far be that inconstancy from such an one; I will not consent unto this counsel, yea I earnestly contradict it. Gregory saith, Then from this forth, I will not hold thee for a Cardinal. John answereth, Nor will I have thee for a Pope. Thus they were parted with mutual defiance. Ibid. When the King of France heard of this, he commandeth to hold up all the moneys that the Legate had amassed, under the name of relief for the holy Land; and then the Pope was content to keep the truce. Ibid. He was the Author of that hymn, Salve Regina, &c. in which he giveth unto the blessed Virgin the proper worship of Christ. In his name were published the Books of Decretals, that were collected by Raymond a Dominican. He sat fourteen years, and died An. 1241. When the Cardinals came together for election, Robert Somersset, an English Cardinal, was likely to have carried it, and in the mean time he, and some others who did incline that way, were poisoned, to the great infamy of the Roman Clergy, saith Mat. Paris.

4. CELESTIN the IV. a very old man, attaineth the Chair by promises. He sat eighteen days, and was poisoned. Then the See was vacant twenty and one moneths, because the Emperor had some Cardinals under arrest; whom at last he dismissed by intercession of Baldwin Greek Emperor, and Raymund Earl of Tolouse.

5. Here it shall not be amiss to insert the comparison of these former Popes with others following, as it is in Io. Bale Catal. From Silvester the II. until this year 1242. (that is, for the space of 240. years) Antichrist did reign in the Roman Church like some accursed Lucifer; for in all deceiving, tyranny, fraud, and oppression of truth (I will not speak of their filthiness more then Sodomitish) did these high Priests employ their times; so that then Rome did deserve to be called the synagogue of Satan, or seat of the Devil; and justly might be reputed, the habitation of foul spirits, and the sink of all uncleanness, Revel. 2, & 18. Wherefore when they went to their general Councils, or their Legates were sent unto the Nations, under colour of reconciliation and reformation, it may seem, that so oft did Satan come out from the presence of the Lord to smite Job; for whatsoever he is said in the Scriptures to have done, the same did these his hooded Vicars; nor did their hellish madness spare the most puissant Princes----- but hereafter shall the Kingdom of Abaddon (which is the King of Locusts, or Friars of the begging Order) by their sophistry, lay waste and destroy all things, until Pope Julius the II. that is, the space of 260. years; but that the Lord will have sparks of honesty to be seen here and there.

6. So many Cardinals were poisoned at the last election, that they which were

were alive would not convene, until the Emperor did charge them to go on with the election, with certification, that if they would not, he would cause his Soldiers to plunder their Lands, Cities and houses; and until the French King told them, that he would choose a Pope for the Church of his own Kingdom, Mat. Paris. INNOCENTIUS the IV. was then chosen; he was one of these whom the Emperor had under arrest, and had been familiar with him; but now he forgot his kindeness, and without delay did confirm the sentence of Pope Gregory against the Emperor; so the wars did continue. He proffered the Kingdom of Italy unto Edmund for a certain sum of money; but his father Henry, King of England, was scant of money (saith Mat. Par.) that he could not perform what was required, because he had foolishly tied his Kingdom unto the Popish Merchants. In the Council at Lions (which Bellarmin calleth the thirtieth general Council) he would not delay his curse three days against the Emperor, albeit he understood that the Emperor was upon his journey to come before him and satisfy. He ordained the feast Octava festivitatis Marie. And that Cardinals should ride with foot-mantles, and red hats, and red clokes, for honor of their Order, saith Platina; or in imitation of the Jewish Priests, saith Po. Vig. de inven. rer. lib. 4. cap. 9. Or rather it came to pass, that the prophecy might be fulfilled, and the Beast be clothed in scarlet, Revel. 17. 3. He added unto the Decretals; and honored the Dominicks with apostatical (they say Apostolical) honors and privileges, and advanced them unto Bishopricks; and in favor of Curates, he discharged all begging Friars, to exercise any of their function. Mortuous Appeal lib. 5. cap. 4. §. 6. ex Azor. Iesui. Thus he did ramverse the privilege granted by Pope Honorius the III. After the Council, when he heard that the Imperial forces did prevail in sundry places, he, like a lion robbed of his whelps, rageth, and leaveth no means untried to cut off the Emperor; especially he enticeth some of his domesticks, Theobald Francis, James de Mora, Pandulf de Fasanellis, and William de S. Severino to lie in wait for his life, either by poison secretly, or by weapons violently; it was made known unto the Emperor, and yet he could not be so watchful, but he was poisoned in Pulia, as appeareth by his Letters unto his Brother in law Henry the III. King of England. The doers of this fact (saith he) being accompanied with a number of Friars Minorites, do openly avow, that they are about the affairs of the Mother Church of Rome; and that they are signed by Apostolical Letters against us; and the Pope is the Author of our death and disinheriting, Matth. Paris. sen. So soon as the Pope heard of the Emperor's death, he taketh his journey into Italy; when he went from Lions, the Bishop and other chief men of the City did accompany him; and unto them he said, I have done much good in this City since I came into it: At that time were but three or four Stews in it, & now is but one, howbeit a large one, from the East-gate to the West-gate. Idem. ad An. 1251. He coming into Italy, ceased not to draw the Cities cleaving unto the Emperor, from his Son Conrade; yea, at the same time, when Lewes the French King and his Navy were in great peril of the Turks in Syria, he caused to proclaim greater pardon unto all who would fight against Conrade, then he or any Pope had proffered to fight against the Turks; for he caused it to be preached in all the pulpits of Italy, If any will fight against Conrade, both the signed (that is, the fighter under the sign of the Cross) and his father and mother, shall have pardon of all their sins. When he heard of Conrades death, he laughed loudly, and said, I am glad, and let all the Church of Rome rejoyce, for now our two greatest enemies are out of the way, Conrade King of Siciles, and Robert Bishop of Lincoln. And immediately he went unto Naples, to take possession of that Kingdom. Not long thereafter he directeth

Letters into England, to take up the dead body of the before named Robert, and cause him to be proclaimed an Heathen: the same night after this direction, he thought that the same Robert did smite him on the side, and for his impiety did threaten him with the judgement of God; the next day his side was very sore, and within few days he died. Matth. Paris.

7. ALEXANDER the IV. was chosen at Naples, when the See had been vacant two years. His first exploit was, to follow the wars moved by his Predecessors against Manfred, then King of both Sicilies; to this effect he sent his locusts the Friars to preach, that every one should send Subsidy unto the holy wars, against the enemy of the Church. Some did see the Pope's insatiable greediness, and others were perswaded, and so all Italy was in an uproar. He rewarded his Friars with red hats, and cornered caps. He gave the Kingdoms of Sicily and Pulia unto Edmund, Son of Henry III. King of England, for the conquering; and for this effect, he sent Legate Roiland to collect all the tenths of England and Scotland (against Manfred, still prevailing not onely in Naples, but in Hetruria and Lombardie) and many abominable things (saith Matth. Paris.) did flow from the sulphurous fount of the Roman Church (fie for sorrow!) to the dammage of many. Such an exaction was not heard, as the Pope craved at that time. Roiland said in the Assembly at London, All the Churches belong unto my Master the Pope. One Leonard in name of the Bishops, said, It is true, for defence, but not for possession nor dissipation, as all things belong unto the King. In a word, at three several meetings he received a universal nolumus. Therefore the Pope sent two Minorites, Arlotus and Mansuetus, with some Bishops, and with full power to exact tenths of Benefices, to absolve for money all perjured persons, all convicted of adultery, sodomy, &c. Whereupon an old woman, in the Church of St. Alban, is said to have seen a fearful vision; and heard a voice crying thrice, Wo, wo unto the inhabitants of the earth. Matth. Paris. ad An. 1259. saith, This was not a dream, but a fearful threatening from heaven. This Alexander added unto the Decretals; and turned the ancient Temple of Bacchus, to the service of St. Constantia. He sat seven years.

8. URBAN the IV. (Patriarch of Jerusalem, a French man) never entered into Rome, because of factions. Because the Ancestors of Conradin King of Sicilies, had been adversaries unto former Popes, he sent unto Lewes King of France, requiring to send his brother Charles, Duke of Anjou, with an Army to expel Manfred and his pupil Conradin; and he will give him and his heirs to the fourth generation both Sicilies in fee, as the inheritance of the Church. Lewes prepareth an Army, but Urban saw it not. He ordaineth the feast of the Rood or Cross, Pol. Virg. de inven. rer. lib. 6. cap. 8. as also the feast of Corp. Christi upon this occasion, as Onuphrius writeth, A Priest was saying Mass in urbe vetere (where Urban was residing) and doubted of the transubstantiation, as he was holding the hostie in his hand, hot blood dropped down and coloureth the Corporale; Urban taketh this as a true miracle, and ordaineth the second Thursday after Whitsunday to be kept holy, for confirmation of transubstantiation; as also he commandeth the bread should be adored, and the Corporale should be carried in the procession that day. It is no wonder to see men believe lyes, and deceive others. Onuphrius testifieth in the same place, that a Nun Eva did bleed in that Mass; he saith, It was a common report, and calleth it a fable. Jo. Bale (ex Arnol. Bost. & po. premonstrat.) sheweth, how Urban appointed that feast at the request of a Nun Eva, which had been acquainted with him, and did alledge that she had seen a vision for institution of such a feast. And the same Bale hath an Epistle of Urban unto her concerning that feast, both long and impious.

The feasts
of the
Corp. Christi.

Whatsoever was the occasion, we may say with Po. Virg. lo. cap. 1. feasts were heaped upon feasts for very small causes, and we scarcely know whether it was profitable, seeing it is manifest, the manners of Christians are become such, that if it was profitable unto Religion in former times to appoint them, it is now more profitable to abolish them. Urban sat three years.

9. CLEMENS the IV. of a Lawyer in the Court of France, was made Bishop of Podio, and at last Pope. In his time Charles Duke of Anjou, overthrew Manfred and Conradin, as followeth; and at Rome was Crowned King of both Sicilies and Jerusalem, upon these conditions. 1. He shall pay yearly four thousand crowns to St. Peter. 2. He shall never accept the Empire, although it were offered unto him, unless he be pressed by the Pope. Whereby the intention of the Conclave is manifest, that they sought by all means to bring the Empire low, to the end they might the more easily lift up their heads. The Guelphs then did insult over the Gibelines. Clemens sat three years, and died in Viterbio, and had given order to bury him in a Cloister of the black Friars; and so would many of his Successors, for the honor of that Order. The Cardinals could not agree in the election for the space of two years and nine moneths: many strove for it; and so great was their pertinacy (saith Naucler.) that neither the fear of God, nor prayers of men could move them: at last, by procurement of Princes, especially of Philip King of France, they agree to choose one not as yet named. So Theobald Viscount of Placentia, and Bishop of Leodium (being then Legate with Edward Longshanks in Syria) was chosen; upon advertisement, he made haste into Italy. This was

10. GREGORY the X. who never saw Rome. In his first year he summoneth a Council (which they call, the XIV. general Council) at Lions, and was held An. 1274. He calleth four Bishops from Germany, four from France, four from England, two from Spain; from Sicily, the Kingdom of the Church, Hungary, Dacia, Bohem, Poland, Suionia, Norway and Scotland, from each of these one. Bishop Spotswood in Hist. lib. 2. (ex Scot. lib. 10. cap. 34.) saith, There were two Patriarchs; Cardinals 15, Bishops 500, and 1000 mitred Prelates, besides the King of France, the Emperor of Greece, and many other Princes. The first proposition was for the holy war; and for it they decree, that a tenth part of all Benefices in Christendom (the privileged Churches not excepted) should be paid for six years; that all Penitentiaries or Confessors, should urge offenders to assist that holy business with their wealth and riches; and that every Christian, without exception of sex or quality, should pay a penny yearly during that space, under pain of excommunication. 2. For remedying abuses in the Church, it was ordained, 1. That no procurations to Bishops nor Arch-Deacons, unless they do visit the Churches in their own persons. Here is still a postern for the Bishops. 2. No Church-man should possess more Benefices then one, and should reside at the Church he retaineth. 3. None of the Clergy shall without the Pope's licence, answer the impositions which shall be laid upon them by any Prince or State. 4. The Mendicant Friars shall be reduced to four Orders, the Minorites, Predicants, Carmelites, and Hermites of St. Augustin, who shall continue in their present estate, until the Pope shall otherwise think good. 5. A prohibiton was made, to advise or admit any new order, besides these named. Some other Acts of less moment were passed, whereof the extract under the hands of the publick Notaries, were sent unto this Church, saith he; but all these Statutes, turned in a short time into smoke; pluralities being of new dispensed, with the clause of Non obstante, which then first came in use. The Orders of Friars and Monks were restored one by one; the Cisterians redeemed their liberty by payment of 500000 marks; the Bernardines paid 600000 crowns; and other Orders made their composition. Whereby it appeareth, that the Statutes which were enacted, were onely devised to raise sums of money, and not of any purpose to redress these abuses. They did profess at that time, that upon these charges alone they would redeem Asia, and Africa, from the Turks, Saracens, and Barbarians; and for this effect, the Emperor Rodulph gave unto the Pope Bononia, and the revenue of Romandiola, which paid yearly 700000 drach. of gold. Howbeit Gregory died the next year, yet these taxes were paid. In that Council also Canons were prescribed for the maner of electing the Pope; especially, that the Cardinals should continue in a chamber, and not come forth, nor have a dish of meat but one, until they agree. But neither were these observed. He advanced the Dominicans to high Dignities, even to red hats.

11. INNOCENTIUS the V. was the first Pope of the Order of Dominicans; for Gregory had advanced so many of them, that then the locusts had power to choose their own King. He procured peace betwixt the Hetrurians and Pisanes, and absolved them from the curse of Pope Gregory. He had a purpose to abrogate the Canons of the election of the Pope, but he died in the fifth month.

12. HADRIAN the V. in his short Papacy of forty days, sent Letters unto the Emperor Rodulph, enviting him to come into Italy, and take the Kingdom of both Sicilies from Charles Duke of Anjou.

13. JOHN (some call him XX. some say XXI. and others XXII. as appeareth by what is said before of the Johns) sat but eight moneths, and did many things smelling of folly and levity, saith Platina; to wit, he made these Articles against the begging Friars; 1. Christ, as he was man on earth, by lapse of time, had proper and immediate right of garments, shoes, and other things, partly by donation of believers, and partly he bought them. 2. Christ never commanded his disciples to renounce their right and possession of temporal things. 3. Christ gave no other law of life to his Apostles, then to his other disciples. 4. Christ commanded not his Apostles simply, that they should possess neither silver nor gold, except onely in that journey, when they were going to preach, and thereafter they might have these things again. 5. The Apostles had their own propriety and right of clothes, shoes and swords; and after the holy Ghost was sent on them, these words, We have left all things, are not to be understood, as if they renounced their propriety, save onely in affection. 6. The Apostles might have had their particular dominion of Castles, or Villages, or any other temporal goods. 7. The Apostles, notwithstanding their Evangelical perfection, might have had immoveable goods in common, as Lands; but they had no such things in Judea, because in the Spirit they foresaw, that they must go among the Nations. 8. The Apostles never made a vow to renounce temporal things. Catal. rest. ver. lib. 17. These Articles were against the profession of the Friars; but experience sheweth whether they were against their affection. He revoketh the constitutions of Pope Gregory concerning the chamber; and after him the election went not in that maner, but was more weighed by the purse, until Pope Celestin the V. renewed the same Canons. He canonized Lewes Bishop of Tolouse, and Son of Charles King of France; and Thomas Aquinas the black Frier. He dreamed of long life, and said, he knew so by the stars; but as he was walking under a vault (which he had made for his pleasure at Viterbio) it fell upon him, and the next day he was found among the rubbish. Platina.

14. NICOLAUS the III. a Roman, of the family of Ursini, was of as great authority as any Pope before him Pope. Clemens had given the government of Rome unto Charles Duke of Anjou, under the Title of Senator; and Nicolaus took this office unto himself; and he inciteth Peter King of Arragon, to claim the right of both Sicilies (because he had married Constantia, the onely childe of Manfred) and take that Kingdom. He was the Author of that famous Decretal in 6. in c. Fundamenta. tit. de Election. & electi potestate; to wit, God hath assumed Peter into the society of individual unity; the Lord would have him to be called that that he was himself, saying, Thou art Peter; that from him as the head, he might pour his gifts on his body the Church. Thus they became more arrogant and blasphemous. He took in Bononia, Flaminia, and other Cities into the Papal Sec. He made a Law, that no King, nor Kings Son, should be Senator of Rome. He began to talk of making two Kings of his own kindred, one of Hetruria, and another of Lombardie; but he was prevented by death. Platina saith, He is reported to have loved his kinsfolks too much; and to have robbed from others to give unto them, without all reason. He had a Park for hares at Rome; and fat almost four years.

15. MARTINE the IV. a French man, restoreth (contrary to the Law of Nicolaus) Charles to his office of Senator of Rome, and government of Hetruria. Whereas many Popes had their ordinary residence at Viterbio, he was forced to flee (because of sedition betwixt the Italian and French Cardinals) and be Crowned at Vrbe Vetere, or Orvieto. Now Charles thought to have subdued Michael Paleologus, Emperor of the East; but Michael and Peter of Arragon had secret correspondence, and levy an Army upon common charges. The Pope understanding this, sent unto Peter, asking, Why he was amassing such an Army? Peter answered, If I knew my shirt were privy to my intention, I would burn it. So Peter passeth over with his Army unto the coast of Africa; there he took some prey, and returned into Sardinia, awaiting his opportunity to come into Sicily. The Sicilians hated the French, and they all conspired, that on Easter day, when the bell was tolling to the evening Mass, they should kill all the French; it came so to pass, that they spared not a woman with childe: That night was thereafter Vigilia Sicula. Then John Prochyta, the chief author of that conspiracy, advertiseth Peter, and brought him in. Charles was in Italy; and then were continual wars betwixt the two Sicilies, until Charles died: and Peter took his Son, and held him captive. The Pope sent his Legate unto Naples, to hold that Kingdom in name of the captive Charles; and he excommunicated Peter for sacrilege, and gave his Kingdoms of Castil and Arragon, unto any who would enter and occupy them: Behold the contrariety of the Popes! Peter was not afraid of the vain curse of the pretended Peter, who died in sorrow in the third year of his Papacy. Martin gave unto the begging Friars, liberty to hear confessions, and administer the Sacraments.

16. HONORIUS the IV. was elected at Perusio, when his Brother Pandolf was Roman Senator. He made haste to Rome, and dwelt on the hill Aventine. He ratified the excommunication of Peter. In his time was wars betwixt Peter and Charles, betwixt the Genoways and Venetians, and betwixt the Pope and Guido Feltrenus, for the Province of Flaminia. Then sickness was so rife, that so many Cardinals died, that the remanent said, God was against the election; therefore it was delayed ten moneths.

17. NICOLAUS the IV. hired Soldiers to go unto the defense of Ptolemais, which onely remained of all the late Conquest; when they came thither, they did no less dammage to the Christians then to the Saracens: by dissention, or rather ambition of these Papalines, Ptolemais was lost 196. years after the first Conquest. Contrary unto Pope John XXII. did Nicolaus teach, that Christ both by word and example, had taught his Apostles perfect poverty; that is, to renounce and forsake all goods, and reserve no right either in common or personal; and that such poverty is holy and meritorious. Bellarmin de Ro. Pont. lib. 4. cap. 14. He abode at Reate, because of factions at Rome. He had been a Dominican; but then preferred he no Order to another (Platin.) and made Cardinals of all sorts, and gave them equal privileges. When he was sick, he called all the Cardinals together, and discharged them of all power and authority, that they all should live a private life. They said, he was phrenetick, and left him. Then he sent for a certain number of Minorites, and gave them all red hats, in sign that they were all Cardinals; and he caused them all to swear, that after his death they should suffer none to be chosen Pope, but one of their own Order. He sat four years. P. Morn. in Myst. Then was such competition, that the Cardinals could not agree the space of two years and three months. At last Peter an Eremitic, and Father of the Celestines, or

18. CELESTIN the V. was preferred for conceit of his godliness. It was so great a wonder, that a man was preferred for conceit of godliness, that 200000 persons went to Perugia, to see his coronation. His residence was at Aquileia, Platin. In his first Consistory he began to reform the Clergy of Rome; and he said, he would make it a pattern unto other Churches. Hereby he procured such hatred of his Clergy, that they sought to depose him; and he was willing to renounce his seat. The Princes were earnest that he would not quit his Chair; and Charles King of Sicilies conveyed him to Naples, and exhorted him that he would abhor so great indignity, seeing the people every where were so prone towards him, Platin. But the Cardinals, especially Benedict Caietan, caused it to be broached, that the Pope was a doating old man, and unfit for such a place; and caused some of his own chamber to tell him, that he would lose his life, if he did not renounce the Papacy: also Benedict spake thorow a reed into his chamber, as if it had been a voice from heaven, telling him, that he should forsake the Papacy, as being too weighty a burthen for him. So when he had sat six months, by the craft of Benedict (who deceived the holy man, saith Platin.) he was persuaded to dimit, if it were lawful. Then they made an Act, that it was lawful for the Pope to renounce his place: this Act was by his Successor inserted into the Decretals, ca. Quoniam. Then Benedict left nothing undone, by ambition and fraud, to advance himself, saith Platin. and was called

19. BONIFACE the VIII. and by some others NERO the II. So soon as he was Crowned, he said, he would prevent sedition, lest a Schism be made, and some take Celestin for their head, who was returning into his Eremitish life; so he thrust the old man into the Castle of Fano of Henrici. Celestin was sensible of the fraud, and said unto Boniface, Thou hast entered like a fox, thou wilt reign like a lion, and shalt die as a dog. The old man died in sorrow; and was canonized under the name of Peter the Confessor, by Pope Clemens the V. and his feast is kept Iunii 17. Platin. Boniface took part with the Minorites, and gave them special authority (without licence of Bishop or Priest) to preach, hear confessions of all whosoever would come unto them, nihil obstante. He did first of all the Popes bear two swords; and endeavored to move fear, more then piety, unto Emperors, Kings, and Nations; to give or take away Kingdoms; to banish men, and bring them home again at his pleasure. Idem. He excommunicated Philip King of France, because he would not obey his command, in the complaint of Edward King of England, and Guido Earl of Flanders. Then the King would suffer no money to be carried out of France. Boniface curseth him and his seed to the fourth generation. The Emperor Albert sought confirmation twice or thrice; but Boniface said, He was unworthy of the Crown, who had killed his Lord. Then having set a diadem on his own head, and a sword by his side, he said, I am Cæsar. Nevertheless, thereafter he did confirm Albert, but on condition to take arms against France. I. Nauclet. Of all others, he was the greatest fire-brand betwixt the Gibelines (which were called Albi) and the Gwelfs (or Nigri) and destroyed all the Gibelines so far as he could. He augmented unto the Decretals with another book, where are these constitutions; The high Priest of Rome should be reproved by none, albeit he cast down innumerable souls to hell. Another, We declare, pronounce and define, that upon necessity of salvation, all humane creatures should be under the Pope of Rome. Extrav. c. unam sanctam, de Maior. & obed. Bellar. de Ro. Pon. l. 1. c. 9. confesseth that this is contrary unto the order of the primitive Church, seeing at that time all the Apostles, and first Teachers, had equal power. And lib. 2. cap. 12. he saith, The Church, which is but one, should at all times keep one and the same government. Therefore Boniface brought into the Church a strange and grievous innovation. He proclaimed the first Jubilee to be kept An. 1300. and promised full remission both of sin and punishment, unto all who came that year to visit the Churches of the Apostles; in solemnising of which, he shewed himself one day in his Pontificals, and according to his promise, he gave remission unto all who came that year; the next day he came forth in the Imperial ornaments, and caused a naked sword to be carried before, and the Herald cried, Behold two swords. Bellar. de Ro. Pon. lib. 5. ca. 5. teacheth, that in these words, Behold two swords, and in the answer of Christ, It is enough, is no syllable of spiritual nor temporal power; but onely that Christ forewarneth his disciples, that in the time of his passion they were to be in such fear, as they who sell their coat to buy a sword: this he writeth not of his own invention, but according to the ancients. Albert Crantzius commendeth the Popes every where almost; but in Saxo. lib. 8. cap. 35. when he is writing of this pomp of Boniface, he cannot contain himself from crying, Behold, Peter, thy Successor! and thou, Savior, behold thy Vicar! behold whither the pride of the Servant of servants hath climbed! Pol. Virgil. de inven. rer. lib. 8. cap. 1. saith, This feast was in imitation of the Jewish Jubilee, or to draw away the people from remembering the ancient heathenish secular Plays. Whatsoever was the pretext, it appeareth the aim was to bring gain unto Rome, and glory unto the Pope. In the year 1301. he sent Boniface Bishop of Apamea, or of Openham, unto Philip King of France, requiring him to go into the holy Land: when the Bishop saw no appearance of obedience, he threatened the King, that the Pope would deprive him of his Kingdom. Wherefore the Bishop was charged of arrogance and treason, and cast into prison. The Pope sent another, and commanded the King to set the Bishop at liberty, and to take voyage into the East against the Infidels, and not to meddle with the tenths of the Clergy. Philip answered, His difficulties at home did both hinder him from going into the East, and brought a necessity of Subsidy from the Clergy; and he was willing to dismiss the Bishop. The Legate said, You know not the Pope's authority, which is not onely the Father of all Christian souls, but Lord and Prince in temporal things; and therefore by that authority I do excommunicate thee, and I declare thee unworthy to reign, and thy Realm forfeited unto the Church of Rome. And he did acquit all French from their oath of obedience unto Philip; and he disannulled all indulgences, grants and priviledges, that had been granted by any of his Predecessors unto any King of France. I. de Secres. Then Philip by advice of his Council, did cause it to be proclaimed, That none of his subjects go unto Rome, nor send money thither; and he bestowed vacant Benefices without leave of the Pope. Wherefore the Pope wrote unto him thus; Boniface the Servant of God's servants---- fear God, and keep his commandments. We will thee to understand, that thou art subject unto us in spiritual and temporal things; and that no gift of Prebends or Benefices belongeth unto thee; if thou hast the custody of any Prebend, keep it unto the use of the Intrans; if thou hast presented any, we discern that gift null, and do revoke all that hath been done by thee; and whosoever thinketh otherwise, we judge him to be blockish. Philip conveneth the Peers and Bishops at Paris, and by their advice replieth in this manner; Philip by the grace of God King of France, unto him who is called Boniface, and is not such indeed, little friendship or none. Let thy blockishness know, that in temporal things we are subject unto no man; and that the gift of Prebends and Benefices (being void) belongeth unto us by our royal prerogative, the which we will defend with the sword; and we think them fools and mad who judge otherwise. Io. Secres. Thereafter the King had another meeting of his Nobles and Clergy at Paris, where sundry persons of both states gave in their grievances, accusing the Pope of many crimes, as heresie, simony, and others, saith Io. Naucler. And others write, they undertook to prove, that the Pope was an usurer, incestuous, having known two of his Nieces, a Simoniack, an Heretick, that he had a familiar spirit, he denied the resurrection, &c. And that these things may be the better qualified, they propound that a general Council may be called. There a National Assembly against the Pope, and calleth for a general Council as his superior. When Boniface heard these things, he gave the Kingdom of France unto the Emperor Albert. Philip levieth an Army in Naples (which was then under the French) under the conduct of Siarra Columna (an Hetrurian, whom with all his kinred the Pope had excommunicated, and razed their Castles and houses for writing against him) and sent William Nogaret (a French Gentleman, and one of the Albigenses) to publish the foresaid appellation at Rome. They came to the gates of Aruagio (Platina calleth it Anagnia) with the assistance of some Gibelines. The Pope hid himself, with his Nephew a Marquess, and two Cardinals; these two escape by a privy door; the Marquess rendered himself in hope of favor; they rush in, and gave the Pope in option, whether he will presently quit his life or Papacy? He said, he would never renounce his Papacy. Wherefore Siarra would have killed him; but Nogaret said, they had not that commission. They carried him to Rome, where grief turned him into madness, and he died on the thirty fifth day thereafter, in the eighth year of his Papacy, and An. 1304. Platina addeth this exhortation (it seemeth from Fasc. tempo.) By his example, let all Princes, both of Church and Commonwealths, learn to rule their people and Clergy not arrogantly and contumeliously, as he of whom we are speaking did, but holily and modestly, as Christ our King, and his disciples and true followers; and let them endeavor to be loved rather than feared; which is the cause of the fall of many Tyrants. In his days were many and fearful earthquakes, that many houses fell; and the Pope with all his Court was once afraid, and dwelt in a spacious meadow under pavilions, about Andersmes.

CHAP. II.

Of EMPERORS.

1. FREDERICK the II. was very yong, and the Empire could not be vacant so long time, for many evils that might ensue; therefore the Princes moved PHILIP of Suevia to accept the Crown, until his Nephew came to age. He sought not confirmation of the Pope; and therefore Innocentius said, Either the Pope shall take the Crown and Kingdom from Philip, or Philip shall take the Apostolical ornaments from the Pope. Then Innocentius went about by all means to keep the Empire from Frederick; and to this end (among other his tricks) he absolveth all the Electors from their oath, and raiseth slanders against Philip; and enticeth Barthold Duke of Zaringia, to usurp the Empire. He would not. Then he perswadeth Otho Duke of Brunswike, and Brother of the Duke of Saxony. So wars were betwixt Philip and Otho. Notentius excommunicateth the Emperor. Nevertheless Otho at last was put to flight, and glad to seek peace. Philip was not unwilling, and gave him his Daughter in marriage. Not long thereafter, Philip had a meeting with the Pope's Legate and Otho, and was murdered by them in his chamber in the tenth year of his Empire. P. Mexia.

2. OTHO the V. was elected, and quickly confirmed by the Pope; but their concord continued not; for on the day of Coronation, a tumult arose between the Romans and Germans, for the gifts which the Emperor had bestowed; 1100. were slain, and no fewer were wounded. The Emperor took it ill, and required satisfaction from the Romans; they refused: and the Pope was suspected to be the cause of the first tumult. Likewise the Pope had caused him to swear at his Coronation, that he should with all his might maintain and preserve the Imperial liberties, and recover that which was given away and lost. Matth. Paris. in Iohan. Innocentius did require this in despite of Frederick. Then Otho seeing that he was slighted, went hastily from the City, and wasted Tuscia, Marchia, Anconitana, all Romandiola, Capua, and he intended to enter into the bounds of Naples. The Pope then requireth him to restore the patrimony of the Church, and the sued Land, under pain of his curse. Otho did not regard his menaces, and said, He was doing according to the oath of his Coronation. The Pope excommunicateth him at Rome, Matth. Paris. loc. ci. and he sent unto Sifrid Bishop of Mentz, commanding him to publish the sentence of the Roman Consistory against Otho throughout all Germany, and charge all the Cities that they do not acknowledge him. Sifrid delayed notime. But immediately Henry Count Palatine of Rhene, the Duke of Brabant, and other Princes and Barons, levy an Army against Sifrid, and forced him to leave his Bishoprick, and hide himself in Thuringia, where the Count did as yet cleave unto the Pope. When Otho understood of this stir in Germany, he did return quickly, and notwithstanding the Pope's curse, was received as Emperor; and calleth a Diet at Norinberg An. 1212. about Whitfunday, where he declareth the manifold fraud of Innocentius, and how unjustly he had accursed him; and then said, Be of courage, you Princes, unto you belongeth the charge of this Kingdom, and the administration thereof; I say, unto you belongeth every disposition of the Teutonick Kingdom, and to provide for every thing therein; it is in your power, and not in the power of the Pope, to create or forsake an Emperor; it is your part to calm the troubles, if any shall arise within the Empire; therefore, ye Princes and Nobles, maintain your rights, and shew your power for your Nation and Imperial Laws; lest if ye do it not, ye be deprived of Empire and patrimony, &c. By these and such other words, they resolve to levy immediately an Army, and first to invade Thuringia. Io. Naucler. gener. 41. In the year 1214. Innocentius causeth Frederick to be elected (which now had been well bred in literature) and Otho thought to have hindered the election; but the Princes (some for envy of his puissance, and some for affection to the former Emperor, and some addicted unto the Pope) fell from him; therefore he retired into Saxony, until he gathered a new Army; he made some attempts, but in vain, and died An. 1220.

3. FREDERICK the II. left Germany in peace, and went to be confirmed at Rome. He gave unto Pope Honorius the County of Funda, and other great gifts, even a rod to break his own head; and he confirmed the Act, Whosoever continued a year under excommunication, shall be guilty of proscription, and shall not be absolved, until he make satisfaction unto the Pope. In recompence of these gratuities and obeysance, when two Counts in Tuscany, Thomas and Richard, did rebel against the Emperor, the Pope maintained them, and absolved them from their allegiance; and because Frederick did expostulate Honorius, the Pope thundereth a curse against him. Some Bishops conspired with the rebels, and the Emperor accused and pursued them for treason. They run to Honorius. He sent a Nuntio unto the Emperor, and commandeth to restore the Bishops, and dischargeth him that he meddle not with Church-men. The Emperor could not endure such imperiousness, and said, How long will the Bishop of Rome abuse my patience? when will his covetous heart be satisfied? go tell him, that I have as great prerogatives as my Father Henry, and Frederick my Grand-father; and that I will rather hazard my Crown, then suffer him to impair my authority, seeing every Prince in France, Spain, England, &c. hath the nomination of their own Prelates. Pe. Mexia. But Platina saith, The cause of this excommunication was, when his Mother died (which held him within bounds) he began to vex the Church Lands. But it is certain by sundry Histories, that his Mother died in the beginning of Innocentius. In his time came John de Bregna King of Jerusalem into Italy, for aid against the Turks; he made reconciliation betwixt the Pope and Emperor; and gave his onely Daughter Jole unto the Emperor (then a widower) with the Title, King of Jerusalem: for this cause the Kings of Sicily, were called Kings of Jerusalem for a long space. Then Frederick did intend to go into Asia; yet because he delayed (Pe. Mexia saith, the truce which John had made with the Sultan for ten years, was not yet expired) the Pope did intend some great thing against him, but was taken away by death. When Gregory was installed, Jole was brought to Rome to be married; and when the Pope held out his right foot unto the Emperor to kiss it, he scarcely touched his knee, but would not bow unto the foot. P. Mexia. The Pope was not well pleased; he dissembleth for a time, but intendeth to revenge: So after some moneths, he chargeth the Emperor to go into Asia, according to his vow, but intendeth to deprive him of the Empire. Frederick suspecteth it, and delayeth the longer, till he heard that the Christians in Asia were utterly distressed; then he assembleth his Nobles at Cremona, and causeth his Son Henry to be created Cæsar, and sent him to perswade the Princes, to send aid unto his expedition. An. 1226. At this time the Lombards had made a league with other Cities of Italy, by suggestion of Pope (as is believed, saith Naucler.) Honorius, against the Emperor; which league continued many years, to the great prejudice of the Empire, and manifest hindering of the expedition. An. 1227. Pope Gregory again chargeth the Emperor to go into Asia. Frederick writeth unto his Son, to conven conveen the Princes again, and nameth the time when they should make their rendezvous at Brundusio. The Emperor becometh sickly; nevertheless he sailed with his Army into Creta; and there being hindered by sickness, he sent his Army forward, and returned himself into Pulia. Then the Pope excommunicateth him; the Papalines say, because he had murthered Jole, and others speak of other pretexts; but P. Mexia and Blondus say, that Jole died after this curse. Immediately Frederick sent to Rome, offering to clear himself; but his Ambassade was not admitted. Therefore the Emperor sent Letters throughout the Empire, and to other Princes, shewing how wonderfully he was excommunicated, and how presumptuous and covetous the Church of Rome was become, even the mother of all mischief. Unto Otho Duke of Bavier he wrote thus; The high Priests of Rome do now affect not onely dominion, but God-head, for they will have all men to fear them more then God; and it is sure, that there be many Antichrists among them; neither hath Christian Religion any such adversary----- that man which is called the Pope, abounding in wealth to the great prejudice of piety, thinketh (after the maner of Tyrants) that he may do as he listeth, and is answerable to none, as if he were God; what is proper unto God, he vaunteth of himself, that he cannot err; he requireth both impudently and imperiously all men to believe, that he cannot be guilty of a lye. Avent. Annal. lib. 7. And unto Henry the III. King of England, he wrote; The Church of Rome is become so avaricious, that they are not content with the goods of the Church, but they will have the inheritance of Emperors, Kings and Princes, and make them all tributaries, as Henry hath experience, and the Earl of Tolouse, whom the Popes binde with excommunication, till they bring them into bondage; they have words softer then oyl, and are insatiable blood-suckers; they say, The Church of Rome is the mother of all; but she is the root of all evil, and sheweth the pranks of a step-dame, &c. Matth. Parisien. But Frederick must go into Palestina; and An. 1228. the Calipha of Babylon was pestered with civil broils, and the Emperor the more easily recovered Jerusalem without blood, and was Crowned in it, and began to fortifie. The Sultan did fear his power, and sought truce for ten years. The Emperor sent unto the Pope, certifying him of his happy success, and craving absolution, seeing he had performed his promise; and he expected congratulation. But the Pope did cause the messengers to be killed, that they should not publish such news; and he said, the Letters were sent to advertise of the Emperor's death; for he thought the Cities of Pulia would submit themselves unto his See. And to the end the Emperor might not return, he sent unto John Patriarch of Jerusalem, and unto the Templaries, that they would not acknowledge the Emperor; But they did more think upon their own danger: Yet as Matth. Parisien. hath ad An. 1229. the Templarii wrote unto the Soldan, that the Emperor was to be at such a time at that part of Jordan where John baptized Christ, and there he might have occasion to kill him. When the Soldan had read the Letter, he said, There the fidelity of Christians! and he sent the Letter unto the Emperor. But the Emperor was informed (as the truth was) that the Pope had created John de Bregna Exarch of Ravenna; and had incited him to invade the Empire on the one part, and the Lombards on the other. Thomas, an Earl, whom the Emperor had intrusted to be one of his Deputies, did certifie him, and told him, that his friends and Clergy of the Empire, did admire how the Pope could do such things. Ibid. Neither did the malice of this Pope stay, until he had stirred up Henry against his Father. The Emperor understanding all these things, returneth quietly into Sicily; he levieith an Army; many came gladly unto him; and by the help of God, he recovereth all the holds that they had taken in his absence. After all these things, the Emperor seeketh peace of the Pope, and albeit he sent eight of the chief Dukes and Bishops within the Empire, offering himself and his life to be censured by the Church, yet in the space of a year he could not obtain peace; at last An. 1230. by frequent intercessions, and after the payment of 120000. ounces of gold, the Emperor was restored. Some write, that the Pope was a good Merchant, who could reap so much money for an excommunication; which power he had received freely, if he had received that power from Christ. Then Frederick went into Germany, to curb his two Sons Henry and Frederick; they did submit themselves. Then he turneth to revenge himself of the Lombards. And now Pope Gregory excommunicateth him again, as a Tyrant and Heretick; and he calleth him, that warlike beast coming out of the sea; and he threatneth all them of the Empire, that they should not wish well to Frederick. Then the Emperor sent Letters unto sundry Countreys, shewing his liberality unto the Pope; and on the other side, the pride and avarice of the Pope; whom he calleth, the red dragon that deceiveth the world; the Antichrist; the typified Balaam, who was hired for wages to curse God's servants; the Prince of darkness, who bewitcheth the Prophets; the counterfeit Vicar of Peter, setting forth his own imaginations, and hath turned pontificium in maleficium; a wrestler of the word into his own gain. In the end, he entreateth all them of true wisdom, to despise the roaring of such an enemy. Then he proclaimed a Diet at Ægra; where did assemble Cæsar Henry, the Dukes of Saxony, Brandeburgh, Misnia, Turingia, the Bishop of Mentz, and the Nobles of Brabant, and a little thereafter Frederick, the Emperor's second Son; all cleaving unto the Emperor, notwithstanding all the Pope's curses on the one side, and promises on the other. So the Emperor marched toward Hetruria, and to Rome. In the mean time the Pope forgiveth the payment of tenths for a time, giveth Church livings that were vacant, and promiseth eternal life unto all who would fight against Frederick, and marked them with the Cross; and he himself goeth unto the siege of Ferrara, where he allureth the Governor unto a parley, and taketh him captive, and then the City, contrary to his faithful promise. The Popish flatterers call this falshood a stratagem. The Emperor said, It was strange, that Christians were marked with the Cross against him, as an Infidel or Mahumatist. Nevertheless he passeth from City to City subduing his adversaries, till he came into his own inheritance; there he levieth an Army, and hireth Saracen Soldiers, for fear that in the end, the Pope's curses might change the mindes of the Italians, as in the days of Barbarossa, and Henry the IV. He took some Gwelph Cities; then having intelligence, how the Pope had deceived Bohem, and Prince Palatine, he sent unto them, shewing (in sum) how the estate both of the Church and Commonwealth was subverted by this Pope; and he promiseth that himself, as the chief member of the Commonwealth, would endeavor to remove him, who pretending to be the shepherd of the flock, is a very wolf, to the end a faithful shepherd might be placed in Christ's Church; and he entreateth that they would not retard his purpose, as they tendered the good of the Empire. The King of Bohem was so moved with this Letter, that immediately he procureth a meeting of the Empire at Ægra, to aid the Emperor. The Pope was no less busie, partly by means of Otho Duke of Bavier to stay them, and partly an Assembly at Rome from France and England, to deprive Frederick. The Emperor hearing of such a Council, stoppeth all passages by Sea and Land; and had a great prey of the Pope's Legates (whom the Pisanes, in the Emperor's name, took by Sea) and great victories at Ticino and Faventia. P. Mexia. And such was his respect unto the

the quietness of the Commonwealth, that he again sendeth for peace; and in the mean time the Tartars came into Poland, Misnia, Bohem, Hungarie, and the Princes were forced to send unto the Emperor for aid, promising obedience unto him in all time coming. He advertiseth the Pope of the calamity of Christendom, and craveth peace, that he may resist the Infidels. But the Pope would the Infidels did oppress, rather then the Emperor should stand; therefore he labored that his confederates might meet at Libussa, to the election of another Emperor. When he could not work out his point, he died for very anger. The Emperor now hopeth for peace at home, and marcheth with all speed into Hungarie. The Tartars hearing of him, fled away and left Europe. Innocentius the IV. though he had been very familiar with the Emperor, yet was not more peaceable then others had been. In a Synod at Lions An. 1245. he excommunicateth the Emperor for perjury, in not performing his promises, and for heresie; but no particular is named, either in the citation or sentence. The Emperor made haste to answer at Lions, if by any means he might enjoy peace; but being within three days journey, he heard how peremptory the Pope was against him, and also the Gwelphs had taken some of his Towns in Italy, whereby he knew it would be to no purpose, though he went forward, and therefore he wheeleth about, and layeth siege to Parma. Innocentius causeth to elect Henry Landtsgrave of Thuringia to be Emperor; and he directeth Letters unto the Soldan of Babylon, craving peace, at least truce betwixt the Christians and the Saracens, as some say (saith Mat. Paris.) but others write, to break the truce betwixt him and the Emperor; but the matter of the Letter is understood by the Soldan's answer. We have heard (saith he) thy Nuntio talking much of Christ----- we know more of this Christ then you know; and we magnifie him more then you magnifie him: whereas you say, you desire peace and quietness among men, so do we always; but there is mutual love betwixt us and the Emperor since the days of my Father, but betwixt you and the Emperor it is as you know: but it is not lawful unto us to treat with the Christians, without his counsel and consent. We have written unto our Ambassador at the Emperor's Court, shewing him the heads of your message; he will come unto you and tell you, and report again unto us. Matth. Parisien. saith, there was suspicion that this Letter was forged, by information of the Emperor, but he judgeth otherwise. And Alb. Crantz in Saxo. lib. 8. cap. 4. saith, The Pope was so wrathful against Frederick, that he would have turned away not onely Christians, but the Infidels also. And it may appear what the Pope was seeking, seeing in the mean time he was exacting tenths and twentieths through France, England, &c. as for maintaining the wars against the Infidels, and sent the money into Germany and Italy against the Emperor. In Germany Conrade the Son of Frederick, led an Army against Henry, and overthrew him in the second fight, An. 1247. and he died before he was Crowned. Matth. Parisien. Then the Pope did proffer the Imperial Crown unto Richard, Brother of Henry the III. King of England: He refused simply. Then unto Haco King of Norway: He answered, He would fight against the enemies of the Church, but not against all the enemies of the Pope. At last he caused to be elected William Count of Holland, which was Crowned; but the foresaid Conrade pursued him; and he retired into Holland, and then did renounce his Title of Emperor. The more God did prosper Frederick, Innocentius was the madder; and the more mad was he, when heard that Entius, the Emperor's bastard Son, had obtained victories against the Gwelphs, and other Gibeline Captains prevailed in other places. When the Emperor lay at Parma, he (as secure) went one day a hunting, and left his Army not sufficiently provided; the Citizens came out and took his pavilions, which they called victory. So the Emperor turned to Domnio, and thence into Pulia, bringing many Cities into his obedience. And then An. 1249. he sendeth unto Lions, professing his innocency in all that had happened, and shewing the wrongs that he had sustained by the former Popes; and withal, that howbeit the Pope by custom (as he alledgeth) had the confirmation of the Emperor, yet he had not power to depose him, no more then other Prelates in other Realms, who anoint their Kings; and nevertheless, I earnestly crave that I may have peace. The Pope hearing of this submission, became the more haughty, and would not consent to a treaty: so that many great men were offended, and did detest so great pride, and did return unto the Emperor. Great were the schisms in Germany and Italy; nothing in safety to any, each party by violence robbing the other. Now Otho Duke of Bavier, and others more forsook the Pope; wherefore the Pope caused to assemble another Synod at Mildorf, and summoned Otho to compare, and answer for his rebellion against the Pope. He appeareth, and said unto the Commissioners, I cannot marvel enough at your inconstancy; ye know how ye drew me from the Pope, and ye your selves called him the Antichrist; and ye perswaded me to take part with the Emperor: so there is great inconstancy both in your deeds and words, calling that wicked and violent wrong, which lately ye called just and right: But ye are overcome with expectation of honors and pleasures, more then led with honesty and godliness, according to your office. As for me, I will obey God and my Prince. I believe in Christ, and trust in his mercy; and perswade my self, that those whom ye do curse and give to the divel, are in the greater favor with God. They could give no reasonable reply; yet they accounted him as bad as the worst, and accursed him. Avent. Annal. lib. 7. All these are but a taste of the Popes innumerable inventions against the Emperor. And here you may please to see the verses which Frederick sent unto Pope Innocentius the IV.

Iactares, cum sis Urbis & Orbis onus.
Nunc membrum non es, sed putre cadaver & hulus,
Ense residendum, ridiculumque caput.
A Daniele Βδελυγμα nefasque caputque malorum,

At last the Emperor heard that his Son Entius was taken captive, and his enemies waxed strong in Germany; wherefore he intendeth to go into Germany, but was poisoned, as is touched before, and became sick at Florence An. 1250. and there divided his lands and goods unto his children; and then set his heart on meditation of the promised blessedness. The Papalines write, that after a little space he began to recover somewhat, and was stifled by his bastard Son Manfred with a pillow, Crantz. in Saxo.lib.8 cap 18. The writers testifie, that he was endued with excellent gifts, albeit the Pope pursued him as an enemy of the Church. And they say, when they consider the life of Christ, and his command to forgive seventy times in a day, with the practises of the Popes against the Emperor, they are perswaded to think with Æneas Sylvius, that there hath not been a greater calamity in the Church or Commonwealth these many years, whereof the Bishops of Rome have not been the Authors; and they call this Frederick, another Charls the Great. He could talk in Arabick, Greek, Latin, French and Dutch languages. On his Tomb it was written thus;

Nobilitas orti, possent obsistere morti,
Non foret extinctus Fredericus, qui jacet intus.*

Jo. Bale saith, he may not in this cause believe Blondus, Platina, Stella or Sabellicus, for they report nothing but what was written by the flatterers of the Popes, that (if it had been possible) they might provoke all the world against him; but who desireth to know the truth, let them read the sixth Book of the Epistles of Petrus de Vineis, Hæc Marius, saith he.

4. In the Greek Empire was a great alteration about that time; the History thereof I will set down together for the more clearness. Isaacius the Emperor had redeemed his Brother Alexius from the Scythians, and advanced him to so great authority, that all the affairs of the Empire were at the command of Alexius. Here Nicetas Choniates. in Annal. lamenteth the condition of that people, saying, Truth and holiness had failed, and because of manifold iniquity, love was become cold, so that the people left whole Cities, and went in colonies into the Lands of the Babarians, where they might live more securely; for a sober kinde of life was banished by frequent tyrannies, and the most part of the Emperors were robbers, neither thinking nor doing any thing moderately----- O glorious Empire of the Romans (saith he) and majesty which all Nations did admire and adore! what Tyrants hast thou endured! with what injuries hast thou been afflicted! how many have burnt in love of thee! what men hast thou embraced, and prostituted thy self unto! what sort of men hast thou honored with a diadem and purple shoes! &c. By the way observe here, that the Greeks do always call themselves Romans; and they called all the western people, Latins. When the Empire was in this condition, Alexius usurpeth the Crown; he pulleth out his Brother's eyes, and shutteth him in prison An. 1190. Alexius, Son of Isaacius, fleeth unto Philip Duke of Suevia (afterwads Emperor) who had married his Sister Irene; and he sendeth him at last unto the Pope for help to be restored. There this Alexius conformeth himself unto Rome, and he promiseth (saith Nicetas) to change the institutions of the ancient Romans, into the corrupt Religion of the Latins. The Pope recommendeth him unto certain Princes, which then were assembling at Venice to go into Syria, to wit, Baldwin Earl of Flanders, and his Brother Henry, Boniface Marques of Monferrate, Lewes Prince of Savoy, and others more. The Venetians also had an old quarrel against the Greeks, and were glad of this occasion. Likewise the yong man did swear unto them, that he would give them what they did demand, even (which were impossible) oceans of money, saith Nicetas. Though the Emperor Alexius understood of this preparation, he made nothing for resistance. So the Latins arrived at Jadara, and then came to Epidamnus; and they call yong Alexius Emperor, to the end the people may the more willingly accept them; then they came to Constantinople. Theodorus Lascaris, Son in law of Alexius, made some resistance; but Alexius fled, and the Italians enter the Town; and after nine years imprisonment, Isaacius is set upon his throne, and his Son Alexius with him. Within few days the chief of the Italians sat with them, as being saviors of the Commonwealth; then the Soldiers plundered the Town, sparing neither private houses nor Churches, nor the Flemings, nor the Pisanes, nor the Venetians dwelling there. The old Alexius had been deceived by a false response, that the East and West should be conjoynd in his time; and now the Monks (execrable men, and hated of God, saith Nicet.) made him believe, that God would restore him sight, and give him the Monarchy of the world; thus he had no other thought but to eat and drink with these Monks. And the yong man kept company with the Latins, was for the most part in their ships, playing at dice, carowing, &c. From July 18. till January 25. the people were so grievously oppressed, that they began to talk of choosing another Emperor; the wiser sort said, It was not time to attempt the like: but the people were so impatient of their oppression, that there must needs be another Emperor, and they name Nicolaus Canabus, who was very unwilling. But Ducas Alexius (called the proud) taketh him prisoner, killeth yong Alexius, imprisoneth the old man, and taketh the Scepter; the people were contented. He beginneth to treat with the Venetians, and other Latins; their demands were so high, that the Greeks could not or would not assent; wherefore they possess themselves of the Town, put Ducas to flight, and do more harm then the Saracens did at their entering into Jerusalem, saith Nicet. Then they made fifteen Electors, and choose Baldwin Emperor, and Thomas a Venetian to be Patriarch, who was sent to Rome, to get all these things confirmed by the Pope; and he reporteth Imperial badges to Baldwin, in whose Successors that Empire continued sixty years. At that time Creta and Euboea, or Nigrepont, was given unto the Venetians; Boniface was made King of Macedonia; and other rewards were given to others. All the Greek Empire was subject unto Baldwin, except Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Hadrianople, and in them several Greeks had the dominion; especially Lascaris about Hadrianople, and kept the title of Emperor of Constantinople. The Bulgarians invade Thracia, and took Baldwin captive, and sent him in fetters into Mysia. His Brother Henry succeedeth, and gave his onely Daughter unto Peter Earl of Altisiodore, which succeeded in the Empire at that time when Otho the V. was deposed; he was confirmed by Pope Honorius shortly after his election. So soon as he returned from Rome, he entered in wars with Lascaris; and they conclude a peace: then he was entrapped in Constantinople, and died in prison in the third year of his reign. His wife Jole causeth his Son Robert to be received Emperor. He fell in love with a yong damsel, betrothed unto a Burgonian Knight (who had done good service in that Empire) and by consent of her mother, brought her to his palace. The Knight dissembleth for a time, and then made an horrible revenge; to wit, he gathereth his friends, and a number of Greeks, haters of Robert, and cometh by night into the Palace, he cutteth off the nose of the yong Empress, and throweth her mother out at a window into the sea. Robert could not revenge it; for at that time he must go to

Rome for confirmation, and in his returning, he died at Macedonia. His Brother Baldwin was received Emperor; and because he was yong, the Pope sent John de Bregna to be Governor there. He contracteth Baldwin with his second Daughter; governeth the Empire six years, and leaveth it in peace unto his Son in law. John Duca married the onely Daughter of Lascaris, and did reign thirty and three years, but dwelt at Nice in Bithynia: He was peaceable; and dischargeth his subjects from wearing any clothes but what their own Countrey did afford; and he caused them to be industrious in husbandry; by which two means (as Nic. Gregoras witnesseth) his subjects became very wealthy, and amassed plenty of Silver and Gold from their neighbors round about, which at that time were necessitated to come and buy victuals from them. Unto John succeeded Theodor Lascaris; he put Baldwin to such stress, that he went unto his Brother in law Frederick the II. for aid, when Innocentius the IV. was chosen. Then Lascaris died, and Baldwin returned, but had not long peace; for Michael Palæologus, the Nephew of Alexius, was first chosen Governor of the Empire, and then Crowned Emperor, for the time of his pupil John (the Son of Lascaris) his minority; he would be Lord of the whole Empire. Cæsar, Brother of Michael, was sent against Epirus; by the way he came near Constantinople with eight hundred men, without his expectation, the Greeks (being wearied with the Government of the Latins) envite him to come in. Baldwin was not able to resist, and fled; so that Empire returned unto the Greeks An. 1260. but fore weakened, and after that it decayed also.

5. WILLIAM Earl of Flanders, and CONRADE the Son of Frederick, now strove for the Empire of Germany; the one was confirmed by the Pope, and Conrade was aided by the Gibelines; so that Italy and Germany had not peace for many years. At last Conrade considering the difficulty of holding Germany, and that the Kingdom of both Sicilies were more sure, appertaining unto him by his Grand-mother Constantia, he left Suevia, and such Cities of Germany (as had accepted him) under the tuition of his Father in law, the Duke of Bavaria, and went into Italy, still keeping the title of Emperor. He was received in Verona, and being accompanied with Enceline, Captain of the Gibelines, he was made welcome in sundry places on the coast of the Golf; and passing by Romandiola, he sailed into Pulia, where he was heartily received by all, except the Cities of Naples and Capua; he besiegeth them, and took them, and punisheth them severely. Not long thereafter he dieth at Naples, and left his Son Conradine Heir of both Sicilies and Suevia, under the protection of his wife and some German Princes. But Manfred (the bastard Son of Frederick) behaving himself at first as one of the Tutores, endeavoreth by all means to possess himself of both Sicilies. Pope Innocentius the IV. and his Successor did alledge, that Kingdom appertained unto the Church of Rome, because Frederick and Conrade had died under excommunication. But Manfred (with the help of the Gibelines) prevaieth, so that he was Crowned King of Sicilies, (his Nephew living in Suevia) and did invest Bishops, and Arch-Bishops, without consent of the Pope; and they all, contemning the Papal prohibition, gave obedience unto their King. Matth. Parisien. ad An. 1258. William then was onely Emperor, and they which had adhered unto Conrade, sought his peace. He thought to be Crowned at Rome, but being in a Diet at Colein (saith Naucler) he heard that the Frisons had rebelled, and invaded Holland; this rumor made him stay his journey. He went against them; as he with one or two went to spie a place to encamp, his horse fell thorow the ice, and he was so pestered, that he could not come out; some Frisons perceiving him, and not knowing who he was, slew him, and drowned him. After him not any Emperor was of such authority as the former had been.

6. The Princes could not agree in the election; at last three choose Alphonso King of Castile; three were for Richard Earl of Cornwall, Brother of Henry King of England; and the King of Bohem was for himself. Alphonso was glad, but could not come into Germany, because of his business with the Moors in Spain; and to keep the Pope's favor, he gave him some Cities upon the river Po; he gave what he never had, and in so doing he did deplume the Eagle, saith Crantz. in Saxo. lib. 8. cap. 21. Richard had the assistance of his Brother, and was Crowned at Aken: Some Towns received him; others wait for Alphonso; and many were neutral, usurping liberty; so miserable Germany was kindled again with Civil wars. Richard died after he had remained in Germany seventeen years. If Alphonso had come then, he might have been Emperor. But the Gibelines in Italy, do invite Conradine Duke of Suevia (now about eighteen years of age, and of good expectation) to come, and they would aid him in recovering his Father's inheritance from Charles Duke of Anjou. Pope Clemens the IV. hearing of his preparation, declareth Charles King of Sicilies, to be Vicar of the Empire; and wrote unto all the Nations, that they should not aid Conradine against Charles; and that the German Electors should not name him to be King of the Romans. On the other side Conradine publisheth a deploring declaration, shewing how injuriously Innocentius the IV. had dealt with him, being at that time very innocent; for his Father Conrade had recommended him unto the tutory of the Roman Church especially, and Innocentius, as one of his Tutors, had taken possession of the Kingdom of Sicilies, and then divided it among his own friends. 2. When Manfred had in his name recovered that Kingdom, Pope Alexander did stir up other men to invade that Kingdom. 3. Pope Urban had dealt unmannerly with him; for first, he would have confirmed that Kingdom unto Manfred and his Heirs; and then he inviteth Charles to take it. 4. Pope Clemens now dealeth unclemently with him, in establishing a King within that Kingdom against him; and as if that were not enough, he thundereth a process against him, and hath declared Charles to be Vicar of the Empire throughout all Italy, to the end he may have the more power against him; and he concludeth, that upon these grounds he taketh arms against Charles. Naucler. gener. 43. About that time Henry (who was banished out of Castile by his own Brother, King Alphonso, and having insinuated himself into favor with the Romans, was created Senator of Rome, and had great authority there) sent unto Conradine, and promised him aid, not for recovering his Kingdom onely, but to attain the Imperial Crown. Conradine with all haste marcheth into Italy, and was accepted as Emperor by them of Sena, Pisa, and the Gibelines of Lombardie and Romandiola: He overthrew Charles his Marshal at Aretio; and he had gotten possession of all Hetruria, if at the call of the forenamed Henry he had not made such haste toward Rome, where he was accepted by the Senator and many Romans, and lodged in the Capitole. Thence he and Henry went into Pulia, where they were taken captive by Charles; and after a year, by the unclement instigation of Pope Clemens, Conradine was beheaded, contrary unto the Law of Arms. Many French men did speak against it; but when they saw that the Pope's will must be obeyed, these French appointed a certain man to be in readiness to kill the Burreo (immediately after the beheading of Conradine) lest he vaunt, that he had shed the blood of a Prince: And the Duke of Flanders, with his own hand, slew him which had given out the sentence. All Christendom abhorred the fact; especially Peter King of Arragon, by Letter, upbraided the Pope, saying, Thou art a worse Nero then Nero himself, and more cruel then any Turk. God suffered neither of the two to rejoyce long time; for Clemens died within a moneth; and albeit Charles lived some years, yet he had continual wrestlings and misfortunes, and died in sorrow. P. Morn. in Myster. After this the house of Suevia failed, and that through the malice of the Popes; and many of their Cities became free. The Princes Electors convene at Frankford, but could not agree in three years; in the end, they all confer their suffrages on Lewes Count Palatine to name one; he nameth

7. RODULPH Earl of Habsburgh, which had lately conquered Austria from the Crown of Bohem. Germany was all glad, because they had suffered much, enduring this inter-reign the space of twenty and two years. Rodulph was Crowned at Aken; but would not go to Rome, pretending unto the Pope the difficulties in Germany; but unto others he said, as the fox unto the lion, Omnia te advorsum spectantia, nulla retrorsum. He contented himself with Germany, and that the Cities in Italy paid unto his Deputies: but many did usurp; and some bought their liberty: and he gave unto Pope Nicolaus Ravenna, and some other Cities. He had wars with Othocurus King of Bohem, who was killed in battel; and Rodulph did agree with his Son Wenceslaus, and gave him his Daughter in marriage. He was held in singular estimation, because he, finding the Empire troublesome, had procured peace, and left it in peace An. 1291.

8. When Baldwin was chased out of Constantinople, he had his refuge unto Charles King of Naples, and contracteth his Daughter with his Son; in stead of dowry, he promisseth Constantinople, if by the aid of Charles he can be able to recover it. Charles thought by this means to attain unto the Monarchy of Julius Cæsar and Augustus; he was informed of the weakness of Constantinople, and of the aid that he might have from the Italians and Germans remaining in Greece since the last conquest, &c. so he prepared to invade. Michael Emperor of Constantinople is afraid of him, and to hold him at home, he perswadeth the King of Sicily, and the Venetians, to invade the Kingdom of Naples; and he sent unto the Pope for his furtherance. The Pope refuseth to assist him by any means, unless he will come into agreement with the Church of old Rome; whereunto Michael assenteth, and sendeth Ambassadors to treat of the Articles; which were comprised into three.

1. That in the Litanies mention should be of the Pope and four Patriarchs.
2. That it should be lawful unto any Greek to appeal unto old Rome, as the older and more perfect Court.
3. That in all things superiority should be given unto Rome. At this time no mention was of the word filioque in the Creed. Joseph Patriarch of Constantinople, hearing of this concord, left his See, and entered into a Monastery. The greatest number of Presbyters preached against it, and exhorted the people to suffer martyrdom, rather then to accept such articles; so that a great stir was among the people; and the Emperor was in greater fear of his people at home, then of his foreign enemy, knowing that dangers at home are most perilous; and he was brought into this strait by many of his Nobles, either to perswade them of his assent, or then avow them as enemies: And first he calleth them together, and sheweth unto them, that he had attempted this concord with the Western Church not for desire of novelty, but to prevent the present difficulty, and it is wisdom to decline the greatest evil; for if the enemy come against them, the broken walls which now are begun to be repaired shall suffer greater evils, and themselves with wives and children shall be slaves, neither able to retain their ancient Laws nor Religion; and therefore he had chosen to yield in lesser things for a greater commodity; with these words, some were moved, and many were not; wherefore he shewed violence: some were clapt in prison for disobedience, some were banished, and all means were used whereby mens mindes could be tried; they who had knowledge (who were but few) suffered all extremities couragiously, others wandered into Peloponnesus, Achaia, Thessalie, Colchis, or wheresoever they heard of Christians, Niceph. Gregor. lib. 5. After this he went to the Councel at Lions, but his doings there were so ungracious unto his Countrey, that he had no quietness; and when he died, his Son Andronicus, though he loved and revered his Father, yet because he had gone from the right doctrine of the Church, would not suffer his body to be buried, no not in a common place of burial; onely he commanded that a few should cover it in the earth, a little space from the leager where he died, lest the body of an Emperor be torn of beasts, Ibid. Immediately Andronicus sent his Edicts every where, proclaiming the liberty of the Church again, and restoring all who were banished or imprisoned, or robbed for the cause of Religion; and Becus the Patriarch left his seat privily, and hid himself in a Monastery, fearing still when and where the people would crush him; and Joseph, who was forced before to dimit, is now restored. But where alteration once entereth, it is not soon calmed; both Clergy and people were divided into factions; for the conformers of Michael, when they had no other to say against Joseph, they objected, that he had received his seat, Arsenius the true Patriarch being yet alive, and was therefore excommunicated by Arsenius. The followers of Joseph alledged again, that Arsenius was deposed in a free Synod, by Authority of the Emperor, as indeed Nicephorus Gregoras sheweth the same lib. 4. howbeit the ground of the deposition is justly questionable, or rather unjust. Joseph was glad, for love of quietness, to renounce his See, and within a few days died; and George, or Gregory, a Cyprian, succeeded unto him, a learned and eloquent man: the Emperor would not suffer him to receive consecration from any Bishop, who had yielded unto the new Articles; onely he was chosen, and elected, and the Emperor gave unto him pastorale pedum, and so without consecration he administered, until Nicephor Bishop of Mozylle came Legate from the Prince of Ætolia, and the Bishop Debreus from Macedonia, about some other business; then, by advice of George, Andronicus designeth Germanus, a Monk, to be Bishop of Heraclea; and by these three, the Patriarch was consecrated. Nevertheless the contention ceased not yet; but the Emperor being wise, and desirous to make peace with the least offence of either party, he calleth a Synod at Atramylium; there after little jangling, both parties agreed, that their several reasons should be written in two several books, and the decision should be committed unto God by fire and miracle; so when they had watched all night, and prayed unto God, both books were cast into a fire in the midst of the Church, on a Sunday; both parties waited that their book should be preserved, but both were burnt: this was the sentence of God, and his deciding of them who troubled the Church untimously, and would refer a serious matter unto a foolish trial. From thence they all subscribed unto the Patriarch; nevertheless, they who had suffered under Michael, did now so domineer, that all the other Bishops and Priests were removed from their places; and the Bishops commanded their inferiors to take the priestly habits from them, and trample their garments on the ground, with these words, He is unworthy; and after they had buffeted them, they thrust them out of the Churches, even albeit the other party professed repentance; But (as Nicephorus saith lib. 6.) they who were so unmerciful, suffered afterward just punishments, none of them died in their own place; and

and being also most shamefully removed, they ended their lives in sorrow: Especially the forenamed Becus wrote Apologies, and desired to be heard in a lawful Assembly. The Emperor considering, that reproaches sometimes had just grounds, and sometimes were altogether false, yet in time are wont to breed factions, called the Clergy, with some of the Nobility into his Palace, and there Becus, coming from his prison, was permitted to speak, and pleaded so eloquently, that many of his hearers were perswaded. The Patriarch and Muzalo magnus Logotheta, refuted his eloquence with strong reasons; and Becus was sent again in banishment into a little Town of Bithynia. After this the Patriarch set forth refutations of the opinions of Becus, and he spake very bitterly against him; some Bishops and Priests by their published writings, did admonish the Patriarch to change his style, if he would prevent danger, and the like reproaches: he took this admonition to proceed of envy, and was the more stirred to write, and heap disputations upon disputations, thinking to stop the mouthes of adversaries: the more he writeth inveſtively, the more of his own Clergy begin to dislike him; but he regardeth nothing, till Chilas Bishop of Ephesus, and Daniel Bishop of Cizicum (whom he had advanced, and esteemed above others) became his avowed enemies in the same cause: then he thought upon the example of Julius Cæsar, resisting all his adversaries; but in grief yieldeth unto Brutus and Cassius; so he quiteth all jars and disputes, he dimiteth his charge, and entereth into St. Marie's Hodegium or Monastery. Chilas and Daniel drank also of the same cup; for their Clergy rose against them severally, and dilated them unto the Emperor, and to other Bishops, for crimes worthy of deposition. The Emperor summoneth them unto Constantinople; they elude his summons with delays; but they did finde the Emperor's secret dislike, more noisome then open anger; and they were dispised of all their colleagues and brethren; nor were they answered in their revenues, and so died in sorrow. Nicep. Gregor. lib. 6. The same Andronicus took pleasure in Astronomy, and began to think on the right keeping of Easter. Therein Nicephorus Gregoras the Historician shewed his skill; and did demonstrate by Astronomical reasons, that the day of Easter was changed from March 25. unto the 17. day. Many did deride the ostentation (as they did judge) of Nicephorus, that he had not gotten licence to speak, if the Emperor had not commanded them silence. His reasons were taken from the vernal equinox, and the first full Moon thereafter. The Emperor was perswaded of it, and would have had it amended; but he did fear, that the unlearned would be offended, and the Church be divided; and he said, It were not an easie matter to go through the Empire and the Islands, and to inform them in such a scruple, but some would keep one day, and some keep another; therefore it is better to continue in such things as they were received. Gregor. lib. 8.

9. A D O L P H Count of Nassaw was next Emperor, by the policy of the Bishop of Mentz; for he dealt privily with the Electors, and perswaded them to refer their suffrages unto him; and he named this Adolph. He sought not confirmation from Rome. He was faithful unto the Empire; for he did not enrich his own children; but did enlarge the revenues of the Crown, by conquering the Principedom of Misna, and other Lands. In time of the wars betwixt France and England, he was for England, and all the Electors were for France; and therefore they conspired against him, saith Jo. Naucler, and they dethroned him. Albert the Son of Rodulph was chosen; they fought a bloody battel before Albert was Crowned, and Adolph was slain. All the Authors of the insurrection were remarkably punished within a year; to wit, both the Bishops and the Counts; and Albert (though he lived some years, yet) was slain by his own Brother, Idem. The death of Adolph, and the time, is marked in these verses:

In Iulio mense Rex Adolphus cadit ense: Per manus Australis praecepsit machina talis.*

Of divers Countreys.

this Century.*

1. Platina in Honor. III. writeth, that then were earthquakes so great and fearful, that in the mountains Salvii five thousand men and women were smothered by ruine of houses, and falling of stones off hills: and in the days of Gregory the IX. was inundation of waters; Tiberis overflowing his banks brought great harm: and men were so plagued with pestilence, that scarcely the tenth person was preserved: then was a strange eclipse of the Sun, and Stars seemed to fall. But these days were more miserable for spiritual plagues; for the misty ignorance of former times became more foggy; people and nations were wonderously deluded with strong delusions of the man of sin. No peace in the world almost; and the blood of Christians was shed every where, and for the most part by procurement of the Popes, partly under the shew of holy wars, and partly under pretence of heresies, as will yet more appear. For

2. Then came the locusts out of the bottomless pit; of whom the first was Dominicus Calaguritanus a Spaniard, the Father of Frates Pradicatores, or black Friars, who were also called Jacobines and Dominicans. Petrus Auratus, one of that Order, in Scintilla Divi amor. cap. 5. writeth of him thus; Our holy Father Dominicus, did every day lash his own body most sharply; once for dantonng the flesh, next for satisfying for the souls in Purgatory, and the third time for living sinners. But Antonius Arch-Bishop of Florence, about the year 1420. goeth further, comparing Dominicus with Christ in number and greatness of miracles, in name, in life, death, and after death; and in all these (almost) preferring Dominicus (O blasphemy!) saying, Christ raised three dead bodies; Dominicus raised three dead bodies at Rome; what shall I say of four hundred which were drowned at Tolouse, and at the prayer of Dominicus were brought forth safe, after they had been a long space under the water? Christ, being immortal, came twice unto his disciples when the the doors were shut; but Dominicus, being as yet mortal, came into the Church in the night when the doors were shut, lest he did awake his disciples. Christ after his death said unto his disciples, All power is given unto me in heaven and earth: but this power was given unto Dominicus in heaven, on earth, and in hell; for he had Angels to serve him, and the Devils trembled at his nod, nor were they able to disobey him. The prayer of Christ was heard so oft as he would; for when he prayed in the garden, Let this cup depart from me, albeit he was not heard, in so far as he prayed in sensuality, yet according to his minde or reason he wished not to be heard; but Dominicus shewed unto one of his companions, [Iacob. de Vorag. in Legend. Aurea calleth

calleth him Prior Monasterii Cassamaria] in a familiar conference, that he never did seek any thing from God, which he did not obtain to his hearts desire; [to wit, because he was more perfect then Christ, and never did pray by appetite of senses.] These and many other blasphemies were paralleled by that Bishop, and canonized Saint of the Roman Church. Anton. par. 3. tit. 23. cap. 1. §. 2, & 38. The next was Francis of Assisio, an Italian, the Father of the Minorites, or Franciscans: he also is exalted above the Prophets, Apostles, yea and above Christ. In Francis (say they) the passion of Christ is renewed; of him David saith, Thou hast crowned him with glory and honor, and thou hast set him above the works of thy hands; He is given as a light to the Nations. It is most certain, for one Mass of St. Francis, God hath been appeased with all the world. They are all saved who die in that Order, and under the rule of St. Francis. He hath obtained from God, that none can die evilly in his habit. Christus oravit, Franciscus exoravit. P. Morn. in Myster. iniq. ex libro Conformitat. Vita B. Francis. ad vit. Christi. The Author of that book was Barth. de Pisis, An. 1389. it was approved by the Roman censurers, and printed at Bononia An. 1510. with this inscription, Liber aureus. These two, Dominic and Francis, were canonized, and their Orders confirmed: And by the Bull of Pope Gregory the IX. it was commanded, that all should believe the holiness and power of these men, or shall be punished as Hereticks. That Legenda sheweth the cause of their honor. Pope Innocentius did refuse to confirm their Order, until he dreamed; as Mantuanus also hath expressed it in Faustor. lib. 8.

This dream is in Legenda Aurea, and in Fascic. temp. After that dream, Innocentius craved that Dominic would draw up the rules of his Order; but before the rules were digested, Innocentius died; and then Pope Honorius received and confirmed them. Legen. Aurea. Bonaventura in vita Francis. saith, that dream was meant of his Father Francis. How was the Lateran Church then like to fall? The Emperor for a long time was striving against the Popes; and the Waldenses were preaching against the heresies of Rome, and calling the Pope the Antichrist; therefore power and authority was given to Dominic and Francis, with their disciples, to allure with their pale faces, to sting with fained words, and to preach, that all men should send money for maintaining the holy wars against the holy wars against the Emperor, and that none should believe the new doctrine of the Waldenses: This was the scope of their preachings at first, and so did they uphold the Lateran Church. And because the Bishops were not diligent enough to resist the Waldenses, the Pope committeth unto Dominic the office of Inquisition; and he took with him others, which either with sword or by tongue, would oppugn all the adversaries of the Roman Church. Afterwards these Friars became Bishops, Cardinals, and Legati à latere (and what were they not?) to gather collections of money, and to incite Kings and Nations against the Infidel Emperor (as they spake) and Princes, and against them whom they called Hereticks. For their diligence in this Commission, Dominic and Francis were called the two Olives, and the two Candlesticks standing before the Lord, Revel. 11.

and the two Cherubins full of wisdom, Exod. 37. Antonin. loc. cit. Their Institution was, to have a white coat, and a black one above it; to live by the works of their hands, or by alms, but to have no proper goods; and lest their piety turn to idleness, they should go abroad and preach every where, as Christ did. Pope Innocentius the III. commended this Institution; and after him Honorius confirmed it. Pol. Virg. de inven. rer. lib. 7. cap. 4. From their preaching they were called Pradicatores. Francis had been an Augustinian, but he would, being a more strict life, all Monks had possessions in common, though nothing in propriety; but he would have nothing in common nor in propriety, nor two coats, but one coat of the natural colour, girded with a girdle of leather: This he commended as the very life of a Christian, and commanded and practised by Christ; and to the end that these of his Order should beware of pride (which often followeth sanctity, faith Pol. Virg. loc. cit.) he would have them called Minorites. He vowed obedience unto Pope Honorius the IV. and his Successors; and his Brethren must vow obedience unto him and his Successors. When they were advising in the Colledge at Rome, upon the confirmation of this Order, some Cardinals said, It was a new thing, and more then man is able to perform. John Bishop of Sabinien, said, It is blasphemy against Christ and his Gospel, to say, that it containeth any thing new and impossible: So it was confirmed at that time. And afterwards by Pope Gregory the IX. in these words; We say, that neither in common nor in special, should they have any propriety; but they may have the use of utensils, of books, and other moveables that they shall get lawfully; and the Friars may use such things as their General or Provincials shall think good, reserving the dominion of the houses and places unto such as is known it belongeth unto; neither may they sell their moveables, or give them away from their Order, unless a Cardinal of the Roman Church, who shall be Governor of the Order, shall give power and consent unto their General or Provincials. Innocentius the IV. declared, that the propriety of the Minorites goods, belongeth unto the Apostolical See; and he gave them power to appoint Procurators, who might sell, or any way change their goods for their use; and to change the Procurators as they thought good. And so though they had vowed simple poverty, yet they devised ways of possession; yea, they sought the possessions of other Monks; and (as Math. Paris. faith ad An. 1235.) it was told them, It is a shame unto them, and scandal unto others, to change their rule and profession so soon. Their way of purchasing was thus; They had liberty to hear confessions (as the Dominicans had to preach) and they did ask persons of whatsoever quality, Hast thou made thy confession? If it were answered, Yea; they said, To whom? if it were answered, To our Priest; the Friar said, What an idiot is that? he never learned Divinity, nor hath he read the Decrees, nor hath he learned to solve a question; those Priests are blinde guides of the blinde; come unto us, we can distinguish between leprosie and leprosie; unto us are the mysteries and secrets of God revealed; confess unto us, to whom so great priviledges are granted by the Apostolical See: Therefore many Nobles and others, lest their Bishops and Priests, and made their confessions unto the Friars, and gave them their tithes and offerings, as is manifest by the querulous Letters that were collected by Petrus de Vincis Epist. lib. 1. And then the Friars began to rear up gorgeous buildings for themselves, and the Priests were for the most part but contemned and poor. Some Popes made Decrees in favor of the Friars, for the benefit of the Church; and some made contrary Decrees: for them, Honorius the IV. Gregory the IX. Alexander the IV. Clemens the IV. and V. against them, and for the Curates, was especially John the XXII. (who made himself Pope)

and others after him: In his time some that were called pauperes de paupere una, and Beguni, separated themselves from their Order, and returned to their Institution; Pope John condemned them and their constitution: but these were zealous of their first rule, even so zealous, that at Massiles four of them were condemned by their own Order the Inquisitors, and were burnt, because they would not consent unto the dispensation that was granted unto them. Others in many places of France called these four Martyrs, and said, If the Pope hath consented unto their death, he is an Heretick. Such doings and speeches, provoked Pope John the XXII. first to suspend, and then to condemn the Decrees of his Predecessors, that had confirmed the Institution of that Order, as commanded and practised by Christ. Geo. Calixtus in his book De nova arte, hath those things at more length, ex Nic. Eimer. the Author of Director Inquisitor. and Alvar. Pelagius de Planctu Eccles. After Pope John were many Bulls both for and against the Friars. Then starteth up a new controversie between the Friars and the Priests; The Priests said, Of Tithes. The Tithes, being the proper patrimony of the Church, should be paid unto them who serve in the Church, and not unto idle bellies, who have not charge in the Church. The Friars move other two questions; 1. By what Law should Tithes be paid? 2. Unto whom they should be paid? For the first they say, It was the uniform consent of the Church, that God commandeth the payment of Tithes under the Gospel, as under the Law. So Origen on Numer. cap. 18. August. de temp. Ser. 219, & 48. and such was the practise in many ages, saith Concil. Matiscon. 2. cap. 5. But at that time the Friars held, It was a judicial Law, binding the Jews only, yet so as it may be continued by Princes; and the Church hath enjoined the payment of the tenth part of the increase; neither may any refuse to pay the Tithe, and more also, if the Church shall enjoin more, as she hath power indeed. Tho. Aquin. in Sum. 2.2. qu. 87. The other question was before without scruple, that Tithes should be paid unto Church-men; and a division should be of them (as of all other Church-goods) one unto the Bishop, another for the Curate, and a third for the fabrick of the Church, and the fourth for the poor and strangers. But the Friars made a new distinction, saying, In Tithes two things are to be considered, to wit, the power of receiving them, and the Tithes themselves; the power is spiritual, and belongeth unto them that serve at the altar for their service; but the things called Tithes are corporal, and therefore may be given unto Laicks. Tho. Aquin. ib. By this distinction the Priests were cheated; and afterwards the Tithes were given to Abbeyes and Monasteries. By the way note, that the Friar Thomas calleth the Friars Laicks; as they were never reckoned among the Clergy, unless they were promoted, and received Orders. And we may see how the Franciscans were subdivided (as also other Orders) into Sects; some kept the first Institution, and go coarsely apparelled, living onely by begging; and others want not their ease nor abundance; they say, They have nothing, and yet enjoy plenty: and they excuse their practise (which is contrary unto their profession) with a distinction. They have riches in common, but nothing in propriety. This cause why Friars are so many ways subdivided, is marked by Bellarmin de Monach. l. 2. c. 2. Every Sect (saith he) is hot at the beginning, and then they become colder; then ariseth some one or other, who reduceth the Sect to the first Institution, with some particular Rite in remembrance of himself, and this is called a new Religion. Until this day these two Orders kept the Office of Inquisition, wheresoever the Pope commandeth, saith Francis Pegna in Directo. Inquisitor. but principally the Franciscans exercise it. Their office. How they discharge this Office, Agrippa de vanitat. scien. cap. 96. sheweth, saying, Whereas their jurisdiction should be grounded upon Theological traditions, and holy Scriptures, they exercise it according to the Canon-Law and Papal Decrees, as if it were impossible the Pope can err; and they throw away the holy Scriptures as a dead letter, or but a shadow of truth, yea, and they say, as a buckler and fortrefs of Hereticks; neither admit they the ancient traditions of Fathers and Doctors, saying, Those might be deceived, and deceive, but the holy Church of Rome cannot err, nor the Pope the head thereof; and they set before them the Books of his Court, as the But of their faith: when they enquire, they ask nothing but, Believest thou in the Church of Rome? and if it be answered affirmatively; they say, But the Church of Rome judgeth this proposition heretical and scandalous unto godly ears, or derogatory unto the power of the Church; and so they compel the man unto a recantation. But if he who is examined, do profess to maintain his opinion by testimony of Scripture, or by reasoning, they make a noise, and blowing their cheeks, they say, You have not to deal with Batchelors, or raw Students, but with your Judges; you come not to argue and jangle, but you must answer simply, whether you will acknowledge the Decree of the Roman Church, and revoke what you have said: If the man will not, they shew him faggots, and say, We must deal with Hereticks, not by arguments and Scripture, but by these, &c. A third sort of locusts were the Carmelites, a more ancient sort indeed; for they had been many ages at mount Carmel, even under the Soldan; but when they changed their habit, they were all banished; and coming into Europe, were confirmed by Pope Honorius the III. Their habit was white; their rule was to accept from any man, and do nothing, but at command of their Superior to deceive the people with glossing words, under pretence of long prayer. Those were once conjunct with the Franciscans in the Inquisition; but when they saw the people hated them for the cruelty of that office, they forsook it; as I. Bale in Catal. pag. 546. hath marked from the Bull of Pope Alexander the IV. A fourth sort was the Crucigeri, which began (as Pol. Virg. de inven. rer. lib. 7. cap. 3. hath it) in this maner. INNOCENTIUS the III. directed against the Albigenes a great number of Soldiers, intended against the Turks; they had received their badge of the cross: Those all were slain, and the Pope canonized them all; and for their honor he began such an Order, and gave them privileges. Pope Alexander the IV. dreamed that he saw St. Augustin, and caused he called all the Augustinians out of the woods and deserts, and caused them to dwell in Cities, and gave them exemptions and privileges. So about that time began many other Orders, both of men & women, apart in their own Monasteries, and some of both men and women in the same Monastery, but (for shame) in divers parts, and both sorts under the command of a woman; as the Order of St. Clara (the Sister of Francis the Minorite) and of St. Briget. About the year 1252. the Minorites began to teach Aristotle, that they might be the more able to deceive with Sophistry. Innocentius the IV. thereupon said, Now Philosophy sitteth like a whore; to wit, (saith Matth. Parisien.) as another Caiaphas, he prophesied truly; If he knew that she was a whore, why did he suffer her to occupy the chair of her Mistres? because he would shew, that wittingly and willingly he had given a bill of divorcement unto the holy Scriptures. Scholastick Theology was the proper exercise of these two Sects of Friars, and they did still extinguish the few and little sparks of truth: For the Scholastick Divinity had (as it were) three ages; the first from the year 1120. until the year 1212. the Doctors of this age are reckoned, Anselm Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, Hugo de St. Victor, a German, Richard de St. Victor, a Scot, Gratian the Compiler of the Decrees, Peter Lombard Master of the Sentences, his colleague Blandinus, dinus, Rupertus Tuitiensis, Hugo de Ponto, Hugo the Cardinal, and first Compiler of Concordantia Biblica, Leo Tuscus, Gulielm. Altifiodorensis, Vincentius Gallus, Alexander de Ales, alias Fons vite, an English, who wrote the first Commentaries on Lombard, Gualter Pictaviensis, Alfonsus Tostatus, or Abulensis, &c. The second age began with Albertus Magnus, Professor once at Paris, and then at Colein, his disciple Thomas de Aquino Doctor irrefragabilis, Aegidius Romanus Primate of Aquitania, Johannes Scotus Subtilis Doctor, Richardus de Media villa, Alanus de Insulis, Augustinus de Ancona, Nicolaus de Lyra, Cardinal Bonaventura Sepharicus Doctor, Durandus de St. Portiano, not the worst of them, Gulielmus Occam, about the year 1330, &c. These were diligent in studying, reading and writing; but as the Arrians, Novatians, and other Hereticks in former times, did trust in their subtil disputes, so these for the most part, forsake the certainty of Scriptures, despise the simplicity of the Fathers, delight in the subtilty of distinctions and curious questions; and were readier to wrangle and jangle with ostentation of wit, then to search the truth in love; desirous to maintain opinions that they have coyned, and not to follow Divine oracles; faining new words, and prating of verbalities, realities, hecceities, and what other frivolous words they can devise, to paint and disguise their errors: And when they have talked so highly, that few can understand their discourse, then they are called sublime Doctors; and what one did coyn, another did oppose and refute. In their disputes they seldom bring texts of Scripture for confirmation or grounds, but so saith the Philosopher, or so saith the Master (meaning Aristotle and Lombard) or so saith such a Father. And others among them, whose sagacity cannot soar aloft, do write of the power of the Pope, and miracles of Saints; they forge plausible or terrible fables, advance the reliques and Histories of this or that Saint, still mixing their own lyes. I leave the third age of Scholastick unto its own place. These of that second age, have added many errors unto the former; as for example, 1. Peter Lombard could not tell, whether the change of the bread in the Sacrament were formal or accidental; but these held transubstantiation and concomitancy. From this root sprang a wood of intricate questions, that the world knew not before (which demonstrateth the novelty of the error) as 1. What giveth immediately the form unto the Sacrament? Pope Innocentius the III. lib. 4. de Myster. cap. 6. saith, Christ used no words in the consecration, but onely did consecrate by his Divine power. But Tho. Aquin. in Sum. par. 3. qu. 76. ar. 1. ad 1. saith, Against this are the words of the Gospel, which say, Christ blessed; and certainly that blessing was done by some words; therefore the words of Innocentius are spoken opinative magis quam determinative. For clearing this point, he sheweth (a little before) a new distinction between this Sacrament and all other Sacraments; to wit, the form of other Sacraments import the use of the matter, but the form of this importeth onely the consecration of the matter, which, saith he, consists in consubstantiation. 2. Whether the substance of the bread remain after the consecration? they conclude this negative. 3. Whether the substance of the bread be turned into nothing, or into materialiam primam, or into the body of Christ? 4. In what subject do the accidents of the bread and wine remain? 5. Whether the transubstantiation be done in a moment of time? 6. Whether the dimensions of Christ be wholly in this Sacrament? 7. Whether the body of Christ be in this Sacrament locally. 8. Whether the body of Christ doth move according to the motion of the hostie? 9. Whether any eye, even a glorified one, can see Christ's body in the Sacrament? 10. Concerning the truth of the words, Hoc est enim corpus meum, are innumerable controversies, as, Whether hoc signifie bread? or whether it importeth demonstrationem ut conceptam, & non ut exercitatem? or ad intellectum, & non ad sensum? that is, This, that is the thing signified, by this is my body: Or, whether it demonstrateth to the sense? but is to be understood according to the instant or moment, not of pronouncing it, but of pronouncing the last syllable; as when one saith, Now I will be silent. Thomas Aquinas first did write those, and innumerable more such questions, and after him many have debated them, and many other questions of that subject and nature. 2. Before it was voluntary (excepting the case of scandal) to confess their sins, and no Laws were against them which did not confess; yea, Lombard, Lib. 4. Dist. 17. B. saith, It may be said, that without confession of the mouth, or payment of outward punishment, sins are blotted away by contrition and humility of the heart; for after that one doth with a grieved minde propound to confess his sins, God forgiveth; because there is confession of the heart, albeit not of the mouth; and by this confession the soul is inwardly cleansed from the spot and contagion of committed sin, and the debt of everlasting death is forgiven; and therefore (saith he) these sentences [of the Fathers which he hath quoted before] concerning repentance and confession, are to be understood of the confession of the heart, or of inward punishment. But after that Decree of Innocentius the III. the School-men held, that he is not to be accounted a Christian, who confesseth not all his sins particularly. As for the circumstances, the Canon biddeth the Priest be discreet in searching the circumstances of the sinner, and of the sin. But the School-men press every man to confess particularly every circumstance of his sin, so far as possibly he can. Concerning the person who should hear confessions, Lombard, loc. cit. D. teacheth, that a man should diligently seek a Priest, because God hath given the power of binding and loosing unto Priests; but if a Priest cannot be had, one may make his confession unto his neighbor or companion: and he speaketh no where of a Monk or Frier. But afterwards the Dominicans got power from the Popes, and the Priests were neglected. 3. Gratian in his Decrees, and Lombard in his Sentences, have no word of pardons or Papal indulgences. But when avarice had possessed the Clergy, and the people were blinded with ignorance and superstition, and both were contented with an outward formality, then publick declarations were redeemed with sums of money, which they called alms for the use of the poor, or for building Hospitals or Churches, or Bridges; and the discharge of the publick declarations, was called indulgence or pardon. The School-men finding this practise to be so gainful unto Bishops, and the pardons so acceptable unto the people, did commend them in their preachings, yet so, that among themselves some made question of the truth of them; for some (as Tho. Aquin. Supplem. qu. 25. ar. 2.) said, These pardons were but a kinde of pious deceit, whereby the Church draweth men into some sort of devout actions, as a mother allureth her childe unto some steps, by shewing him a golden peny, which she giveth him not. Some said, they were available in the Court, not of God, but of the Church; others held they were useful in both Courts: And they made the ground of this power, to be the treasures of Christ's, and the Saints sufferings, which they had suffered more then was needful for the propitiating their sin and everlasting punishment, all which their sufferings of supererogation, make up the treasure of the Church; and the Bishops or Priests may bestow a part of that treasure on them which have not merits of their own. And truly any man might perceive (as the Germans did in their grievances, which they sent unto Pope Hadrian the VI.) that these were cunning frauds to purchase money unto the Pope, and the Friars, and others

their partners. We read, that in the primitive Church, when discipline was strict, they would remit somewhat of their severity, as they saw the persons affected; but in that Century, not so much the punishment already enjoined, but to be enjoined was dispensed with for money; in former time the dispensation was granted, lest the penitents did faint under the burthen, and that they might the sooner be received into the communion again, nor were they granted for money. But at that time, and in times following, they were pardoned from all satisfaction, both for sin committed and to be committed, if they would give moneys; which trick was coloured with pretext to say Masses for them, or for use of the holy wars. And these pardons were (at most) thought to avail onely unto the living, until Boniface the VIII. did extend their vertue unto the souls in Purgatory. Co. Agrip. de vanit. scien. cap. 61. Unto the more clearing of this point, hear what John Roffen. saith, contra assert. Luthe. art. 18. (seeing Pol. Virg. de inven. rer. lib. 8. cap. 1. and others do cite the same as truth; Possibly many (saith he) do not value indulgences, because the use of them is known to have come but lately among Christians; unto them I answer, It is not certain who gave them first; nevertheless there hath been some use of them very ancient, as they say, among the Romans, which may be gathered by the Stations----- None who is Orthodox [here he would say, Popish, or a follower of the Pope] doubteth whether there be a Purgatory; of which there is no, or very little mention among the ancients; yea, and among the Greeks it is not believed until this day; and neither did the Latins conceive the verity thereof at one time, but by little and little, nor without dispensation of the holy Ghost; that after so many years, both the faith of Purgatory, and use of indulgences, was generally received by the Romish Church: so long as there was not fear of Purgatory, no man sought pardons; for upon it doth all the account of pardons depend; if ye take away Purgatory, what use have pardons? therefore pardons began after that people stood in aw of Purgatory. So far he, saith Polydore, which thou perhaps (seeing they are of so great moment) didst expect (as more certain) from the mouth of God. But Roffensis saith further; If there be no Purgatory, we shall not have need of pardons; considering therefore how long time Purgatory was not known, and then it was believed by some by degrees, partly by revelations, and partly by Scriptures, and so at last it was believed generally by the whole Church; we may easily understand some cause of pardons: Seeing then Purgatory was so lately known, who can now admire, that there was no use of pardons in the primitive Church? &c. 4. A fourth device of the Friers, was the distinction of merit, ex congruo, & condigno; some holding the one part onely, and some both parts, but it was never universally approved among them, seeing always some did abhor to say, A man by his merits is worthy of the Kingdom of heaven. Of which number were Guiliel. Parisien, Jo. Scotus, Gregorius de Arimino, Biel, &c. This particular leadeth to another consideration of these Friers, that as they do differ in degrees, the latter sort (for the most part) being worse, or more erroneous then their fathers, and ready to produce a worse generation, so they did and still do differ in contrary opinions; for they preach not Christ of good will (saith Agrip. de vanit. scien. cap. 97.) but for contention; so that there is more hope of agreement among Philosophers, then among these School-men, seeing they have darkened and killed all maner of Divinity with opinions of men, and new errors, &c. and the posterity sweareth into the words or tenets of their Master; and they are led captive by his opinion, so that they will not yield unto contrary reasons nor Scripture. This is clear by the families or Sects of Thomists and Scotists, striving the one against the other, not in Philosophical or indifferent points, but in matters of greatest moment; As for example, 1. Thomas saith, A man is accepted of God, not for his vertue, but by the grace of God, which is the fountain of these vertues. In 2. Sent. Dist. 26. q. 1. ar. 4. But Capreolus on that place bringeth Scotus, Durand and Aureolus, holding the contrary. 2. Thomas saith, A man deserveth glory ex condigno, 1, 2. qu. 114. ar. 3. yet to make this smooth, he hath devised that distinction, that a work deserveth either as it proceedeth from free-will, or as it proceedeth from God's grace; and so on that part of Rom. 6. Lect. 4. he saith, If good works be considered in their own nature, or as they proceed from mans free-will, they deserve not eternal life ex condigno, but onely as they proceed from the grace of the holy Ghost. But Durand in 2. Sent. Dist. 27. qu. 2. refuteth both the tenet and that frivolous distinction. 3. Thomas proveth, that a man cannot understand supernatural things without the light of grace, In 2. Sent. Dist. 28. qu. 1. ar. 5. But Durand on that place striveth for the contrary. 4. Thomas saith, No man in this life without habitual grace, can eschew all and every sin, 1, 2. qu. 109. But Scotus holdeth the contrary. In 2. Sent. Dist. 28. 5. Thomas saith, None without the help of God, can sufficiently prepare himself unto habitual grace, loc. cit. ar. 6. and there he declareth what it is to prepare himself; to wit, to turn unto God; as he which hath his eyes turned from the Sun, prepareth himself to receive the light of the Sun, when he turneth himself unto the Sun. Against this doth Durand dispute, in 2. Sent. Dist. 28. qu. 5. 6. Thomas saith, Grace differeth really from vertue, as the soul from the faculties, in 2. Sent. Dist. 26. qu. 1. ar. 4. Scotus holdeth the contrary on that place. 7. Thomas holdeth, that want of original justice in babes is a sin, ibid. Dist. 30. qu. 1. ar. 2. Durand on that place holdeth the contrary. 8. Thomas saith, Original sin cannot be properly called a quality, or absolute form inclining to ill actions, 1, 2. qu. 82. ar. 1. Gregor. de Armi. On 2. Sent. Dist. 30. qu. 1. ar. 2. teacheth, that according to Augustin, original sin is a positive quality, or carnal concupiscence, by which man is inclined to sin actually. 9. Thomas holdeth, that every action of man, if it be evil, is properly a sin, 1, 2. qu. 21. ar. 1. Gregory in loc. cit. holdeth the contrary. 10. Thomas proveth, that every act of man, as it is an act, is from God, De malo qu. 3. ar. 2. Capreolus on 2. Sent. Dist. 37. qu. 1. ar. 1. bringeth Durand, Gregory, and Aureolus, disputing in the contrary. 11. Thomas teacheth, that to the goodness of an action, is required the goodness of the matter, and of the form and intention. Capreolus on 2. Sent. Dist. 38. bringeth sundry school-men, holding that the goodness of intention is not necessary. 12. Dominicans generally hold, that the Sacraments do work grace after the manner of a knife, cutting and framing a thing, and not a vessel containing grace. But the Franciscans deny all effective power in the Sacraments, but bring the vertue of them from the onely power of God's promise, so oft as the Sacrament is administered. They do agree in the opere operato, and differ in the manner. Concil. Trident. lib. 2. 13. Dominicans held, that the Sacraments of the old Testament did not confer, but onely fore-signific grace which was to be given after the sufferings of Christ. The Franciscans held the contrary, ibid. 14. Thomas par. 3. qu. 75. ar. 4. saith, It is necessary to believe, that the body of Christ is in the Eucharist, by the change of the substance of the bread into it. But Bellarmin De Euchar. lib. 3. cap. 23. saith, Scotus held, that transubstantiation was not thought a doctrine of faith before the Lateran Council; and that there is no express Text of Scripture, which without declaration of the Scripture, can convince one to admit transubstantiation. Certainly the opinion of Thomas was according to the sense of the article which Innocentius the III. did decree; and howbeit the Romanists hold still the word transubstantiation, yet they are all for the most part fallen upon another conceit, that the substance of the bread vanisheth, or is annihilated, and the body of Christ cometh instead of it. And hence ariseth many questions among them, as, whether the body of Christ be eaten with the teeth, and go into the belly? whether the wicked do eat the body of Christ? They who will read any School-man on Lombard, Lib. 4. Dist. 10, 11. will finde many such questions concerning the Sacrament. In a word, all the huge volumes of Thomists and Scotists upon the Sentences, are so many monuments of controversies betwixt antagonists in the Romish Church; as lately Dr. T. Mortan hath proved the Protestant faith by testimonies of these School-men, or (as he speaketh) even the enemies being judges: Therefore all the boasting of Papists concerning the unity of their Church, is indeed but to delude them which are not acquainted with their books. Thus the Church was pitifully divided with these Sects; and when the disciples of these School-men went abroad to preach, one thus, and another the contrary, the people knew not what to believe. And albeit the Popes did tolerate them so long as they stood for the triple Mitre, yet hence we may understand one main cause, why some Bishops and Princes did bewail the confusion in the Church, and after that time wish and cry for a Reformation. To this purpose hear how Pe. Soave in Hist. Con. Trident. lib. 2. reporteth the contest betwixt the Bishops and the Generals of the Friars. On the one side the Bishops did complain, that albeit Christ had commanded to teach the people his doctrine, and that could be no other way but by publick teaching in the Church; and to the end sufficient men might be provided to teach the people, this charge did properly belong unto Bishops; as the Apostles at first shewed the way, and the holy Fathers did follow; yet this charge of so great importance was taken from the Bishops, that no footsteps thereof remain, and that by giving of priviledges, and this is the cause why all things become worse and worse, because Christ's institution is changed. The Universities had immunity, that a Bishop cannot know what they are teaching; the power of preaching is given unto the begging Friars, so that they are free from the Laws of Bishops, and will not let them see what they are doing; and so Bishops are robbed of the chief part of their office. And in the contrary, they which at first were appointed onely to bewail the sins of men, and which by expresse and severe threatnings were forbidden to teach or preach, have now usurped, or as a gift do possess that office as their peculiar onely, in the mean time the flock wanteth a shepheard and hireling too; for these vagring preachers, which skip from one City to another, cannot understand either the necessity of the people, or the capacity of their mindes, and far less the opportunities of teaching and edifying them, so as a constant Pastor might, who living continually with his flock, hath more experience of their infirmities and necessities. Moreover, these preachers have not such an aim to edifie the people, but to bring alms to their own advantage, or of their Convent; and to the end they may make their purchase the more liberally, they look not to the salvation of souls, but onely to their own advantage by flattering, delighting and following the affections of men; and the people learn instead of the doctrine of Christ, nothing but news, or certainly vanity----- The onely remedy of all these evils is, that these priviledges and exemptions be discharged, and the charge of teaching and preaching be restored unto Bishops, and of chusing others to be their helpers in that work. On the other side, the Generals of the Friars said, When Bishops and Curates had neglected their pastoral work, so that in many ages, neither preachings were heard in Churches, nor teaching of Divinity in Schools, at last God did raise up the Orders of begging Friars, to repair the defect of that necessary office, which they had not usurped, but had obtained by the gift of the supream Pastor ; and seeing it belongeth unto him chiefly to feed the flock , it is an injury to aver , that whom he hath appointed to supply their defects, who according to their office should have had care of the flock, and had forsaken it, and medled with the harvest of others; but it is rather true, that unless they had so done in love and charity, there had been ere now no remembrance of Christ's name ; and therefore seeing for the space of three hundreds years and upwards they have waited upon this work , to the manifest benefit of men , and by just title of the Roman high Priests, gifts and prescription of so long time, this is their office; the Bishops have no reason to move any controverſie , or pretend the custom of ancient time, for recovering the office which they had forsaken for so many ages. And what is objected of their enlarging the Monasteries or seeking their own gain, it is a meere calumny , seeing of the alms they did reap nothing but meat and clothes , and what was over, was employed to the service of God , in saying Masses, or in building and decoring Churches, for the benefit of the people; and therefore the offices which have been exercised by these Orders , in the holy Churches and study of Divinity , which scarcely can be found without the Cloisters of Monks , they may justly claim as their own, and should be continued with them , seeing hardly can other sufficient men be had. So far there. If we compare these two discourses , and consider how truly the first describeth the latter times , and the other painteth forth the preceeding time, we may understand the miseries of the Church, and what need there was of Reformation.

Cardinals.

3. It is said before , that Pope Innocentius the III. made a Law , that the election of the Pope should appertain unto the Cardinals onely, whereby their grandure did wax mightily. I will not say , that this was a novation, and a change of the election of the Bishop of Rome ; but now it is time to speak of their beginning , and increase of their honor, and that in the words of Romish Authors. The Jesuit Azorius saith, Some bring their conception from Gregory the I. and some from Silvester the I. and some from Marcellus. Bellarm. de Cleri. lib. 1. cap. 16. alledgeth, that there is mention of Cardinals, in a Councel at Rome , in the days of Pope Silvester the I. but then (as Spalatin. de Repu. Eccles. lib. 4. cap. 5. §. 11. hath observed ex Grego. Registr. & Epist.) Cardinalis was no other but fixed and ordinary , and it was opposed to vagrant and titular Bishops and Priests ; whereas now (saith he) for the most part , or rather all Cardinals are but titulars , and none of them hath an ordinary or settled charge. Ibid. §. 32. Bellarm. loc. cit. saith also, The office of Cardinals consisteth in three particulars : 1. Is the office of a Bishop, or Priest, or Deacon. 2. The election of the Pope. 3. It is to assist the Pope always. In all these, saith he, they have their original from the days of the Apostles ; but he proveth not well. When Pol. Virg. searcheth the invention of things , he passeth not by the invention of Cardinals, in li. 4. ca. 9. Pope Marcellus (saith he) from among the twenty five Parishes that were then at Rome, appointed fifteen of them to be Cardinal [or as they call them improperly Mother-Churches, and the rest were but Chappels or Oratories] for the use of baptism and burial, and this is the very beginning of the Order of Cardinals--- and long after, to be a Cardinal, was no other thing but to have the care of souls. [That which followeth , is commanded to be blotted out by the Index expurgatorius , Printed at Antwerp An. 1561. pag. 70.] But afterwards, when Pope Boniface the III. obtained from the Emperor Phocas the prerogative over all the rest of the Bishops , then the high Priest of Rome, with his Senate of Town-Priests, began to be more advanced above others ; and these Priests to whom these titles were given in old time , and to whom

the cure of Christian souls was committed, began especially to be honored with that name, as proper to the highest Dignity---- In the beginning it was altogether a burthen, and at last the chiefest honor, seeing they are always nearest to the Pope in the administration of the Christian Republick, and unto them was more and more given; and by little and little by jarring of the Emperors and the people of Rome for the election of the Pope, all the right of the election came unto them. So far he. In this last matter, Bellar. loc. cit. is more plain; howsoever these things be so, I confess, saith he, that the Cardinalship was a step unto a Bishoprick, as it is most manifest out of the first book of the life of Gregory, cap. 7. but that order is changed, and Cardinals are preferred unto Bishops; because when the Emperors, and Clergy, and people did chuse the Pope, the Cardinals were not in such estimation; but when onely they began to chuse the Pope, and onely Cardinals were chosen; the dignity of a Cardinal is not without cause more respected. Secondly, The dignity of a Cardinal is advanced, because they were wont to be neither the onely, neither the chief Counsellors of the Pope; for in the first eight hundred years, a national Council of Italian Bishops was gathered, for consultation of the weighty affairs, as is manifest by the Councils; there the chief place was given to Bishops: but when the affairs of the Church of Rome did increase, especially the temporal Princedom in the days of Pipin and Charls the Great, the Councils have been omitted, and all things brought to the Colledge of Cardinals. So he. We saw before how great priviledges Innocentius the III. gave unto this Order, and so did Innocentius the IV. If Peter Damian, Cardinal of Ostia, had seen them so far honored, whereunto would he have compared them, seeing he is bold to extol them so far in his days? What thinkest thou of the Cardinal Bishops (saith he) who principally chuse the Pope of Rome, and do transcend the power of all Bishops, yea of Patriarchs and Primates? to wit, except the Sacrament of the universal Church, these are the eyes of the one stone, that is, of the Roman Church; of whom it is said in Zachary; Behold the stone which I have set before Jeshoshua; upon that one stone are seven eyes; they are the lamp of the one candlestick--- they are the candlesticks in the midst of which Jesus doth walk. Apoc. 2, &c. Baron. Tom. 11. ad An. 1061. nu. 11. at the election of Cardinals, the Pope saith to them, Be ye our Brethren and Princes of the world? Antonin. Flor. sum. Theol. par. 3. tit. 21. cap. 1. §. 2. Pope Pius the II. said to his Cardinals, Ye are my eldest and best beloved children; and ye are honored with most excellent dignity, when ye are called into the Apostolical Colledge; ye shall be our Counsellors, and judges of all the earth---- ye shall be Senators of the City, and like unto Kings; and very hinges of the world, upon whom the door of the militant Church must turn and be governed. Vsser. de Eccles. statu. cap. 4. ex Sac. cerem. Ro. Eccles. lib. sect. 8. cap. 3. Antonius, after his maner, proveth, that the same authority belongeth unto them, loc. cit.

4. In this Century these Friars and Cardinals spared not the blood of God's servants; for Pope Innocentius thought first by disputes and sophistry to bear down the Waldenses, but when he could not that way prevail, he caused his Friars to sting them with fire and sword. An. 1205. he sent the forenamed Dominicus, with Didacus Bishop of Exonia or Uxonia, in Spain, into the County of Tolose; they disputed once at Viride Folium, and again at Axamia. An. 1207. in the City Montie-regalis, the same two, with Fulco Bishop of Tolouse, and Petrus de Castro novo, the Popes Legate, disputed against Arnold hot, Pastor Albigensum, Ponticus Jordanus, Arnold Aurisanus, Philibert Castrensis, and Benedict Thermus. These were the Articles; The Church of Rome is not the holy Church, neither Spouse of Christ, but filled with the doctrine of divels; she is Babylon that John describeth in the Apocalypse; the mother of fornications and abominations; covered with the blood of the Saints. It doth not please the Lord, which pleaseth the Church of Rome; neither Christ nor his Apostles did institute the Mass, but it is the device of man. By consent of both parties, four Laicks were named Auditors; to wit, two noble men, Bernard de Villa nova, and Bernard Arensis; and two of meaner degree, Raymundus Godins, and Arnold Ribertia. When the disputation had continued three days, Fulco sought the space of fifteen days, and he would give the defence of his positions in writing; and Arnold Hotcraved eight days to give his answer in writing likewise. They assembled at the day appointed; and the conferences were prolonged the space of four days; and at last the Bishop said, These things ought to be taken from the Mass, that are not of the Mass: and so they were dismissed; neither was any more done of these controversies, Vsser. ex Vignier. Hist. Eccles. ad An. 1207. There were also other conferences among them. But when the Pope and his Cardinals saw that they could not prevail with disputes, Odo Bishop of Paris easily perswaded the Pope to try them with the sword, An. 1208. The Pope wrote unto Philip King of France for that effect; and proclaimed Indulgences unto all who would take Arms against the Waldenses and Albigenes, even as large as to them who warred against the Mahumetists; and the Pope and the King gave all the lands of the Waldenses, and their goods, unto any who would take them. Raymund Earl of Tolouse was of this number; and was much envied by the Clergy for his devotion, and by Laity for his grandure: he was Cousin-german of King Philip, and Lord of Tolouse, Province, Aquitania, Delphinat, the County of S. Giles, Velnaissen, Ruthen, Cadurcen, Albio, and of other large dominions on both sides of Rhodanus; he had married Johanna, Sister of John King of England, and after her Eleonora, Daughter of Peter King of Arragon, Vsser. in Stat. & Succes. Eccles. ex Guil. Armor. & Bertrand. in gest. Tolos. Of the same profession were the Counts de Foy, de Beders, de Cominees, de Carmain, &c. To the end that Raymund may be the more odious unto the people, the Preachers did slander him of Manicheism; but untruly, saith Bertrand. In the year 1209. were levied in France 22000. men; their General was Simon Earl of Monford, with some of the Preachers and Nobility. They first did set against Biterræ, in which were 100000. men; it pleased God that the persecuters had the upper hand; and when the Soldiers asked the Abbot of Cistercian, what they should do, because they knew not who were Hereticks, and who were not? he answered, Kill all, God knoweth who are his: So they spare neither age nor sex, Cesar. Hist. lib. 5. cap. 21. Many hundreds were burnt, many were hanged, and many thousands were slain in other places, I. Thuan. ad An. 1550. In a word, they prevailed so, that Raymund was robbed of all his lands almost; and went to Rome An. 1215. and promised obedience unto the Church, if the Pope would cause his lands to be restored. Innocentius answered, The expedition was chargeable unto the Church, and unto Simon de Monford; and therefore he had given these lands unto Simon; and it was past the King's confirmation, and could not be recalled; onely he would grant unto Raymund 400. marks yearly, during his life, if he shall continue under obedience. Then Raymund went to Arragon, and levied an Army of 100000. men; and within a year he recovered by strength all his lands. Simon was killed An. 1218. and 22000. men with him; so was his Son Guido An. 1219. Io. de Serres. Then King Philip sent his Son Lewes once and again against Tolouse; but all in vain so long as Raymund lived, and Roger de Foy; both which died within one moneth, An. 1221. His Son Raymund (whether were burnt within the Diocye of Tolouse, eighty were beheaded, and Almericus, Captain of the Castle of Vare, was hanged, and his wife was stoned to death. M. Fox in Act. & Monim. sheweth out of Herm. Mutius, that An. 1212. sundry Noble men and others, in the County of Alsatia, did hold, that every day was free for eating of flesh, if it be soberly; and that they do wickedly, who hinder Priests from lawful marriage. Therefore Innocentius caused an hundred of them to be burnt in one day. Naucerus sheweth, that at the same time were many of the same doctrine at Millan, who sent relief unto their Brethren in Alsatia. An. 1220. William, a Goldsmith, was burnt, because he said, Rome was Babylon, and the Pope was Antichrist. Bale ex Caesar. in dialog. Desiderius à Lombard. at the same time was called Harcfiarcha, because he wrote against the begging Friars. We read of many such other burnings and martyrdoms in other places and times; but the truth could not be burnt, nor overthrowen, nor want her witnesses.

(whether for fear of worldly opposition, or if he left the doctrine which his Father had professed, it is uncertain) offered all obedience unto the Church and King, if they would grant him peace. Almaric, the Son of Simon de Montford, appeareth in the contrary, alledging his Title unto the County of Tolouse--- which was granted unto his Father, and confirmed by the Pope and the King. In the mean time Philip dieth, and left unto Almaric 20000. (some write 100000.) lievers of Paris, for a new expedition against Tolouse; and at last, by perswasion of Romanus, Cardinal de St. Angelo, the Pope's Legat, Lewes VIII. King of France, with Arch-Bishops, Bishops, Abbots, Peers, Barons, and 50000. horse, with a great number of foot (which arose for fear of the King and the Pope's Legate, more then for zeal to the cause, saith Mat. Paris. in Hen. III.) they were marked with the sign of the Cross, against the Hereticks (as they spake) of Tolouse and Avenion (which also belonged unto Raymund) and boasting to destroy all the means and men within his Dominions, An. 1226. They came first to Avenion, craving passage through the Town for shortness of way. The Citizens said, They feared more danger. The King sware he would not rise from siege, till he had taken the City. They had so provided, that within were neither old persons, nor women, nor children; and all beastials were removed, and all the meadows were tilled; that the King had scarcity without, and they within had plenty; so without was dearth, and death (as was reckoned) of 22000. Simon and the Pope's General were killed with stones out of slings. Some of the Nobility crave leave to return, but obtain it not. The King dieth. Romanus causeth his death to be concealed; and after asking a treaty for peace, (which was refused) he craveth that he and the Prelates may enter the City, to try if the wickedness was so great, as the cry thereof was come unto the Pope's ears; and swore that he minded nothing but the salvation of souls: But he contemned his oath, brought in the Army, brake their walls, and slew many of them, Mat. Paris. ad An. 1226. in Hen. III. In the year 1228. Raymund did rout his adversaries in three several battels, idem. Then they invade Tolouse; but so that the yong King was glad to seek peace; and the Earl accepteth it on good conditions. Then the Pope sent the Marshal de la Foy with a fresh Army. King Lewes would not allow it, and said, They should perswade by reason, and not constrain by force, Io. de Serres. When open wars were ended, the Bishops and Friars were busie with burning and hanging; and these broyls were not ended for seventy years, saith Bertrand. Ia. Thuan. in the dedication of his History, telleth summarily the success: They were killed or banished, and scattered hither and thither, but not convicted of errors, nor brought into repentance; some fled into Province, or near unto the Alps; finding lurking holes for their lives and doctrine; some went into Calabria, and their followers abode there until the Papacy of Pius the IV. some settled in Bohem, Poland and Livonia; and of their reliques in Britain, was John Wickliff in Oxford. So Thuan. Wheresoever they went, Satan followed to devour them. And all the Historians of those times shew how they were persecuted; as Vissar. hath marked particularly, loc. cit. ca. 10. Innocentius III. caused the bones of Almaric to be burnt, a learned Bishop at Paris, because he had taught, that no sin is imputed unto man in the state of grace; and Images should not be in Churches; and other twenty four persons, for the same doctrine, An. 1210. Io. Bale Cent. 3. cap. 67. in Appen. sheweth ex Bern. Lutzenburg. that when Dominicus, with twelve Cistercian Monks, was sent against them, the sum of them who were killed in the wars, were 100000. persons, and out of Christ, Massanus. That in the Diocly of Narbon 140. men chose rather to suffer the fire, then accept the doctrine of Rome, An. 1210. And in the next year 400.

5. Guilielmus de Alta Petra, Bishop of Paris, about the year 1220. wrote a book De Clero, wherein he speaketh of the Clergy of his time in this maner; No godliness or learning is seen in them, but rather all divellish filthiness, and monstrous vices; their sins are not simply sins, but monsters of sins; they are not the Church, but Babylon, Egypt, and Sodom; the Prelates build not the Church, but destroy it; they mock God; and they and their Priests do profane the body of Christ; they lift up to the heavens, with all maner of Ecclesiastical honor, the limbs of the diuel, and enemies of God: in a word, they bring Lucifer into the Church of Christ. He taught also that there is no law belonging unto the salvation of man, but the Gospel of Christ.

6. Joachim, Abbot of Curacon in Calabria, about the year 1200. held and taught, that the Pope and his Court were the Antichrist, because they were drowned in simony and luxury; by their wickedness they hindered the Jews and Pagans from converting unto Christ. He wrote propheticall pictures upon the Revelation, with Italian expositions; wherein he sharply taxeth the Pope and his Clergy. In his Commentary on Jeremiah, he saith, The days shall be perillous from the year 1200. until the last times, when the law of liberty shall appear, the Gospel of Christ shall be preached, and the Church shall be purged, as the wheat from the chaff and tares. Pope Innocentius the III. condemned him, as thinking amiss of the Trinity; and saying, that he who believeth the Trinity of persons, and unity of nature or essence, establisheth a quaternity. But as we said, Antoninus sheweth, that the Pope condemned that error as his, but he condemned not himself. And Mar. Luther, in a peculiar Treatise, cleareth this Joachim from all error of the faith in the Trinity, Catal. test. verit. lib. 17. and certainly all is not sure that is set down in the Decretals. M. Fox in Act. & Monim. sheweth ex Roge. Honedem. that when Richard King of England went to Syria, by the way he sent for Joachim to meet him in Sicily, and asked him many things; among the rest, he asked what he thought of the coming of the Antichrist? He began to expound the mystery of the seven Kings in the Apocalypse; these are seven persecutors, Herod, Nero, Constantius; Mahumet, Melfemutus, Saladin and Antichrist; and Antichrist is now sitting in the City of Rome, and in his Apostolical throne; as the Apostle saith, he is an adversary, and exalteth himself above all that is called God: Also he foretold the estate of the Church; all the Church of the Saints shall be hid; for the elect of God; what they know, they shall know it to themselves; so that they will not presume to preach publicly, because of prevailing darkness; not that they will leave to encourage and exhort the faithful privately, but because they will not dare to preach publicly, Vsser. de Eccles. statu. cap. 6. ex Roge. Honen. annal. in Rich. II.

7. Conradus, a Lichtenal, was made abbas Vrspergensis An. 1215. In the History of Henry the V. Emperor, he sheweth, that many at that time did reprove peregrinations and indulgences; and in that place he calleth them a novelty. He writeth many things in favor of Popes, yet the force of truth sometimes prevaieth with them: he condemneth Pope Gregory the IX. for excommunicating the Emperor without just causes, and without all order; he condemneth the Pope for taking Lands from the Emperor in his absence, whereas he had forced him to go away; and for killing some who were signed with the Cross, because they were going to aid the Emperor against the Turks; which, saith he, is most abominable to speak. He made this rhyme of the avarice of Rome. Epephonema ex vita Phil. Imp.

Ex Catalog. test. ver. lib 16. This is expounded of the frequent gadding to Rome in the days of Pope Innocentius the III. See pag. 317. 8. Thore.

8. There is extant a constitution of Lewes, surnamed the blessed, King of France, bearing the date An. 1228. sub tit. de Talis, wherein he regrateth the avarice of Popes, saying, The exactions and grievous burthens of moneys that are laid on the Churches of our Kingdom by the Court of Rome, and whereby the Kingdom is miserably exhausted, and more yet may be by burthens which are said to be lately imposed, We will that these be levied upon no condition, nor gathered, except onely for a reasonable, pious and most urgent, or inevitable necessity; and by our exprefs and willing consent, and with the consent of the Church it self of our Kingdom. At that time the Senate of Paris did present unto John Santroman, the King's Advocate, the Pope's Bull to be read and answered. He replied, saying, The greatest confusion of all things would arise upon the accepting and comprobation of that Bull; for by Authority of such in former times, the people of the Kingdom had in great number gone out of the Kingdom unto Rome; of whom some became slaves or clients to the Cardinals; and some living more liberally, had wasted their patrimony idly; and others in the City or by the way, had perished with the inconvenience of the air and frequent pestilence; and so France was exhausted of subjects, especially of the learned men. He sheweth also, how vast sums of money were carried away for vacancies and avow-fancies of Bishopricks and Abbeyes, and other titles in the Church, so that sometimes ten or twelve Bulls were sold for one Priesthood; and if this custom shall continue, (said he) it shall come to pass, that who hath any store of moneys, will send to Rome and buy a Priesthood unto his Son or Cousin. The Rector of the University of Paris spake to the same purpose; and having protested at length against the Bull, he appealeth from the iniquity thereof unto the next Council. Brut. Fulmen. ex Chronic. Britan. Armoric. lib. 4.

Remiss Simony.

9. And because we have heard a little of the exactions which the Court laid upon the Nations, to make this more clear, I will add from the same Brut. Fulmen. pag. 66, & 67. an example of France; there the Author saith, It is most certain, two sorts of simoniacal merchandise, of those things that are called spiritual, are exercised at Rome by the Pope; one whereby Priesthoods are sold openly without dissimulation, and that is very gainful; another not so lucrative, but no less abominable, which is called Taxa penitentie Apostolice. The names and titles of the former are innumerable; but of such a multitude, the principal are reckoned, The tribute of Annates or vacancies; by this word is understood a years revenue, which is paid unto the holy treasury of the Pope; and these are often doubled or tribled. Item the tribute by premunitions, resignations in favors, commendas, dispensations of age, of order, irregularity, and bodily faults. Item the tribute for the favor of expectations, from devolutions, from Benefices ere they be vacant, for priviledges and exemptions of not visiting, agreements of reconciled persons, transactions that are made with the Pope's good pleasure, for exchange of Benefices with dispensation, Episcopal mandates, expeditions in forma vel ratione congrui, for creating Prothonotaries and Notaries Apostolical, for letters of colleagues or fellow-helpers, for letters of lesser or higher justice; for Dignities Secular and Ecclesiastical, for new foundations or change of the ancients, for reduction of Regular Monasteries into the condition of Secular, for restitution in integrum, for the fruit to be had in time of absence, for legitimations, for porcative altars, for non obstantis, for dispensations to Secular Canons, for revocations and ranversings, for tolerations of concubines, usually termed Toleramus, for rescriptions unto pleas, &c. Of this merchandise is a Papal book, with this inscription, Taxa Cancellarie Apostolice cum Notabilibus juxta stylum hodiernum Curie Romane. In this book is a sentence exprest in these words; And note diligently, that these favors and dispensations are not granted unto poor folks. And what gain is amassed of these particulars, take an example from the grievances of the Parliament of Paris, which they did present unto King Lewes the XI. and which was translated into Latin, and printed three several times cum privilegio Regis. Art. 72. And that we may demonstrate particularly how much the Realm hath been exhausted of moneys within these three years, it is observed, that in the time of Pope Pius, twenty and more Arch-Bishopricks and Bishopricks were vacant within the Realm, and without doubt partly for the annual tribute (which they call Annata) and partly for the accessory and extraordinary charge charges, from every City 6000. crowns were paid; in sum 120000. crowns, Art. 68. More then sixty Abbeyes did vake, whereof each one hath paid 2000. crowns at least; in sum 120000. Art. 74. At the same time Priories, Deanries, Provestries, Preceptories, and such other Dignities which are not honored with the Crosier, were vacant no fewer then two hundred; and for each of these Benefices were paid five hundred crowns; in sum 100000. crowns. Art. 75. It is certain, that in the Realm are at least 100000. Parishes, and there is none of them in which some man hath not obtained some grace or favor expective; and for each one of these were paid 25. crowns; partly for the expenses of the way or journey, partly for writing the Bulls, for the non obstantis, prerogatives, annullations, and other special causes which depend upon these expectative graces; as also for the executorial process that were made upon the same graces; in sum 2500000. crowns. So far the Parliament of Paris. Summa summarum is 2840000. crowns. This was paid in three years. As also it is found, that the tax of vacancies, accounted in the books of the Camera, from Cathedral Churches and Abbeyes in France, do every sixth year amount to the sum of 697750. lievers, besides Prelacies, which are not taxed, and other Benefices, the exactions of which do almost amount unto the same sum----- Pag. 77. There was a book printed at Paris An. 1520. with the priviledge of the Parliament of Paris, on June 6. of the same year, with this title, Taxa Cancellaria Apostolica, & taxa sacra pœnitentiaria item Apostolica, where fol. 36. may be seen the prices and merchandise Apostolical of absolutions. Absolution for a Monk wearing pointed shoes, and a coat tied up, 7. s. Absolutions for a Priest that hath confirmed in marriage persons within degrees forbidden, 7. s. For him that hath known a woman within the Church, and hath committed other villanies, 6. s. For a Priest that hath married persons privily, and hath been present at their clandestin weddings, 7. s. For a Laick who hath stolen holy things out of a holy place, 7. s. For him which hath carnally known his mother, sister, or his kinswomen by blood or marriage, or his godmother, 5. s. For him which hath deflowered a virgin, 6. s. For perjury, 6. s. For a Laick which hath killed an Abbot, or any Priest inferior unto a Bishop, or a Monk, or Clerk, 7, 8, or 9. s. Absolution for the murder of a Laick by a Laick, 5. s. For a Priest, Dean or Clerk, when his supplication is signed with Fiat, 18, or 16. s. For him which hath killed his father, mother, brother, sister, wife, or any kinsman (being a Laick, because if any of them were a Clerk, the murtherer is bound to visit the Apostolical See) 5. or 7. s. For a man that hath smitten his wife, so that thereupon she hath a mischance, or hath brought forth before the time, 6. s. For a woman which hath taken any drink, or done any other thing to destroy her birth after it was quickened in her belly, 5. s. Is not the condition of Christians miserable, and hath need to be bewailed? ---- So that Ela. Blondus lib. 3. Rome instaurate, hath written truly; Now the Princes of the world do adore and worship the perpetual Dictator----- the high Priest----- and all Europe almost sendeth unto Rome now greater tribute, or certainly equal unto ancient times, in so far but as every City do receive Priestly benefits from the Bishop of Rome. So far Blondus. And that this may be understood, I shall adjoyn the words of Suetonius, in the life of Julius Cæsar, where writing of France, he saith, He brought all France into the form of a Province, and laid on them to pay yearly, in name of tribute, four hundred sestertium; and Eutropius, lib. 6. saith the same; which sum, according to the supputation of Budæus de Assè, is 1000000. crowns, or a Million. So far ex Bru. Fulm.

10. When the Latins did reign in Constantinople, the Greek Church was in some manner made subject unto Rome, until the year 1230. at this time the seam-ript coat was rent in sunder, upon this occasion; A certain Bishop was elected unto an Arch-Bishoprick in Greece, and came to Rome to be confirmed, but could not obtain confirmation, unless he would pay a great sum of money unto Pope Gregory the IX. The Bishop detesting simony refuseth; and returning without confirmation, declareth unto the Nobility of the Land the matter as it was; others which had been with him, did testifie the same: Wherefore all the Greeks made a general separation from the Church of Rome. After seven years, Germanus, Patriarch of Constantinople, wrote unto the same Gregory, humbly intreating to advise upon some means of unity, that the truth on both sides being debated by Scriptures, the erring party might be reduced, the slander be removed, and unity be restored; offering also, that notwithstanding his old and feeble age, he would meet him in the middle way. The Pope replieth, Christ said to Peter, Thou art Cephas; & the power of judging the Articles of faith, belongeth unto the Pope lineally. In a word, he refuseth to call the matter into question. Immediately he excommunicateth all the Greek Church; and he chargeth all Christians to take the sign of the Cross, and fight against the Greeks as Turks. Then Germanus wrote again unto the Pope, shewing the incommodities of discord, the naughtiness of his excommunication, and his opposition rather then succession unto Peter; for Peter did instruct all Pastors to feed the flock of God, and to care for it; not by constraint, but of a willing minde; not for filthy lucre, but of readines; not as they were Lords----- As for himself; that did appertain unto him (said he) which is written in chap. 1. of the same Epistle, We rejoyce, though we be in heaviness through manifold tentations. Briefly, he entreateth the Pope to look into Christ's Gospel, and the Epistles of the Apostles, and the Divinity books of ancient writers, that whosoever hath gone astray may be reformed, seeing they both pretend sincerity of faith and doctrine. He wrote also another Letter unto the Cardinals of the Latin Church, shewing the utility of Council, (seeing God giveth not all wisdom unto one man) that men may be united by mutual communication; then exhorting unto unity, as they had been formerly: If we have fallen (saith he) raise ye us up; I mean not a bodily, but a spiritual rising, [at that time they were subject unto the Latins, and he waveth to speak of that liberty] and we shall confess our selves debtors unto you; but if the scandal hath begun at old Rome, read what Paul writeth unto the Galathians, when Peter came into Antiochia, I withstood him to his face, for he was worthy of rebuke; and nevertheless we may holily judge, that that resistance was not a cause of discord, but of searching the truth, and of deeper disputation; for they continued firm in the bond of love, conformable in faith and doctrine, and no way divided with ambition nor avarice; Oh, if we werelike them! Thirdly, He sheweth that the Schism of the Church proceedeth onely from the oppression, tyranny and exactions of the Roman Church; which of a mother, is become a step-dame, and wholly coveteth to make Nations tributary unto her, and to make Kings her vassals; and gapeth after gold and silver, contrary unto St. Peter, who said, Gold and silver have I none. Fourthly, He sheweth what Churches keep the Orthodox faith with the Greek Church; to wit, the Ethiopians, inhabiting the greatest part of the South, Syrians, Iberi, Alani, Gothi, Charari, innumerable people of Russia, and the Kingdom of Bulgaria; all which acknowledge the Greek Church as their mother. He closeth, praying that Christ, who for our sins became man, and is the onely head of the Church, would unite the Greek Church with her sister the Latin Church of old Rome, in wholesome doctrine and brotherly love. When the Pope had read those Letters, he sent an Army unto Constantinople, under the sign of the the Cross, to fight against the Greeks, Mat. Paris. ad An. 1237. Then Germanus and the Patriarch of Antiochia, did excommunicate the Pope in their several Synods: Among other Articles, contrary unto the Bishop of Rome, they did consent, that Antioch should be preferred unto Rome; because Peter sat there, and was but crucified at Rome. Idem ad An. 1238. Is it any doubt then, which of the two Churches can with good reason be called Orthodox, seeing the one sought to be tried by the Scriptures, and the other would not?

11. In the last Diet of Germany, gathered at Regensburgh, against Pope Gregory the IX. and his Legate Albert, Eberhard Bishop of Salzburgh, had a Sermon, which is in Arventin. Annal. lib. 6. and is repeated by many; the sum is: After the preface, concerning love as the badge of Christians, whereby they should be distinguished from the Soldiers of the infernal Jupiter, he saith, Christ our Savior, Lord and God, hath often forewarned us to take heed of false Christs and false Prophets, who being covered with a sheeps skin, that is, a Christian name, and title of high Priest, seek to domineer over us, and to deceive us; he hath taught us to know them by their thorns and works of avarice, luxury, contention, hatred, envy, wars, miseries of discord and ambition: by such words, what hath the heavenly Emperor more clearly pointed at, then the Pharises and Scribes of Babylon? unless we be blinde, we may see a most cruel wolf under a sheeps skin, the title of the high Priest; the Romish Priests [Flamines] take Arms against all Christians; by daring and deceiving, and raising wars after wars, they are become great; they kill and massacre the sheep; they thrust peace and concord from the earth---- they bring all men low, that they may devour all men, and bring all men into slavery; they provide not for the good of the flock as a shepherd should do---- righteousness faileth, but impiety, covetousness, ambition, and lust waxeth; the weak and good men are a prey unto the wicked, and onely bad men are wealthy. Christ forbad to hate our enemies, and commanded to love them, & by doing them good to engage them; but contrarily, the Romanists do violate holy things; when they have sworn into a covenant, they abuse the name of God, and deceive men; they are ingrateful unto their benefactors, and recompense good with evil deeds; and with great shew of piety they deceive, betray, strive and fight: they will have us to resist divine Majesty, heavenly providence, nature, and the supream power which God hath ordained. A hundred and seventy years since Hildebrand did first, under shew of Religion, lay the ground of Antichrists Kingdom, he first began this unhappy war, which hitherto hath been continued by his Successors; first they did exclude the Emperor from their Pontifical Assemblies, and transferred them unto the people and Priests; then they deluded the people, and excluded them also; now they would make us slaves, that they may reign alone; and when they have tasted of Imperial dignity, and know both their own and their adversaries power, they will pretend the specious shew of erecting the liberty of the Church, to domineer and oppress Christian liberty. Believe what ye see, they will not cease until the Emperor be brought under, the honor of the Roman Empire be destroyed, true shepherds who would feed the flock be oppressed, the dogs who can bark, be out of the way, and then they will turn all things topsie turvy, and domineer over us whether we will or not---- The supream Majesty took on him the form of a servant, and did serve his disciples when he washed their feet; but those Flamines of Babylon will nothing but reign, and cannot endure an equal; they will not cease until they have trod all under their feet, and sit in the Temple of God, and be exalted above all that is worshipped; their hunger of riches, and thirst of honors, is unsatiable:

gainst the

the more ye give unto the avaricious, he coveteth the more-----licence maketh us all the worse; he who is the servant of servants, will be Lord of Lords, as if he were a God; he despiseth the holy assemblies and counsels of his Brethren, yea, of his Lords; he feareth that he be called to account for what he doth dayly against laws and good order; he speaketh great things, as if he were God; he hath new purposes in his head, to set up an Empire unto himself; that wicked man (whom they usually now call Antichrist) in whose forehead is written the name of blasphemy, I am God, I cannot err, changeth laws, establisheth his own, spoileth, defraudeth, killeth, and sitteth in the Temple of God, domineering far and wide---- As in the days of the ancient Sibylla, Hydaspes, that most ancient King, hath under the name of a prophecying childe, told the prosperity, and named the Romans long before Troy was; and Prophets have foretold in dark words, that every one cannot understand: The majesty of the Roman people, by whom the world was governed, is now away, and the power hath returned into Asia; the East shall rule again, and the West shall be a servant; Kingdoms are multiplied; the highest power is, I will not say torn, but dissolved and broken into many--- the Emperor is but a title, and onely a shadow; now there be ten Kings together, who have taken their part of the ancient Roman Empire, not to rule it, but to destroy it. Those ten horns (which St. Augustine could not understand) the Turks, Greeks, Egyptians, Africans, Spaniards, French, English, Germans, Italians, and Sicilians, do possess the Roman Provinces; and a little horn is grown up among them, which hath eyes, and a mouth speaking great things; especially it compelleth three of these Kingdoms, to wit, of Sicily, Italy, and Germany, to serve it--- What is more clear then this prophesie? &c.

12. Petrus de Vineis, Chancellor of the Emperor Frederick the II. wrote six books of Epistles, which were printed in the year 1566. some of them are inserted in Catalog. test. veru. lib. 16. He wrote many in name of the Emperor, unto several Princes: The second Epistle of the first book he directed unto the Kings and Princes generally, exhorting them, that they obey not the Pope and his Cardinals, who feed upon the alms of the poor, and oppress the children of the Church: The following ages (saith he) may be wise, when they know what hath been before them; and as the wax receiveth impression from the signature, so mortal men are framed by example. O that I had tasted of such happiness, that Christian Princes had left unto us such timely warning, as we from the experience of our wounded Majesty do leave unto you; the Clergy, who are made fat by the alms of the poor, do oppress the children; when they are ordained Apostolical Fathers, though they be the children of our subjects, yet forgetting their fatherly duty, will not vouchsafe to reverence Emperor nor King. What is spoken in borrowed words, is clear by the presumption of Pope Innocent the IV. for in a general Council (as he calleth it) he durst pronounce a sentence of deposition (which he cannot maintain without a strange prejudice of all Kings) albeit I was neither summoned, nor convicted of any fraud or offence. What cause have ye all, and every King of every Countrey, to fear from the wrath of such a Prince of Priests? It is not enough that he attempteth to dethrown us, albeit we, by the power of God, were crowned after the election of the Princes, and approbation of the whole Church and people, living in the Religion of Christian faith; and albeit in respect of the Imperial Diadem, no rigor can be exercised against us, even though lawful causes were proved against us; but the abuse of that Priestly power would so overthrow us, that we should be neither first nor last. And this indeed ye do, when ye obey them who counterfeite holiness, and their ambition ambition hopeth to swallow you all. O that your simple credulity would beware (as Christ hath warned) of that leaven of the Scribes and Pharisees! how many filthinesses of that Court might ye abhor, which shame and dishonesty will not suffer me to name? truly the wealthy revenues, wherewith they are enriched, to the impoverishing of many Kingdoms, have made them mad; among us Christians are become beggars, that the Patavens may be fed among them; ye bring down your own houses, that ye may build up your adversaries houses there--- It hath been our care that those things should be written for you, albeit not declaring sufficiently what I wish; but other things I will acquaint you with in a more private way, to wit, to what uses your prodigality may employ the riches of the poor. What can be done in chusing an Emperor, unless peace, which we intend by able mediators to establish, be at least superficially restored betwixt us and the Church? what may we intend concerning the common and particular affairs of all Kings? &c. In Epist. 3. he saith, It is no where found, that by any Law of God or man, the high Priest of Rome may at his pleasure transfer the Empire, or judge Kings or Princes, by depriving them of their temporal Kingdoms; for albeit according to the Law of men, or of custom, our consecration belongeth unto him. yet he hath no more power to deprive us, then the Prelates of any other Nation, who after their custom, do consecrate and anoint their Kings. In Epist. 13. unto the King of France; It is notorious, and the world cannot hide it, how that Apostolical Father hath impugned our innocency with both the swords; for while at his command we were passing over sea, he (our adversary and enemy) invaded the Kingdom of Sicily, and hath spoiled it many ways; then after our returning into the Kingdom, by the manifold intercession of the Alman Princes, a peace was made with the Church; and though I did my service, yet that Apostolical man laid his hands more heavily upon us, and proprio motu; without any cause on my part, he hath devised whatever could be devised to our ruine; and by proclaiming the sentence of excommunication against us, and by his Missives and Nuntios, he publisheth unto all men the titles of defaming us. Lastly, To supplant us, he, aspiring as it were to build the tower of Babylon against the fort of David, hath called all the Prelates he could unto a particular Council, so aiming to set the East before the North; but the wondrous providence of God; by whom we live and reign, beholding the purpose of so great iniquity, and turning his thoughts into nothing, hath brought the Cardinals and Prelates, both of France and some other Nations, into our hands, whom (many others being drowned in the sea) we keep fast as our enemies----- Let not your Highness marvel [scilicet Augustus tenet in Augusto] that Cæsar keepeth in prison the Prelates of France, who would have imprisoned Cæsar. In Epist. 21. unto the King and Peers of France, he saith, Lift up your eyes round about, hearken with your ears, ye sons of men, and behold the general scandal of the world; lament the division of Nations, and the general decay of justice, and wickedness proceeding from the Elders of Babylon, who heretofore seemed to rule the world, but now they turn judgement into bitterness, and the fruits of righteousness into wormwood. In Epist. 31. unto all Prelates, he saith, A Pharisee anointed with the oyl of wickedness above his fellows, the Roman high Priest of our time, sitting in the chair of perverse doctrine, endeavoreth to destroy what is warranted from above; he intendeth to eclipse the rays of our Majesty, and turning truth into a fable, he sendeth his Letters into divers parts of the world full of lyes, accusing the purity of our faith at his pleasure, and not with reason. He, who is a Pope by name onely, hath written, that we are the Beast rising out of the Sea, full of the names of blasphemy; and we do aver, that he is the Beast, of which it is said, Another red horse came out of the Sea, and he who sitteth upon him, taketh away peace from the earth--- for from the day of his promotion, that father, not of mercies, but of discords, a diligent procurer of desolation, not of consolation, hath turned all the world into scandals; and, to use his own word in the right sense, he is the great Dragon, who deceiveth all the world; he is the Antichrist, whose forerunner he calleth us; he is another Balaam, hired for a reward to curse us; he is the Angel coming out of the bottomless pit, having the vials full of bitterness, &c. By these few passages it may appear, what good and learned men have thought of the Pope.

Philip King of France his Letter to the Cardinals.

13. In the first Book of Epistles, written by the now named Petrus de Vineis, the 34. is in name of Philip King of France, directed unto the Cardinals, concerning the election of the Pope; there he saith, What provoketh them unto discord? greediness of gold and ambition; for they think not what is expedient, but what they would have; they make more account of their particular interest, than the publique; and wickedly prefer their gain unto honesty; how then shall they rule others, who cannot rule themselves? who hurt their friends, and do good to their enemies, and in the end catch nothing unto themselves? The Court of Rome was wont to be glorious in knowledge, maners and vertue, and were not provoked with the menaces of fortune, because they thought they were safest under the protection of vertue then of chance; but now it cannot be called, Curia sed cura, a Court, but care; they love a mark of money better then Mark's Gospel; a salmon better then Solomon--- they love honor, and eschew a burthen; they love to be advanced, but neglect the profiting of their subjects in piety--- such cannot be called shepherds, but rather impious wolves; by whose perfidiousness the holy Mother the Church is trod under foot, faith is undone, hope is put away, and love is pulled up by the roots.

Contention
of the Sorbo-nists against the Minorites.

14. In the year 1253. was great contention between the Masters of Sorbon in Paris, and the preaching Friars, who were so increased in number and honor, becoming the Confessors and Counsellors of Kings, that they would not be subject unto the former Laws and Customs. The School-men convened, and were content to want somewhat of their weekly portion, to satisfie the Court of Rome, from which the Friars had obtained their privileges, or (as Mat. Parisen. in Henri. IV. speaketh) their horns: after the wasting of a great deal of money, and much travel bestowed on both sides, some Customs of the University were changed, and a kinde of agreement was made. In the next year the contention was hotter, and the Friars would multiply their number in despite of the University and City; the King and City would have preserved the Custom of the School, but the Friars had more favor with the Pope, because of their great service unto the Court, and they carried the victory, and the Pope ordained, that they might teach Divinity, without account of the former order concerning the number. In time of this contention, the Friars published a book, with the title of The eternal Gospel, whereof John de Parma, an Italian Monk, was said to be the Author. On the other side, four Masters of the University set forth another, Of the danger of the last times; one of the four was William de Sancto Amore; and therefore the Friars called the favorers of that book Amorei. In this book the Masters say, Now there be fifty five years since some have attempted to change the Gospel of Jesus Christ into another Gospel, which they call the Gospel of the holy Ghost; and when he cometh, the Gospel of Jesus Christ shall be abolished, as we are ready to prove by that accursed book. *1a. The eternal Gospel.

Nec.

Nic. Eimeric. direct. Inquisi. par. 2. qu. 9. sheweth some passages of that cursed Gospel. 1. The eternal Gospel is better then the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and all the Old and New Testaments. 2. The Gospel of Christ is not the Gospel of the Kingdom, and therefore it cannot edifie the Church. 3. The New Testament is to be annulled, as the Old was annulled. 4. The New Testament shall continue in power but for six years next to come, to wit, until the year of incarnation, 1260. 5. They who live after that year, shall be in the estate of perfect men. 6. Another Gospel shall succeed unto the Gospel of Christ, and another Priesthood unto his Priesthood. 7. None are simply fit to teach men in spiritual and eternal things, but such who walk bare-foot, &c. Many other Articles are in that place now cited. The people began to despise the Friars, refused to give them alms, and called them hypocrites, successors of Antichrist, false prophets, flatterers, and wicked counsellors of Kings and Princes, contemners and supplanters of their Ordinaries, defilers of Royal beds, abusers of confessions, &c. Mat. Paris. ad An. 1256. where it is also written, that both those parties sent their Commissioners unto the Court at Anagnia: both the books were censured; and Pope Alexander ordained, that the book of the eternal Gospel should be burnt, but privily, and so far as might be, without discredit of the Friars. But the Pope was the more offended at the other book, because it was written against the religious Friars; therefore he published a Decree to this purpose: Some, professing to have the knowledge of the Scriptures, but straying from the way of the true sense, have plotted wickedness, and have uttered very great iniquity against the innocent and upright--- they have reviled their brethren, and laid stumbling blocks before the beloved children of their Mother the Church--- they have made a book, not of instruction, but derogation; not admonishing, but biting--- and because the book is a seminary of great scandal, and hath bred much trouble and damage to souls, and hath hindered believers from former devotion, and their wonted giving of alms, and from entering into that Religion; therefore that book, which beareth the title; Traclatus brevis de periculis novissimorum temporum, we condemn as wicked and execrable---- commanding, that whosoever shall have that book, he shall burn it within eight days after sight of this our Sentence; and pronouncing the sentence of excommunication against all that shall despise this our command, &c. That book was burnt quickly at Anagnia.

15. Hugo Barchinonensis, Cardinal S. Sabinae, wrote many books at that time. In his preface before Joshua, he reckoneth the Canonical Books as they be in the Hebrew and Greek Testaments; among the Apocrypha he putteth Ecclesiasticus, Wisdom, Maccabees, Judith, because, saith he, they are doubtful. On the Prologue of Jerome, before the books of the Kings, he saith, The Church receiveth the Apocrypha books, not for proof of faith, but instruction of maners. Here it may be marked, that as yet, yea and until the Council of Trent, the books of Maccabees, and such others, were not accounted Canonical; as also witnesseth Pererius in Daniel. lib. 16. and others whom I have named elsewhere. As for the 47. Canon of the third Council at Carthage, from which Bellarmin. de verbo Dei. lib. 1. would derive the Authority of the Divine Canon; Baronius ad An. 397. testifieth, It was not a Canon of that Synod; so saith Binius Annotat. in Conc. Carthag. 3. I return to Hugo; on Psal. 77. he saith, Many Clerks are the generation of vipers--- they persecute their Mother the Church, and so far as they can, they slay Christ their Father. On Matth. 16. Upon this rock, i.e. upon this foundation, and that rock is Christ, 1 Cor. 10. none can lay another foundation, but that which is laid, even Christ Jesus, On 2 Tim. 3. All Scripture, that is, the holy Scripture, which containeth all things necessary unto salvation, is perfect; therefore it hath the privilege to be called, The Scripture, by an antonomasia. Catalog. test. ver. lib. 16. Pope Alexander deposed him, Naucler. gener. 42.

16. Humbert de Romania, fifth General of the Dominicans, about the year 1250. wrote a book De ratione tollendi schisma inter Græcos & Latinos. In par. 2. cap. 11. he saith, The cause of the Schism, was the intolerable burthens of Popes, in exactions, excommunications, and statutes. Catalog. test. ibid.

Germany a-
Pope.

17. Pope Honorius the IV. sent John, Bishop of Tusculo, into Germany, to exact from all Bishops, Priests and Abbots, the fourth part of all their substance for five years, unto the maintenance of his Soldiers against Peter King of Aragon: For this cause a frequent Assembly convened at Wirtzburg; the Emperor Rodolph came there: When the petition was propounded, the Elector of Colcin refusing, did appeal unto a general Council: when he was alledging his reasons, the Legate interrupted, and threatened him with the Pope's curse: Then all the Priests and Monks scoffed at the Legate, and began to buffet him, that if the Legate had not commanded his Marshal to convey him away, he had not escaped with his life. Then Probus, Bishop of Tull. said, How long, most dear Colleagues, shall those vultures of Romulus abuse our patience, I will not say, our foolishness? how long shall we endure their wickedness, avarice, pride and luxury? this most wicked sort of Masters of Synagogues will not cease, till they bring us all into poverty and wretched slavery: By our jars, this malady waxeth; by our differences, these rogues are safe; so long as they command, we shall never have peace nor piety: Lately they raised the Saxons and Suevians one against the other; those instruments of Satan, or Antichrists, have sown the seeds of discord in Germany. When Conradin, a yong man of very good hope, was seeking (according to the Law of nature) the inheritance of his Fathers, they circumvented him with fraud, and killed him most cruelly. [He rehearseth many such tricks done by the Popes; then he saith] As twelve years ago Gregory the X. dealt with the tenths, the same will Honorius the IV. do with the fourths: That he might strip us of our gold, he armed the Turks against us; and this Pope is more desirous of tribute, then of our welfare. Those Satans speak of light, and intend darkness, to deceive the people; and that they regard not Christ our Lord and God, their aims and works, unless we be blinde, do prove, the issue sheweth, and the holy Scriptures describeth, Wherefore Fathers, devoted to Christ, awaken, provide against these calamities---- I am not ignorant what this Tusculan is, I know the man; he is gold thirsty, a false usurer, a vile slave of money; I fear not his menaces; I appeal unto the Senate of Christendom, &c. All the Assembly approved what he had said, and nothing was done for the Pope. Wherefore Probus was accused at Rome; but in the greater estimation at home, and with all good men. Ph. Mornay. in Myster. ex Aventin. lib. 7.

Carmelites.

18. Nicolaus de Biberach, General of the Carmelites, lived about the year 1270. he bewailed with tears the corrupt estate of his Order. Whereas in the wilderness they did attend constantly on prayer, reading and handy works, now (said he) since they dwell in Cities, under their mother hypocrisie, their study is ease, idleness, lust and luxury. When he had bestowed his time five years in that charge, and with grief saw no amendment, he wrote a book against them, which he called, Ignem sagitta, and returned into a Desert about the mount Ewatrof. In that book he calleth them step-sons, reprobates, cauterised vagabonds, prattlers, unhappy counsellors, wicked discourfers, Citizens of Sodom, despisers of the best Testament, the tail of the dragon, drawing down the third part of the stars from heaven, and casting them on the earth, Revel. 12. In chap. 5. he saith, Tell me, what new religion is this in your Cities? from morning until even, ye run two and two thorow the streets, and he is your leader, which goeth about roaring, and seeking whom he may devour; and so that prophesie, The wicked walk in a compass, is most true of you; for the chief purpose of your gading, is not to visit the fatherless, but yong women; not widows in heaviness, but wanton maids. Nuns, and Mistresses; and each cast their eyes on another, and words of lustfulness, corrupting good manners, enflaming the hearts, &c. That is not pure religion--- Wo is me, my dear friends, seeing ye are wrapped in the clay of the world, why think ye that ye are not defiled? 1. Bale. Cent. 4. §. 42. in Appe. 2. In another Treatise, that he calleth Occultus, he writeth, that he had been at Rome; and had seen their feigned flatteries unto strangers and learned men; and had heard their oaths with Judas kisses, that faith was like spices, rare and dear; that the Pope and his Court did draw all things unto them; they were worse then Pharaoh, thieves and robbers, always in womens bosomes.

19. John Semeca, Provost of St. Stevens in Halberstad, and Doctor of the Laws, did first with Herculean courage (saith Erant. in Saxon. lib. 8. cap. 27.) attempt to write a Gloss on the Decrees, which none before him had done, nor could any after him do better. When Pope Clement the IV. did require from the Clergy the tenth through France and Germany, for redemption of the holy Land, this John did publish an Appeal in the contrary; and the Pope did excommunicate him, and deprive him of his Provostry, for his presumption, as he said: But many great men in Germany, did judge that John was not the worse man, or to be forsaken; and death did prevent the evils that were thought to have followed; for both the Pope and John lived not long thereafter. Ibid. This Glossa of Semeca, was in high account until the time of the Council at Trent; but after that time, the Popes, Pius the V. and Gregory the XII. have put several censures on it. Jo. Pappus hath collationed their censures, and published them Argentorati An. 1609. out of which Edition I have marked these. Coll. VII. Dist. 9. cap. 11. Sana quippe, ver. Cum ergo, he saith, In the Canonical Scripture nothing can be found that agreeth not with Divine Laws, and Divine Laws consist with nature; this is manifest, whatsoever is contrary unto Divine and Canonical Laws, is contrary unto natural Law. The Edition of Pope Pius, ordaineth these words to be left out; and the Gregorian blottereth them not, but addeth on the margin. See above Dist. 6, &c. X. Dist. 16. cap. 1. Canones. And among the Apocrypha, that is, books without a certain Authority, as, the Wisdom of Solomon, the book of Jesus the Son of Sirach, which is called Ecclesiasticus, and the books of Judith and Tobias, and the book of Maccabees; these are called Apocrypha, and yet are read, but perhaps not generally. The Edition of Pius biddeth blot all these words until Clementis exclusively; the Gregorian hath the whole Gloss, but noteth on the margin: I, but these books are not Apocrypha, but Canonical, albeit in ancient times some Catholicks doubted of them. XI. Dist. 17. cap. 6. Concilia. The Roman Church hath her Authority from Councils. The censure of Pius saith, Blot away these words; as also in the margin these words, The Pope from the Councils, &c. But the Gregorian keepeth the words of the Gloss, and omitteth the margin. And in the same Gloss, where it is said, The Roman Church hath primacy principally from the Lord, and secondarily from Councils: Gregory will have it in the margin thus; Councils give not properly the primacy unto the Roman Church, but declare what is given by the Lord. XVI. Dist. 17. cap. 3. His igitur. In all the Sacraments Simony is committed, except marriage perhaps, because in it the grace of the holy Ghost is not given; as 3 2. q. 2. Connubia. The censure of Pius putteth away these words; and it followeth in the Gloss, But in other Sacraments it is given: Pius saith, Put away other. And where the margin hath, I allow not this saying, because---- Pius saith, Put away all that. But the Gregorian retaineth the Gloss wholly, and setteth another margin thus; The Sacrament of marriage also giveth grace; nor doth the alledged text serve the purpose. XVIII. Dist. 25. cap. 3. Vnus, ad ver. Quia facile, And because we may confesse unto a Laic, even albeit a Priest be at hand; but we shall not confesse mortal sins, save unto a Priest, so that one may be had, or else we may confesse them unto a Laick. The censure of Pius putteth away all these words, as also the margin, where it is said, We may confesse unto a Laick. But the Gregorian retaineth the Gloss; and for the margin setteth these words, We may not confesse venial nor mortal sins unto a Laick sacramentally, but unto a Priest. XX. Dist. 26. cap. 2. Acutius, ad ver. Significat. And so a Bishop is a Sacrament, even as the water it self. The censure of Pius putteth away all these. But Gregory retaineth the Gloss; and addeth in the margin, Neither the Bishop nor the water is properly a Sacrament. XXIV. Dist. 50. ca. 14. Et purgabit, ver. Domo, i. e. sacerdotibus, For all evils have flowed from Priests, 24. quest. 3. Pius putteth away all these words, as also the margin, which saith, All evils from Priests. But Gregory retaineth the Gloss; and for the margin, saith, See the Gloss cited in that Chapter. Now the cited Chapter is from Jerome, on Hos. 9. where he saith, When I have searched ancient Histories, I cannot finde that any hath rent the Church, and seduced people from the house of the Lord, but these whom God hath appointed to be Priests and Prophets, i. e. watch-men; these therefore have been turned into winding snares, and have laid scandals in all places. LVII. De penitentia Dist. 1. in princ. Vtrum Gloss. ver. eod. But whatsoever Bas. saith, say thou, That neither by contrition of the heart, nor by confession of the mouth are sins forgiven, but onely by the grace of God. Pius putteth away all these words. Gregory retaineth the words, but noteth in the margin, or rather perverteth, thus, Onely God forgiveth sins, but by the merit of Christ, and the ministry of the Priests; and in the penitent he requireth contrition, (at least attrition, which by vertue of the keys, becometh contrition) confession and satisfaction. LIX. Ibid. cap. 5. Magna, ver. dimiserit, Remission of sin goeth before contrition of heart; for one cannot confesse truly, unless he first have faith working by love. Pius putteth away all these words. Gregory retaineth them, and in the margin addeth two corrections; one at the word, goeth before; yea, remission is the effect of contrition. S. Tho. 4. Dist. 17. ar. 1. q. 1. another at the word, Confesse; one confesseth truly and profitably with attrition onely. LXIV. Ibid. ver. Iustificeris, That thou mayest be justified in respect of others, not in respect of God, with whom thou art justified. Pius putteth away all these words. Gregory putteth them not away, but in the margin he saith, Yea, Gratian bringeth this to shew, that neither with God is any justified without confession of the mouth. De consecratione, LXXVII. Dist. 2. cap. 22. Tribus gradib. ver. Miscere, It is certain, when the species [elements] are broken with the teeth, so soon is the body of Christ taken up into heaven. Pius putteth away these words. Gregory putteth them not away, but saith in the margin, The body of Christ abideth so long as the species abide, which goeth down into the belly, and do nourish. There be many other alterations of that Gloss; all which do shew, how the Church of Rome changeth from it self so oft.

20. Elias rubeus Tripelianensis wrote seven books, which he called Semidia-lia; he writteth there first against the Idolatry of the Gentiles, and then against the vices of all estates. When he cometh to the Clergy, he taxeth their superstition, stitution, prodigality, pride, and abominable enormities arising from their usurpation or abuse of alms. Lib. 4. he saith, If we will truly cleave unto the truth, we can speak no good of the universality of them without a lye. Catalog. test. ver. lib. 17.

21. Marnard Count of Tirolis, took the Castle of Trent from Henry then Bishop, and compelled him to leave that See. When Henry was dead, Pope Nicolaus the IV. sent into his place Philip Mantuan, a Franciscan, and caused him to excommunicate the Count. Marnard by open proclamation publisheth his Apology, that he had not raised, but repulsed wars; that nothing was more dear unto him then peace, especially with Bishops; but they, which should be holy Fathers, are corrupt with love of the world, and have bereft him of his ancient patrimony: If any would assure him, that the Bishops shall not wrong him nor his hereafter, he will render all that he hath taken from them; otherwise he will not be such a fool, to quit his inheritance unto these effeminate Antichrists and prodigious eunuchs; none did trouble the common peace as they do; they are not readers of Scriptures, nor teachers of people, but fathers of bastards, wine-bibbers, avaricious, usurpers of Lands and Kingdoms: If they be not Antichrists, what are they? worse are they then Turks, or Tartars, or Jews, and do more offend Christian simplicity; whereas they are our inferiors, they would have us to be their servants, against the Law of God and the Nations--- and therefore, said he, I appeal from the cruel and unjust high Priest, unto our true Pastor and Divine Father. Catalog. test. ver. lib. 17. ex Aventi. lib. 7.

An appeal
Pope,

22. When Pope Nicolaus the IV. did advance the Minorites, An. 1294. the University of Paris had a meeting against them; the Bishop Ambianensis had the Semon; his text was, The Lord is near unto all that call upon him in truth. There he declared a three-fold truth, of life, of doctrine, and of righteousness; The Friars have none of these; not of life, for their hypocrisy is notorious; not of doctrine, because in words they teach pleasant things, but they carry gall in their hearts; not of righteousness, because they usurp the charge of the office, and Benefice of others, the Priests.

no truth.

23. We have often heard, how the Popes were busie to send Christian Princes into Syria; their aim was the enriching and enlarging the See of Rome, and the event was the shedding of Christian blood. The particular exploits fill up volumes; but the general may be understood partly by what is touched already; I will summarily add an example or two more. In the year 1220, when Pope Honorius had excommunicated the Emperor, many Princes and Bishops went thither: The Pope's Legate, Pelagius, would be General Commander; wherefore John, King of Jerusalem, withdrew himself and his Army; and these fresh Soldiers would not be marshalled by a Bishop: Then the Legate, seeing he could do nothing without the presence of a King, sent Letters, intreating him to have compassion on the Christian Army. The King (as a wise man, saith Io. Naucler. generat. 41.) considering, howbeit it was not honorable that such affairs should be managed by Priests, yet to satisfy the commands of the Roman Church, he gathereth the Christians in Syria, and marched to Damietta. When he was come, his advice was, that it was not expedient at that time to go into the fields, because about that season Nilus is wont to overflow. The Legate was impatient of delay, and threatened them all with excommunication who would speak in the contrary. The Army was about 70000. men. The Sultan would not fight, but stoppeth their passage until Nilus did overflow the Land; and the Christians were brought into that extremity, that they could neither continue nor march; and so were forced to quit Damietta unto the Sultan, if he would let them return to Aca and Tirus; and he [to satisfy their superstition] gave them a piece of Christ's Cross, which he had brought from Jerusalem. The Venetians, Genoways, Pisanes, and others within the Town, hearing of this agreement, refuse to give over the Town; and the Army did threaten them to deliver Aca unto the Saracens, if they would not leave Damietta according to the agreement; now many of them had their families in Aca: so Damietta was lost. After the loss of Tripolis, Beritus, Tirus and Sidon, Pope Nicolaus the IV. stirreth up the Christians to go unto the defense of Ptolemais; but they had no government nor discipline, and so did more harm then good; for the Patriarch of Jerusalem, the Masters of the Templarii, Hospitalarii, and Teutonici, and the Kings of Cyprus and Sicily, strove for the command; and when they were at this dissention, the Sultan invadeth them; and they left it, 196. years after it was conquered by Godifrid, saith Io. Naucler. gener. 44. and of all the purchase then, no place was in the power of Christians, but Cyprus and Cilicia.

Of the Tartars.

24. The Christians could not prevail against the Turks, yet God stayed the Infidels, that they could not make new invasions against the Christians at that time; for the Scythians, or Tartars, came out of the North like grasshoppers for multitude, saith Nic. Gregoras; and Matth. Parisien. saith, in infinite multitudes; they divide themselves in their own countreys; the one party went against the Turks in Asia, about the year 1220. and the other under Bato (saith Platin. in Innocen. IV. Matth. Paris. calleth him Bathcharcan) came into Europe, overran Russia; Polonia, Bohem, Hungaria, &c. with so many and huge calamities, that the like was not heard from the beginning of the world, saith Matth. Paris. ad An. 1241. When the Emperor Frederick went against them, they fled through Bulgaria and Thracia into Asia, and joyned with the other party at Iconium, the Palace of the Turks: Nic. Gregoras saith, John Ducas, Emperor of the Greeks, received ten thousand of them, and gave them Lands in Macedonia and Phrygia, to be in readines against his adversaries. These did prevail mightily against the Turks, and took many of their Lands, and made up a vast Kingdom in Asia, and called their Prince Chan or Cham. About the year 1250. the Cham Mango, by perswasion of Hyatho King of Armenia, was converted to Christian profession. His Brother Chaolon conquered all the Kingdom of Persia, and vanquished the Calipha of Babylon; he overran all the Lands about Jerusalem, but spared to come near the City, at the request of Hyatho. The third Cham was Mango; and after him Cobila, or Gobelus, kept the faith and Kingdom forty two years. The Successor of Hyatho made apostasie, and called himself Mahumet Cham; and the Son of Cobila forsook the faith. Then Cothos Melechmeses, Sultan of Egypt, slew him in a battel, and drove all the Tartars out of Syria; they had their refuge unto Armenia. Benedectar, Sultan of Egypt, hunted them, and conquering that Land, called himself King of Armenia. Argon, the Brother son of Mahumet Cham, took his Uncle, and cut him in the middle with a saw; and by agreement with the Sultan, was King, and kept the faith. Cusan, the Nephew of Cobila, was also a Christian, and had nothing so dear as to advance the faith; in singular wisdom he kept peace with his neighbors, and obtained great victories against the Sultan of Egypt, and conquered all Syria about the year 1320. In his Son's time both the faith and power of the Tartars failed; for the Sultan of Parthia entered into Persia, and the house of Otoman overcame all the rest of Asia unto Pontus; and the Tartars were rooted out of all their conquest about the year 1350. their power continued about 130. years. This History, and the Greek article of the accusative case in Revel. 20. 7. τις γὰρ ἐκ τῶν πύλων, give give occasion to consider, whether these words, and the verse following, be not a prediction of this their Empire and their Apostasie, rather then of any instruments of Satan in pursuing the believers.

CENTURY XIII.

CHAP. IV.

OF BRITAIN.

1. IN the year 1203. a certain number of Greeks came from Athens into England, and asserted, that the Latins had erred from the way of truth in the Articles of Christian faith; and they would shew the right way by invincible arguments, which all should receive, if they will be saved. This was reported unto King John; he answered, Our faith is grounded upon the Authority of Christ and the Saints, and I will not suffer that it be tossed with disputes and janglings of men; nor will we change the certainty for uncertainty; go therefore, let me hear no more of you. So they departed. Mastb. Parisien.

2. Alexander, Abbot of the Benedictines at Canterbury, was sent by King John in commission unto Rome; there he maintained before Pope Innocentius and the Clergy, that there is no power, under God, higher then a King; and that the Clergy should not have temporal Government, since the Kingdom of Christ is not of this world: He proved these two Articles by Scripture and Reason, and by testimony of Gregory the I. in an Epistle unto Augustine Bishop of Canterbury. Behold the event; Pandulf the Legate, suborneth some English Barons to accuse the Abbot; and he accursed and deposed him, & so brought him to poverty. Then the worshippers of the Roman Beast did boast, saying, Behold the man that took not God for his help. Idem.

3. In the year 1205. Hubert Bishop of Canterbury died; the same night the young Monks chose their Superior to be Arch-Bishop, without the knowledge of King John, being then in Normandy. The elder Monks sent unto the King, craving his gracious licence to chuse their Arch-Bishop according to their Canons. The King gave them his assent; provided, that for his sake they would shew favor to John Bishop of Norwich. They obeyed; and the King sent to Rome for confirmation. Reginold preveeneth his Messenger. The Suffragans of Canterbury were offended at both parties, and sent speedily to Rome to stop both the elections, because they both were without their knowledge. Then arose no small trouble both at home and at Rome. At home was such a strife, that the King sent Letters and Commissioners, commanding them to leave their contentions, and attend their ministration, or he would deprive them of their Benefices, &c. At Rome was reasoning on all sides; and Innocentius said, The disposition of that See appertained unto the Monks onely; and he willed them to chuse Stephen Langton, Cardinal of St. Chrysogono: None durst refuse but the King's Procurator. When Stephen came unto King John, he was content, so that his Sovereignty be preserved entire. Stephen loved not this supposition, and shewed some haughtiness. The Monks receive the Cardinal, because it was the Pope's pleasure. Therefore the King banished sixty four of them, as contemners of Royal Authority; and he sent Letters unto the Pope, expostulating: 1. That he had rejected the Bishop of Norwich, and had set up another, which was unknown to him, and brought up among his enemies; and (which is worse) who derogateth from the Royal privileges; wherefore I cannot admire enough, that the Bishop and Court of Rome do not consider how necessary (said he) my favor is unto the Roman Church; and that they weigh not how vast revenues have been gathered out of England, the like whereof they have not received from any Nation about the Alps. As for his privileges, he said, he would rather quit his life then forsake them. Finally he concludeth, If the Pope will not hearken unto his request, he will so provide, that there shall be no more such gadding to Rome; neither the sinews and riches of the Land any more transported, whereby he was made less able to resist his enemies; and he had of his own sufficiently instructed at home in all kinde of literature, that he needed not to seek justice abroad. Breifly, the Pope excommunicated King John; and forgave all his adherents in time past, but he condemned all who in time coming shall serve or aid him, or pay him tribute, &c. And he commanded the Bishops and Clergy to publish this sentence every Sunday. Some forsook the Countrey, but none durst publish the sentence; nevertheless it became known unto all; whence began great distraction of mindes; and the King was severe against all which denied him homage. Some were not afraid to speak for the King; that the Pope had not power to domineer over any King, since Peter had received onely Ecclesiastical power. Matth. Paris. saith, it were tedious to tell all their names which spake thus. Then Innocentius wrote unto Philip King of France, proffering unto him full remission of all his sins, and clear possession of all England unto him and his heirs, if he will kill John or expel him. The French King accepteth, prepareth and armeth himself, especially with Bishops, Priests, Monks, and their adherents. John understanding this, as also perceiving how his Lords and Barons were diversly enclined (for fear of the curse, as such who took part with him, and for the foresaid dispensation unto all who forsook him; and they were not a little byassed, by that command, to deny all service and debts, duties and allegiance) he knew not whither to turn. In the mean time cometh a Nuntio from Rome unto the King and his Nobles at Canterbury, with this Commission; That the King and they would consider their present danger, and be reconciled unto his Holiness in time. Then the Lords swear unto the Nuntio, that unless the King will obey his Commission, they will make him obey whether he will or not. The King in this strait submitteth himself, and resigneth the Crown of England and Ireland from him and his heirs for ever; upon condition that he and his heirs should have again the same Dominions from the Pope, for paying yearly unto the See of Rome 1000. marks of Silver. Then he kneeled, and gave his Crown unto Pandulf the Legate; who kept it five days as a seizing of these two Realms; and the King confirmeth the same by his Charter obligatory. Here, by way of anticipation, it is marked in the Histories, that no King of England did acknowledge this subjection, nor pay the farm, Pol. Virgil. in Hist. Anglor. lib. 15. Matth. Paris. saith, It is reported by many, that this detestable Charter was burnt in the chamber of Pope Innocentius the IV. An. 1245. when he caused his own wardrobe to be burnt, to the end he might obtain a new taxation from the Bishops, which were convened at the general Council; and after the Council, he sent a Charter, with a command unto all the Bishops of England to subscribe it; and King Henry was not onely enraged against the Bishops for subscribing it; but did also swear, that he would stand for the freedom of his Kingdom, and would not pay tribute to the Court of Rome so long as he breathed. But to return; at that time some of the Priests and Abbots consented not unto this shameful action; of whom some came afterwards, like blinde idiots, unto Pandulf, and begged remission; the baser sort was forgiven, and the heads.

as fittest and fitteſt for the Pope's mouth, were ſent to Rome. In the mean time Innocentius was holding his Latronal Councel, and there did excommunicate Otho the Emperor, John King of England, Peter King of Arragon, Raymund Earl of Tolouſe, &c. Then Stephen Langton was ſent, and abſolved King John: and immediately he called many Biſhops, Abbots, Earls and Barons unto London, and perſwadeth them into a league againſt the King, unleſs he will renounce all title unto vacant Benefices, wards of marriages, &c. Then Innocentius ſent Nicolaus Biſhop of Tuſculum, and he began to intrude perſons into vacant Benefices of Canterbury as it pleaſed him. The Arch-Biſhop reſuſed, and appealed to Rome; and ſundry Nobles took part with him, alledging that they would defend the Liberties of their Countrey. Innocentius approveth generally all that his Legate had done. The Biſhop and Lords ſtood for their Liberties. The King began to think how to be relieved of his new tribute, and ſent unto the Pope, requeſting him to excommunicate the Biſhop of Canterbury (who had been the occaſion of all theſe broils) with ſome of the Lords, and he would never intend exemption of his ſue-duty; and with his Letter he ſent a ſum of money. But this ſtir was ſoon calmed; but by and by that faction did convene again, and did force the King to yield unto all their above named demands. The King then ſendeth unto the Pope, and ſheweth how they had wreſted his power from him, and craveth his aid for recovery. The Pope ſendeth his excommunication againſt them all: his Nuntio chargeth Stephen to publiſh the excommunication; he reſuſeth, and poſteth toward Rome; where, after he was heard, he was ſuſpended; and another ſentence of excommunication was directed againſt all the Nobles and Barons, which had conſpired againſt the Pope's beloved Son; and remiſſion of ſins was proclaimed to all the ſubjects of the Kingdom, which will take part with the King and the Legate againſt the Lords; and all the Biſhops were commanded to publiſh this excommunication, under no leſs pain then to be in the ſame danger. Then the Lords (Matth. Pariſien. calleth them Londoners, to wit, becauſe of their league made in London) were in deſpair, and knew no more whither to turn, then the King did before; but they cried out in reproach of the King, ſaying, Wo to thee John, the laſt of Kings, the abomination of Engliſh Princes, and confuſion of our Nobility: Alas! thou haſt waſted England, and more wilt thou be waſted; alas! England, England, &c. Then twenty four of them, in name of the reſt, went unto Philip King of France, and intreated him to give them his eldeſt Son to be their King. The Pope underſtanding this motion, ſent Wallo Cardinal of St. Martin, and chargeth Philip to deſiſt from ſo raſh attempts; and to defend his vaſſal John, and the Lands of the Church, againſt thoſe Traitors. Philip did judge this an inſolency, and he hoped that the Lords would ſtand to their promiſe; and partly he truſted in the league lately renewed with Alexander King of Scots; and therefore he answered, The Kingdom of England was never a part of Peter's patrimony, nor ſhall it be hereafter; no Prince may pledge or give away his Kingdom, without the conſent of his Barons, which are tied to defend it: If the Pope ſhall bring this preparative into Chriſtendom, he will ſet at naught all Kings and Kingdoms; I love not this example which is begun in theſe days; and therefore I cannot allow what John hath done, though he be my utter enemy; and I lament that he hath ſo ruined that noble Realm. The Peers ſtanding by, cried, as in a fury, with one voice--- We will ſtand to this Article, though to the loſing of our lives, let John do as he willeth; no King can put his Land under tribute, and ſo make his Nobility ſlaves. Lewes ſaid, The Barons of England have elected me for their Lord and King; ſurely I will not loſe my right, but will fight for it unto death; I doubt not but I shall obtain it, for I have friends among them; [his Mother was Sister of King John.] At this time John was going from place to place, possessing himself of the Noble mens Lands: yet fearing their attempts, he came to Dover, expecting aid from forraign Countries; and many came to him from Flanders, Brabant, and Holland, on the one side; and from Guien, Gascony, and Poitiers, on the other; and a most wonderful number of men from other Countries: for the report went, that the Pope had written unto them to assist King John. Wallo the Legate followed Lewis into England, An. 1216. and renewed the curse against him, for usurping against John, and against Simon Langton, and other English, which had excited Lewis; and against Alexander the II. King of Scots, with a wonderful solemnity; causing all the bells to be tolled, candles lighted, Church-doors opened, and committing them all to the Diuel for their contumacy. Lewis caused the curse to be proclaimed null; and was accepted at London as King: He made Simon high Chancellor. King Alexander wasted the North parts of England. And every one said, The Bulls were of no force, since the ordering of temporal affairs did not belong unto the Pope; and what hath the Bishop of Rome to do with our wars? behold, he will be the Successor of Constantine, and not of Peter! Matth. Parisien. ad An. 1216. It happened at that time, that the Viscount of Mandevil, who came from France with Lewis, fell sick; and being moved in conscience, called unto him some of the English Lords, and said unto them, I lament your wretched case, and from my heart I do pity the desolation come upon your Country; the dangerous snares which are laid for your confusion, are hid from your eyes; but take heed in time: Prince Lewis hath sworn a great oath, and sixteen of his Nobles, (of whom I was one) that if he obtain the Crown of England, he will banish them all, which are now against their native King, and are Traitors to his noble Person: And that ye take not this for a fable, I assure you upon my faith, being in this condition as ye now see, at the mercy of God; I have great conscience hereof, and I pity your estate, and so give you this warning: your King hath for a season kept you under; but if Lewis shall prevail, he will put you from all; of two extreame evils chuse the least, and keep it secret what I have told you. Shortly thereafter he departed this life. When this was once noised among the Barons, they were in great heaviness; for they saw themselves betrayed every way: on the one side was the Pope's curse; and also Lewis dealing to the French all that he purchased, either Territories or Castles; yea, and they heard him say, They were all Traitors. Then they agree to submit themselves unto King John: they were easily pardoned. And John recovered Rochester Castle and City, London, York, Lincoln, and prevailed in many hazardous adventures against Lewis and Alexander. The same year John did lodge two days in the Abbey not far from Lincoln, and there died: Some say he was poisoned by a Cistercian Monk; Matth. Parisien. faith, he died of an Ague through sorrow and surfeit. Rog. Hoveden and I. Fox in Act. & Monim. give him this testimony; He was indeed a valorous Prince, and unfortunate like Marius, having experience of both fortunes; nor loved he the Mass. Then many of the Lords swear obedience unto Lewis. But William Earl of Pembroke, Marthal of England, a grave and wise Counsellor, did quietly and friendly call together sundry of the Earls and Barons, and set before them Henry, (the eldest Son of King John, being then nine years old) and perswaded them to embrace him for their King; and he was crowned by Wallo at Glocester, with consent of them which had followed his Father: and Wallow accursed them all which did follow Lewis. Nevertheless Lewis did more and more harm in the Land, until the above named William went against him him with an Army; and then he fled into London, and sent unto his Father for help; an hundred Ships were prepared in France: but Richard, a bastard Brother of King John, having onely eighteen Ships for keeping the Cinque-Ports, set upon them, and by providence fifteen of them escaped not unsunk or taken. Then the Ambassadors of Lewis writ from Rome unto him, If he left not England, the Pope would renew the sentence of excommunication against him; likewise many of the Nobles forsook him. Then he fought a treaty with the King; and at last it was concluded, that a 1000 l. should be given unto Lewis to depart, and should never return: So he was honourably convoyed unto the Sea. And reconciliation was made betwixt Henry and Alexander, with consent of the Legate. Then Wallo began his harvest; the Kings had dealt for themselves and their Armies, and the Legate could wring nothing from them; but he calleth the Clergy to account. Hugh Bishop of Lincoln, paid 1000. marks unto the Pope, and as much unto the Legate, &c. He summoned the Scotch Bishops and Abbots to Anwick; some opened their purses, and were absolved; and the most stubborn (as he called them) were sent to Rome. With the inferior Church-men he took another course: he sent for the Prior of Duresm, and Westbeck the Arch-Deacon, to go into Scotland, and call before them the Priests and Canons into every principal Town of the bounds; and there partly upon their confessions, and partly by wearisome protractions from day to day, great sums were squeezed from them. They who went to Rome, had purchased Letters from the Bishops and Abbots of England against Wallo; and accused him before Pope Honorius of avarice and other crimes. Wherefore the Pope took from him a part of the prey; and the accusers were absolved, and sent home with empty purses. But the Pope being not yet contented, sent Cardinal Ægidius to exact other sums, for absolving them from their vow of going into Palestina. When Ægidius returned, he said, he was robbed by the way: therefore another Legate was sent to gather as much. The King convened his Nobles and Prelates, and all in one voice did send, and forbid the Legate to come into the Realm, G. Buchan. Hist. lib. 7. Also England groaned under these burthens, and sent their grievances unto the Council at Lions: Regrating, 1. That the Pope was not content with Peter-pence, but extorted from them great sums of money, without consent of the King, and against all precedent examples. 2. Patrons cannot present unto Benefices, which are given to Romans, ignorant of the language, to the great prejudice of souls, and spoiling of the Realm. 3. Of the frequent recourse of the Pope's Legates, by whom faith and fidelity, the ancient Customs of the Nation; the Authority of the Statutes, Laws and Priviledges are abrogated. But the Pope's purse had no ears to hear such complaints; and anon he sent for more money: wherefore a Proclamation was made, in name of King Henry the III. that no man should consent to any exaction of money unto the Court of Rome. The Pope, in a rage, directed instantly his Letters unto the Bishop of Worcester; charging all England, under pain of his curse, to obey his Legate before such a day; and that Bishop to be executioner of his curse. Fear of the curse prevailed against the former Proclamation. But the Pope was not yet satisfied; he was not ashamed to crave first the tenth, then the fifth part; and lastly, the third part of all Church-revenues within England, besides other extraordinary occasions; and the yearly revenue of the Pope in England was 60000. marks sterling. Whereupon the King sent his Messengers again unto Rome; and the Nobles did, by writing, complain of the scandals arising from the avarice of the Court, and spread their complaint through the Christian world; professing, that they would not suffer the Country to be so rudely abused, although the King would wink at it; and unless these things (said they unto the Pope) be speedily redressed by you, let your Holiness know for certainty, that it may (not without cause) be feared, that such danger is like to ensue, both to the Church of Rome, and unto our King, that no remedy will easily be found for it. At that time John (a Cardinal, and an English man) did entreat his Holiness, for God's cause, to bridle, with some temperance, the passion of his minde, which is here. (said he) to tell you plain, too much commoved without cause; your Fatherhood may consider, that the days be evil: 1. The holy Land lieth in misery and peril. 2. All the Greek Church is departed from us. 3. Frederick, the mightiest Prince of Christendom, is against us. 4. Both your Holiness and we are exiled from your Papal seat, and thrust out of Italy. 5. Hungary, and all the Nations thereabout, look for nothing but utter ruine from the Tartars. 6. Germany is tossed with intestine wars. 7. Spain is fierce and cruel against us, even to the cutting out of Bishops tongues. 8. France is by us impoverished, and like to conspire against us. 9. Now wretched England, so oft plagued by us, much like Balaam's ass goared with spurs, beginneth to complain of her intolerable griefs; and we, after the maner of Ismael, hating all men, do provoke all men to hate us. Matth. Parisien. ad An. 1246. But Innocentius would relent nothing; yea, made his exaction more grievous; and began to excite Lewis King of France, to slay or expel King Henry. France remembered former times; and Lewis refused to vex his Cousin: But (saith the before named writer) the hearts of all men were provoked to mislike the Pope and Church of Rome; whereof the one sought to be esteemed a Father, and the other to be the Mother of all Churches; but he proved a step father, and she a step-dame.

4. In the year 1222. the in-dwellers of Caithnes refused to pay tenths unto Adam their Bishop; and therefore he excommunicated them all: then they came into his house, and in his chamber they slew a Monk, and his Servant; and they drew him into his kitchin, and burnt him with all the house. Pope Honorius rested not, till he had caused King Alexander to hang four hundred of them; and the Earl of Caithnes hardly obtained pardon, albeit he was not accessory unto the deed. Boet. lib. 13. cap. 14. About that William Bishop of St. Andrews, brought from France some Dominicans, Franciscans, Jacobines, and some Monks called vallis umbrosæ; these, by their crafty insinuations with people, did supplant the credit of Priests, and drew unto themselves both credit and means of the Ministry; and were maintained by the Popes, because they studied especially to advance their designs. Spotsw. Hist. p. 43.

5. Nigellus Vireker, a learned and much respected Monk at Canterbury, writ a Book, De abusu Verum Ecclesie; and sent it unto William, Bishop of Ely, Chancellour of England; a man (saith Bale) most envious. In this Book he rebuked not the proud Prelate only, but all Teachers under the Tyranny of the Pope; because they committed the cure of souls unto children, belly-gods, and despisers of the sacred Word.

6. Walter Mapez, Arch-Deacon of Oxford, was once sent by King John unto Rome; after his return he did write several books against the Pope and his Clergy; closely reproving the Pope, sometimes under the name of Goliath, sometimes of Pluto; and shewing manifestly that then Antichrist was reigning in the World. He had a fellow with him, who made shew of a Pleasant or Rimer; but all his rimes were said to be written by Mapez himself: In them he plainly paints forth the Roman Court, and calleth the Prelats proud beasts. The rimes begin thus:

Quod pendet à Capite totum est immundum:*

*Trahit enim vitium primum & secundum,
Et de fundo redolet, quod est juxta fundum.
Roma capit singulos, & res singulorum,
Romanorum Curia, non est nisi forum,
Ibi sunt venalia jura Senatorum,
Et solvit contraria copia nummorum.
In hoc Consistorio si quis causam regat,
Suam vel alterius, hic imprimis legat;
Nisi des pecuniam, Roma totum negat,
Qui plus dat pecunie, melius allegat. &c. Io. Bale.*

In Catalog. test. verit. lib. 14. we find these rimes ascribed unto this Mapez.

Vide Deus ultionum,	Quod in Templum Solomonis
Vide videns omnia,	Venit Princeps Babylonis,
Quod spelunca vespillonum	Et excelsum sibi Thronum
Facta est Ecclesia.	Posuit in medio.

These words are to no sense, unless the Temple signifie the Church of Christ; and the Prince of Babylon signifie the Pope of Rome.

7. An. 1237. was a conference at York between Henry the III. King of England, and Alexander the II. King of Scots; where they did accord upon the matters of debate between the kingdoms. Then Otto the Pope's Legate would go into Scotland for redressing (as he said) the affairs of the Church: But Alexander said unto him, I remember not that ever a Legate was in my Land; neither have I need of one, thanks be unto God; neither was any in my Father's time, nor in any of my Ancestours; neither will I suffer any so long as I may. Otto returned with King Henry, Matth. Parisien. Nevertheless this Alexander did suffer Peter Red to take away 3000. pounds for the Pope, which no King of Scotland had suffered before. Idem ad An. 1240. But Evet. lib. 13. cap. 20. addeth, He sent the Earls of Carriſt and Athale, to accompany Lewis King of France into Syria; and he sent unto the Pope a thousand marks, lest he should think himself despised.

8. Robert Grosſthead (alias, Capito) Bishop of Lincoln, was the most renowned Bishop of his time; a godly man; an admonisher of his King; a fearless rebuker of the Pope; a bold reprover of Prelates; a corrector of Monks; a director and teacher of Priests; a favourer of Students; a Preacher to the people; a defender of fatherless and widows; a persecutor of the incontinent; a searcher of the Scriptures; a lover of truth; a hammerer and contemner of the Romans, saith Matth. Paris. In the year 1237. his own Clerks gave him poison in a drink; but (as it pleased God) he escaped death at that time by help of medicine. The Priests which taught not the word of God, but human traditions, he called the Ministers of Satan, thieves of the night, robbers in the day, corrupters of manners, murderers of souls, and Angels of darkness; and he called their exemptions, snares of the Devil. An. 1253. Pope Innocentius sent unto him a Letter, commanding him to provide a Canons place for an Italian in his Diocē, nihil obſtante. He returned answer; I am most willing to obey Apostolical commandments; but those things which are contrary unto the Apostles command, I will gain-stand, since I am obliged unto both by the command of God. . . . The tenor of your aforesaid Letter, agreeth not with Apostolical holiness, but plainly disagreeeth: 1. Because by that word non obſtante, in that and so many other Letters, do abound a deluge of inconstancy, shamelessness, lying, deceiving, difficulty of trusting any, and innumerable other vices following thereupon, shaking and confounding the purity of Religion, and the quietness of all sociable conversation. . . . 2. Except the sin of Lucifer, which is also the sin of Anti-christ, there cannot be a greater sin, nor more contrary unto the Apostles, or more hateful unto Christ Jesus, then to destroy souls by defrauding them of the Ministry In a word, the holiness of the Apostolical seat cannot do any thing but unto edification, and not to destruction; for this is the fulness of power, to edification: But those things, which they call Provisions, are not to edification, but most manifest destruction. The Pope, hearing this Letter, foamed, as in a rage, and sware by Peter and Paul, that he would hurl such a phrenetick wretch into confusion, which durst so boldly controule his command, and make him a fable unto the world: Is not the King of England our vassal, yea and slave, whom I, at my nod, may thrust into prison? The Cardinals, namely Ægidius a Spaniard, and some others touched in conscience, could scarcely appease his fury; and among other words they said, To confess the truth unto your Holiness, it is true what he saith, and we cannot condemn him for it; he is a Catholick man, more holy and religious then we our selves are; and as it is judged, amongst all the Prelates, there is none better, nor his equal; this is not unknown universally, nor can our contradiction avail against him; wherefore we think best to pass by such a thing, lest perhaps some tumult arise thereupon, especially seeing it is manifest unto all men, that once must come a defection and departure from the Church of Rome. When Robert lay on his death bed, he said unto the brethren coming to visit him, Heretic is an opinion taken up by human sense, contrary unto the holy Scriptures, openly avowed, and pertinaciously maintained: Is not Innocentius therefore an Heretick? and since Christ came into the World to save souls, may not the Pope be justly called the Antichrist, who seareth not to destroy souls? The Pope doth impudently annul the privileges of his Ancestours . . . and therefore the contemner should be contemned; according to that saying of Esay, Wo to thee who despisest Matth. Parisien.

Antichrist.*

9. In the year 1240. a Carthusian Monk at Cambridge, said openly before Otho the Legate, Gregory is not the head of the Church, but there is another head thereof; Satan is loosed; the Pope is an Heretick; Gregory which is called Pope, defileth the Church and the World. The Legate said unto him, Is not power given from above unto the Pope to loose and bind souls, and to exerce the charge of Peter on earth? The Monk replied, How can I think that such power as was given unto Peter, is given to a Simoniack and Usurer; yea, and who is defiled with greater crimes? The Legate did blush for shame, and said, We may not strive in words with a fool. Idem.

10. Seval, Arch-Bishop of York, followed in the same footsteps, when he saw the pride of the Pope usurping and tyrannizing above the Kings, he was astonished; and in the grief of his heart, he intreated Pope Alexander the IV. by Letters, that he would leave off from such daily enormities, or at least refrain himself, and follow the example of good men; that he would feed Christ's Lambs, as Peter did; and not pull the skins off them, and devour them like an hungry Wolf. The Pope had given the fattest of his Benefices unto some wanton young men, and ignorant of the language; as he made Jordanus, Dean of York, &c. Seval would admit none of them: wherefore the Pope excommunicated him with bells and candles. He could suffer these ceremonies; but he could not suffer strangers to be set over the people; and the more he was cursed by the Pope, he was the more beloved of the people; and they did blessing him, yet quietly, for fear of the Romans. Although he was not murdered, yet for his sufferings he was called a Martyr. Idem ad An. 1257.

11. Matthew of Paris (whom I have often named) was a Benedictine of Saint

Saint Alban : he wrote the History of England , from the days of William the Conqueror , until the year of his own death , 1260. where he describeth , how others spoke against the abomination of Antichrist , to the end , that posterity might know and abhor it ; and thereby he giveth us to understand what were his own thoughts , as here and there he expresseth himself. e. g. ad An. 1237. he saith , It is manifestly known , that the Church of Rome (alas !) hath deserved the wrath of God ; for the guides thereof seek not the devotion of people , but their full purses ; not to gain souls unto God , but to collect revenues to themselves ; to oppress the religious , and many ways impudently to catch other mens goods hence ariseth grumbling among men , and the wrath of God is provoked dayly. Ad An. 1238. he calleth the Pope the Successor , but not the imitator of Peter. Ad An. 1245. he saith , The Pope sent unto the King of Arragon , and then unto the King of England , craving that he may come and abide in their Kingdoms ; and the Nobility did refuse , because the Papal Court was so infamous , that the strength thereof went up unto the clouds. Ad An. 1251. he saith , The threatening of the Apostle may be thought to be fulfilled , Unless there be a departing , the son of perdition shall not be revealed. Behold , that mens hearts depart , and not their bodies , from the Pope , who is enraged like a step-father ; and from the Church of Rome , which is cruel in persecuting , like a step-mother.

12. John Russel , an English Gentleman , who married the Widow of Walter Cumin , Earl of Lenox , about the year 1262. afterwards he purchased Letters from the Pope , to summon a number of Scots to appear in England before the Legate , for slandering his wife of witchcraft , and poisoning her first husband . The Scots dispised the citation ; alledging their ancient privilege , that Scotch men cannot be charged to answer without their own Country ; and so the summons turned to nothing , saith Buchan. Hist. lib. 7.

13. Within some few years King Alexander the III. was encombred with the pride of Priests and Monks , saith the same Author there ; he understandeth certainly Bishops and Abbots ; which being enriched (saith he) by former Kings , and enjoying long prosperity , began to grow rank ; and would go before the Nobility , as in wealth , so in all other things , or at least be equal with them . The Noble men took this in ill part , and dealt roughly with them ; wherefore they complain unto the King . Whether he thought these injuries not to be so hainous , as the Priests called them , or if he thought that they were not without cause , yet he made no account of them ; therefore the Bishops did excommunicate all the Noble men , excepting the King only ; and with many threats do prepare themselves to go unto Rome . Then the King , calling to minde what broils Tho. Becket had raised in England by his ambition , called the Bishops from their journey , and compelled the Nobility to yeild unto their pride . Thus the spiritual Lords (as they would be called) had the precedency.

14. The Jews lived then in England , and waxed both in number and wealth . An. 1235. they obtained from Pope Gregory the IX. that they should not be taxed by Christian Kings ; and that they might have Christian servants and nurses . An. 1257. they murdered a young boy in Lincoln ; therefore King Henry imprisoned seventy one of them at London . The Minorites , being hired for money , procured their liberty ; for (saith J. Bale) Henry did not so much reign , as bear the image of the Romish Beast : but after that time , the name of a Minorite was odious in the ears of English men . Edward the I. banished all the Jews , and escheated all their goods , allowing them only a vaticum . One good thing God wrought by them ; they left many Bibles in England , whereby sundry of the learned were stirred to learn the Hebrew language; as Gregory Huntington, &c. This Edward began to restrain the wealth of Monks, and the power of Bishops. When Lands were given to Monasteries, or a Monastery bought any Land, they did not acknowledge the Superior of those Lands; so the King and Noble men were prejudiced of Wards, Reliefs, Knight-Service, and such other things. Edward made a Law, that no person, religious, or any other, should buy or sell Lands that might any way come under Mortmain, [that is, in prejudice of the Superior] under pain of forfeiture of the same. At that time was confusion of Courts, the Civil Judges and Bishops endeavoring to enlarge their own, and contract their Rivals Authority: Edward fixed boundaries unto them both; as is more particularly in T. Fuller's Church-History, lib. 3. He discharged the Abbot of Waltham, and the Dean of Pauls, to crave the tithe of any mans goods for the charges of Jerusalems wars, albeit the Pope had given them this Commission in three several Bulls. The Abbot died; and the Dean appeared before the King and his Council, and promised to obey. He also summoned the Dean of Wolverhampton; because, against the privileges of the Realm, he had given a Prebend of his Chappel unto a stranger, at the Pope's command. The Dean appeared, and confessed his fault, submitting himself unto the King's clemency. K. James VI. in Monitio. ex archivis Regni.

15. Alexander the III. King of Scots, fell with his horse over the rocks, on the West side of Kingron, March 18. An. 1285. His life was remarkable, and his death lamentable. He had divided the Realm into four parts; and abode a quarter of the year in each part, giving justice unto all men; so he knew his subjects, and they knew and loved him. The Judges of each part waited upon him within their jurisdiction; and when he removed, the Judges of the other part received him: so his Court was never populous. His children died young, except one Daughter, who was married to Erik King of Norway; and she had one Daughter. After his much bewailed death, a Parliament at Scone named six persons to govern the Country for the time; three for the part on the North side of Forth, and three for the South. The King's Daughter was dead; and Edward the I. sent unto this Parliament, suing the marriage of their young Queen unto his Son. So the Estates consented very readily; provision being made, that Scotland should be governed by their own Laws and Magistrates. In the mean while Margaret died. Then competition followed between Robert Bruce, Earl of Hastings in England, and of Carriſt and Garioch in Scotland, and John Baliol, Earl of Galloway. The ground of this plea flowed by their genealogy from King David, who died in the year 1153. He had one Son, Henry Earl of Huntington; he died before his Father, leaving three Sons, Malcolm, William and David: So Malcolm (surnamed the Maiden) succeeded his Grandfather; and after him his Brother William, the Father of Alexander the II. and Grandfather of this Alexander the III. David, the third Son of Henry, had three Daughters; Margaret, Countess of Galloway; Isobel, married to Robert Bruce (surnamed The Noble) Earl of Hastings; and the third, or youngest, was Countess of Huntington. Margaret had no Sons, but three Daughters; Dornagilla, the Mother of John Baliol, and Mary the Wife of John Comin, &c. Robert the Noble had a Son, Robert the Competitor, who married the heretrix of Carriſt; and had two Sons, Robert, the King afterwards, and Edward. Then Dornagilla pleaded first for the Crown; but Robert, Earl of Carriſt, alledged, that he, being of equal degree with her, the male should be preferred in the inheritance of Lands, and rather of Kingdoms; as it hath been lately practised in Burgundy, and is usual among Brethren and Sisters: as for her Son, he is a degree further off, and therefore not to be heard in that cause. The parties parties did so increase, that no Authority could command either of them; and intestine wars were thought dangerous; wherefore, by common consent, Edward the I. was chosen Umpire. At the first he omitted no point of formality: he called unto Berwick the Competitors, John and Robert, and the Governors of the Realm; he protesteth, that he calleth them not as Subjects before their Magistrate, but as his Friends before their chosen Arbitrator: he caused them all to swear, that they will stand to his decreet, and receive one of the two whom he should name: He chose twelve Scots, and so many English, as his Councillors in that matter; and caused them to swear, that they shall give their advice uprightly, according to their knowledge. The mean while he thinketh upon his own advantage; and considering that Scotland was divided into two powerful factions, it seemed the more easie unto him to work his own point; in shew he sendeth for Jurists in other Nations, not doubting (as that sort is seldom of one opinion) but to finde some response conducing to his own end; which may appear by his altering the state of the question; which he propounded in this maner: A King, who is not wont to be crowned, nor anointed, but only set in a chair, and be proclaimed King, yet not so free, that he is not under another King, and himself acknowledged so, dying without children, two of his Cousins, and Nephews of his Granduncle Sempronius, seek the inheritance, &c. The most part answered, The custom of the Realm is a Law in such a case; and if there be not a precedent, they should stand at the will of the Superior King. Then in another meeting at Norain, Edward required acknowledgement of subjection from all the Scotch Commissioners: They did all refuse in one voice. In a third meeting, at Berwick, he sent privily for Robert, and proffered him the Kingdom, if he would swear fealty unto him. Robert answered, I will never prejudice the liberty of that Realm. John Baliol was sent for, and accepted the condition. So he was proclaimed King six years after the death of Alexander; and all the Scots swear Allegiance unto him: Afterwards, both the King and Nobles, gave their oath unto King Edward, in Newcastle on Tyne: The Nobility were male-contented, but they must dissemble. It happened after some years, that Macduff, Earl of Fife, was killed by the Earl of Abernethy, and because this family was potent, Macduffs Brother could not obtain justice in Scotland for the slaughter; therefore he appealed unto King Edward: who summoned King John to London: He appeared; and at first sat down with Edward, thinking to answer by his Proctor; but he must stand at the Bar: This indignity begot in him a desire of liberty. When variance fell between France and England, John, thinking this a fit occasion, renewed the old league with France; and, by the Abbot of Arbroth, sent into England (with consent of the Estates) a revocation of his dedition. Wherefore Edward resolveth to take Arms against Scotland: He sent for Robert Bruce, Son of the Competitor (being then defunct) and proffered him the Kingdom, if he would go with him to expel King John, or cause his Friends in Scotland to desert, or not assist John. Robert did both. At that time four thousand Scots were slain in sundry fights; and in the Castle of the Burgh of Montrose, King John did resign unto the Commissioners of King Edward, all right to the Crown. Sir Hugh Cressingham was made Governor of Scotland; and John was carried into England: yet by intercession of Pope Boniface, he was let go into France, his Son being kept in pledge, lest he did attempt any new trouble. Then Edward went against France; and in his absence, the Scots had mutual treaties with France; they chose twelve Governors of the Country; and many incursions were in the borders on both sides. At that time arose the famous William Wallace, a Gentleman of mean estate, but extraordinary in courage and strength ; he did many rubs unto the English : and because the Governors were thought remiss, he was chosen to be the only Governor, and called the Vice-Roy of King John: He recovered many Towns from the English, and threw down many Castles and Forts, lest his little Army were divided in keeping them. The Earl of Warren, and the Lord Percey, were sent against him ; but because these had bad success, Edward made truce with France, and came against Scotland ; where he prevailed so, that, in a Parliament at St. Andrews, all the Nobility and Estates did acknowledge him ; only Wallace kept himself quiet in the high-Lands. When Robert Bruce put the King in minde of his promise, Edward scoffed at him, saying, Had he no other thing to do, but fight for a Kingdom unto him? Buchan. Histo. At that time Edward destroyed the ancient Laws of Scotland, and sought how to bring the two Nations in amity and affinity ; He burnt the Chronicles, and Books of Divine Service, constraining them to follow the Missale of Sarum ; those who were repugnant unto these changes, were severely punished : He removed the most learned men into Oxford. Briefly, he destroyed all the Monuments of Antiquity ; and upon the least occasion he cut off all, who in his judgement could enterprize any insurrection, Boeth. lib. 14. Wallace lurked a while, but he stirred again ; and prevailed both in favor and power among the people ; as followeth in the next Century.

1.  BENEDICT the XI. was chosen Pope November 1. An. 1304. He absolved Philip King of France from the excommunication of Boniface; and restored the Cardinals, John and James Columnæ, which had written against Pope Boniface. And Platina addeth, Boniface had pursued them more then became a Priest, for envy against them, and too much respect of the faction of the Guelphs. He sate nine months.

2. CLEMENS the V. after contention of the Cardinals the space of ten months, was elected: being, in the mean time, at his own seat in Burdeaux. When it was certified unto him, he commanded all the Cardinals to come unto Lions: There were present at his Coronation, Philip King of France, his Son Charles, John Duke of Burgundy, &c. In the midst of the Procession a great wall fell upon them, so that John and twelve other persons were killed, Philip was hurt, the Pope was struck from his horse, and lost out of his Mitre a Carbuncle of the value of six thousand crowns. Platin. When this unlucky pomp was ended, he created many French Cardinals, (and not one Italian) and removed the Court of Rome unto Avenion; where it continued seventy four years, as in another transportation to Babylon. We read not of any, which in all this time made exception, that Rome was the seat of St. Peter, and house of the holy Ghost; and therefore the Pope should abide at Rome. Clemens avouched openly to keep a Concubine, the Daughter of Count de Fuxa. P. Morn. in Myster. ex Villano. He sent three Cardinals with Senatorial power to govern Rome and Italy. Because Ferraria had revolted, and submitted themselves unto the Venetians, he excommunicated the Venetians for accepting them; and gave all their goods unto spoil, wheresoever they could be apprehended: the like he did unto the Florentines, and other Cities, for their revolting. Sardinia did belong unto Genua, and he gave it unto the King of Sicily, for winning it from the Turks. How he dealt with the Emperor, it followeth: But here it is to be remembred, how he ordained, that none should use the title, or exercise the power of Emperor, until he were confirmed by the Pope: And when the Imperial seat is vacant, the Pope shall reign as Emperor until one be chosen. He confirmed the Feast of Corp. Christi, granting Indulgences of one hundred days unto all who shall be present at the Matins, &c. Lib. 3. Clement. tit. 16. de reliquis ca. Si Dominum.. It seemeth, that the people had not regarded the former Institution. He was the Author of the seventh Book of Decretals: before his death he did condemn them, as containing many snares in them; and caused them to be burnt, saith Io. Naucler. But his Successor did confirm them. He excommunicated Andronicus, the Emperor of the East, as an Heretick, because he would not suffer the Greeks to acknowledge the Pope for their head, &c. Because he would not reside at Rome, the Romans refuse to give him the patrimony of St Peter; and thereby he was brought into the greater exigence: But Platina saith, A great famine was the cause of his scarcity. Then he lived by the money of Bishops, which came unto him to be confirmed, and by such other shifts and gifts; yet by these means, he is said to have gained 9500. marks of Silver, besides his expense, which he bestowed liberally in one year. Annates. Platina writeth, that he ordained the Annates, or the first years stipend of all Intrants, to be paid unto the Pope out of all Countries. But Pol. Virgil. de inven. rer. lib. 8. cap. 2. saith, It was the custom of Italy in the days of Pope Alexander the IV. and in the Council of Vienna. An. 1308. the Clergy offered unto the Pope, the twentieth part of their stipends yearly, if he would discharge the Annates, and they were not heard. England would never pay the Annates of lesser Benefices, although they did yeild in Bishopricks, saith Caranza in Bonifac. VIII. Io. Naucler. pag. 914. saith, I see none, in Germany, pay Annates unto the Pope, but only they who hold their Benefices of the Pope immediately. Pol. Virgil. loc. cit. saith, How grievous is it to the Priests, to deliver the price of the Annates before they receive a penny, whereby they are forced to undertake great debts, and so wrong their friends from whom they borrow, if it happen that they die soon? Shall not this be occasion unto wicked men to corrupt Religion? yea, and indeed (saith he) it breedeth great contempt of the poor Ministers and their Ministry. P. Mornay. in Mysser. pag. 540. saith, That An. 1416. the Church of France did refuse to pay the Annates, because, albeit it was once granted in the days of Pope John XXI. for an expedition beyond Sea, and sundry Popes had by force taken them, yet it should not be so, since thereby Benefices and Ecclesiastical things are sold, and both Popes, Bishops and Priests are guilty of simony, contrary to their oaths. But to return unto Pope Clemens; he had promised unto King Philip to abolish the memory of Pope Boniface the VIII. and to annul all his Acts; but by advice of Cardinal Pratenfis, he delayed unto a general Council; and this he summoned to be held at Vienna: where the King did require from the Pope the performance of his promise. The Council did acknowledge Boniface to have been a lawful Pope; but they did declare all his Acts against the King, to have been unjust; and that none of them should be prejudicial unto the King, nor his Successors, Io. Naucler. pag. 872, & 878. In this Council the Pope did propound the aid of the Christians in Syria; that the Templaries should be punished; as also the reformation of the Church. Wars were proclaimed; and Indulgences were offered in these words; We will, that the punishment of Hell be no way laid upon him which is signed with the Cross; granting also, unto every signed person, power to pull three or four souls out of Purgatory at their pleasure. The Divines at Paris were not a little scandalized, and the rather, because it was written in the same same Bull, We command the Angels to carry the absolved soul into the glory of Paradise. It was then a received Article, that the Pope may command the Angels as his Sergeants. In this Council the Templaries were condemned for their Apostatic. But Io. Bale in Cent. 4. 82. in Appen. 2. sheweth from Christop. Massaus, and P. Mornay. sheweth, that Bocartus, Villanus, Arzonius, Arventin, and others, bear witness of their innocency; some affirm, that their great revenues through Europe was the cause of their ruine; and therefore some accuse Pope Clemens, and King Philip: others say, the Pope envied them, because they inveighed against the Popes and Court of Rome, as disturbers of Christendom, and the cause of losing Syria and Palestina. Io. Naucler. pag. 873. saith, At that time Clemens the V. accused the Templaries of impiety; and that order was destroyed; and their most large revenues were taken. Some report, that they had an image clothed with a mans skin, unto which, when they entered the Order, they did homage, sacrificing most cruelly with mans blood; which when they had drunk, they did exhort one another unto continuance in such wickedness: and other crimes were imputed unto them, especially that by their craft the Turks had got Jerusalem. This pest (saith he) did fall by the great fervor of all French; and also in Germany, after the Letters of Pope Clemens: and I see, that some writers do not so much condemn the doleful religion of the Templaries, as the avarice of the French King, who was the cause of this faction: And Pope Clemens gave their goods unto the Order of St. John, or the Hospitalaries; but because the King and other Princes had taken possession of them, much money must be paid for redeeming them. But thereafter, the King and his children were obnoxious to many miseries, which they were said to have suffered for their iniquities; and many judged those men to have suffered unjustly, and did reverence them as Martyrs, and with devotion did gather their bodies and bones. Moreover (saith he) Jacob de Moguntia, writing of those times, reporteth, that Clemens the V. condemned the Order of the Templaries; and committed the execution against some in Germany unto the Bishop of Mentz: He called a Synod; and when he was in the Chapter-house, ready to publish the process, a religious man, Hugo Count of Wiltgraff, who abode in the Castle of Grunbach, by Meisenheim, came in with twenty Soldiers, his Brethren of that Order, clad with white clokes, with the sign of the red Cross, after the maner of the Teutonicks, and they all had their weapons under their clokes. The Arch-Bishop rose up unto them, and beckoned with his hand, that they should sit by him: But the Count standing, said, My Lord, Arch-Bishop, it is publicly said, that to day you will renounce and accurse me and my Brethren, of the Order of the Temple, which is not pleasant unto us; but we demand, that you would publish unto your Clergy here present, our appeal which we have made unto the next Pope. The Arch-Bishop could not go from his place for fear of weapons, and therefore he answered calmly, It shall be so, but first the Pope's Process must be published; and afterwards, without any distance, he caused the Appeal of the Templaries, with the causes thereof, to be read and published. And among other things in that Appeal, it was written as one cause, that their Brethren, whom the Pope had caused to be burnt, were free of those imputed crimes; and for a miraculous token of their innocency, their clokes, with the sign of the Cross, were not burnt nor consumed in the fire. The Arch-Bishop said unto them, Be of good courage, I will write unto the Pope in your favor; and so it was: And after the Arch-Bishops Letter, the Pope wrote again unto him, and recommended to enquire of the matter: And the Bishop called another Synod; and by advice and consent of other Bishops in the Province, the innocency of the Friers was clearly known, and they were absolved. This was done in Mentz An. 1211, July 1. saith Nauclex. P. Moen. in Myster. saith, When John Molan, a Burgundian, the chief of that Order, was entering into the fire, he summoned Pope Clemens to appear, within forty days, before the throne of God, to answer to that sentence pronounced against him. Molan was burnt March 11. An. 1313. and Clemens died April 10. immediately following. As for the third cause of the Synod, we shall have occasion to speak of it in the third Chapter. The See was then vacant two years and three months; and the Cardinals at last did submit all their suffrages unto Jacob de Ossa Cadurcensis; who afterwards went up unto the Papal Chair, and said, I am Pope. This was

3. JOHN the XXIII. who was so desirous of novelties, and to leave remembrance of him, that he turned Bishopricks into Abbeys, and Abbeys into Bishopricks; he divided one into two, and united two into one; he erected new Colledges, and destroyed the old; he appointed new Scribes, and taxes of every Bishop and Priest. Pol. Virgil. de inven. rer. lib. 8. cap. 2. By a Decree he pronounced them Hereticks, who say, Christ did teach perfect poverty; that is, to renounce the possession of all goods, both in particular and in common; for (said he) it is impossible to retain the use of consuming things; and to quit the right of them both in particular and in common. This Decree (saith Platina) doth scarcely accord with sacred Scripture, which testifieth in many places, that Christ and his Disciples had not of their own, and it condemneth all the Franciscans, teaching and disputing in their schools, against the ambition and avarice of the Clergy; and it was made directly against the Decree of Pope Nicolaus the IV. Bellarmin. de Ro. pont. lib. 4. cap. 14. saith, These two Decrees fight not; because Nicolaus denieth not, that Christ had some propriety although in common; but he denieth that Christ lived so always; and John denieth not, that Christ sometimes had not propriety in particular, nor in common; but he denieth that he lived so always. Thus the Jesuit will have the two to agree, although John would purposely condemn the others Decree. This John believed, that the souls do not enjoy the presence of God before the day of judgement. Bellarmin. loc. cit. testifieth, that the Cardinals did resist this opinion; and that he repented the day before his death; nor was it an error (saith he) because it was not defined in any Council. Nauclex. saith, Many Divines, of approved knowledge and life, held that this Pope was an Heretick, for holding some errors; which (they say) he recanted coldly at his death; and his Successor, Benedict, did publicly condemn those errors. Note here, the Pope was an Heretick; and the Pope recanted; but he recanted coldly. Erasmus in Prasat. before the fifth book of Ireneus, saith, He was compelled by the Divines of Paris to recant his opinion. Bishop Jewel against Harding, pag. 668. declareth this ex Massa. lib. 18. Pope John taught and professed error; and he sent two Preachers to Paris, the one a Dominican, and the other a Franciscan, to maintain the same heresie; But one Thomas, an English Preacher, withstood the Pope; and the Pope threw him into prison: hereupon the King summoned a Council unto his Palace in Vintiana Sylva; the whole Assembly subscribed against the Pope; immediately the King sent unto Pope John, and willed him to reform his error, and to set the Preacher at liberty; and so he did. At that time Peter de Corbaria, John and Michelin, three Minorites, did openly teach, that St. Peter was no more the head of the Church, then any of the other Apostles; that Christ left no Vicar upon earth; that the Pope hath no power to correct or punish, to set up or cast down an Emperor; all Priests, of whatsoever degree, are of equal degree, power and jurisdiction, by the institution of Christ; and it proceedeth cedeth from mans authority, that one hath more power then another; neither the Pope, nor all the Church, can, by coactive power, punish any man, unless they be authorised by the Emperor. At that time the Pope and Emperor were at variance, as followeth; and when the Emperor went to Rome, Pope John was deposed by the Cardinals as a fugitive; and the now named Peter was chosen, and called NICOLAUS the V. When he was installed, Pope John accursed him, for those his articles; his excommunication is in the Extravagants of Pope John the XXII. and beginneth, Ad audientiam: and Pope Nicolaus accursed Pope John. At last Boniface, Earl of Pisa, brought Pope Nicolaus to Avenion, and there shut him up in a Monastery till he died, Antonin. par. 4. tit. 11. cap. 7. §. 5. Nicolaus had advanced the Minorites, and John degraded them the more, and declared them Hereticks. He sat twenty years. His Heirs found in his treasury 25. millions of crowns, Io. Naucler.

4. BENEDICT the XII. sent 25000. florens for reparation of S. Peter's Church at Rome. His contention with the Emperor followeth. His Epitaph describeth his life briefly:

Debius à vero, cuparepleta mero.*

He sat seven years; and died An. 1342.

5. CLEMENS the VI. took upon him, at the first, to enrich all his Cardinals with the Bishopricks and Benefices of England. Edward the III. was not a little offended, and annulled all the provisions which the Pope had given within his Realm; commanding, under pain of imprisonment and death, that none presume to bring from the Pope any such provisions. At the same time all the tenths of Templaries were paid unto Edward, as followeth. Clemens exchanged a fee-duty, which the French were wont to pay out of Naples, for the City Avenion; and so that Kingdom was made free, and Avenion was a part of St. Peter's patrimony. Boniface the VIII. had or-

But the Christian Emperors abolished the Secular Plays; and the Popes have restored them. The Bull of proclamation, under Clemens, hath these words; What person or persons soever, for devotion, shall undertake peregrination unto the holy City, the same day that he goeth out of his house, he may chuse a Confessor or Confessors in the way, or where he pleaseth; unto which Confessors, we grant, by our Authority, full power to absolve all cases Papal, as fully as if we were personally present: And we grant, that whosoever, having truly confessed, shall chance to die by the way, shall be absolved from all his sins; and we command the Angels of Heaven, to take his soul out of his body, being absolved, and to carry it into the glory of Paradise, &c. He sate ten years.

6. INNOCENTIUS the VI. in some things gave a good pattern; he would not bestow Benefices, without examination of the life and literature of the Intran; he suspended many collations that were granted by Clemens, because the persons were not qualified; he commanded all Prelates, under pain of his curse, to reside at their own seats; because the sheep should be attended by their own shepherd, and not by an hireling; he restrained his domesticks to a small number, and those were men of good report; and he commanded all Cardinals to do the like; saying, His life, and the life of his Cardinals, should be exemplary unto others, as was the life of our Savior. Platin. Nevertheless, in pride he was not inferior unto any of his Ancestors; for he kindled the wars in Italy, sending Cardinal Ægidius with an Army against sundry Cities in Romandiola, Marchia, Anconitana, &c. which had fallen from the Popes. He sent Magistrates into Rome, now one, and then two, as he pleased: He advanced a vain man, Nicolaus Gencii, who, under the title of Tribunus Rome, attempted great things: He charged the Pope to return into Rome, or otherwise he and the City would chuse another Pope. When Charles the IV. was chosen Emperor, this Nicolaus (pretending that he was the true Soldier of the holy Ghost, the deliverer of the City which hath jurisdiction over all the world, and now revoked all privileges granted before unto others, in prejudice of her jurisdiction) summoned Lewis Duke of Bavaria, and Charles King of Bohemia, who called themselves Emperors, and all the Electors, to compare before him, or he will proceed against them as disobedient. Io. Naucler. gener. 45. The people followed him for a time, but soon forsook him; then he fled privily, and sought refuge under the wings of Charles, whom he had summoned: Charles taketh him, and sent him unto Avenion; where he was kept, until Francis Baruncellus did usurp the like prank; the Pope sent against him this Nicolaus; he killed the other, and was again Tribunus; not long after the Pope threw him down again, and created Guido Jordanus Senator for a year. This Pope sate nine years and eight months.

7. URBAN the V. an English man, had waited long at Court, and when he could attain no Benefice, he said unto his fellow, I think verily, although all the Churches of the world were vacant, none of them would fall on me: The same companion, seeing him taken from a Cloister, and crowned with the triple Mitre, said unto him, Now all the Churches of the world are fallen on your head. He followed the course of his Predecessors, in subduing some Cities of Italy, and stirring men to go unto Syria. In the fifth year he would go to Rome: He caused the heads of Peter and Paul to be searched; he took the flesh of them, and when they were laid in boxes of gold, he placed them by the great Altar in Lateran. Platin. If those could be true reliques, let the judicious confider. He was the first consecrator of the Rose; and gave it unto Johanna Queen of Sicily, who was called a famous whore; and is said to have killed her husband. From that time the Popes do yearly, on the Sunday of Letare, honor some Prince with such a Rose; being consecrated with great solemnities, and certain prayers, anointed with balm, sprinkled with musk, and watered with holy water, in sign (as they say) of Jerusalem, both militant and triumphant, in the name of the Father, Son and holy Ghost. About that time began the Agnus Dei, which the Pope giveth in the first year of his Papacy, and reneweth it every seventh year: this is the prayer wherewith they hallow it; By the worship and honor hereof, let the iniquity of us thy servants be washed away; let the filthiness of our sins be cleansed; let pardon be obtained, grace be bestowed, and at last they, with thy Saints and chosen, may deserve to attain eternal life. What more can be wished by the merits of Christ? P. Morn. in Myfter. Urban sat twelve years. Platina could not know, whether he died at Avenion, or by the way. Froffard. Hist. lib. 1. saith, At Avenion, An. 1571.

8. GREGORY the XI. had vowed to dwell in Rome only, if ever he were chosen Pope; and then he was mindeful of his vow. This was not acceptable unto some Cardinals, nor unto the King of France, who sent his Brother, Duke of Anjou, to dissuade him; at last he would go, and died there shortly after. He sent into Germany, craving tenths of all Church-men; the three Electoral Bishops, with one voice, refused. Crantz. in Saxo. lib. 10. cap. 2. & Naucier. The Histories shew many troubles and wars in his time. He sat seven years.

9. When the Cardinals assembled unto the election, the Romans threatned them, if they did not chuse a Roman, they would do whereof they should repent; and being not contented so, they came violently among the Cardinals, and caused an old man of an hundred years to be chosen: They sat him upon a white mule, and convoyed him thorow the City with much pomp. The old man died on the third day. Froffard. lib. 2.

10. URBAN the VI. a Roman, was chosen likewise by force and fear. He commanded the Cardinals to have fewer servants and horses; because what was bestowed on them unnecessarily, might be better employed on the poor: he commanded also, they should not take gifts from pleaders in their Courts; wherefore the Cardinals, fearing his severity, went to Anagnia. Platin. But Froffard. (who lived at that time) saith, He displeased all men with his pride; and the Cardinals said, they were forced to chuse him; and therefore the See is vacant. So at Funda, they chose CLEMENS the VII. Bishop of Camerak, a French man. This Schism continued thirty nine years. Crantz. in Saxo. lib. 10. cap. 4. saith, The Emperors were wont, and yet do, carry in their colours, a double headed Eagle; and now the Popes began to worship a double headed Mitre. Robert Budeus, a Noble man of Britain in France, was in the bounds of the Romans with 2000. men; Clemens allured him on his side: thus troubles began. Charles the V. King of France (the wisest Prince of those times, saith Froffard.) assembled his Estates, especially the Clergy, to enquire which of the two should be accepted: Opinions were different; the Prelates, the King's Brethren, and many Divines were for Clemens; the King approved their sentence; immediately it was proclaimed; and Clemens made his residence at Avenion. There followed him the King of Spain, the Prince of Savoy, the Duke of Millain, the Queen of Naples, and the King of Scotland. The Emperor Charles dissembled, although the greatest part of the Empire followed Urban. Lewis Earl of Flanders, said, Wrong was done to Urban. The Hammonians yeild to neither of the two.

Froßard. lib. 2. What troubles were then in all the Church, and every Nation partaking thereof? Priests were imprisoned by the adverse party; Cardinals were racked and killed; and many battels were fought for those two; the one called the other a Schismatick and Heretick, the son of Belial, and the Antichrist: It would require a volume to shew their bloody facts. Then was great strife for the Kingdom of Sicilies; Johanna the Queen had married four husbands; the coultins and heirs of her husbands pretend right; when she could not eschue the trouble of pretentions, she rendred the Kingdom unto Pope Clemens, to dispose of at his pleasure. Urban gives it to an Hungarian, Charls the brother's son of her first husband; on condition that Pregnan his brothers son should have Campania. Clemens gave the Kingdom to Lewis Duke of Anjou, An. 1380. The people receive Charls: Lewis went thither with an Army of 30000 men. Both pretend right from the Pope; and Lewis alledged the consent of the Queen then defunct. The Neapolitans said, that the Queen could not dispose of the Kingdom; and Clemens was not Pope. Calabria and some others received Lewis, who continued there, and died An. 1383. Then Charls was only King, and refused to give Campania unto Pregnan. Urban summoned Charls to appear at Nuceria; and in the mean time he cast seven Cardinals into prison, and created 39 Cardinals of his own kindred. Charls came with an Army to the place; but Urban fled by sea into Genua, and took the seven imprisoned Cardinals with him; of whom he caused five to be shut up in factis, and to be drowned in the sea. When he heard that Charls was dead, he returned unto Naples, with intention to defraud his sons; but when he could not prevail, he went to Rome: he sent his Bulls from Genua into England (for he could not find a greater enemy against France, saith Froßard.) offering remission of sins unto all who would fight against the Clementines; and gave liberty unto the King to give assignations of the Tithe of all Church-rents (except the Primates) unto the Noble-men for their charges; and he prevailed with some Preachers to perswade the people. They being allured with fair promises, thought themselves happy to die in such Wars; Such were the times saith Froßard. In a short space, by Tithes and voluntary offerings, were gathered 2500000 French crowns; and for the more assurance, the Pope would have a Bishop to be General; and Henry Spencer Bishop of Norwich was named. The like Bull was sent to Lusitania, to excite them against Spain, for siding with Clemens. A Letter of Richard the II. is extant (saith Io. Fox in Act. & Monu.) unto Pope Urban, exhorting him to have more respect unto the unity and peace of the Church; and shewing, that Princes should coerce such mis-order in the Church, as Moses rebuked Aaron; Solomon put down Abiathar; Otho the I. removed John the XIII. ... and by the same reason (said the King) why may not Kings now bridle Roman Bishops, if the quality of their fault, and the necessity of the Church so require? And if it were not lawfull for Princes to restrain the outrages of a Pope, though he were lawfully chosen; he may oppress the Church, change Christendom into Heathens, and make the sufferings of Christ in vain; or else God hath not provided well in all things for his Church on earth, by service of men, to withstand dangers; and the Pope should consider these things seriously, lest he caused all the Princes to rise against him ... for certainly the World will not be oppressed by a Pre-late; and will rather leave the Romish Church desolate, &c. But affections blunt all admonitions. Urban knew what gain was reaped by the Jubile; therefore he ordained it to be kept every 33 years, because Christ lived but 33 years: so he proclaimed and kept it An. 1383. He caused his Cubicular John de Therano, to write a book on these words, Give to Caesar, what are Cæ-

far's, &c. The scope of the book was to prove, that those words had place only for a time, and after Christ's ascension they were out of date; because he said, If I were lift up to heaven, I will draw all things after me; that is, I will draw all things to the Empire of Popes, who from thence shall be Lord of Lords. In the year 1383. the Clementines besieged him in a Castle, and had taken him, if the Soldiers had not mutined for want of pay; nor could Clemens afford them 20000. franks. Urban sat eleven years, and died An. 1389. very few bewailed his death, because he was so rude and intractable. Platin. Then Pope Clemens desired the King to interpose his Authority with the Emperor and other Princes, that for conserving peace, no other Pope be chosen; but he was disappointed, saith Froissard.

11. BONIFACE the IX. was chosen at Rome, one altogether ignorant of literature, and so unfit for the affairs of Court, that he scarcely understood the propositions which were scanned before him; and in his time ignorance was in price, saith Theod. à Nicom. the Secretary of many Popes. Morn. in. Myster. yet he was like unto Boniface the VIII. as in name, so in craftiness; and when the Romans began to shew their discontentedness, he, like another Tarquinius, cut off the Chastoles high heads. Laur. Valla in Declam. contra Donat. Constant. He openly professed simony; and would admit neither Cardinal nor Bishop, until they delivered money at his pleasure, or at least an Annate. Morn. pag. 490.

12. BENEDICT the XIII. was chosen at Avenion, after the death of Clemens, An. 1393. upon express condition, that if the King of France did not approve the election, another should be chosen. The King heard the Legates of both Popes, but consented to none of them; and, intending the peace of the Church, he sent unto the Emperor, (whose Authority and care should have been principal in this case, saith Froissard.) and unto the Kings of England, Bohemia, and Hungary, intreating them not to be deficient unto publick tranquillity. After the year 1397. when the Noble men of France were redeemed from the power of the Turks, King Charls wrote again unto the Emperor. They appointed to meet at Rhems, pretending other causes of their meeting. After consultation, they sent the Bishop of Camerak unto Rome, exhorting Boniface, that for the good of the Church, he would lay aside his Papal honor for a time, until by advice of Princes and learned men, a necessary overture were provided. The Pope said, He would follow the advice of the Cardinals. But the people of Rome did exhort him to maintain his own right, and not to submit to any Prince of them all. At the second conference, Boniface said, He would submit, if Benedict would submit also. The Bishop did report this answer unto the Emperor, at Confluentia, and returned into France; and he was sent unto Benedict with the same proposition. His Cardinals could agree upon no certain answer; and he said, He was lawfully chosen, and would not renounce for any mans pleasure. Wherefore a Captain that was sent with the Bishop, laid hands on the Pope, and took him. Then Charls advertised the Emperor; and he intreated the King of England to lay aside all faction for a space, and contribute his aid in this case. When this came in consultation, the Estates were desirous of the purpose, but it did offend them, that the business was carried on by Authority of the French King; and they said, France shall never prescribe an order in Religion unto England. The same year Charls died; and Richard was committed to the Tower, Froissard. lib. 4. Then France agreed with Benedict, upon condition he should procure the peace of the Church. Many Cities in Italy revolted from Boniface, as may be seen in Platin. and he was brought into such great penury, that he sent unto all Countries, offering pardons for so much money as their charges towards Rome would require: By such Indulgences, his Legate brought from one Country 100000. florens, Theod. à Niem. lib. 1. cap. 68. & Mornay. He called his Legates to account, and finding that they had reaped more gain, he put them to death. But his pardons were so contemned, saith Platin. that many crimes were done, because people thought, they could have remission for money. Pol. Virg. de inven. rer. lib. 8. cap. 1. reporteth the same. He kept the Jubilee An. 1400. when many hundreds of people died of the plague at Rome. After that the Cardinals of Avenion went to Rome, to treat of peace: but Boniface said, He only was Pope, and Peter de Luna was the Anti-Pope. They replied, Their Master was not a Simoniack. He discharged them of the City, and within three days he died, An. 1404.

CENTURY XIV.

CHAP. II.

Of EMPERORS.

1. ALBERT Duke of Austria, summoned a Diet at Frankford; he renounced his former election, and was chosen again. Pope Boniface the VIII. was his only foe; but afterwards he confirmed him, on condition he would expel Philip King of France, and take his Kingdom to himself: But Albert, in stead of war, married the Daughter of Philip, and lived for the most part in peace. After the example of his Father, he would never go into Italy; yet he governed his part of it by Deputies and Dukes. He had wars with the Kingdom of Bohemia, and conquered it unto his eldest Son: At whatsoever occasion he had any fight, he was present in person, and was always victorious; therefore he was called Albertus Triumphans. He was once poisoned by the Bishop of Salzburgh, and by help of medicine was preserved. At last he died unfortunately, by conspiracy of his Brother's Son John, in the tenth year of his reign, An. 1308. All the time of Adulph and Albert, Andronicus, the Son of Michael Paleologus, reigned in Constantinople; he would never acknowledge the Pope of Rome. Philip King of France thought now to be Emperor, because the Pope was in his Realm; but Clemens did fear his power, and wrote unto the Electors to hasten the election.

2. HENRY the VII. Earl of Lutzenburgh, was chosen, and quickly confirmed by Clemens; on condition that he should go to Rome, and be crowned within two years: The Pope required this, because he thought by him, to beat down the troubles in Italy, saith Jo. Naucler. He had wars with the Duke of Wittembergh, Albert's Brother's Son, for the Kingdom of Bohemia. Albert's Son was dead, leaving but one Daughter, whom Henry did sue for his Son. Then he went into Italy, and subdued Robert King of Pulia. The Pope sent three Cardinals to crown him at Rome; but he began to fear his power, and gave the Cardinals in charge to require homage of him, and that he should swear faithfulness unto the See of Rome. Henry said unto the Cardinals, It was not the custom of his Ancestors, and against the freedom of the Empire, that the Prince of Princes should give an oath of fidelity unto the Servant of Servants. Nevertheless he was crowned, and received graciously by the Clergy and many Cities; and he compelled them to obedience who did refuse. The Pope did strengthen the above named Robert against him; and because that course could not prevail, Jacobine, a Dominican, gave him poison in the wine at the Mass, in Bonconvento, An. 1315. The Pope by his divulged Bulls, would have excused the Frier; but the people were so enraged for this villany, that they arose against that Order, and killed many of them, and burnt their houses in Tuscya and Lombardy. Andronicus was now become old, and assumed his Son Michael to govern equally; but he lived not long time: his Son Andronicus rebelled against the old Emperor, so that Greece was divided, and became a prey unto Othoman. At that time Chatiles, Governor of Peloponesus, sent for the aid of the Turks; they came, and carried great spoil out of Thracia. The other party sent unto the Italians and Spaniards, which both sought their own gain; and when the Greeks were sensible of their folly, they did submit themselves unto young Andronicus; and then he dealt roughly both with the Turks and Italians, so that they both became his enemies, Laonic. Chalco con. de reb. Turci. lib. 1.

3. After the death of Henry, the Electors could not agree; for four chose Lewis Duke of Bavier; of those four, the Duke of Brandeburgh gave his sentence by his Proctor; and the other three chose Frederick Duke of Austria, who thereafter purchased the consent of Brandeburgh; they were crowned by two Bishops severally; Lewis at Aken, and the other at Bonna; and great sedition arose in Germany. They both, by their Ambassades, sought confirmation from the Pope. Unto LEWIS he said, He had already usurped too much, and gone beyond the power of an absolute Emperor. FREDERICK did alledge the valiantness of his Father and Grandfather. Pope John said, Solomon's Son was not very wise. So he rejected them both; and alledged, that according to former Acts of his Predecessors, now he was Emperor. Wherefore wars continued eight years; and John proclaimed against them both, alledging, that the Imperial Crown is the gift of the Pope, since it was decreed, that the Germans may elect their King, but then he is Emperor, when the Pope of Rome, who is Father and Prince of all Christendom, doth approve him; and when the Electors cannot agree, none is King, but the Bishop of Rome governeth at his pleasure, even as the soul should command the body, by whose benefit it liveth; and so shall the world be well ruled, when profane things are subject unto spiritual. For these causes, seeing two are chosen . . . and neither of the two seemeth worthy unto us, (said he) we command, that within three months they both renounce, &c. The most did follow Lewis. At Frankford was a frequent Diet of the Princes, and all the Electors (Frederick was a captive) there many things were decreed for the honor of the Empire; and that Lewis should provide, that the liberty of Germany be not turned into bondage; and whosoever will maintain the Acts of Pope John, is an enemy of the Republick. Immediately Otho Bishop of Carintha, and Lambert Bishop of Tolouse, the Pope's Legates, were expelled out of Germany. All the Bishops, Prelates, Priests and Monks, obeyed the Decree; only the Dominicans inclined sometimes unto the Emperor, and sometimes unto the Pope. By Authority of that Assembly, an Act was published, that is in Aventin. lib. cit. The heads are; Christ the Savior, our Lord and God, and his chief Apostles, Peter, Paul, James and John have foretold, that perillous times were coming after their departure; and they have forewarned especially, that we should beware of false Christs, false Apostles, and false Prophets, who are so called from the lyes of their feigned Religion; terming themselves Priests, when they are the messengers of Antichrist; their insatiable thirst of honor and money, their lechery and pride being most manifest, bewray them; we deny not, but confess sincerely, that our times cannot endure any censure. long custom prevaieth above truth; indignation breaketh our silence; seeing from Heaven we are set in the highest watch of human affairs, we cannot be silent, lest we prove to be dumb dogs

that cannot bark, as the Prophet speaketh; although we cannot drive away the wolves, because of the iniquities of the times; yet it is our duty to resist them, and declare who they are; although we cannot prevail against them, lurking under sheeps skins, as we would; yet it is in some measure sufficient unto those who cannot attain, to have a willingness to do. [Then they apply unto John, shewing how that he vexed the Church of Christ, and compelled Christians to draw their swords against Christians; and brought people into a custom of perjury, rebellion, and conspiracies; and they add] Neither can Christians keep peace when God giveth it, they are so troubled with this Antichrist; so great is the madness of this man, or rather Satan, that openly, in Assemblies, he proclaimeth his wickedness, as if they were good works: When Christian Princes are at variance, then indeed he is Priest of Rome; the great Priest then reigneth and domineereth, when all things are wasted with jars and broils, and his power becometh terrible; he might have most easily restored peace with one Letter, but he hath no will that peace be among us; yea, by him rather was the discord increased; he feigned now to favor Lewis, and then to love Frederick; as each of them was weaker, he promised his aid unto the weaker; he did purposely invite both unto the Coronation, and gave fair words unto both; when they were ready to have agreed, he perswaded them unto Arms; all these things he doth craftily, that when we are undone by intestine wars, he may destroy the Empire, and possess Castles, Towns, and Republicks. When he is capital foe, and publick enemy, yet he will be Proctor, Witness, and Judge in his own cause. . . . what he pleaseth, he judgeth lawful. . . . he assumeth the spirit of Satan, making himself like unto the most High; and suffering himself to be worshipped, (which the Angel forbad John to do) and his feet to be kissed, after the manner of Dioclesian and Alexander, two most cruel Tyrants. . . . Those Popes have thrust Cæsar out of Rome and Italy, and Christ out of the Earth; they permit the Heavens unto him, and have taken Hell and Earth unto themselves; and they will be believed, not only called gods of the earth and of men, as if they reign over the souls and tongues, or as if they had divided the Empire of the world with Jupiter; how contrary are these things, Crucified and Supream power, a Soldier and a Priest, an Emperor and a Pastor? he is the two headed Beast, who is Augustus and the great high Priest; as we read of Nero, Decius, &c. I then they refute the particulars of the Pope's Bull; finally concluding, If he be not the Antichrist, certainly he is his forerunner, from whom we appeal unto the Christian Senate of the world. This Apology of Lewis prevailed, even among his foes, that the Earl of Tirolis, and some others, dealt for peace between Lewis and Frederick. Lewis had the other captive, and he set him at liberty, on condition that he should renounce the title of Emperor; and within few years he died. Then Lewis was sole Emperor; and he went into Italy, An. 1327. being invited by the Gibelines, to aid them against the Gwelfs; and he exercised the Imperial Authority where he came; therefore the Pope excommunicated him, Platin. But Tho. Couper in Epist. saith, He was accursed, because Udalrick, the Emperor's Secretary, (without the Emperor's knowledge) in an Epistle, had called the Pope, the Beast rising out of the Sea. The Emperor did often profer a treaty of peace, but the Pope would not hear of it. Many learned men, both Divines and Jurists of Bologna and Paris, wrote then against the Pope, as followeth. When Lewis could not obtain confirmation from the Pope, he entred into Rome, and was received gladly; he and the Empress were crowned by Stephen Colonna, Vicar of Rome, with full consent (saith Platin.) of Nobles and Cardinals. The City was then governed by their own Citizens, under the title, Vicars of the King of the Romans. Plat. in Iohan. There he assembled a very frequent Synod, and declared more fully, 1. What wrongs he had suffered from Jac. de Cadurco, alias Pope John the XXII. or rather the mystical Antichrist (said he) and Abiathar, who had followed Absalom against David. [And he did not only thus complain, but also the Orators of the Armenians, and other Nations, against whom John had covenanted with the Turk.] 2. He shewed what Authority other Emperors had exercised against the Popes, when they were found vicious. 3. With common consent of the Princes, and Bishops of Italy and Germany; and assent of the Priests and People, Pope John was condemned of irreligiouſness and heresie, and as Author of the Antichristian Empire. Lastly, They did chuse another Pope, Nicolaus the V. as is written before. John raged, and deprived Lewis again. When Benedict the XII. was chosen, Lewis sent Orators, craving peace; and the Pope answered, that he and his Brethren would take care to restore that Noble branch which was cut off from the Church; and he did commend Lewis, as the most eminent Prince of the world: He bewailed also, that Italy was oppressed by Tyrants, and the holy Land by the Saracens, and all these evils had hapned for want of an Emperor. The Orators hearing the Pope speak thus, were assured that the absolution was granted. But (saith Naucler. gener. 45.) the King of France, and Robert King of Apulia, turn all upside down; for two Arch Bishops, and two Counts, came and dissuaded the Pope from making peace with Lewis, lest he be called a friend of Hereticks. Benedict said unto them, Do your Masters wish, that there be no Empire? We speak not, holy Father, (said they) against the Empire, but against the person of Lewis, which is condemned for his practising against the Church. Then said Benedict, It is true, we have done against him; but he would have fallen at the feet of our Predecessor, if he could have been accepted; and what he hath done, he hath been provoked thereunto. But (saith Naucler.) the Pope could not prevail. And John King of Bohemia, and Henry Duke of Bavier, wrote, that with the aid of the Kings of Hungary and Cracow, they would set up another King of the Romans. So the Cardinals did for that time hinder the absolution, and the Orators were dismissed with fair words. In the year 1336, Lewis assembled the Princes in Spira, and from thence sent other Orators unto the Pope for absolution; among these was Gerlak Count de Naslaw, and the Bishop of Curia. When they came, Benedict weeping, said, He loved Prince Lewis; but the King of France had written unto him, that if he did absolve Lewis without his consent, he should finde worse dealing then Boniface had found. The next year Lewis and Philip de Valois, King of France, were agreed; and they both sent together unto Benedict for absolution of Lewis. Then said Benedict, Shall I now judge Lewis an Heretick, and then a most religious Christian, at the King's nod? and so did still refuse. And it is thought (saith Naucler.) Philip did pretend to desire what he would not; and Benedict did profess what he would not, though he would have done it; and so nothing was done. But it will appear, that the Pope did dissemble at first, and at this time began to shew himself. In the year 1338, Lewis called another Diet to Frankford, and there, by advice of some Minorites, he published a Declaration against the Sentence of Pope John, where he proved out of the Canon Law and Ancient Customs, that it appertained only unto the Electors to chuse the Emperor; and the interest of the Pope is onely to anoint him, being chosen, which is but a ceremony; and if the Pope will refuse, any other Bishop may anoint: wherefore when the Emperor giveth oath unto the Bishop of Rome, it is not of homage or subjection, but only of faithfulness, and defense of the Bishop and the Church.

if necessity do require his furtherance; so that it is against all Antiquity, that the Pope restraineth the Authority of the Electors to the designing of the King of the Almain only, and taketh unto himself alone to create the Emperor; as also it is absurd, that the Pope assumeth the managing of the Empire as lawful Emperor, when the Imperial Throne is vacant, which power belongeth unto the Palatine of Rhine: likewise he did clear himself particularly of those things which Pope John had alledged against him: And in the end, by advise of all the Clergy and Princes of Almany there assembled, declared the whole process, that was laid against him, to be null and of no force. This Declaration is at length in Nauciler, loc. cit. At that time Benedict made Luchin the Viscount, and his Brother John the Arch-Bishop, to be Vicars of Millain, and other Towns; and he gave the same power unto Mascin Scala in Verona and Vincentia, and unto others in other Cities, and that he did by his own power, (as he said) because when the Imperial Seat is vacant, as for a time it was vacant, all the Imperial power did belong unto him. Nauciler. ibid. Then the Emperor, seeing that now was no hope to be absolved, and, as the Pope was doing, he created all hereditary Vicars in Italy, (who afterwards became absolute Lords) lest they should revolt from him. Pope Clemens was haughtier then all the other; he summoned the Emperor to appear, and satisfy God and the Church. Lewis sent his Orators, and promised to obey. Clemens demanded, that the Emperor should confess all his heresies and errors; that he should resign the Empire, and not reassume it but with the good leave of the Pope; and that he should render himself and his Sons, and his goods, into the Pope's reverence: All which the Orators did subscribe, so that the Pope and the Cardinals did admire at it: And then they propound harder conditions. Nauciler. saith, The Emperor would never have subscribed these Articles, though he had been a prisoner. When he saw them, he sent Copies of them unto all the Princes; and they did assemble at Frankford in September, An. 1344, where, after consideration of these Articles, they did judge them derogatory unto the honor of the Empire; they all with one voice did abhor them; and they did intreat the Emperor, to stand in defense of his honor, as he had done before, and they should not be deficient to the uttermost of their power. Nauciler. ibid. Then Clemens did accurse the Emperor again for Heresie and Schism; and he accursed all the Bishops and Princes that favored him; and he sent a mandate unto the Electors, to proceed unto a new election. The Heresies were; 1. He believed not the determination of Pope John the XXII. concerning the poverty of Christ. 2. He held that the Emperor may depose a Pope. 3. He, being accursed, did contumaciously lie under the curse. 4. He gave Bishopricks unto some, and deposed some Bishopricks, who would not do contrary unto the Papal interdiction. 5. That he had deposed a Pope, and set up an Anti-Pope. Henry of Viernberg, Arch-Bishop of Mentz, would not consent unto the violation of his innocent Majesty; therefore the Pope deposed him, and sent Gerlak of Nassaw into his See. Other Bishops and Electors, being seduced by John King of Bohemia, did consent unto the election of his Son Charls. Waltram, Bishop of Colcin, got 8000 marks; Baldwin, Bishop of Trevers, was Uncle to King John; the Duke of Saxony received 8000 marks. &c. P. Mexia. The Pope, without delay, approved the election. Behold what a fire the Pope had kindled, if the wisdom of Lewis had not been singularly patient. He would not renounce his Imperial Title; but he returned to Burgravia, where, by procurement of the Pope, he was poisoned with a drink, which the Dutchess of Austria presented unto him, An. 1347. and therefore he was called a Martyr. Clemens had sent his Bulls unto the Princes of Germany.

many, commanding them to accept the before named Charls as their lawful Emperor: And he had obtained from Charls, that from thence forth none should be accounted Emperor, until he be confirmed by the Pope, and to believe otherwise is a pernicious heresie. The Princes and other States understanding this, thought Charls unworthy of the Diadem; and they said, Will that Servant of Servants rage always in pride and ambition, that he dare with a shameless face, more then manifestly surpass the wickedness of the most cruel Tyrants that ever was read of? Wherefore, after the death of Lewis, they assembled to a new election. The Bishop of Mentz, and three Secular Electors, (the other Bishops came not) chose Edward the III. King of England, and Brother in law of Lewis the V. He gave them thanks, but refused, because he was troubled with wars in France. Then they chose Frederick, Marquess of Misnia, Son in law of Lewis. Charls gave him a sum of money, that he should not accept. Thirdly, An. 1350. they chose Gunther Earl of Swarzenburgh, (they were so resolved not to accept an Emperor from the Pope) and he was presently after poisoned by his Phylician Findank, who also died within three days, having, at his Master's command, tasted first of the same potion. Thus were they all made away who withstood the Pope. Gunther knowing that he must die, and being desirous to leave Germany in peace, rendered his Title unto Charls. And so, after long contention, the honor of the Emperor is brought to a meer Title; nor could the most puissant Emperors prevail, because the people were perswaded, that they drew their swords against Heaven, if they did resist the Pope; as if they had presumed, like the ancient Giants, to climb into the skies, and pull God from his Throne; and the thundering excommunications, were judged not so much menaces of death, (which peradventure might have been avoided or contemned) but of damnation, which as it is most terrible, so it was thought unavoidable.

4. CHARLS the IV. was a weak Prince in courage and prudence; through ambition he did extreemly weaken and debate the Empire; he approved that form of Coronation of the Emperors which is kept in the Vatican, and containeth many servile Ceremonies; As The Emperor supplieth the office of a Sub-Deacon in ministring unto the Pope, and saying Mass; and Divine Service being ended, he must hold the stirrup while the Pope mounteth on his horse, and for a certain space must lead the Pope's horse by the bridle: Also he obliged himself, that he should stay no longer in Italy then while he were crowned; so whereas many Emperors had for some ages displayed their forces, to drive the Popes from Rome, now the Popes, without any forces, have removed the Emperors from the Tower of the Empire, and made themselves absolute Lords. Hence also it appeareth, that now the Emperors are but the images of the ancient Emperors, and the Popes give spirit unto the image. Naucler. writeth, that Charls entered into Rome on foot; in derision whereof, a Senator began an Oration before the people, in these words; Behold, thy King cometh unto thee with meekness and lowliness. He was crowned by two Cardinals, depured by the Pope; and the next day took his journey into Germany. At that time Petrarcha wrote many things, between derision and disdain, in his Epistles, partly unto Charls, and partly unto others: In his second Book, De vita solitaria. sect. 4. cap. 2. he saith, Cæsar hath taken the Crown, and is gone into Germany, contenting himself with the lurking holes of his Country, and the name of Emperor; he embraceth the lowest members, and forsaketh the head; who, we thought, should have recovered, hath lost it. . . . I confess, his oath binderh him, and he excuseth himself, that he hath sworn to abide in Rome but a day; Oh infamous day! oh shameful covenant! oh Heavens behold an oath! behold Religion! behold godliness! the Bishop of Rome hath left Rome so, that he will not suffer another to dwell in it, &c. P. Morn. in Myster. pag. 472. As Charls came to the Empire by miserable ambition, so he may be called the first Emperor which ruined the Revenues thereof; for he did first consent, that the Viscount of Millain should be the perpetual Vicar of the Empire; and the Viscount having once full Authority, usurped liberty: And to the end he might tie the Princes Electors unto him and his Son after him, he promised to give them great sums of money, and for payment thereof, he gave them discharges of their taxes, and tributes of their Lands unto the Empire: which covenant being once made, they cause the Emperor (when he is at first chosen) to swear, that he shall never revoke: So the tributes of many Lands and Towns of Germany, which anciently was the Emperor's patrimony, is dispersed among the Princes and free Cities. Then also was the order of the Electors changed; it was appointed, that the Bishop of Mentz should ask the votes; 1. Of the Bishop of Trevers. 2. Of the Bishop of Colein. 3. Of the King of Bohemia. 4. Of Prince Palatine of Rhine. 5. Of the Duke of Saxony. 6. Of the Marquess of Brandenburg. And lastly, give his own vote. But in procession, the three Bishops should go foremost, and the Bishop of Trevers in the midst; and the three Princes should follow them, and the Duke of Saxony in the midst, then the Emperor, and immediately after him the King of Bohemia. Bulla Aurea in Fascic. rer. expetend. And they have a third order in serving the Emperor at his table on the solemn days. In the year 1359. Charls had a conference at Mentz with the three Electoral Bishops; and Pope Innocentius sent thither the Bishop Calvacen, for a Subsidy unto his Treasury; and gave him power to dispense with the Clergy who had not Canonically purchased Benefices, either Curata vel sine cura. There was also the Dukes of Saxony and Bavier. The Emperor called the Legate; and heard his Commission; then said Charls, Lord Legate, the Pope hath sent you into Germany to require a great sum of money, but you reform nothing among the Clergy; Cuno, a Canon of Mentz, was standing by, with a costly hat, or cap, and many golden and silken fantasies about it; the Emperor said to him, Lend me your cap; then laying aside his own, the Emperor put on the Canon's cap, and said unto the Princes, Am I not now more like a Soldier then a Clark? and so he rendered the cap unto Cuno. Then he said unto the Bishop of Mentz, Lord Arch-Bishop, We command you, that with the fidelity wherewith you are tied unto us, you reform your Clergy, and put away these abuses in their clothes, shoes, hair, and conversation; or if they will not obey, that you command the fruits of their Benefices to be brought into our Exchequer, and, by consent of the Pope, we will employ them unto honest uses. When the Legate heard these words, he went presently away. Io. Naucler. hath this; but he sheweth not what the Bishop of Mentz did in obedience unto the charge, nor how the Pope was taken with the answer; but only he sheweth, that the next year Pope Innocentius sent unto John de Salverd, a Canon of Spira, to gather the half of all the fruits of Benefices within that Dioc, whether vacant or shall be vacant, for two years, unto the Pope's use. This Charls did more good in Bohemia, then in all the other parts of the Empire; he erected a School of Liberal Sciences at Prague; he built the new City, and a glorious Palace, and many Monasteries; and he made the Bishop a free Arch-Bishop, whereas before he was subject unto the Bishop of Mentz. He and his Empress went to Rome to kiss Pope Urban's foot, and returned within three months. He died An. 1378. In Constantinople, after Andronicus, his Son Calo-Johannes did reign; his Uncle and Tutor, John Catacuzen, did usurp the Government; and they both both were called Emperors; and in the end Calo-John was sole Emperor. This unhappy John sent for the Turks to come unto his aid: Soliman then did possess all that in Asia had appertained unto the Empire, and came over the Hellespont, but could never be beaten back again; he took Gallipolis, and other Cities on the coast, and then Hadrianople. Lazarus Despot of Servia, or Myfia inferior, and Mark Despot of Bulgaria, and some other Princes, went against him, An. 1363. and were overthrown. John came into Italy, France and Germany, for help against the Turks; but when he could obtain none, he returned, and sought ways to fight under the Turks colours in Asia. Laon. Chalcocon. lib. 1. After that time Soliman became Lord of many Christians Lands in Europe; and his Brother Amurathes conquered more; and so that Empire decayed yearly.

5. WENCESLAUS, succeeding unto his Father, is called wretched and effeminate; whether his minde was set on devotion, or that he would not meddle with the two-headed Beast, (for then began the great Schism of the two Popes) it is uncertain; and the Civil wars which began in the time of Charls, did then increase. The Vicars, which were appointed to govern the Imperial Towns in Italy, became absolute; and so did others in Germany usurp liberty. The Electors, seeing that he had no care of the Empire, and that especially he favored John Huls, conspired, by instigation of Pope Boniface the IX. to chuse another; but they could not agree; for two were chosen, An. 1400. Robert Count Palatine, and Jodok Marquess of Moravia. Jodok died within six months; and then Robert was sole Emperor. Then Wenceslaus made no account, and, contenting himself with Bohemia, lived yet twenty years. Emmanuel, the second Son of Calo John, by the aid of Bajazet, succeeded unto his Father; and paid him yearly 30000 crowns; and did willingly quit Philadelphia. Andronicus, the elder Brother, was glad to take pay of the Turk. Laon. Chalcocon. lib. 2. The Turks, by these means, and because of the dissensions in Italy and Germany, especially of the Schism between the Anti-Popes, had the more opportunity to subdue Bulgaria, Walachia, and carried great spoil out of Hungary. Sigismund King of Hungary, with the aid of Germans, French and English, about 100000 men, fought against 300000 Turks, and were overthrown An. 1397. Because Emmanuel would not follow Bajazet, and had made a league with some Princes against him, Bajazet went to besiege Constantinople, and had taken it, if the Lord had not raised up Tamerlan, King of Massagetes in Tartary, by the solicitation of some Turkish Dukes which were robbed by Bajazet. Tamerlan was admired for his power and success; he subdued Persia, Media, Assyria, Armenia, and all Asia between Tanais and Nilus. Bajazet left the siege of Constantinople to fight him at Prusa, where Bajazet was taken, in the 25 year of his reign. Tamerlan asked him, What he would do if he had him in that case? The Turk answered proudly, I would put thee in an iron Cage. Tamerlan did so with him, and carried him through Asia until he died. The Sons of Bajazet had Civil wars a long time, and killed one another. So the Christians in Europe had rest from the Turks, until Amurath the II. subdued Mustapha, the fourth Son of Bajazet, and recovered the former conquest: He returned against the Greeks in the days of John, the eldest Son of Emmanuel, because he had aided Mustapha. Laon. Chalcocon.

CENTURY XIV.

CHAP. III.

Of divers Countries.

*In the grossest darkness was

1. IN this Century grofs was the darkness both of ignorance and vitiousness in the body of the Church; the Preachers did not teach the knowledge of God, but sought their own gain; and the people could not but be ignorant; nevertheless, God raised some in all Estates, to note and rebuke the corruptions of the time, as followeth. It was not a small furtherance, that in the Council at Vienna, An. 1511. it was decreed, that in all Academies, there should be some expert in the Hebrew, Chaldee and Arabick languages, who should not only teach these languages, but translate their books into Latin, for the larger spreading of God's word, and the more easie conversion of Infidels: By the benefit of these languages, the light of God's word began to shine more clearly; and the Commentaries of Nic. de Lyra, on the Bible, was a good help, although in many things complying with the times: and some Greeks, fleeing from the oppression of the Turks, came into the West, and taught the Greek tongue, and translated some of the Fathers.

2. A shew and hope of reforming the Church, was made by Pope Clemens the V. in the Council at Vienna: It is clear therefore, that the corruption was known by the people, and a Reformation was wished. Clemens gave order to Durand Auditor Rotæ and Bishop Mimaten, to set in order some Articles of Reformation, to be propounded in the Council: The Treatise is extant, with this Title, De concilio celebrando, printed Lutetia, An. 1545. He beginneth at the Roman Clergy, saying, They have followed the way of Balaam, who loved the hire of iniquity, and was rebuked for his madness which hath hapned also in these days, seeing so foolish and unorderly things are done by Church-men, who should be a light unto others; they have offended the senses even of Pagans and Jews, so that such as have no knowledge of Divine reason do abhor their madness, and being wiser, reprove their wicked ways: He sheweth what might be the way of Reformation; to wit, in the holy Council, Kings and Bishops should conspire unto these things: 1. Recourse must be made unto the Law of God, unto the Gospel, and to Councils that have been approved by the inspiration of the holy Ghost, and unto good human Laws; whatsoever is found to have been attempted by men in government of the world, contrary unto these, let it be amended and reformed; and therefore away with all abuses, customs, dispensations, priviledges, and exemptions, that are contrary unto them. 2. Let the Popes conform themselves, their works and words, unto divine and human Laws; and give unto their inferiors, an example of things that should be done; or if they will shift from those Laws, and domineer rather then provide for their Subjects, their honor is puffed up with pride, and what was ordained for concord, is turned to dammage. 3. It cannot be denied, but the Roman Church, in many things, hath strayed from the primitive institution, and from the minde of the holy Fathers, Councils and Decrees, even so far, that the first institution is forgotten; but they should prefer the truth of the holy Scriptures unto all custom, how ancient soever it may seem to be. 4. The Pope should not suffer causes to be lightly brought from other Provinces unto his Court; now all order is confounded; the Pope giveth Benefices before they be vacant; and the proverb is to be feared as too true, He who coveteth all, loseth all. Here he inveigheth at the promotion of strangers, who are blinde leaders of the blinde, when they know not the language of their flock: And against Simony; which reigneth (said he) in the Court, as if it were no sin: Against the plurality of Benefices, and pensions wherewith Bishopricks are burthened to pay unto Cardinals; Benefices are bestowed on the Pope's Nephews and Friends; St. Gregory would not be called universal Bishop, nor suffer that name to be given unto any other; and the ancient Popes were wont to prefer the names of other Bishops unto their own; this he sheweth by instances; and concludeth the point thus; Every cause should be decided in its Province. 6. It seemeth profitable, that in the Council marriage be granted unto Priests. 7. Monks should be compelled to work with their hands, as anciently they should not be permitted to meddle with the office of Priests and far less should Friars be permitted to go a begging. 8. It is necessary to repress the abuse of images, the selling of indulgences and penances, and the impertinent discourses of Monks in their Sermons; for they leave the Scriptures, and preach the inventions of men. He often repeateth, There is no hope of reforming the Church, unless Rome begin with her good example; (and here, in the ninth place, he reckoneth their corruptions) for the universality of the Church is offended, and infected with the example of the Roman Church; and the leaders of the people, (as Isaiah saith) cause the name of God to be blasphemed; and (as Augustine saith) nothing is more hurtful unto the Church then the Clerks, who are worse then Laicks. He sheweth the rapines of the Legates, and other servants of the Court; the exactions for indulgences, for privileges and dispensations, from whence floweth the neglect or contempt of Religion; and all these are through the luxury and pride of Popes and Prelates, whose pride is greater then of all Kings and Princes. Here he taxeth the negligence and ignorance of the most part of them, and seemeth to despair of them in these words; Alas! that saying of Isaiah seemeth now to be too true of the Church, It shall be an habitation for dragons, and a Court for ostriches. . . . O that it were not true of our Clergy, which he saith, This people draw near unto me with their mouth, but their heart is far from me. He hath many such passages in the three parts of that Treatise; but no fruit followed so wholesome admonitions. Mornay in Myster.

3. Arnold de Villanova, a French man, (or Catalanus, as some say) wrote many books: In Colloquio Frider. & Arnol. he hath a remarkable History; Frederick King of Sicily, a religious Prince, said unto him, He had a purpose to do some remarkable service to the honor of our Savior, but two impediments were in his way, fear and doubt; he feared to be despised as a fantastical fool by the world, both of Clerks and Laicks; who are all careful of earthly things, but none of them favor of heaven: and he doubted, whether the Gospel be mans invention, or brought from heaven: three things did move him to doubt so; 1. He certainly knew by hearing and seeing, that Bishops and Clerks make a shew of Religion through custom, but they had no devotion; they are earnest in vain-glory and lusts, but they feed no souls unto salvation. 2. Monks and Regulars, professing Apostolical simplicity and poverty, do astonish men with their lewdness; they are so estranged from the way of God, that in comparison of them, not only the Secular Clerks, but even the Laicks are justified; their wickedness is so vile, that no Estate can endure them; they profess humility, poverty, and perfection of virtues, but no measure of virtue may be found in them; for humility, they are presumptuously proud, creeping into Kings Courts, Councils and Commissions; they intrude themselves into secular affairs, and if they be refused or rebuked, they become furious with viperous bitings; they attend feasts, and endeavor by any means to enrich themselves; they are false, ungrateful, deceitful and affected liars; in hatred, pertinacious; in preaching, pestiferous; disobedient

to superiors; and do openly avow uncleanness. The third cause of his doubt was; Whereas in former times, the Bishops of the Apostolical See sent their Legates unto the Nations, to know of their increase or decrease in Religion; was answered now no such thing is heard of, but their business is for worldly things. Arnold answered, His purpose is pious, and he should not leave it off; his fear, is a suggestion of Satan, hating the glory of God, and the salvation of souls; and he should vanquish such fear, by consideration of God's love, and the example of Christ, suffering the revilings of men. . . . As for his doubts, he might be sure that the Scriptures are the Word of God; Jesus Christ is the promised Savior, and the same God who created the world; which is clear, not only by the Articles of faith, but even by irresistible demonstration. His reasons are such as should rather confirm his faith; for the first two are null; because Christ, who is the foundation of the Church, hath foretold the defection and corruption of preachers, both by voice and Canonical Scriptures, and by revelation unto persons of both sexes; which the Popes, with great devotion, keep among the Archives of the Apostolical See; and I have seen and handled them in the holy City. And against the third motive, it may suffice what God had done in his time, and what he is about to do shortly; to wit, he had warned the See of Apostacy under Boniface the VIII. and under Benedict; for a certain man had told them, 1. That their Counsellors were the Ministers of Satan, under shew of Religion and zeal, drawing them from ancient purity. 2. Whatsoever those angels of Satan did advise them, they should not authorise and execute: And it was told them, if they shall condemn this warning, God shall cause them to feel here the presage of everlasting judgement; Boniface believed not this until he felt it: And it was told to Benedict by writing, that God would shortly pull him from his seat; and it came to pass, for he sate not thirty five days after that: And it was told them, That they who glory of evangelical perfection, are corrupters of evangelical doctrine, by wicked lives and pestiferous preaching; seeing the Friars, in their Sermons, do traduce them whom they do envy, and flatter such as they would rob; they deprave divine Oracles with false expositions, impertinent applications, and sophistical distinctions; they omit things necessary and useful, and in the spirit of Antichrist they seduce people from their ordinary shepherds; they go unto all Provinces, and buy the office of Inquisition; and like raging divels, they persecute all true believers with false calumnies, furious vexations, clamorous lyes, and unjust punishments, and yet none reproveth nor restraineth such madness: All this (said he) I have seen among the Apostolical writings. And it was contained in the same denuntiation, that these false prophets had conspired against the Divine truth; covenanting, that none of them should touch those passages of Scripture, which the Ancients had in their Commentaries expounded of false teachers; but to teach the Prophets rather than the Evangelists; that some of them taught, that the commission of man with man was no sin; and if any of their own society do rebuke their faults, he is condemned to death as superstitious, or enemy of their Religion; if any do appeal unto the Apostolical See, not for severity of discipline, but for corruption of the Gospel, he is imprisoned cruelly, or exiled; all the books, declaring the truth of the Gospel, and describing their ungodliness, are condemned to the fire, under pretence of superstition and error; for an ambiguous sentence, they persecute all who would live in evangelical poverty, whether without or within their order; some of them do always attend the Apostolical See, lest the complaints of the people come there; they are like the drake and ostrich; for the drake hath pleasure in waters, so they in fleshly lusts; and the ostrich hath feathers like an eagle, eagle, but never riseth from the earth; so their austerity of outward carriage is like to heavenly Religion, but their hearts cleave fast to earthly ambition They have forbidden all their fellows, under pain of death, to read the Scriptures declaring the truth; and they stop the fountain of living waters, from them that thirst after the water of life Seeing God hath foretold those things, and now hath twice denounced them; although the messenger was contemned, and cast into bonds, he is not moved, but continueth constant in the faith; neither should it move thee, O King, to doubt of the truth of the Gospel; and I know, that God will cause those things to be denounced the third time unto the Apostolical See; but determinately by whom, and where, and when, I cannot tell, because it is not shewed unto me; and if that man, whom God shall send, undertake it, and prosecute it with the zeal of Moses and Phinehas, he will, by the power of God, adorn it with excellent things, both old and new; but if he neglect it, be you assured, God will within these three years bring most fearful judgements, to the astonishment of the East and West, &c. The third denouncer was himself; and at that time began the contention between the Pope and Lewis. King Frederick was perswaded by these words, and wrote unto his Brother James, King of Arragon, of all these things; and received Letters from him, tending much to the same purpose. Mornay testifieth, that both the Letters of the date An. 1309. are extant; and the copies of them are full in Catal. test. ver. lib. 18.

4. Dantes Aligerius, a Florentine, was then famous for piety and learning, and an excellent Poet, saith Platin. in Bonifac. VIII. He wrote a book De Monarchia mundi, where he proveth, that the Pope is not above the Emperor, nor hath any power over him; he confuted that, which was called Donatio Constantini, that the Emperor neither gave such a gift, nor could give it: He derided the comparison of the Pope to the Sun, and of the Emperor unto the Moon; and averred contrarily, that the Pope hath his priviledges from the Emperor. In a Poem, of Paradise, in the Italian tongue, he complaineth, that the Pope, in stead of being a shepherd, is become a wolf, and driveth Christ's sheep out of the right way; that the preaching of God's Word is omitted, and vain fables of Monks and Friars, and Decretals, are most heard, the flock is fed with the winde: He saith, The Pope is the whore of Babylon, and the Patriarchs [or Cardinals] are the towers of it; in old time, the Church was persecuted by the sword, but now by famine, for the bread which was gave for her nourishment, is taken away. 1. Fox in Act. & Mon.

5 Robert, a French man by name and Nation, a Franciscan by profession, the longer he was in that order, he loved the Friars the worse; he lived about that time: A Treatise, under his name, is printed with the Prophecies of Hildegardis. In the sixth Chapter he speaketh in the name of God unto the Pope, saying, Who hath set this idol in my seat to rule my flock? he hath ears, and heareth not the voice of them who go down mourning into hell; he hath eyes, and seeth not the abomination of the people, and the Bacchanal excesses of their pleasures; how great evil doth this people before me? neither will he see them, unless he see a treasure Wo to the Idol, who shall be equal unto this Idol on the earth? he hath exalted his name, saying, Who shall controule me? they who ride on horses do serve me; what was not done unto my Predecessors, is done unto me, &c. This was his exposition of that in Zech. Wo to the Idol shepherd. In chap. 1. and chap. 12. Some prophecies. he describeth the Pope under the name of a serpent, who exalteth himself above measure, oppressing the small number of godly men, and hath many false prophets about him, to obscure the name of Christ, and advance the name of the serpent only. Again he saith, I was praying on my knees, mine eyes being lift up to Heaven, and I saw an high Priest clad in white silks before me; his back was towards the East, lifting up his hands towards the West, as Priests are wont at the Mass; his head appeared not; and as I marked more attentively, whether he had an head, I saw his head withered; and small like a tree: Then the Spirit of the Lord said unto me, It signifieth the condition of the Roman Church. Again he saith, As I was the same way exercised, I saw in the Spirit, and behold, a man walking in the same habit, carrying sweet bread on his shoulders, and very good wine by his side, and he held in his hands a round stone, biting it with his teeth, as an hungry man biteth bread, but he did nothing; then two heads of Serpents came out of the stone: and the Spirit of the Lord, instructing me, said, This stone is unprofitable and curious questions, wherewith the hungry souls are turmoiled, when they leave substantial things: And I said, What meaneth those two heads? He said, The name of the one is Vain Glory, and the other is Overthrow of Religion. It is to be observed, that about that time, the chief questions in the Schools were, Whether the bread of the Mass be turned into the body of Christ, or whether the substance of it evacuateth? what eateth a mouse, when she eateth the Sacrament? wherein subsisteth the accidents of the bread, whether in Christ's body, or by themselves? &c. Again he saith, I saw a clear Cross of Silver, like to the Cross of Toulouse, but the twelve apples of it, were like to vile apples that are cast out of the sea: What is this, Lord Jesus? The Spirit said, The Cross is the Church; which shall be clear with pureness of life, and shril with the clear voice of the truth preached: Then I said, What meaneth those rotten apples? The humiliation of the Church-men, which shall come to pass. Here he prophecied of the Reformation. Possevin in Apparto. 2. calleth this Robert, An excellent Preacher of the Word. Mornay in Myster. pag. 427.

6. Marfilius Patavinus wrote the book Defensor pacis, about the year 1324. there he debateth the question between the Emperor and the Pope: and by the holy Scriptures, Laws, Canons, and Histories Ecclesiastical and Civil, he maintaineth these positions; Christ is the only head and foundation of the Church: He made none of the Apostles to be universal Vicar of the Church; nor made he the other Apostles subject unto Peter: It is more probable, that Peter was never at Rome; far less had he his seat there, who had no fixed seat, as also not any of the Apostles: The fulness of power in any man, is a manifest lye, an execrable title, the beginning of many evils, and the use thereof should be discharged in a good Council: The authority of the keys, is that judiciary power that consisteth in dispensing the Word, the Sacraments and Discipline: Christ, whose Vicar the Pope calleth himself, did never exercise temporal authority on earth; he was subject unto the Magistrate, and so were his Apostles after his ascension, and they taught others to obey Princes: If a Pope usurp temporal authority, Princes should, by the Law of God, resist by word and deed, or they are unjust, and sin against God; and those who fight for the Pope, should be accounted the Soldiers of Satan: Unto the Pope belongeth not the election, nor confirmation of the Emperor; but contrarily, the Christian Prince, with consent of Clergy and People, should name the Pope; or if one be chosen in his absence, he should confirm him: If the Pope go astray, or be accursed, the Emperor should reduce him into the way, and judge him in a Council: When Peter lived, he might have fallen and erred; neither hath the Pope any priviledge against error: That that Christ said to Peter, I have prayed for thee, is to be extended unto the other Apostles: Only the Canon of the Bible is the fountain of truth; against which [Canon] we may not believe either Pope or Church: Concerning the sense of Scripture, or any Article of the faith, we may not believe the Pope and his Cardinals, seeing not once have they seduced silly souls into hell: The Christian Church is the universality of believers, and not the Pope and his Cardinals; she is represented in a lawful and general Council: A Council should be assembled by the Emperor, with consent of Christian Princes, as anciently it was always: The Word of God should be the only rule, and chief judge in deciding causes Ecclesiastical: Not only the Clergy, by Lay men also, if they be godly and learned, should have voice in general Councils: The Clergy and Synagogue of the Pope, is a den of thieves, &c. This book was printed at Basil, An. 1522. In another Treatise he saith, Good works are not the efficient cause of salvation, but causa sine qua non. Mornay. ibid. pag. 452. He was condemned as an Heretick by Pope John the XXIII. Catal. test. ver. lib. 18. Consider what a Modern could say more of this matter; and whether they shew not themselves to be ignorant of antiquity, who accuse us of novelty.

7. The same positions were held by John de Janduno, or Gandanensis, at the same time, as is manifest by his books, printed at Venice and Florence: So wrote also Luitpold, Bishop of Bamberg; namely, in a Treatise De Translatone Imperii, printed Lutet. An. 1540. he saith, The Authority of governing the Empire, belongeth unto the Emperor so soon as he is chosen; and the Coronation by the Pope addeth nothing, since Cæsar is not his vassal nor feudatory: The donation of Constantine is but a fable. He was also condemned by Pope John. Catal. test. ibid. Michael Cefenas, General of the Franciscans, was bolder, saying expressly, The Pope is the Antichrist; and Rome is Babylon, drunk with the blood of the Saints. Therefore Antonin. par. 3. tit. 21. cap. 5. reckoneth him among the poor men of Lions: For the Valientes still suffered persecution in sundry Countries, and under divers names, as the adversaries pleased to brand them: Many errors are imputed unto them by the writers of those times; but because they did abhor the Pope and his Court, they were reviled (as we have heard from Arnold de Villanova) and sought out to the fire; as An. 1302. Nogaret (the Father of him who took Pope Boniface the VIII.) was burnt in Aquitania. Clemens the V. caused it to be proclaimed, to take up the flag of the Cross against them; and destroyed 4000 near the Alps, whether they had fled. Platin. Others went higher unto the mountains, of whom some remained in his days, saith Antonin. par. 3. tit. 22. cap. 10. From them were the in-dwellers of Angromia, and adjacent parts, continuing until the Council at Trent. Trithemius testifieth of many that were burnt in Austria about that time; howbeit he, beliving the reports of malice, imputeth many errors unto them; yet he testifieth, that they abhorred the Mass, calling the Hosty, a god invented by man; the Church of Rome, a Synagogue of unbelievers, and not the flock of Christ: they denied all mens merits; intercession of Saints; the difference of days and meats, &c. He witnesseth also, that the professore of the same doctrine, were innumerable in Bohemia, Austria, and confine Countries; and that one of their Preachers, who was burnt at Vienna, had affirmed, that above 80000. embraced the same doctrine within those Provinces; and another, named Lombard, who was taken and burnt at Colein, avowed, that there were many of his Religion, within and about that City; and from those dregs (saith he) Bohemia is infected with these errors until this day.

But it was made known unto all the world; what was the doctrine of the Bohemians at Constance and Basil. Antonin. par. 3. tit. 21. cap. 5. faith, Many of them were burnt in many parts of the world; especially Picenum, or Marca Anconitana was full of them, and also Florence, whence many were exiled, and spread themselves even unto Greece. He called the Emperor Lewis a follower of them; he faith, Jo. Castillioneus and Francis Hacutara, two Franciscans, were burnt for the same doctrines. Pa. Æmilius faith, Under Charls, the fair King of France, were sublime engines, and most learned men; among them were some truly holy, and others, striving foolishly to exceed others, kept no measure, and became wicked; and it is uncertain to guess of the judgement and manners of some; the evils of the time were grievous to good men, who mourned secretly. P. Mornay. in Myster. pag. 440. & 454. About the year 1340. Conrade Hager, who was a Preacher at Wortzburg the space of twenty four years, taught, The Mass is not a sacrifice, nor available to quick nor dead; and money given for Masses is very robbery, and sacrilege of Priests: And certainly, as he condemned the false sacrifice, he declared the true: For such doctrine he was imprisoned. Fox in Act. out of the Register of Otho the VI. of Herbi. An. 1390. twenty four Citizens of Mentz were burnt at Binga for the doctrine of the Waldenses. Massius speaketh of more then twenty who were burnt in Province at Narbon, because they would not acknowledge the Roman Decretals, and called them contrary unto Scriptures.

8. There is an ancient record poetically compiled, of the date or year 1343. under the name Pœnitentiarii Asini; there a fox, a wolf, and an ass, are said to shrieve one another; first the wolf confesseth unto the fox, and was absolved easily; then the wolf heareth the confession of the fox, and sheweth him the like favor; and lastly the ass confesseth, that being hungry, he took a straw out of a sheave of corn that was upon an horses back going in pilgrimage unto Rome; he professeth repentance for the fault, yet thinking that it was not so hainous as the faults of the other two, he was confident of remission; but discipline was sharply executed upon him; he was condemned and slain. By the wolf, was meant the Pope; and the fox resembled the Priests: these do easily absolve one another; but the Laicks, who were meant by the ass, must suffer sharp censure; namely, if the German Emperor come under inquisition, he must be deprived; though the cause be but like a straw, yet the wolf faith, It is a great crime: So they, exagurating the escapes of the Laicks, they flie upon them, and devour them. Fox in Act.

Church.*

9. Francis Petrarcha, a Florentine, was Arch-Deacon of Parma, about the year 1350. a noble Poet, and honored with a Poetical Crown in the Capitole, in presence of the Nobility and people of Rome. Plain. In his Latine Epistles, which are full of gravity and zeal, he declareth his minde concerning the present condition of the Church, especially in those that have no title. In Epist. 8. he faith, Whatsoever is spoken of the Assyrian or Egyptian Babylon, whatsoever is written of the Labyrinth, of Avernus, of Tartarus, and the sulphurous Lakes, are but trifles in comparison of what we see now; here is terrible Nimrod and Semiramis, here is fearful Rhadamantus and greedy Cerberus, here is Pasiphae lying under Taurus, and that two natured Minotaur; briefly, you may see whatsoever confused thing. And in Epist. 9. he calleth himself a pilgrim of Jerusalem, about the rivers of Babylon. In Epist. 10. you do marvel at the superscription of my Epistles, and not without cause, seeing thou hast read of two Babylons only but marvel not: there is a third Babylon in our quarters; where can a city of confusion be said to be more justly, then in the West? who built it, I know not, but it is well known known who dwell in her, surely they from whom she hath her name; and if thou wilt believe, here is Nimrod potent in the earth, climbing into the Heavens against the Lord here is Cambyſes more furious then he in the Eaſt, or then the Turk. In Epift. 16. he ſheweth the dangers of good men, and lovers of truth; and then ſaith, Seeing without the Kingdom of vertue, filly and naked truth is deprived of all aid, what thinkeſt thou will be, where all vertue is dead and buried? ſurely there truth is the greateſt crime, and falleth under the hatred of many, becauſe all muſt hunt after the love of one man . . . where is no piety, no charity, nor faith; where pride, envy, avarice, and luxury do reign; where the worſt are promoted, and the bribing villain is exalted to Heaven, but the juſt and poor are oppreſſed; where ſimplicity is termed fooliſhneſs, and malice is wiſdōm; where God is contemned, money is worſhipped, Laws are trodden under foot, and good men have been ſo abuſed; that now not a good man can be ſeen: I would gladly exempt one from this deluge of ſin, and I confeſs he may deſerve it, but it is a ſcorn to except one; therefore no Noah, no Deucaleon ſhall eſcape; and leſt the woman be thought more happy; no Partha ſhall ſwim forth: this City is drowned with a deluge of filthy luſts, and with an incredible torrent of wickedneſs Unto this Epistle I have affixed neither my hand nor ring; nor time; thou knoweſt the voice of the ſpeaker; and where I am. In Epift. 16. he congratulateth a friend for leaving the Pope's Court; then he ſaith, If there may be any true preface, the God of vengeance is at hand; the Lord will freely deal his juſt reward, unto the inſolently proud is their own vengeance . . . I remember what long ſince, I ſaid unto one, (who among very evil men, was the beſt of our number; and to whom thou art joyned in blood, and I by acquaintance) that a laſt day is approaching unto that Order, when their pride ſhall fall, the patience of God and man being wearied out; and when he, between ſtubbornneſs and deriſion; did with unto me the blindeneſs of Tireſias, and objected the words, Simon, I have prayed for thee and I replied, that I ſpoke not of the defection of faith, but of the ruine of them who deſtroy the faith then he ſaid in earneſt, Hold thy peace; although it be true, yet let not us be the Authors whether they will or not, all things have their own time, and the end of illuſions is at hand; which that I may ſee, I ſhall not live ſo long. Behold! every good man was then waiting for the fall of Babylon, and the Reformation of the Church. In Epift. 17. he ſheweth, that againſt his admonition, this friend would try with his eyes, whether it were true what he had written; and by experience had found, that whatſoever wickedneſs was in the world, all did flow to Avenion, as to the Sea: Petrarcha ſaid further unto him, If thou worſhip Chriſt, as thou haſt done religiously hitherto, the wickedneſs of his adverſaries, which thou haſt ſeen, ſhall be a ſpur unto thy faith, and make thy piety more zealous; for thou ſeeſt a people, who are not only adverſaries of Chriſt, but (which is worſe) under his banner, they fight againſt himſelf, and for Satan; and being filled with the blood of Chriſt, they ſay, Who is Lord over us? Truly, if Judas would come with his price of blood, he ſhould be welcome, and poor Chriſt ſhould be thruſt from the doors; that it is ſo, no Chriſtian is ignorant; none bewaileth it, none ſeeketh remedy; but while one looketh unto another, wickedneſs is unpuniſhed, and waxeth as thou ſeeſt; and which at the firſt was a curable malady, is now altogether corrupt: I confeſs, it began before our days, as we have learned from our Grand-fathers and now this peſt looketh toward the end. In Epift. 18. he directeth his ſpeech to Babylon in France (that is, to Avenion) thus; Shall I call thee a famous or infamous whore; who hast played the harlot with the Kings of the earth? indeed thou art the same that the Evangelist saw in the Spirit; thou (I say) art the same, and none other for thee, sitting upon many waters; the people and Nations are the waters upon which thou sittest: Whore, know thy habit; a woman clothed in purple and scarlet, and gold and precious stones; having a golden cup in her hand, full of abomination, and uncleanness of fornication: Doeſt thou not know thy self, Babylon! unless that deceive thee, which is written in her forehead, Great Babylon, and thou art Little Babylon; little indeed in compass of walls, but in vices, and compass of infinite passions and lusts, and multitude of all evils, thou art great, yea greatest, yea infinite: And surely what followeth, agreeth unto thee and no other, Babylon the mother of fornications and abominations of the earth, a wicked mother of most wicked seed If thou wilt yet dissemble, mark what followeth; And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the Saints, and with the blood of the witnesses of Jesus: Why art thou silent? either shew another drunken with this blood, or if thou canst deny that thou art drunk; for the vision must be true of all the whoredoms wherewith all Nations and Kings are drunk, what lookeſt thou for, but that that John saith, Babylon is fallen, it is fallen, and become a den of divels, who do reign in thee, though with faces of men? Then returning to his friend, he saith, But thou, my friend, hear with the Apostle, another voice from heaven, saying, Come out of her my people, &c. Morn. in Myſter. pag. 465.

10. Hayabad, a Franciscan, preached in Avenion, An. 1345. before Pope Clemens, that he was commanded by God to declare, that the Church of Rome is the whore of Babylon; and the Pope and his Cardinals are the very Antichrist; and that his Predecessors, Benedict and John, are condemned. When the Pope challenged him, he said, He was commanded in a vision to speak so, and therefore he durst not fail to speak it. Catal. test. ver. lib. 18. ex Henr. de Erford. Chron. John Rochetalaida, another Franciscan, preached the same; and is said to be one of them who were burnt at Avenion, An. 1353. In the year 1351. a Carmelite, in a Sermon, spake against the vices of the Pope and his Cardinals; but he was quickly hurled from the place. Mornay. ex Albert. Argentin. The same Author saith, A Letter was affixed upon a Cardinal's door, which was directed unto the Pope and his Cardinals; when it was opened, they found written, Leviathan, Prince of darkness, saluteth his Vicar the Pope, and his Servants the Cardinals, by whose aid he overcometh Christ; he commendeth them for all their vices; and he remembreth the salutation of their mother pride, and of their sisters avarice, and others who prosper well by their help It was dated, In the centre of hell. The Author could not be known by all their inquisition.

-11. At the same time Gregory de Arimino, opposed the Doctors in the Articles of justification by works, and of free-will; at Paris he taught, that man hath free-will to do evil, but no good without special grace; and that we are justified by faith only: And he said, The School-men deserve to be called Semipelagians. Andreas de Castro and John Buridan, two famous men at that time, agreed with him.

12. Then Eudo, Duke of Burgundy, perswaded the French King, that he should not receive into his Realm the new Decretals and Extravagants. His sage advice is extant among the Records of France.

13. John Tauler, a Preacher in Argentine, about the year 1350. taught against all the merits of men; and in a Sermon upon that Text, Simile est Regnum cælorum Patrifamilias, he confuteth invocation of Saints; and proveth, that we are justified of grace only, referring all mens trust in the only mercy of God. He was bitter against all superstition. In a Sermon on the Epiphany, he saith, The Prelates are blinde guides of the blinde; and it is to be feared, that both guides and people fall into condemnation. In Dominic. 2. quadrages. on Matth. 13. he saith, We must do as the Cananitish woman; she passed by the Disciples, and made her petition unto the Lord himself. On his Sepulchre, in the Monastery of the Dominicans in Strawsburgh, is an image of a man, pointing with his finger unto the Lamb of God: whereby was signified, that his aim was to teach, that Jesus Christ had taken away the sins of the world; and that he dispised mans merits. Catal. test. ver. lib. 18.

14. John Rupeffa, or de Rupe Scissa, was imprisoned by Innocentius the IV. and then was burnt; because he called the Church of Rome, the whore of Babylon; and the Pope, the minister of Antichrist; and the Cardinals, false Prophets. He wrote in prison a book of Prophecies, with this title, Vade tecum in tribulatione; there he saith, Surely God will send a scourge among the spirituality. Two Cardinals went to talk with him, and he told them a parable; Once a bird was brought into the world, all naked and without feathers; other birds hearing of her, would visit her; they saw her marvelously fair, and pitying her that she could not live well without feathers, they consult how she might be helped, and they all resolved to give her some of their own feathers; so she was well furnished, and began to flie, and they delighted to behold her; but afterwards, she seeing that all the birds honored her, became proud, and struck them with her beak; she plucked the feathers off some, and the skin from others, and was hurtful unto them every where: Wherefore the birds sate again in Councel, and advised, what was best to be done with that unkindly bird; the peacock said, Seeing she is so haughty for my painted feathers, I will take them from her again; the falcon said, I will have none again: The sentence pleased them all, and they pulled every one their own feathers. Then the presumptuous bird, seeing that they had dealt so with her, humbled her self before them, confessing their gift; and that when she came naked into the world, they had clad her, and so might justly take their own again; in an humble maner she craveth pardon, and promised to amend all that was done amiss, that they should have no cause to complain. The gentle birds seeing her humbled, and pitying her, help her again, with this admonition, We will gladly behold thee flying among us, if thou fulfil thy office in humility, which is the chiefest ornament; but assuredly, if at any time thou shalt extol thy self in pride, we will reduce thee into thy first estate. Ye Cardinals and Prelates are this bird; the Emperor and other Princes have bestowed on you their goods, and ye abuse them in your pride; but the time is coming, when they will take their goods from you, and ye shall be ashamed, and confess your misdeeds. The Author of Catal. test. ver. lib. 18. addeth, Time hath declared a part of this, let Prelates take heed to the rest.

15. Matthias, a Bohemian, abode a long time in Paris, and was called Parisiensis; about the year 1360. he wrote a large Treatise of Antichrist; there he proveth that the Pope is the Antichrist: He inveigheth against the Clergy for negligence in their callings, and calleth them the locusts mentioned in the Revelation; he complainerh, that every City, and almost each man had his proper Saint, or Savior, besides Christ; the images and reliques that are set up in Churches to be worshipped, he calleth, the invention of Antichrist; he saith, The worship of God is not tied to persons, places nor times; he rebuketh the Cloisterers for contemning the Lay men, and calling themselves the only religious; he resuteth the merit of works, and calleth them the cause of salvation sine qua non. In the end he prophesied, that God will

is coming.

15. Nicolaus Orem, a Doctor of Divinity, had a Sermon before Pope Clemens the V. in time of Christ's Nativity. P. Morn. in Myfter. hath the heads of it; and it is full in Catal. test. ver. lib. 18. His text was in Isaiah 56. My salvation is near When he had shewed, that the words are meant of Christ's coming in the flesh, he speaketh of his coming to judgement, when he will punish the corruptions of the Church; unto which he applieth the text of Ezek. 16. In what day thou wast born, I saw thee Then he saith, Although it belongeth not unto us to know the times, yet by certain signs, some things may be guessed; of which I take the first from 2 Thes. 2. Unless there come a departing, the man of sin shall not be revealed. St. Jerome; in the last question of the Inquisitions of Januarius, expoundeth this text of the Roman Empire; between which and the persecution by Antichrist he putteth no distance; and now, what is the estate of the Empire, in respect of its ancient majesty, judge ye. The second sign, That the Church shall be worse in manners then the Synagogue of the Jews; Christ rebuked the Jews; because they suffered doves to be sold in the Temple; and they honored God with their lips only consider ye, if it be worse to sell the Sacraments and Benefices here are some honoring God with their lips, and yet dumb dogs Pastors are ignorant of true knowledge The third sign may be taken from that inequality; One is hungry, and another is drunk the Priests are greater then the Princes; and some are baser then the most abject commons The fourth sign, is the pride of Prelates The fifth sign, is the tyranny of Governors; the property of a Tyrant is to seek not the good of his subjects, but his own interest; such are our Pastors; of whom it is true, as it is written in Ezek. 24. and Mic. 3. Ye hate good The sixth sign, is the promotion of unworthy men, and the contempt of good men . . . The seventh sign, is the tribulation of worldly States, and commotion of Nations, which is seen in many places The eighth sign, is the refusing of correction; if it be true of the Princes of the Church, which is written Jerem. 7. They will not hearken, and have made their faces as an adamant. . . So if ye consider those signs, ye may judge, whether the present times be secure; and if it be true what God saith in my text, My righteousness is near to be revealed. Then he answereth some objections, saying, Some are very confident, and they say, The Prelates are the Church, whom God will keep forever; according to that, Behold, I am with you unto the end of the world; But that is to be understood in respect of the faith, which shall continue forever; so that when charity shall wax cold, faith shall abide in a few in the midst of calamities, as Christ hath foretold: And if any think that they are free from tribulation, because they are of the Church, the Lord hath prevented such, when he said, Jerem. 7. Trust not in lying words, saying, The temple of the Lord which shall not avail you Lastly, He concludeth with a serious exhortation to repentance. This Nicolaus, at the direction of Charls the Wise, translated the Bible into the French tongue:

16. Catharine of Sena, lived about the year 1376. Antonin hath her propheties in his Hist. par. 3. She said, An utter confusion of the Church, and a Reformation is a coming. When it was told her, The Perusines have rebelled against the Pope; she said, Begin not your mourning yet; what ye see, is but milk and honey in respect of things following the Laity do this now, but the Clergy will do more; for they give an universal scandal unto all the Church; it shall not be heresie, but accounted as heresie, that shall divide the Church. When the Schism began, after Pope Gregory the XI. Raymund, Raymund, who wrote the Legend, said unto her, Now is thy prophecy fulfilled. She answered, As I told then, It was but milk and honey, so now I say, What ye see, is but childrens play, in respect of what shall be. Antonin addeth, What this holy Virgin foretold of tribulation and schism, is come to pass; but what she spoke of good Pastors and Reformation, is not as yet. He was Bishop of Florence in time of the Council at Constance.

17. Pope Gregory the XI. by his Bull. commanded John, Arch-Bishop of Prague, to persecute Militizius, a Bohemian, because he had said, Antichrist now reigneth; and he had private congregations, among whom were some harlots, whom he had converted, and of whom he said, These are to be preferred unto all the religious Nuns. Jacob Misnes, a writer about the year 1410. testifieth, that Militizius said, He was moved by the Spirit to search the Scriptures, concerning the coming of Antichrist; as also to preach at Rome, that the Pope is the Antichrist; and that the Church is laid desolate by negligence of Pastors; she aboundeth in temporal riches, and is void of spiritual: Also that many now seem to deny Christ, because, though they know the truth; they dare not profess it, for fear of men. Fox in Act.

18. Henry de Jota, or Heuta, taught at Vienna in Austria, about the year 1380. All men without grace, do but sin when they do their best works; because the person must be accepted, before his works be accepted; God, and not a Priest, forgiveth sin; and the Priest doth but declare out of God's word, whom God doth binde or loose: As Jerome had taught, It is better to confesse unto a learned Priest, although he hath no jurisdiction, then to an unlearned Priest having it; reservation of cases unto the Pope or his Bishops, is not of God's Law, but from men, since all Priests have a like power of the keys; all God's counsels are commandments.

19. John Munziger, Rector of Ulme, about the year 1384. taught, The bread of the Eucharist is not God, nor should be worshipped as God. The Monks contended against him, and the matter was referred to the University of Prague; there his propositions were approved; and nevertheless, the bread must be worshipped, said they, for the concomitancy of the Deity.

20. Gerhard Ritter wrote a book about the year 1350. which he called Lachrymæ Ecclesiæ; about the year 1384. Alvarus Pelagius wrote another, Planctus Ecclesiæ; Ubertain, Bishop of Chema, wrote Onus Ecclesiæ: The matter of them all, is to mourn for the corruptions and abominations of Popes, Cardinals, Bishops, Canons, Priests and Monks, &c. Ubertain in cap. 19. saith, A Reformation shall never be, but in a general, free, and godly Council; he saith, There is great need of Reformation; but I fear, this age is not worthy of a lawful Council. In cap. 22. Some Monasteries are more like to Stews of Venice, then houses of God. Catal. test. ver. lib. 18.

21. About that time an Epistle was divulged in Germany, under the name of Wenceslaus, where the Emperor exhorteth Church-men to set themselves at liberty from the thralldom of the Pope; saying, By the Princes of the Priests, the Church is prophaned; the Priesthood is defiled; all order is confounded; all Religion is corrupted; all things belonging to laws, manners, faith or discipline, is undone and confounded; even that although our Savior suffered many things by men of the Synagogue, yet now he suffereth more by our Princes of Priests. There is also a vision of an holy man concerning the estate of the Church; He saw a woman with Princely apparel, and thought that she was the blessed Virgin; but she said, I am not she whom thou thinkest me to be; but the figure of her, for whom thou groanest so oft and prayest, to wit, the Church; whose sorrow is marvelous; and her malady flowing from the head through all the members, even to the feet; and that thou

mayest condole the more with me, behold the causes of my grief; then, laying off the Crown, she bowed her head unto him; and he saw the upper part of her head cut after the manner of a cross, into four parts, and worms crawling out of her brains, and wounds full of matter; then she said, Behold, by those things in my head, thou mayest understand the maladies in my other members; and having spoken so, she vanished. In this Epistle is honorable mention of Marfilius de Padua, and John de Janduno. Morn. in Myster.

22. John Peter, of Ferraria, a famous Lawyer of Papia, about the year 1397. is usually called Præficus Papiensis, as he wrote Præfca utriusque Juris: there he saith, It is fond to say, and abominable to hear, The Pope is superior to Cæsar: The Pope can by no Law have temporal dominion, nor possess Cities and Provinces; what he hath, he hath it by violence: The temporal sword should be taken from him, or Christendom shall never be at peace: By foolishness of Princes, are they become the drudges of Priests: Whom the Pope absolveth from their oath, he maketh them perjured: The Clergy have their consciences in their hoods, and laying them aside, no more conscience appeareth: Let some good Emperor arise against them, who long since for the cause of devotion, and now by avarice, have undone all the world, and brought to naught the estate of the Empire and of all Laicks. John Andrea (who was called Speculator & Monarcha juris) was wont to say, Rome was first founded by robbers, and now is returned to the same estate. All these, and more passages, are razed out by Index Expurgat. pag. 43. of Plantin's Edition.

23. In time of Boniface the IX. was published a dialogue of Peter and Paul, with the title, Aureum speculum. In the preface, the Author saith, All the Roman Court, from the sole of the foot to the top of the head, is manifestly blinded with errors; and with the poison of those errors, the hath made drunk all the parts of the world almost. Then he divideth his matter into three heads, saying, 1. I will describe the most grievous errors of the Roman Court. 2. I will confute her erroneous and uncatholick writings and sayings. 3. That all the Court of Rome is in danger of damnation: And these I will declare by most true grounds; so he prosecuteth them severally. And after many lamentations, as despairing of Reformation, Paul saith, Only the Son of God, I wish, would reform his Church. And lest it be thought that this was his judgement only; he said in the preface, All men do groan privately, but none dare speak it forth. Nor can this manifold corruption be concealed in the Court; for when some said, The Pope cannot be guilty of simony, even in bestowing of Benefices for money: his Secretary, Theodor a Niem, said, It seemeth unto me to be very unjust, certainly it is uncivil, and against good manners, to sell for money unto unworthy persons, that which should be given freely unto the worthy only; and that the Pope, who is above others, and from whom others should have a rule of their doings, is guilty of such a crime; certainly he cannot punish others for that fault, whereof himself is guilty: And he saith, Many good Masters in Divinity, and also in other Sciences, do lament, that simony is so frequent and manifest in the Court; and many Jurists do dispute in the contrary, and have written (although with fear) sundry Treatises, That the Pope, by selling Church-Benefices, is a Simoniack; a Successor of Simon Magus, and not of Peter.

24. About that time was written another book, De atatibus Ecclesie; therein the Author sheweth, what had been the estate of the Church in former ages; namely, that Bishops were not ambitious of superiority, or earthly authority; the Bishop of Rome had not supremacy above other Bishops; the name Papa was common to other Bishops; by divers steps the Pope hath usurped this tyranny; he calleth himself the Servant of Servants, and striveth to be Lord of all Lords; he taketh Divine honor and praise, and he maketh or suffereth men to be Idolaters. Catal. test. ver. lib. 18.

25. In the end of that Century, or beginning of the next, lived Nilus, Arch-Bishop of Thessalonica, who wrote two books of the causes of the Schism between the Greek and the Latine Churches. In Lib. 1. he saith, The cause is not the sublimity of doctrine, surpassing mens capacities; and far less is it any word of holy Scripture, as if it did not declare what concerneth this controversie; for to accuse the Scripture; is all one as if man would accuse God. . . . What then is the cause of the difference? the question is not confirmed by a Decree of an Oeconomical Synod; and the Romans would be Masters, and make all others their disciples. . . . It is very absurd, that whereas the Fathers had no precedents, yet by themselves they saw the right; we having their examples, cannot discern it; and indeed the ignorance of those at the first contention might be pardoned. . . . but when so many ages have passed, and the way of peace is not as yet known, who can think but it is the fault of them who will not have peace? But they say, The Pope is the Prince of Priests, and the Father, who hath power to call universal Synods, and by himself, or without others, may discern in Church-affairs. But Julius was Pope, and Damasus, and Leo, and Agatho, and none of these ever said so; but convening with their Brethren, by the assistance of the good Spirit, they established Acts and peace in the Church: And if this was the only way, and it is not now observed, who can doubt but the cause of the variance standeth herein? and certainly the blame lieth not upon our side. And if the power of discerning belong unto the Pope, it were superfluous to call Assembly; but it is not so; for we know that Agatho, Celestin, and others, had their particular Synods for deciding questions, and nevertheless, they referred those unto the universal Synod, and craved the confirmation of the truth by common decree; which had been needless, if when the Pope had discerned, all others must assent unto him. Now if this question were concerning a private man, it might seem needless to call all the world unto an Assembly; but seeing the chief heads of the world are at variance, it is absurd to determine the cause without the consent of the world, since the Fathers by their writings and example have shewed the way. But if they will still object unto us the primacy of the Pope; we say, that in so doing, he overthroweth his primacy; but by holding the ancient way, he doth what becometh a good man, and maintaineth his place; for he may consider what should be the issue, if the controversie were decided after common suffrage; and what hath hapned unto the Latines, arrogating unto themselves the power of prescribing Laws; for in that way the Church might be free from all tumults, and live in peace, since none could readily contradict that which was established by common sentence; for though some in former times have been so mad, yet they were but few, and vanished soon: But when the peace of the Church is disturbed, he loseth what he might have; for he is deprived of the primacy of the four Patriarchs, neither is there any peace: Many have thought upon remedies; there have been many conferences and Ambassays; but the malady continueth, and shall continue so long as the Latines hold their tenets. The Pope, say they, hath power in Ecclesiastical affairs: So say I, let him not be contrary unto the Decrees of the Fathers; they established things by universal Council; and each had need of anothers aid, being conscious of humane frailty: let the Pope therefore follow their statutes, and discern not any point before it be debated by others: or if he hath his power, not from the Fathers, but from the Apostles, let him hearken unto the Apostle, who said, I have not used my power, lest I lay a stumbling-block unto the Gospel of Christ; and in another place, The power which the Lord hath given us to edification, and not to destruction: And therefore if he hath any power, let him not use it but for advancing the Gospel; to the end, that in following Paul's example, he may shew himself an Apostolical man; but now none can be ignorant; whether he useth it for edification or destruction And that president of the twelve Apostles, St. Peter was rebuked by Paul, and when he was rebuked, he was silent; and although he might have said more reasonably then the Pope, What! the President have done, should be a law unto others; yet he said not so, but accepted the admonition, and contradicted not what Paul had said And when Paul and Barnabas came to Jerusalem, for that question of the circumcision, Peter usurped not primacy, nor said he, It belongeth unto me to discern in such things; but the Apostles and Elders were assembled; neither did Peter debar the Apostles usurping power; nor did the Apostles exclude the Elders that were at Jerusalem, for they had learned from Christ to usurp no primacy: Peter indeed began to speak, and after him St. James; and all the rest of the Apostles and Elders, even Peter himself, consented unto the words of James; so did these blessed men love Christ, and so studious were they of peace and truth in the Church; and the Apostles seeking truth this way, have given us a law in such cases; but seeing ye take a contrary course, can ye blame any but your selves for this variance? This is a touch of more; whence we see, that the Romans wanted not admonition.

26. With the book of this Nilus, is usually printed another of Barlaam, a Greek Monk, to the same purpose. In cap. 16. he recapitulateth all the particulars that he had handled, saying, I have shewed, that each one of the Apostles were immediately appointed by our Lord Christ, to be a Pastor and Teacher of the whole earth. 2. That blessed Clemens was created by Peter, not Bishop of the whole world, but of Rome especially and properly; and that the Roman See was neither first nor last; and by the Laws of ancient Fathers and godly Emperors it became the first. 3. That these also had decreed, that the Sec of new Rome, even as the other, should have power in Ecclesiastical affairs. 4. That it was commanded by no Law, nor was any Custom, that the Patriarchs should be ordained by the Pope, neither was it ever so done. 5. That the Pope had no power over Councils, but they gave Laws unto his Church. 6. That the holy Fathers appointed distinctly what parts should be subject unto the Pope, and which unto each of the Patriarchs. 7. That no Patriarch, nor the Pope, may decree without the knowledge of all, any thing of more weight. 8. That such honor should be given unto the Pope, obeying the decrees of the Fathers; but if he obey not, men should flie from him as a wolf and adversary. 9. That Christians should believe the Catholick Church or faith, but not any particular Church, since it was not so ordained from the beginning. 10. And lastly, That such as refuse or despise the traditions of the Apostles, and profess to believe a particular Church or faith, are members cut off from the body of the Catholick Church, and dead members. Here, for clearing the second Article, I add the words of cap. 3. where he objecteth, (as the Romans do) That Peter died at Rome, and therefore the Roman Bishop should have as full power. He answereth, By this reason it followeth, Because our Lord Jesus died for us at Jerusalem, the Bishop of Jerusalem, succeeding in the place of the great high Priest, should have power over all; and so much more then the Roman Bishop, as Christ was above Peter: Moreover, how unreasonable is it to say, that none of the Apostles had a Successor, but only Peter? or if any of the Apostles would leave Successors, either the Bishops that were ordained by them, or the Stewards of those those Churches where they ended their lives, how say ye, that all should be created by the Pope? can ye say, that the other Apostles were ordained by Peter? and if that was not, how can it be demanded, that their Successors should be ordained by him, whom ye call Peter's Successor? but certainly the other Apostles had Successors, of whom none was first or last, but all equal, and of the same rank. Then concerning the eighth point, in chap. 14. he saith, The Pope cannot be an Heretick: Unto this objection he answereth, What say you? I see him dead, and you say, he cannot die. Object. Many Patriarchs have been Hereticks, but not one Pope. Answer. Let Macedonius say, No Patriarch of Constantinople before me was an Heretick, therefore neither am I one; or rather, to use a more familiar example, if any would plead the cause of that filthy woman, who was Pope, and say, Because never a woman was Pope before her, therefore neither was she one; what sound reason is in such arguing? In chap. 15. he clearly distinguisheth between the Catholick Church and the Roman; and as no man did ever name the Roman Church, when he meant the Catholick Church; so no man, being right in his wit, did ever name the Roman faith, when he meant the Catholick faith; and that Catholick or common faith, we have hitherto preserved, and God guarding us, we will observe it unto the end, saith he.

27. In the end of this Century John Vitodura, a Franciscan in the Monastery of St. Montis, wrote the History of his time; speaking of Pope John, he saith, O what a Successor hath blessed Peter in the See of the high Priesthood, who forgetting the office of humanity, piety, and of a shepherd, liveth a tyrannical life! how could Peter think, that the estate of his Chair and Church could be so enormously perverted, in the latter days, from the rule of righteousness? he was not to be praised, because, it seemeth, he sat not in the pestilential chair. And ad An. 1344. he saith, O God, how great avarice and worship of Idols hath defiled and deformed the Church! how could, or how would Peter and the other Apostles, or their Successors, the Martyrs and Teachers, which laid the foundations of the militant Church, and abode immoveable in the faith and actions of Christ, how could these (I say) have believed, that in our time, the estate of the Church, that was so famous and glorious, could be made filthy in such a manner, with the pestiferous root of avarice? Alas! she is torn and wounded in all her members, and none is for binding her fractures; none to comfort her, or to cure her wounds; she is consumed in her crimes; she is fallen so grievously into the pit of vices, that she cannot rise by her self, nor is there any to raise her; all have gone astray, like wandering sheep; every one hath gone after his own way, which is not right; because her fathers would not be befooled with the love of earthly things: So the word of Jeremiah is fulfilled, From the highest to the lowest, all are set on covetousness: And the word of Micah is true, The Princes judge for gifts, and the Priests teach for a reward, and the Prophets divine for money. This poisonous root, avarice, with its small branches, execrable simony, plunder, theft, and especially devouring usury, hath infected and devoured the world in such measure, that John hath spoken most properly in his Canonical writings, The whole world lieth in wickedness. And An. 1345. at that time the secular and religious Clergy, which had resumed in the Imperial, and other places, lying under the Papal interdiction, did obtain absolution from the Roman Court, when other Clarks did continue freely, and without fear, in celebrating; and such absolution was purchased easily, for a florene: Oh how lamentable and execrable a breach is made in the Church at this time! that saying of the Gospel is now-made null, Ye have received freely, give freely. And ad An. 1348. speaking of the same Papal interdictions, he saith,

G g g g g

Some

Some of them for absolution of men, and for reconciliation of Churchyards, did collect incredible and immoderate sums of money, and did extort from them which were to be absolved, which is miserable and horrible to be spoken; for in the hearts of very many it caused scandal, scruple of the faith, perplexities, detractions, grumbings, infidelity, clamors, commotions, fear and suspicion of simoniacal wickedness; for they said, The Clergy despise, tear and defile, scatter and confound the Church of God, and Spouse of Christ; they divide her integrity, they wound her charity, they harden her benignity and meekness, they weaken her zeal, they shut up her liberality with the knots of covetousness, by withdrawing her from voluntary gifts not regarding the curse of Gehazi and Simon, being hardened in their wickedness: Oh how vile is the Church become in her principal members! all beauty is gone from her; because they which should enlighten her with true doctrine, do darken her with the blackness of error and mist of vices: And the people say, (I use their words) If it be lawful to celebrate for a penny, it were far better and precious to celebrate without pennies; this they say, thinking that simony is committed in these exactions: Oh how great a wickedness and madness, to exact forty, fifty or sixty florens for the absolution of a City, and relaxation of a Church-yard! I am silent of other things; simple and secular people do abhor all these things.

28. Jagielo, Duke of Lituania, was married to Hedwigis, Queen of Poland, An. 1386. with condition, that he should embrace the Christian faith, and annex that Dukedom to the Crown of Poland; he and his three Brothers, Borissus, Snidrigielo, and Vidold, were baptized at Cracow, Febr. 14. The next year he called a general convention of all the people of Lituania at Vilna, in the beginning of Lent, and took with him the Bishop of Gesna, and some Priests: There he propoundeth unto them the forsaking of their Idolatry, and the embracing the Christian Religion; he allured them with exhortations and promises; but the Priests being ignorant of the language, could teach them nothing at all: The barbarous people were loath to leave the customs of their Ancestors; but when they saw, that at commandment of the King, the fire in the Temple of Vilna to be extinguished, and the Altar broken, and the Serpents (which they had worshipped) to be killed and dead, and their holy groves destroyed, without the hurt of any man, the people wondered, and said, How is it, that our gods do not revenge themselves on these wicked Christians? if any of us had done the like, we had perished by the wrath of the gods: Then were they willing to follow the Religion of their Prince; and because it had been wearisome to baptize them all, this honor was given to some of the Nobles, to baptize them severally; and the vulgar sort were set in companies, and the Priests cast water upon them, and gave unto every company a name, saying, I baptize ye in the name, &c. and so in one day 30000 barbarous people were baptized. Ale. Guaguin. in Ker. Polon. To. 1.

29. Nicolaus de Lyra, a Jew by birth, and then a converted Christian, wrote Annotations on all the Bible, which were in great account among the School-men; but in many Articles of faith he differeth from the Papists now, as appeareth clearly by these passages. When Jerome had written in Prolog. in lib. Tobie, The book of Tobiah, which the Jews (following the catalogue of divine Scriptures) have reckoned among those which they call Hagiographa, de Lyra saith, He should rather have said, among the Apocrypha, or he taketh the Hagiographa largely: And in his Postilla, he saith, When I have written (as God hath helped) upon all the Canonical books of the holy Scriptures trusting in his help, I intend to write of the other books which are not of the Canon, to wit, the book of Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Judith, Tobias, and the books of Maccabees. We must know, that the books of the sacred Scriptures, which are called Canonical, are of such authority, that whatever is written there, it is held true without controversie, and consequential also, what is manifestly concluded thereupon; for as in the writings of Philosophers, truth is known by reducing unto the first principles that are known in themselves; so in the Scriptures of Catholick Doctors, truth is known, in so far as things to be believed, can be reduced unto the Canonical writings of the sacred Scripture, which we have by revelation from God, who cannot lye; therefore the knowledge of these writings is necessary unto the Church; for which cause, of the exposition of them, it may be said, what is written Eccles. 24. All these are the book of life; that is, all the books that are expounded in the preceding work, are contained in the book of life; that is, in the books of truth revealed by God, who is life; for as divine predestination is called the book of life, so this Scripture, revealed by God, is called the book of life, both because it is from him which is life essentially, as is said, and it leadeth unto the blessed life. And next it is to be considered, that the books which are not of the Canon, are received to be read by the Church for information of manners; but their authority is not such, that they are thought sufficient to prove things in controversie, as Jerome teacheth in the Prologue on Judith, &c. On Deut. 17. at the words, Thou shalt not decline, he saith, Here an Hebrew Glossa saith, If he say unto thee, The right hand is the left hand, or the left is the right, thou must receive such a sentence: But this is manifestly false, since the sentence of no man, of whatsoever authority, is to be received, if it be manifestly false or erroneous; and this is clear by what is said in the text, They shall judge unto thee the truth of judgement, and they shall teach thee according to his law. Hence it is clear, that if they speak false, or decline from God's Law manifestly, they should not be heard. On Psal. 124. or rather 125. on these words, Like mount Sion, he saith, because, as mount Sion is unmoveable, so they who trust in the Lord, are not moved from the stability of faith; therefore it followeth, shall not be moved for ever, to wit, who dwell in the spiritual Jerusalem by faith formed by love: And the cause of this stability followeth; The mountains are about it; that is, the Angels are deputed to keep the Church, and the Lord is round about his people; as he saith in Matth. ult. Behold, I am with you unto the end of the world. On Daniel, at the last words, he saith, The last two Chapters, to wit, of Susanna and the History of Bell and Dragon, are not of the Canon; therefore now I leave them, and intend to take in hand the other books which are Canonical. On Matth. 1. at the words, Judah begot Phares, he rehearseth an opinion of Jerome, which he confuteth; and he addeth a general reason, saying, The sayings of Saints are not of such authority, but we may think the contrary in those things, which are not determined by the sacred Scripture; therefore Augustine in Epist. ad Vincent. saith, of the writings of the Saints, This sort of writings is to be distinguished from the Canonical Scriptures, and testimonies are not brought from them so, that we may not think the contrary. On chap. 10. at the words, He gave them power over unclean spirits, he saith, If it be asked, Why Preachers do not such miracles now? Gregory answereth, Because when the Catholick faith is sufficiently proved by the miracles of Christ and his Apostles, it is needless to reiterate such proof any more. And a little after, Ye have received freely, to wit, grace, which God hath bestowed on you, whether grace making acceptable, or grace which is freely given; Give it freely, even as ye have received; for for spiritual acts, as for administration of the Sacraments, preaching, and the like, nothing should be received as a price. This is against the practise of that time, as we have now heard in the testimony of Jo. Vitoduran, On chap. 16. He calleth Peter blessed, because the confession of true faith leadeth unto blessedness. . . . and I say unto thee, i. e. for thee and thy companions, thou art Peter, i. e. a confessor of the rock, which is Christ, and upon this rock, which thou hast confessed, i. e. upon Christ, will I build my Church, and the gates of hell, i. e. persecution of tyrants, the assaults and tentations of evil spirits, shall not prevail against her, to turn from the true faith: Whence it is clear, saith he, that the Church consisteth not by men, in respect of power or dignity Ecclesiastical or Secular, because many Princes, and chief high Priests, and others inferiors, have made apostasie from the faith; and therefore the Church consisteth in those persons, which continue in true knowledge and confession of the faith and truth. By these few words he overthroweth the Popedom, as it is taught now. And then he saith, These keys are not material, but are a spiritual power, which is two-fold; one a power of discerning sin from what is not sin; as under the Law, the Priests discerned between leprosie and not leprosie: But observe, that although one cannot discern this without knowledge, yet knowledge is not the key, but a power of judging by knowledge, which he must first have; and therefore, although knowledge is not the key, yet it is necessarily requisite unto the due exercise of the key. The other key is the power of receiving into the Kingdom, or of shutting out, according to true judgement; for the unworthy should be excluded, and the worthy should be received. On Ephes. 1. at the words, Before the foundation of the world, he saith, The election is from eternity, but the effect thereof is in time; which effect, is the sanctification of the reasonable creature; therefore it followeth, that we should be holy . . . according to the pleasure of his will; from which dependeth election and predestination, and not for our merits, not onely in deed, or actually, but also in the foresight of God.

The third age

30. The third age of the School-men began from the year 1320. or thereabout, and continued until 1516. of the condition whereof we have had somewhat by the way; but because we promised to speak of it, here we add more particularly. The School-men of this age had a three-fold power, teaching in Schools, preaching in Pulpits, and giving Indulgences; of their Inquisition is enough before: For the little modesty of former ages, was now turned into impudence; for because in their Inquisition, they had refused the holy Scriptures to be their rule, now in their Schools they durst say, The Scriptures are the buckler of Hereticks; and therefore all Laicks must be discharged from reading the Scriptures, under no less pain, then to be accounted Hereticks: They blamed the Scriptures of obscurity, imperfection, ambiguity, and compared it unto a nose of wax. Will, Tindal, in his book of obedience, Edit. at Marlborough in Hesse. An. 1528. fol. 16. saith, The Scripture (say they) is so hard, that thou couldest never understand it but by the Doctors; that is, I must measure the measuring yard by the cloth. . . . They will say yet more shamefully, None can understand the Scriptures without Philautia, that is, Philosophy; a man must be well seen in Aristotle, before he can understand the Scripture, say they. And fol. 62. They pervert the holy Scripture, and all Doctors, wresting them unto their abominable purpose, quite contrary to the meaning of the Text, and circumstances going before and after; which divellish falsehood, lest the Lay-men should perceive, is the very cause why they will not suffer the Scripture to be in English. Then also it began to be doubted among them, whether the Pope be a god or a man, or neither of the two; to be the Vicar of Christ, was thought to be a small honor. In Proam. Clementin. Iohannes Epist. the Gloss. at the word Papa, saith,

Nec Deus est nec homo, sed neuter inter utrumque: And in the margin, Papa nec Deus est nec homo. Pope Pius the V. in his Edition, An. 1572. was ashamed of these words, and left them out: But Pope Gregory the XII. in his recognition, An. 1580. omitteth the words of the margin; and in the Gloss the words are thus, Papa, id est, admirabilis; & dicitur à Papa, quod est inter-jectio admirantis; & verè admirabilis, quia vices Dei in terris gerit. Inde dixit ille Anglicus in pœtria nova, Papa stupor mundi, & circa finem, Qui maxima rerum, Nec Deus es, nec homo, sed neuter inter utrumque, Etymologia verè nominis est, pater patrum. But the man of sin is yet advanced higher; therefore in these extravagants Ioha. XXII. tit. 14. c. Cum inter nonnullos, the Gloss saith, To believe that the Lord God, our Pope, cannot ordain otherwise, it is heretical. Ye may see such other passages in Morn. Mysser. pag. 444, 445. and Spalaten. de Repub. Eccles. lib. 2. cap. 6. §. 15. cited out of their books. So those times were darkened with clouds of most gross ignorance, and diabolish illusions. And who can any more doubt but the Pope is the Antichrist? we have heard not onely the profession of their opposites, and the confessions of those which were held to be Popes, and called Antipopes, calling one another the Antichrist; but likewise we see the gloriation of the Popes, admitting that title, The Lord God, our Pope; and not only laying the Scriptures in their footstool, but despising them, and preferring their own Canons and traditions in comparison of the sacred Scriptures. But to make more clear what was the order of the Schools in that age, hear yet more from Will. Tindal, in that book and place cited; One of you teacheth contrary to another; when two of you meet, the one disputeth and brawleth with the other, as if it were two scolds: and for as much as one of you holdeth this doctrine, and another that, as one followeth Duns, another St. Thomas, another Boneventure, Alexander de Hales, Raymond, Lyra, Brigot, Dorbel, Holcot, Gorran, Trumber, Hugo de S. Victor, de Monte Tegio, de Nova Villa, de Media Villa, and such like out of number; so that if thou hadst but of every Author one book, thou couldst not pile them up in any ware-house of London; and every Author is contrary to another; in so great diversity of spirits, how shall I know, who lieth and who saith truth? And fol. 18. speaking of the same School-men, he saith, Ye drive men from God's word, and will let no man come thereunto, until he have been two years Master of Art; first they nosel them in sophistry, and in bene fundatum, [in the margin he saith, The School doctrine, as they call it] and there they corrupt their judgements with apparent arguments, and with alledging unto them texts of Logick, of natural Philantia, Metaphysick, moral Philosophy, and all manner of books of Aristotle, and of all manner of Doctors: One holdeth this, another that; one is a real, another a nominal. What wonderful dreams have they of their predicaments, universals, second intentions, quiddities, heccities and relatives? and whether this proposition be true, Non ens est aliquid? whether ens be equivocum or univocum? Ens is a voice only, say some; ens is univocum, saith another, and descendeth into ens creatum & increatum per modos intrinsecos. When they have this way brawled 8, 10, or 12. years, or more, and after that their judgements are utterly corrupt, then they begin their Divinity, not at the Scripture, but every man taketh a sundry Doctor; which Doctors are as sundry and divers, the one contrary unto the other, as there be divers fashions and monstrous shapes, none like another among our Sects of Religion; every Religion, every University, and almost every man hath a sundry Divinity: Whatsoever opinions every man findeth with his Doctor, that is his Gospel, and that only is true with him, and that he holdeth all his life long; and every man to maintain his Doctor, corrupteth the Scripture, and fashioneth it after his own imagination, as a Potter doth his clay. [And in the margin; Yet in this they all agree, That no man is saved by Christ, but by holy works; and that Christ hath given up his God-head unto the Pope, and all his power; and that the Pope may give Christ's merits to whom he will, and take them from whom he will.] Of what Text thou provest Hell, another will prove Purgatory, another Lymbus patrum, and another the Assumption of our Lady; and another will prove out of the same Text, that an Ape hath a tail: and of what Text the Gray-Frier proveth, that our Lady was without original sin, out of the same shall the Black-Frier prove, that she was conceived in original sin; and all this they do with apparent reasons, with false similitudes, and with arguments and perswasions of mans wisdom. . . . The wisdom of one is, that a white coat is best to serve God in, another a black, another a gray, another a blew; and while one saith, God will hear your prayer in this place, another saith, in that place; and while one saith, this place is holier, another saith, that place is holier; this Religion is holier then that; this Saint is greater with God then that; and an hundred thousand such things, &c. And if ye will, hear a Papist writing of those times, Corn. Agrip. De triplici ratione cognoscendi Deum c.4. & de vanitat. scien. c.97. describes them thus; Scholastical Divinity, by little and little, is turned into Sophistry; while the latter Theosophists, and hucksters of God's word, which are Divines, but by a bought title, of so sublime a faculty, have made a kind of Logomachy, moving questions, forging opinions, and doing violence unto the Scriptures by intricate words, putting a strange sense upon them, readier to winnow then examine, presuming to device many seminaries of contentions, whereby they furnish matter of strife unto the wrangling Sophists, when they abstract forms, call the words genera & species, some cleave to the things, and others to the names; and what they take from one, they ascribe unto another, and some take it indifferently, and every one studies how to prove his own heresie; and they turn the sacred faith into sport and infidelity (whereof Tho. Aquin. did complain) among the wise of this age, while they dispise the Canonical Scriptures of the holy Ghost, and chose unto themselves many questions of divine things to foster brawlings, wherein exercising their wits, and wasting their time, they will have all the doctrine of Divinity to consist in such things. If any will oppose unto them the authority of the holy Scriptures, he shall hear anon, The letter killeth, it is pernicious, it is unprofitable; but say they, we must search what is hid in the letter; and then turning to their interpretations, glosses and syllogisms, they allow any sense rather then the proper sense of the words. If you do urge them instantly, you shall receive reproaches, and be called an ass, which understands not what is hid in the letter, but as a serpent, eateth the earth only; so that among them, none are thought to be Divines, but who can contend to purpose, and give an instance in every matter, and quickly devise new meanings, making a noise with so monstrous words, that he be understood by none: and then are they called Subtle, Angelical, Seraphical and divine Doctors, when they talk so that no man understands them. These wicked Hypocrites, and presumptuous Sophists, which (as Paul saith) teach not Christ of good will, but for strife, have brought in so many heresies, that the Philosophers shall sooner accord then these Divines, which have killed all that glory of ancient Divinity with opinions of men and new errors, and labyrinths of infinite expositions which they have devised; under disguised titles, they profess detestable doctrine, and falsely usurp the name of sacred Divinity; and abusing the names and doctrine of the holy Doctors, they introduce Sects, as it was said in the Church, I am Apollo's, I am Paul's, I am Cephas's. pretending regard of them by whose means they began to know; and swearing to the words of their Master, they dispise all others, not regarding what is said, but who hath said it: And no Divine is thought to be truly learned; which hath not addicted himself unto some Sect, and maintains it stoutly, and covets to be named and advanced by the title thereof, as a Thomist, Albertist, Scottist, Occamist; for it is no credit unto such Masters to be called Christians, since that name is common to Butchers, Cooks, Bakers, and every body; and these Sectators are divided again many ways. . . . Moreover, they do forge so many strange things of God, so many forms of the God-head, and so many Idols of phantasies concerning divine things; and they pull Christ our Savior into pieces with the wickedness of their opinions, and clothe him with so many vizards of sophisms, and as an Idol of wax, they forge and reforge him into any shape they please, by their absurd suppositions, that their doctrine may be called meer Idolatry. I pass over the debates and heresies concerning the Sacraments, Purgatory, Primacy, the commandments of Popes, and obligations thereunto; concerning Indulgences, Antichrist to come, and many such things, wherein they shew mad wisdom, with the presumption whereof they are puffed up, like the Giants in the Fables. Then coming to the Preachers, he saith, They make stories of the Saints, with pious lyes; they counterfeit reliques, they devise miracles, and (which they call examples) plausible and terrible fables, they number prayers, weigh merits, measure ceremonies, sell indulgences, distribute pardons, make merchandise of good works, and by begging, they eat the sins of the people; and they spake as assuredly of the apparitions, adjurations, and responses of the dead, as if they had learned them from the books of Tundalus and Brandarius, or from St. Patrick's cave; they play the Tragedies of them in Purgatory, and the Comedies of Indulgences in Pulpits, as on a Stage, with so Soldier-like boldness, so thraasonical boasting, so arrogant eys, changing their countenances, stretching out their arms, with so various gestures, as the Poets feign Proteus, transforming themselves; they thunder unto the people with windy tongues, and Stentor's voice: But they which are more ambitious among them, and would have the gallantry of eloquence, and perfect knowledge, these in crying, (I would say, declaring) sing poesies, tell stories, dispute opinions, cite Homer, Virgil, Juvenal, Persius, Livius, Strabo, Varro, Seneca, Cicero, Aristotle, Plato; and for the Gospel and word of God, they prattle meer toys and words of men, preaching another gospel, adulterating the word of God, which they preach not in sincerity but for gain and reward; and they live not according to the truth of the word, but after the lusts of the flesh; and when in the day they have spoken of vertue erroneously; they bestow the night in the Stews; and this is their way to go unto Christ, &c. Erasmus in his Annotations on 1 Tim. 1. at the word Vaniloquium, speaketh of the School-men at that time thus; What shall I say of ungodly questions, which are made concerning the power of God and of the Pope? whether God can command any evil, as to hate himself, and forbid all good, even the love and worship of himself? whether he can make a thing infinite in respect of all dimensions? whether he could have made this world, even from eternity, in a better condition then he hath made it? whether he could have made a man that cannot sin? There is more work concerning the power of the Pope, while they argue of his two-fold power, and whether he may abrogate what is decreed in the writings of the Apostles? whether he may decree what is repugnant unto the doctrine of the Gospel? whether he may make a new Article of faith? whether he hath more power then Peter had, or equal power? whether he hath power to command the Angels? whether he can make empty that which is called Purgatory? whether he be a man only, or as God? whether he partaketh of both natures, as Christ doth? whether he be more merciful then Christ, seeing we do not read that Christ did ever bring any out of Purgatory? whether among all men, the Pope alone cannot err? Six hundred such questions are disputed in great volumes and their schools are earnest about such questions; and time, the swiftest of all things, is wasted with these questions, which are propounded ridiculously, and determined timerariously; our time is short, and it is a difficult thing to act the duty of a Christian rightly. The third power of the Friars, was to proclaim and sell Indulgences: Because this falleth in often, I will here, only repeat the words of Pa. Paulo, in the first book of the Council of Trent; This manner of giving money for pardons, was put in practise after the year 1100. for Pope Urban the II. having granted plenary Indulgences and remission of all sins, to whosoever would fight in the holy Land, to recover and set free the Sepulchre of Christ out of the power of the Mahumetans, it is followed by his Successors; of whom some (as always new inventions are enlarged) granted it unto those who would maintain a Soldier, if they could not or would not go personally in these wars; and thereafter Indulgences were granted unto such as would take Arms against Christians not obeying the Church of Rome; and many times infinite exactions under these pretences. And lib. 8. he saith, It is sure, and cannot be denied, that in no Christian Nation of the East, either in ancient or modern times, was ever any use of Indulgences, of any kinde whatsoever; and in the West no proof of them can be brought before Pope Urban the II. from his time, until the year 1300. it appeareth that the use of them was sparing, and only imposed by the Confessor, to free men from punishment; after the Council at Vienna, the abuses did increase mightily. Pol. Virg. de inven. rer. lib. 8. cap. 1. saith, They reap no small harvest by these Indulgences; especially Pope Boniface the IX. in whose time such pardons were granted with a full hand, not only at some times, but (as Platina witnesseth) were sold dayly, and every where, as any other merchandise; not without the damage of the giver and receiver; seeing by these, as the vendible remedies, or foul diseases, many did the less abstain from sin, and the power of the keys became contemptible; and that was not without cause, because, as Jerome saith, where a reward is the means, or interveneth, spiritual gifts become the more vile; which, oh, if that age only had seen. So far he.

31. When the Tartars prevailed first in Asia, the Kingdom of the Turks was overthrown; and they were divided among themselves into seven families; at last they became all subject unto the house of Othoman or Otman, Laon. Chalcocon. lib. 1. de Reb. Turc. He was a victorious and cruel Tyrant; and was declared first Emperor of the Turks, about the year 1300. all his Successors have kept his name. He conquered Prusa, a City of Mysia, An. 1303. and made it the seat of the Empire. His Son Orcanes expelled the Tartars; and others of them, through dissensions among Christians, have raised that great Empire of Asia, and subdued the Empire of Constantinople, as partly is said, and more followeth.

CHAP. IV.
OF BRITAIN.

1. King Edward sent the marble Chair of the Scots unto London, and left nothing that he thought could excite the minds of our Nation to any remembrance of former condition; so he promised unto himself a final conquest: but a fresh trouble ariseth upon occasion of his tyranny. Robert Bruce, the Son of the former competitor, and John Cumine, the Cousin-German of John Baliol, beholding at Court the contempt which the Scots did suffer, and considering how Edward had abused them against their native Countrey, they thought upon a revenge; yet they they durst not communicate their thoughts: At last John, perceiving the other pensive, and thinking the same might be the cause of his sadness, adventured first to discover his minde; and he blamed himself, and the other also, that their Countrey-men had fallen into such miseries by their procurement, and in the mean time were both frustrated. There they promise taciturnity and mutual fidelity; and they covenant, that John shall never pretend any title unto the Crown, but assist Robert to recover it; and he shall have all the Lands belonging unto Robert, and be second unto him in the Kingdom: these things were written, sworn and sealed. Robert followeth King Edward still, waiting opportunity. Behold! John adviseth the King by Letter, that Robert had such a design; and for the more faith, he sent the sealed contract. Edward summoned Robert upon treason; he did purposely nominate a long day, that he might also catch his associates, if there were any, and that Robert may fear the less. Robert was not suspicious of the Cumine, and would not flie. A guard was set to attend him. Before the day appointed, his Cousin, the Earl of Montgomery, sent him a pair of gilded spurs; whereby he conceived, his Cousin advised him to flie. The same night he, and two others, came away quietly, in the winter time, and on the seventh day lodged in his own house at Lochmaban: There he meeteth with his Brother David and Robert Fleemine; as he was telling them the cause of his suddain return, they fall upon a Post carrying Letters from John Cumine unto Edward, desiring him to hasten the business with Robert, seeing delay may prove dangerous. Robert hasteth to Dunfrise, and finding John Cumine in the Church of the Franciscans, he challenged him of the premises. Cumine denied all, even that these were his Letters which were taken from the Post. Then Robert struck him with a dagger, and left him as dead. In his coming out James Lindsay meeteth him, and understanding by his words that the other was dead, he goeth into the Church, and killed him and his Brother Robert Cumine. The Scots would have crowned Robert, but such was their belief, they thought him incapable, because he had killed a man in a Church. Therefore the Abbot of Scone posted to Avenion, and brought a pardon in April, An. 1306. Then Robert was crowned at Scone. The Abbot brought also a dispensation unto the Scots, from the oath given unto Edward; and withal, he assured them of the Pope's favor and assistance. As also the Pope wrote unto King Edward, that he presume not any more to trouble the Scots, because that Kingdom was before permitted unto the Roman Bishop; and therefore it belongeth only unto the Pope to give it unto, or take it from whom he pleaseth. Pol Virg. Hist. l. 17. No monument of Antiquity is extant for the Pope's title to the Crown of Scotland; and whether the Abbot made this proffer of subjection, or the Pope did so usurp it, it is uncertain. Nevertheless, Odomar Valentine, Deputy of King Edward, and the Cumines (which were potent and numerous) took Troubles between Eng-land and Scotland.

Arms against Robert. He feared the power of his adversaries, and knowing that many Scots loved him not for his former service against them, so he was in no small perplexity; but he amassed all the forces that he could: He had hard fortune at the first, and was sundry times worsted, so that only two of his friends, Malcolm Earl of Levin, and Gilbert Hay, abode with him; his followers were searched out, and put to death; his Brethren Nigel and Alexander, with his and their wives, were sent into England. Buchan. Hist. lib. 8. Then the controversy was hot at Rome, between the Pope and Edward, for the title of the Crown of Scotland. Edward, by his Proctors, alledged, that the Kings of Scotland were his vassals, and through many ages had done homage to his Ancestors; and therefore, seeing now they had so hainously trespassed against him, he might censure them at his pleasure. This claim is manifested before; and Baldred Byssate did appear in the contrary, as relateth Io. Ffiser. in Britan. Eccles. primord. p. 647. The Pope alledged, that according to his universal power, when there was no Heir, the Kingdom did fall unto the patrimony of St. Peter, nor did it appertain unto any other in temporalities. This debate was not ended in Edward's days. Io. Fox in Act. & Mon. Robert was then lurking in the West Isles; but if he had continued there, he feared the Scots would despair of him; wherefore he sailed to Carrick, and took that Castle from the English, and spared none of them: then fearing to be entrapped by the multitude of them in that part, he hasted into the North, and took Innerness. The Scots hearing that he had taken two such Forts so far distant, not his friends only, but his enemies were encouraged, and drew unto him; and he was so potent, that he compelled John Cumine, Earl of Buchan, to seek peace at Glen-esk; for the Scots in the Cumines Army, durst commend the valor of King Robert, and others were discouraged. Edward had intelligence, and prepared an Army, but died at Lancaster. Edward the II. (turnamed Carnarivan) summoned a Parliament to be held at Dunfrise; few came, and it behoved him to go into France. From that time King Robert was diseased in body, yet he prevailed against the Cumines and English; and his Brother Edward prevailed in other parts of the Countrey. Edward the II. was led by a base Minion Peer of Gaviston; whereupon variance arose between him and his Nobility, until Gaviston was banished; but lo, an honorable banishment! he was sent Deputy into Ireland; and within two years was brought back into his former credit: then the Lords slew him at Warwick, to the great offence of the King. Tho. Cooper in Epito. But the King was reconciled unto his Nobles; and levied an Army of English, French, Scotch, Frisons, Gelders, and others, to the number of three hundred thousand men; Robert could gather but thirty five thousand: by the providence of God, which gave good success unto the wisdom and stratagem of King Robert, the English were soiled at Bannokburn, An. 1314. forty two Lords, two hundred twenty seven Knights and Baronets, and fifty thousand Soldiers were slain, the rest fled; Scotland was delivered; and the Scots pursued, and wasted England unto York. That year was great dearth in England, and a great murrain; the common people were glad to eat dogs, cats, and the like. Also Ireland sent unto Robert, desiring him to come and be their King: He sent his Brother Edward with an Army of Scots; he was received and crowned. After four years the English went against him, and slew him; and the rest of the Scots return home. At that time Pope John sent one Nuntio into England, and another into Scotland, to treat of peace; and for charges, he craved four pence of each mark, under pain of his curse: But neither would the Scotch nor English obey; and Edward refused to pay the Peter-pence. An. 1323. Edward levied another Army, and went into Scotland

Scotland with 100000 men. King Robert remembered the example of Fabius, and thought so great an Army could not continue long time, therefore he retired into the high Lands. Edward wandered from place to place, till his Army was like to starve for hunger; many died, and the rest returning home and tasting meat, scarcely escaped death. James Douglas followed the English, and slew many of them; and Edward was almost taken captive. I. Fox. Then a peace was concluded at Northampton, An. 1327. that the Scots should remain in the same estate, as in the days of King Alexander the III. the English should render all subscriptions and tokens of bondage; and have no Land in Scotland, unless they shall dwell in it; and if they will not dwell there, the Scots should give them for their present possessions 30000 marks of Silver. All this time the English were not of one accord; for the King followed the counsel of Spencer, Earl of Arundel; the other Nobility caused the King to banish him; but the next year he was restored, to the great disturbance of the Kingdom: at last they conspire to imprison the King; and Hugh Spencer suffered death. Tho. Cooper.

2. When King Robert came to great age, he ordained in Parliament his Successors, to wit, his Son David, a child of eight years old, which was espoused to Johanna, Daughter of Edward the II. and if he should die without child, he ordained his Son in law, Robert Stuart, to succeed. After he had exhorted the Estates to keep amity and unity, he gave them three counsels; 1. To beware that the Isles Arbudes be never given unto one man. 2. That they never hazard all their strength in one fight with the English. 3. That they make not long truce with them. After him Thomas Randolph, Earl of Murray, was chosen Regent of Scotland; he was a good Justiciary, and by no means would spare thieves and robbers: so that when a Gentleman came from the Pope's Court, and thought himself secure, because he had obtained the Pope's pardon, Thomas caused to apprehend him; and said, The pardon of sin belongeth unto the Pope, but punishment of the body is in the King's hand. Buchan. lib. 9.

3. An. 1328. Charles the IV. King of France, died without children; then Edward the III. King of England, his Sisters Son, claimeth the Crown of France, as nearest Heir: The French prefer Philip de Valois, the Uncle's Son; and they exclude Edward, by a Law which they call Salica, excluding women from succession. At the first, when the Estates of France had received Philip, Edward did him homage for his Lands in France; but when he was denied of a just demand, wars began between these two Nations, which ceased not altogether until the year 1495. as Tho. Cooper sheweth, or rather until the days of Queen Elizabeth; for sometimes the French prevailed, and sometimes the English, even so far as to be crowned at Paris, and held Parliaments, and had Deputies governing France: Sometimes were truce of thirteen years, or of ten years, but never an absolute peace before Queen Elizabeth. In the year 1393. the King of Armenia came into France, and shewed how the Turks and Scythians were not only oppressing Hungary, but were aiming at the conquest of all Christendom, and in the mean time Christians were devouring one another: with such words he perswaded both the Kings into a truce for four years. Froissard. Hist. lib. 4. But I leave Civil affairs, and return unto the Church.

4. In the year 1306. an English Eremitic preached at Pauls in London, that some Sacraments that were then in use in the Church, were not of Christ's institution: therefore he was committed to prison. Io. Bale ex Io. Baconthorp in Sent. lib. 4. dist. 2. q. 1.

5. That John Baconthorp wrote on the Sentences, where he followeth the truth in many things; especially he refuteth sundry subtilties of Io. Scotus, as Baptista Mantuanus hath marked.

He wrote de Domino Chriſti, where he proveth, that the higheſt Biſhop in every Kingdom ſhould be under Princes. Bale Cent. 4. ſect. 82.

6. Richard, Primate of Ireland, (alias Armachanus) was his diſciple, and taught the ſame doctrine; he tranſlated the Bible into Iriſh: In a Sermon at Paul's Croſs in London, An. 1356. he ſaid, In the eſtate of innocence none had been a beggar; therefore according to that eſtate, unleſs the law of neceſſity do preſs men, none deſireth nor ſhould be a beggar, as neither was Chriſt willingly a beggar; the Law alſo forbiddeth it, Deut. 15. There ſhall not be a beggar among you. He diſcovered the hypocriſie of Friars, in that though they profeſſed poverty, yet they had ſtately houſes, like the Palaces of Princes; and more coſtly Churches then any Cathedral; more richer ornaments then all the Princes; more and better books then all the Doctōrs; they had Cloiſters and walking places ſo ſtately and large, that men of Arms might fight on horſe-back, and encounter one another with their ſpears in them; and their apparel richer then the greateſt Prelates: Theſe Sermons are extant. The next year he appeared before Innocentius the VI. and ſome of the four Orders of Friars appeared againſt him; and he proved his propoſitions ſtoutly and manifeſtly againſt them, that in many reſpects they had leiſt their firſt rules; but (ſaith Walsing. in Edwar. III.) the Engliſh Clergy ſent not unto him according to their promiſes; but the Friars wanted not plenty of money, and ſo lite pendente before the cauſe was decided, the Friars obtained a confirmation of their priviledges. Armachanus died there at Avenion, and was canonized.

7. William Ockam was a diſciple of Jo. Scotus, but he became adverſary of his doctrine; he was the Author of the Sect of Nominales, whereby new occaſions of controverſies aroſe, to withdraw men from the ſtudy of faith: He was a follower of Pope Nicolaus the V. and therefore was excommunicated by Pope John. Then he thought it more ſafe to live under the Emperor's protection; and he ſaid unto the Emperor Lewis, Defend me, Cæſar, from the injury of the Pope by thy ſword, and I will defend thee by the word, by writing, and invincible reaſons: and ſo they did ſo long as they lived. He wrote a Compendium Errorum of Pope John the XXII. and a dialogue between a Clark and a Soldier; wherein he handleth theſe queſtions; 1. Whether the Pope hath any primacy by right from God? 2. Whether Peter had any primacy, or was ever Biſhop of Rome? 3. Whether the Pope and Church of Rome may err? Concerning the Emperor, he diſcuſſeth, 1. Whether one man may diſcharge the offices both of Prieſt and Emperor? 2. Whether the Emperor hath his power from God only, or from the Pope alſo? 3. Whether the Pope and Church of Rome have any power from Chriſt, to commit any juriſdiction unto Cæſar and to other Princes? 4. Whether Cæſar after his election, hath power to rule the Republick? 5. Whether Kings anointed by a Biſhop, receive any power from him? 6. Whether theſe Kings be any way ſubject unto their anointer? 7. Whether the ſeven Electors give as great authority unto the elected Cæſar, as ſucceſſion giveth unto other Princes? &c. All which he diſputeth on both ſides, and concludeth always againſt the Extravagants. He wrote alſo againſt Pope Clemens, and calleth him an Heretick, the Antichriſt, an hater of Chriſtian poverty, a foe of the Common-wealth.

wealth, an enemy of the most Christian Nation, &c. Morn. in Myfter. pag. 451, & 465. In Dialog. par. 2. tract. 1. lib. 3. cap. 16. he saith, The books of Judith, Tobias, and the Maccabees, Ecclesiasticus, and the book of Wisdom, are not for confirmation of any matter of faith; the Church readeth these two, Ecclesiasticus and Wisdom, for edification of the people in manners, but not for confirmation of points of faith. Ibid. par. 1. lib. 5. cap. 25. he saith, A general Council is a part of the universal Church, but is not the Church universal; therefore it is vain to say, that a general Council cannot or against the faith. And cap. 28. If a general Council shall er, yet some Catholicks shall remain, which either privately or publickly (as shall be expedient) shall be bold to defend the Orthodox faith . . . for God is able of stones, that is, of the unlearned Laicks, despised poor ones, and distressed Catholicks, to raise up children of Abraham. And lib. 6. cap. 84. Councils are not called general, because they are called by the Pope . . . if Princes and Lay-men will, they may be present in the general Council, and deal of matters treated therein. In Prolog. compend. error. he saith, Alas! the time of which the blessed Apostle prophesied, when men will not suffer wholesome doctrine. . . . this prophesie is altogether fulfilled in our days; for behold, many pervert the holy Scriptures, deny the sayings of the holy Fathers, reject the Canon of the Church, molest, persecute, and bring into bondage, and without mercy torment and afflict, even unto death, them that defend the truth; so that we may rightly say of our times, which Daniel long since pronounced, Iniquity hath gone from Babylon, from the Elders and Judges, which seemed to govern and rule the people; for many that should be pillars in the Church of God, and defend the truth of God even unto blood, cast themselves headlong into the pit of Heresies. In the same Prologue, he submitteth his writings unto the censure and correction of the Church, but he addeth, of the Catholick Church, and not of the malignant Church.

8. Brigida, or Brigitta, was descended of the blood royal of Scotland, Ph. Morn. in Myfter. pa. 480. another then she which was in the days of S. Patrick, about the year 520. she was married unto the King of Sweden; a most devout woman, (saith Platin.) and canonized as a Saint and Prophetess. Being perswaded by the friers with the same of Rome, she went thither, in the days of Pope Urban the V. hoping to finde great comfort there; but in her revelations she calleth the Pope, a murtherer of souls, a destroyer of Christ's flock, more abominable then the Jews, more odious then Judas, more unjust then Pilate, worse then Lucifer: She saith, His seat is to be drowned like an heavy stone, and his assessors were to burn in fire and brimstone unquenchable: She rebuked the Bishops and Priests, that through their default the doctrine of Christ was not preached, yea, it was abolished; and they had changed all the commandments of God into two words, Give money. In the end she saith, she heard the Virgin saying to her Son, Rome is a fertile Land; and Christ answered, It is so, but of tares; she saith also, that her coming to Rome was to cast away, rather then confirm the opinion that she had conceived of it. These revelations have been often printed.

9. Thomas Bradwardin was a Fellow in Merton Colledge of Oxford, and afterwards Chancellor of London, and commonly called, The profound Doctor; about the year 1330. he had many disputes with the School-men against the errors of Pelagius; and reduced all his Lessons into three Books, which he entituled, De causa Dei: He beginneth thus; I have been solicited earnestly by the petitions of great and many men, that what I had spoken only by voice in disputes, concerning the cause of God against Pelagius, and concerning the power of causes, I would tie it unto durable writ; but here are two things, as the lovers of God do provoke and encourage me into the cause of God; so the friends of Pelagius, being far more in number, do hinder and terrifie me; for (which I speak not without inward sorrow of heart) as of old, eight hundred and fifty Prophets of Baal, were against the one Prophet of God, and innumerable people did cleave unto them, so it is now in this cause; How many, O Lord, fight now, with Pelagius, for free will against thy free grace, and against Paul the spiritual Soldier of grace? how many do to day despise free grace, and proudly think that free will is sufficient to salvation? or if they do use the word of grace, they do but perfunctoriously feign it to be necessary, but they boast that they deserve by the power of free-will to be what they are; salvation seemeth unto them to be not a free gift, but a bought good; because, O God Almighty, these wilde men, presuming of the power of their free will, refuse the aid of thy working in their workings; and say with those, Depart thou from us. Moreover, Lord, how many advance the liberty of their own will, and will not serve thee? or if they confess with their lips, that thou workest with them, yet with these thy proud and hateful subjects, they will not have thee to reign over them; yea, and prouder then Lucifer, they are not content to be equal with thee, King of Kings, but most impudently they would reign above thee; for they fear not to say, that their own will goeth first in action, as the Lady, and thou followest as the Servant. O Lord my God, I cannot think it without sighs, how many and great Judges endeavor carefully to absolve and reconcile the Pelagian errors that were condemned in ancient times, and banished out of the bounds of all the Church? how many presumptuous advocates plead for them? how many damnable proctors they procure on their side? how many, not having two arguments of any art, do turn to killing arguments, and at least to advance the cause of Pelagius, attempt to cast down thy cause with their cries, horrors, reproaches, vice, laughter and gesture? how many and how innumerable people favor them? for almost all the world goeth after Pelagius; arise, Lord, judge thine own cause. Then he sheweth how he was comforted in a vision or dream, that by the grace of God he should prevail against Pelagius: And a little after he addeth, With how many martyrdoms, with how many wounds did the holy Fathers cut down the wood of the Pelagian heresies? and how many venomous branches do still spring and wax out of these old roots? As it was, so it is yet; for first, when their Arch-Heretick Lucifer would not be under and with God, Michael threw him down; then arose Cain, thinking that a sinner is not justified of God freely, by grace given freely, but by his antecedent merit; when he, in the just judgement of God, was cast down, arose Nimrod, who (as Joseph witnesseth) advised men, that they should not ascribe unto God what came happily unto them; but that it was given unto them for their own virtue; and that they trust in their own virtue, and not in God; the multitude was ready to obey their commands, and thought it grievous slavishness to be subject unto God; and so he called men from the fear of God, and made them proud, to the contempt and injury of God: nevertheless, he brought that sacrilegious presumption into tyranny: When the Patriarch Abraham refused it, these arose, speaking vain and great things, boasting that their lips and words were their own, and disdain that God should rule over men: Their children, the Sadduces, (Joseph is witness) did affirm, that both good and evil are propounded to the election of men; and each one chuseth this or that, according to his own will, without God. When these were rebuked by the Prophet, arose some Hebrews, Greeks, and Roman Christians, saying, that according to their merits, they had received the grace of faith; these were refuted by the Apostle. Then

of Pelagianism.*

arose Pelagius, which proudly took arms against the grace of God, and his help; and when he was condemned by the Catholick Fathers, Julian and Celestius renewed the same heresie; and when it was quenched again by the Orthodox Fathers, it was stirred up again by Cassianus, and was lashed by Prosper. About that time the same heresie waxed in Britain, for which (as venerable Beda in his Ecclesiastical History, and Henry Honington in Hyflor. Anglor. reporteth) Germanus of Antisiodore, and Lupus of Treda, Bishops, although the Divels raised a most terrible storm against them by Sea, yet they came over, and confuted it stoutly. But behold, when the heresie was a little cut down, pestiferous twigs did spring up again, as the same Historians have written; which the same Germanus, and Severus Bishop of Tours, coming into Britain, did cut down again. Moreover, before and after these times, the Scottians, by sending wholesome Epistles into the bounds of the Roman See, did purge out the reliques of this plague; as witnesseth the same Beda, and holy Prosper maketh mention of them. And although this vile fig-tree hath been so oft cut down, so oft rooted up, burnt and turned into ashes, and even trod under foot, yet it ceased not to wax so broad, so thick, and by the vitious juyce of it, how much more subtilly, so much more dangerously doth it spread; therefore I, being zealous for the cause of God, do put willingly my hand unto this fire; for I am not ignorant, that these pestiferous Pelagians will with raging mindes, and hideous cries, bark against me, and will seek to tear this paper with violent teeth; as those are wont to carp at other mens writings, which have nothing of their own hand: But, as Josephus telleth, did not the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians, for this cause, rise against Abraham? did not the ancient Prophets suffer many things from the false prophets for the cause of God? did not some ignorants accuse Paul of madness, and wrest all his excellent Epistles? did not Julian, the disciple of Pelagius, with so many accusations, brawl against Augustine, the most glorious follower of the Apostles, and the most stout defender of grace against the ungracious Pelagians? and did not Julian boast, that he would winnow his books, and discover and shew the impiety of his writings? did not other maintainers of Pelagius in France, when Augustine was defunct, presume to disprove his writings? did not many writers oppose the most wholesome doctrine even of Christ and the Fathers? and what am I? I know I am not better then our so great Fathers, nor greater then my Lord why then should I refuse to suffer with them? &c. Hence it appeareth, that errors have been always abroad in the world, and some have opposed them; and they who love God, should and will oppose the errors, as they are able. Afterwards he was Confessor to King Edward the III. and then Arch-Bishop of Canterbury.

10. About that time a book was written in English, called, The Complaint and Prayer of a Plough-man; the Author of it is said to have been Robert Langland, a Priest about the year 1360. 10. Bale Cent. 6. 37. After a general complaint of the iniquity of the time, the Author writeth zealously against auricular confession, as contrary to Scripture, and utility of the Republick, and as a device of man; against the simony of selling pardons; against the Pope, as the adversary of Christ; since Christ commandeth, to bless them who curse us, and to love our enemies; but the Pope fighteth, and curseth for small offences: Christ forbade a Priest to be a Lord over his Brethren, as the men of these new religions do; yea, whosoever will live as Christ hath taught, he is accounted a fool; and if he speak of Christ's doctrine, he is called an Heretick, and is cursed. He complaineth there of the unmarried Priests, committing wickedness, and by bad example provoking others;

of images in Churches as idolatry; of false Pastors, which feed upon their flocks, and feed them not, nor suffer others to feed them; which punish a poor man for his sin, and suffer a rich man to continue in iniquity for a little money; which punish the violation of mans Law, more then the contempt of God's Law; which are more worthy to be condemned then Pilate, seeing he would once not have Christ condemned; but they condemn him now (said he) in his Doctrine and Servants, whom these Priests accurse and burn; they have forsaken both the old and new Testaments, and taken them to another Law, the Canon Law; and they comment on God's Word according to their own Laws; they are wolves in lamb skins; they stand more for their riches which they rob off Christ's flock, then they care for the sheep; they are become shop-men to the rich Merchant the Pope, in selling his wares, pardons in every Countrey, to make him rich; they promise the blessings of Heaven, without pain, for money. Again he speaketh of the Pope, that he calleth himself the Successor of Peter, whereas Peter did acknowledge Christ, and kept the hefts of his Law; but the Pope hath undone Christ's Law, for advancing his own Decretals: he calleth himself the Vicar of Christ; whereas Christ said, wheresoever two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them: but the Pope hath made himself a Pseudo-christ, or Antichrist, since he professeth himself to be the Vicar of Christ, and indeed hath undone the ordinances of Christ, and maketh himself to be worshipped as God on earth, as proud Nebuchadnezzar sometime did; therefore all men should leave this Nebuchadnezzar, this false god, and false christ, and his laws, which are contrary to Christ's teaching. He writeth of Purgatory, that if such a thing were, no Pope could feel such pains, for he might deliver himself as well as others; and yet he hath no power to keep himself nor others out of bodily pains in this world, which (after their own sayings) are far less; and the Pope may go down to hell as another man; and whereas he taketh upon him to absolve any man, without inward repentance, he extolleth himself above God. This complaint is at length in the Act. & Monim. written by Io. Fox; and these are the chief heads of it.

11. In the twenty fifth year of King Edward the III. (which was 1364.) Statutes were made, If any procured from Rome a provision to any Abbey, Priory, or Benefice in England, which is said to be in destruction of the Realm and holy Religion, or if any man sued out of the Court of Rome any process, or procured any personal citation upon causes, whose cognisance and final discussion pertaineth to the King's Court, these shall be out of the King's protection, and their lands, goods, and cattels, shall be forfeited unto the King: The narrative of the Act sheweth the cause of it; and the King and Commons of the Realm had oft complained, that his Realms were impoverished by the Pope, giving Benefices to strangers which never dwelt in England; the King and Nobility were robbed of their right of patronage; the cure was not served; and the will of the first founders was not followed: The King had oft complained, but in vain; therefore he resolved to make his Kingdom free from this bondage. Morn. in Nisler. pag. 480. sheweth, that when Pope Gregory the XI. heard of it, he cried, This enterprize is a renting of the Church, a destroying of Religion, and usurpation of his right and priviledge: Wherefore he sent immediately unto Edward, requiring him to annul these Acts. But when the Schism arose, no Pope did insist in it, until Pope Martin the V. sent more sharp Letters unto King Henry the VI. And he answered, An Act of Parliament cannot be annulled but by another Parliament; and he would assemble a Parliament within a short space for the same cause; but he did it not, saith Pol. Virg. Hist. lib. 19. In the thirteenth year of Richard the II.

this Act was revived, in these words; If any person, within or without the Realm, shall seek from the Court of Rome preferment to any Benefice of Cure, or without Cure, the preferment shall be null, and the person shall be banished, and his goods shall appertain unto the King; and the same punishment shall strike against them, which receive or entertain any such person. As also it was ordained, If any person shall bring or send any summons, sentence, or excommunication, or if any shall make execution of any such summons, sentence, or excommunication, against any person whatsoever, shall forfeit all his lands and goods forever, and himself shall be imprisoned, and incur the pain of death; yea, although such a person had obtained the King's licence for petitioning at the Court of Rome, he shall forfeit a years rent. It is also observed, that before the year 1367. the high offices in England, as the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Privy Seal, &c. were wont to be, for the most part, in the hands of the Clergy, (as also in Scotland until the Reformation) but about that time the English Nobility procured, that all these offices should be given unto temporal Lords.

Offices of State.

12. At that time God raised up John Wickliff, a courageous witness of truth; he was Fellow of Merton Colledge, and Master of Baliol Colledge in Oxford, and Reader of Divinity there, about the year 1370. He began first to oppose in questions of Logick and Metaphysick, but such as strawed the way to other things which he intended: When he set upon controversies of Divinity, he protested publickly in the Schools, that his aim was to bring the Church from Idolatry to some amendment. In his book, entituled, The path-way to perfect knowledge, near the end, he sheweth what travel he had in translating the Bible into English; he gathered many old Latine Bibles, for (saith he) the late books are very corrupt; and he conferred the translations with the ancient Doctors and common Glosses; and especially he was helped by the late translation of Lyra in the old Testament: and the fourth time, he employed many cunning men, at the correcting of his fourth translation: Then he wrote that book which I have now named, wherein he giveth the sum of every book of the old Testament, with some general and useful observations. He reckoneth the books according to the Hebrew; and sheweth also some use of the Apocrypha, for examples of piety, patience, constancy, &c. and denieth that they are for proof of faith. In chap. 2. he saith, The truth of the Gospel sufficeth to salvation, without keeping the ceremonies made of God in the old Law; and much more without keeping the ceremonies of sinful and unknowing men, that have been made in time of Antichrist, and unbinding of Satan, as it is Apocal. 20. and he calleth it heresie to say otherwise. In chap. 1. he saith, Christian men and women, old and yong, should study fast in the new Testament; for it is of full authority, and open to the understanding of simple men, as to the points that be most needful to salvation; and the same sentence, in the darkest places of holy writ, is both open and dark, which sentence is in the open places; and each place of holy writ, both open and dark, teacheth humility and charity; and therefore he that keepeth humility and charity, hath the true understanding and perfection of all holy writ; as Augustine proveth in his Sermon of praising charity; therefore no simple man of wit, should be feared unmeasurably to study the text of holy writ; for they are the words of everlasting life, as Peter said to Christ, John 6. and the holy Ghost stirred holy men to speak and write the words of holy writ, for the comfort and salvation of meek Christian men; as Peter in his Epistles, and Paul Rom. 15. witness: And no Clark should be proud of the very understanding of holy writ; for that very understanding, without charity, which keepeth God's hests, maketh a man deeper damned, as Christ Jesus, and James witness; and the pride and covetousness of Clarks, is the cause of their blindness and heresie. In chap. 10. Though Kings and Lords knew no more of holy writ, then three stories of 2 Chron. that is, of Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Josiah, they might learn sufficiently to live well, and govern their people well by God's Law, and eschew all pride and idolatry, and other sins: But alas! alas! alas! whereas King Jehoshaphat sent his Princes, Deacons and Priests, to each City of his Realm, with the Book of God's Law, to teach openly God's Law unto the people. . . . some Christian Lords send general Letters unto all their Ministers and Liege-men, that the pardons of the Bishop of Rome, which are open lies, (for they grant many hundred years of pardons after doomsday) be preached generally in their Realms and Lordships; and if any wise man gain-say the open errors of Antichrist, and teach men to give their alms to poor needy men, to escape the pains of Hell, and to gain the bliss of Heaven, he shall be imprisoned as a man of unchristian belief, and traitor to God and Christian Kings and Lords. And whereas King Hezekiah was busie to cleanse God's house, and put away all uncleanness from the Sanctuary. . . . some Christians Lords in name (and Heathens in conditions) defile the Sanctuary of God, and bring in simoniacal Clarks, full of covetousness and heresie, and hypocrisy and malice, to stop God's Law, that it be not known and kept, or freely preached; and some Christian Lords keep many Prelats and Curats in their Courts, and in secular offices, openly against God's Law and mans, and withhold them from their ghostly office, and helping of Christian souls. . . . let these unwise Lords know, that Eli the Prophet (one only) had the truth of God, and King Ahab, with 850 Priests and Prophets of Baal, had the false part; and after Micheas, one alone Prophet of God, had the truth against 400 Prophets of Baal, that counselled Achab to war, to his own shame and death: so now, a few poor men, and Idiots in comparison of School-Clarks, may have the truth of holy Scripture, against many thousand Prelates and religious, that be given to worldly pride, covetousness, simony, hypocrisy, and other fleshly sins; and the rather, seeing poor men desire only the truth and freedom of the holy Gospel and Scripture, and accept mans law and ordinances only, in as much as they be grounded on holy Scripture, or good reason and common profit of Christian people. . . . But it is to be feared, full sorely, that Kings and Lords now have been in the former sins of Manasses; God grant that they repent verily, and make amends to God and man, as he did in the end. And near the end of that Chapter, he saith, Now in England it is a common protection against persecution of Prelates, and some Lords, if a man be accustomed to swear needless, false, and unadvised oaths, by the bones, nails, and sides, and other members of Christ, and be proud and lecherous, and speak not of God's Law, and reprove not sin about him; and to abstain from needless oaths, and not lawful, and to reprove sin by way of charity, is cause enough why Prelates and some Lords slander men, and call them Lollards, Hereticks, raisers of debate and treason against the King. . . . How much blood have Lords shed in wars, for pride and covetousness, by counsel of false Prelates, Confessors and Preachers, it passeth mans wit to tell fully in this life: but of shedding blood, and slaying poor men, by withdrawing alms, and giving it to dead stocks or stones, or to rich Clarks and feigned religious, were to speak now, if a man had the spirit of ghostly strength: now men kneel and pray, and offer fasts to dead Images, that have neither hunger nor cold, and despise, beat and slay Christian men; what honoring of God is this? &c. The Bishops and Friars could not endure such doctrine; but so long as Edward the III. lived he was safe; for that King loved him; and as

some write, the above named Acts were by his information made against the Pope and Prelates: when the King became old and unable, his second Son, John Duke of Lancaster, was Regent, (for the King's eldest Son was dead, and his Son Richard was yong) he approved the doctrine of Christ which Wickliff did teach; so did Henry Percey Lord Marshal, William Rigge Chancellor of the University, and many more of account. Simon Langham Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, summoned him to appear at Lambeth, An. 1376. The Duke of Lancaster went with him, and the contention was great; yet nothing was done against him at that time. In the beginning of the reign of Richard the II. John the Regent, and the Lord Marshal, gave up their Offices; then the Bishops thought to have the more advantage against Wickliff: Nevertheless, he continued preaching, 1. The holy Eucharist, after consecration, is not the body of Christ, but figuratively or sacramentally. 2. The Church of Rome is not the head of all Churches; nor had Peter any more power given him by Christ, then any other Apostle had. 3. The Pope hath no more power of the keys, then any other within the order of Priesthood hath. 4. If God be, temporal Princes may lawfully and justly take their temporalities from Church-men sinning habitualiter. 5. The Gospel is a rule sufficient by it self, to rule the life of all Christians here, &c. These and such other Articles were brought to Pope Gregory the XI. by him and twenty three Cardinals, they were condemned as heretical: And the Pope sent his Bulls unto the University, to Simon the Arch-Bishop, and unto the Bishop of London, that they should apprehend the Heretick, as he spoke; he wrote also unto the King to assist the Bishops. A convocation was held at Lambeth; where Wickliff appeared, professing himself to be a true Christian; he explained the Articles; and he denied some to be his assertions, saying, they had wrested his words. At that time, whether the Queen-Mother had discharged the Bishops to do him violence, (as some write) or that the Londoners took his part, (as others say) or both, he was dismissed; only they charged him, that he should preach no more of that doctrine. The Schism of the Antipopes gave some respite unto Wickliff; and Simon was slain in a dissension between the Nobility and the Commons: His Successor, William Courtney, was more fully against him, and prevailed so with the King to banish him: and in the fifth year of the yong King procured an Act, that Hereticks (as it pleased them to speak) should be imprisoned until they justified their cause: This Act mentioneth great numbers of them throughout all the Kingdom, convening to Sermons in Churches, Church-yards, Market places, and other places, where are great assemblings of people. Philip Repington, a Batchelor of Divinity, had been summoned for the same doctrine; but after this Act he forsook it, and became Bishop of Lincoln, and a cruel persecutor of the truth which he had professed. John Ashton also fell away. Nicolas Herford, another Batchelor, made his appeal from the Bishop unto the King and his Council; but William caused him to be apprehended and imprisoned; he escaped, and continued preaching as before. John Wickliff, in the time of his banishment, wrote unto Pope Urban a confession of his faith; wherein he affirmeth, that seeing the Bishop of Rome calleth himself the Vicar of Christ, of all men he is most bound to follow the Law of Christ in the Gospel; since the greatness among Christ's Disciples consisteth not in worldly honors, but in exact imitation of Christ in life and doctrine; and he advised the Pope to leave unto the Secular Powers all temporal rule, as Christ did; and he prayed, that he and his Cardinals might follow the Lord Jesus, and faithfully teach his flock. But the Pope of Rome was so busie against the Pope of Avenion, that neither of them had leisure to attend such matters; and Wickliff did return: It happened that he became sick, and there was little hope of his recovery; the Friars sent four of their Order, and four elder men unto him; and wished him then, in the hour of his death, to recant his former opinions. He desired his friends to set him up, and then said with a loud voice, I shall not die, but live, and declare the most wicked facts of Friars: they left him with confusion; and he did recover, and wrote a Treatise against the Order of Friars; of which Treatise Doctor James maketh mention, in his Book called, Wickliff's conformity to the Church of England. An. 1382. they assembled a Convocation against him, to condemn his Doctrine and Books; in the very hour of their first meeting, all England was shaken with an earth-quake, that all who were assembled, thought it expedient to surcease for that time. At last he died in peace in Lutterworth (where he had been Parson) An. 1387. Such a God is the Lord, that whom he will keep nothing can hurt. John Bale hath a catalogue of his Books in five full pages; and Æn. Silvius in Histor. Bohem. testifieth, that more of his Books were extant, than of Augustine. The late Papists do impute many errors unto him, and so did the Council of Constance; but others have cleared him of those imputations, especially the above named Antiquary, Doctor James. And that the reader may see the falshood of those criminations, this is one, that he condemned all oaths, therein favoring of Anabaptism: But by the testimony which I have cited out of The path-way, it is clear, that he speaketh of customary and false swearing; and in that same Chapter he saith, that to swear by any, is the honor of God alone; and therefore it is Idolatry to swear by any Saint or creature: and by this one instance it may be judged of others. The Council of Constance ordained, to take up his body and burn it; and so the English Prelates took up his bones forty and one years after his death to burn them; such was their rage against the professors of truth. At that time happened a rebellion in Ireland; Richard the II. went to suppress it; while he was there, Thomas Arundel Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and the other Bishops, stole away the hearts of his subjects from him, (because he had hearkened to the doctrine of Wickliff) and persuaded them to advance Henry Earl of Derby to the Crown; to the end, that both they might be rid of such a Sovereign, and have a King for ever obliged to authorize their bloody designs against God's people: but all their treason and cruelty could not smother the truth. It is bitterly enough marked, (saith Io. Bale Cent. 6. 25. in Appen.) that the Earl of Salisbury despised confession, and the Popish Sacraments at his death. Sir John Montague threw down all Images within his Lands. John Purvey wrote Books in defence of his Master's Lessons; he wrote a Commentary on the Revelations, where he saith, Seven years are past, since the Pope of Rome was generally made known to be the Antichrist; [to wit, from the year 1382. Behold how God bringeth light out of darkness!] I had not written such things against Antichrist and his Prelates, if they had not imprisoned me, lest I did speak against them: There he applieth all the prophecies concerning Antichrist and the Whore, unto the Pope and his Court. The Arch-Bishop had imprisoned this Purvey, and by cruel torments caused him to recant seven godly Articles at Paul's Cross; but when he was at liberty he spoke more boldly; and accused the Pope, for denying that the Word of God is sufficient to salvation without the Decrees and Decretals: He said also, Spiritual men write Books against the Pope, and these Books are either hid or burnt; nor is any man suffered to preach, but which are devoted unto the Pope; and good men are drawn into prison: but (said he) more Books, and more vehement, shall be written against the Pope. For these and such other things, Henry Chichelay,

Successor

the Bishops.

Many were called Lollards.

Successor to Thomas, imprisoned him again. An. 1393. Walter Bruite was in question before the Bishop of Hereford, and delivered a book, yet extant (saith Geo. Abbot against Hill. in answer to the first reason) in the Register of that Diocye, wherein he wrote these and many such positions; Bread remaineth in the Sacrament after the consecration; the Pope is the Antichrist; nothing is to be believed (as necessary to salvation) but what may be confirmed by Scripture; the City described in Revel. 7. is Rome; justification is freely by Christ alone; miracles now are no assurance of truth; infants dying before baptism, are not therefore condemned; auricular confession is not prescribed in the Scriptures; the Canon Law is ill grounded; the numeral letters of DXCLERI, make up the number 666; worship of Images is Idolatry; that men are not rashly to be reputed Saints; the Pope hath no power beyond other Saints, nor is the head of the Church; Papists mistake the keys of binding and loosing; the Pope deceiveth men in his pardons; absolution is to be sought at the hands of God only; Priests use vain prayers in the Mass; exorcisms and holy water are unlawful; Priests do sin, who bargain to sing for the souls of men departed; religious men and women are the devourers of widows houses; selling of Orders and Dirges is naught; the Pope is the Beast with the two horns, like the Lamb, while he challengeth the double sword; temporal goods may be taken from the Clergy offending. The same Author, loc. cit. sect. 25. saith, Yea, so far was the Doctrine of Wickliff spread, that Pope Gregory XI. in the year 1378. did direct his Bull to the University of Oxford, against the Doctrine and Articles of that learned man. even Rome it felt ringing of his opinions in that University; neither did his followers die when he died; but long after that Pope Gregory the XII. did direct another Bull to Oxford, in which he useth the same words which his Predecessor had; that is, that Wickliff did follow the doctrine of Marfilius of Padua, and of John of Gandune, of unworthy memory. Which speech is worth the marking, (saith Abbot) to shew, that this man had his predecessors: The Copy of this latter Bull is to be seen in a Book, which that worthy lover of Antiquities, Mr. Hare, gave to our University, saith he.

13. In time of the rebellion against King Richard, amongst all the Bishops, only Thomas Merks, Bishop of Carlile, was for him: In the Parliament they were not content to depose him, but were devising more mischiefs against him. Then said Thomas, None here present is worthy to pass his sentence on so worthy a King, whom they have obeyed as their lawful Prince full twenty two years; this is the part of traitors, cut-throats and thieves: none so wicked or vile, who though he be charged with a manifest crime, should we think to condemn before we hear him; and do ye think it equal to pass sentence on a King anointed and crowned, giving no leave to defend himself? how unjust is this? let us consider the matter it self: I say, ye openly affirm, that Henry Duke of Lancaster, whom ye are pleased to call your King, hath most unjustly spoiled Richard, as well his Sovereign as ours, of his Kingdom. While he was speaking, the Lord Marshal enjoined him silence; and the other Bishops said, He discovereth more Covent-devotion (he had been a Monk) then Court-discretion, in dissenting from his Brethren. Yet at that time his integrity was so respected, that no punishment was imposed upon him; but the next year 1400. when some discontented Lords arose against King Henry, this Thomas was taken prisoner, and judicially arraigned for High Treason; for which he was condemned, and sent to St. Albans. But what shall the King do with him? he could not with credit keep him nor dismiss him; and to take his life was dangerous, when Prelates were thought sacred. The Pope did help the King, by giving unto Thomas another Bishoprick in Samos, a Greek Island. But before his translation was compleated, he died.

Of P O P E S.

I.  NNOCENTIUS the VII. was crowned An. 1404. Before that time none spoke more against the ambition of the Antipopes; and he had sworn to renounce his place, if the union of the Church did so require; but now he could not hear any speaking of taking away the Schism; yea, because some Romans bewailed the dammages of it, he sent them to his Nephew Lewis (whom he had made Marques of Piceno, and Prince of Firma) as to a Burreo, (saith Platin.) and he caused in his own sight, eleven Romans to be thrown out of an high window; and said, This Schism cannot be otherwise taken away; therefore he was called, the bloody Tyrant. Tho. Cooper. For this cause the Romans called for the aid of Ladislaus, King of Naples, and the Pope fled unto his Nephew in Viterbio; thereafter the Romans, fearing that Ladislaus would usurp over the City, brought back the Pope; and he did accurse Ladislaus. Pope Benedict sent unto Pope Innocentius, for a safe conduct unto his Cardinals, that they may treat of an union. Innocentius slightly refused. Wherefore Benedict made his vaunts in sundry missives, that he was desirous of union, and Innocentius had denied a treaty. Then Innocentius became paralytick; and his own Clergy said unto him, It happened unto him justly, according to his demerits. He sate two years. Then the French Nation did represent unto Pope Benedict, the inconvenients of the Schism; and they craved, that he would willingly lay down his Dignity, for the welfare of the Church, if the Pope that shall be chosen at Rome shall do the like. He promised to do so. The Cardinals at Rome, in consideration of the enormities waxing every where by this Schism, took this order; they promise each one, with solemn vow to God, to Mary, to Peter and Paul, and the blessed company of Saints, that if any of them were called to that high place, whensoever the other Pope will quit his place, and his Cardinals will condescend unto the Cardinals at Rome upon a new election, that one may be chosen by them together, in that case he who

who shall be now chosen, shall renounce his Papacy. And they provided, that none shall ever take absolution from this oath : All did subscribe.

2. GREGORY the XII. being eighty years old, was chosen; and the same day, in presence of all the Cardinals, confirmed the same oath by a new subscription. The union was attempted again, by Letters from the one Pope unto the other; they consent to meet on Michaelmas day at Savona in Liguria; but Gregory objected sundry impediments; and when these were removed by Bishops and Princes, he coined more; as may be read at large in Morna. Myster. pag. 497. & ff. Benedict still made shew of readiness; when he heard that Gregory made new delays, he went unto Catalonia in Spain, where he was born, professing his desire of union, but there was no appearance of it: In truth, he was necessitated to go thither; for the French King, and University of Paris, would bear no longer with him, and called him a Schismatick, &c. Gregory thought then that the field was won: He called a Council to assemble at Aquileia; and to the end he may attain his designs, he created more Cardinals. Benedict practised the like in Arragon; both of them still pretending unity. The Church of Rome had of late broached this conceit, That the judgement of the Pope is infallible; but now it pleased God to check that fond opinion, and by lamentably sensible examples teach them their error, that if reason cannot persuade them, experience should convince them; or if they will believe none who had written that the Pope may err, yet they shall see it with their eyes, and then let them hold him the rule of faith at their peril. So the Cardinals of both these factions began to distaste the ambition of their Popes; and first, some of the Spanish Cardinals withdrew themselves, and came to Pisa; and others of the other side assembled with them, to the number of 124 Divines, and 300 Jurists: They with one consent call a Council to be held there, An. 1409. and by their Letters they require the Emperor, the Kings of France, Hungary, England, Poland, Sicily, Arragon, and other States, to give their concurrence. Only the nearer part of Spain, Scotland, and the Count Armeniacus, followed Benedict. The Council was assembled, to the number of 1000 Divines and Lawyers, as some write. They summon both Popes to appear, either personally or by their Proctors. They both contested against the lawfulness of the Assembly, as not having authority from the head. The Council replied, A Council cannot be called by one of the Competitors; for a party cannot make a general, but a particular Council; but neither of the two would yield to the other; so the Council goeth on; and because none of the two Popes would appear, after many Sessions, and after long disputation of their power, and after canonical process, they all, without exception, condemn Pope Benedict and Pope Gregory, and absolve all men from obedience unto them; they annul all their Acts, promotions, &c. In the tenor of deprivation, they call these two notorious Schismaticks, obstinate maintainers of Schism, Hereticks departed from the faith, scandalizing the whole Church, unworthy the Papacy, and cut off from the Church. And they elected unto the Papal Chair, a Greek by birth, Peter Philargus, the Bishop of Millain; who was called

3. ALEXANDER the V. Of him it is said, He was a rich Bishop, a poor Cardinal, and a beggarly Pope: this last part was said of him, partly because of the division of the Papal revenues, and partly because of his profusion beyond any Prince. The other two Popes would never consent unto this Synod. Bellarmin will neither call this Council lawful nor unlawful, De Concil. lib. 1. cap. 8. Then were three Suns, as the Popes were wont to call themselves in comparison of the Emperors, but they were all pale in the clouds, none of them being in their own region; and the Romish Church had three heads. Alexander had scarcely warmed his Crown on his head; when he gave full remission of all sin unto them, who conferred any thing unto the Monastery of S. Bartholomew by Smithfield; and resorted to that Church any of these days following, to wit, Maundy Thursday, Good Friday, Easter Even, or on the Feast of Annuntiation, from the first Even Song unto the latter. Io. Fox in Act. He died in the eighth moneth. When he was dying, he protested before a multitude of Bishops and others, that the Pisan Council had proceeded very lawfully, and had decreed most justly. Platin. Will not the Papists believe the protestation of their Pope on his death-bed? Then the Cardinals thought to be more circumspect in chusing his Successor; they assembled at Bononia; where Baldesar Cossa, a Noble man of Naples, was the Pope's Legate, and Commander of the City; he had a great number of Soldiers both within and without, under pretence of preventing all tumults, but indeed, that if he could not attain unto the Papacy by solicitation, he might atchieve it by arms. Platin. He pressed the Cardinals to name a Pope. They went to election, and named one; he refused him: they name another; he refused to accept him: they did name more; none were to his liking: They ask, Whom will he name? He said, Give me the Cape of blessed Peter, and I shall give it unto the Pope: Then he put it on his own shoulders, and said, I am Pope. The Cardinals thought this an informable election; but none durst speak against him. Bellar. de Ro. Pon. lib. 4. cap. 14. saith, It could not be easily judged, by which of these three was the true and lawful Pope: why? because every one of them had most learned Patrons. This same Pope,

4. JOHN the XXIV. (alias XXIII.) feared that the Cardinals would enterprize something against him, and therefore presently sent Legates unto Germany, entreating the Princes to accept Sigismund unto the Imperial Throne; he thought so to gain his favor. Platin. He, obtaining this desire, proclaimed a Council at Rome, under pretence to crown the Emperor, but intending to establish himself. The Schism continued, until the Emperor procured a Council at Constance, An. 1414. John, hoping that the Emperor would acquit him for his former favor, consented, and gave his Bull for assembling the Council; and in that Bull, he acknowledged the lawfulness of the general Council at Pisa; and called Pope Alexander, the President of happy memory. In the Council he laid down his Papacy; and the Emperor gave him thanks, and kissed his foot: But when he saw no appearance to be restored, he thought best to provide for himself by flight; and he would revoke his renuntiation. The Emperor caused to pursue him. Frederick Duke of Austria apprehended him, and delivered him unto the Emperor; and he committed him unto the Count Palatine of Rhine, who kept him three years in his Castle at Hedleberg. John was judged as unworthy as any of the other two; for he was accused to have hired Marfilus Parmensis, a Physician, to poison Pope Alexander; that he was an Heretick, a Simoniack, a Murderer, an Inchanter, an Adulterer, a Dice-player, a Sodomite, a notorious Atheist, and contemner of all Religion; he sold for 50000 ducates the head of John Baptist, which was in St. Silvester's Monastery at Rome. John Naucler saith, About forty Articles were proved against him. Then the Council dealt with the other two Popes to renounce their authority, as followeth. Pope Gregory, being then decrepit, sent his Proctor, and renounced his power; and was made Legate of Piceno; and died shortly after. Benedict would never acknowledge the Council; and when he died, after the Council was ended, he required an oath of his Cardinals, that they should chuse another Pope after his death.

5. MARTIN the V. was chosen by the Council on Martin's day.

An. 1417.

An. 1417. he was convoyed by the Emperor and Council, with great solemnity, into the great Church of Constance, and from thence unto the Monastery of St. Augustin to be crowned; the Emperor led his horse by the bridle on the right hand, and the Marquess of Brandenburg on the left hand, both on foot. He confirmed the Acts of the Council. The Emperor entreated him to abide in Germany, because of the diversity of Religion, or (as he spoke) for divers enormities there. The French Nation allured him to go with them. He said, The Churches of the Saints in Rome were decaying, by the long absence of Popes; so he went to Italy, and stayed three years at Florence. At that time John the XXIV. redeemed himself out of prison for 30000 crowns, and went unto Florence. Pope Martin feared that he would renew the Schism; but John kissed his foot, and was made Cardinal of Tusculo; yet could not patiently live in so private a condition, and died of melancholy. Then Martin had but one Antipope, and sought by all means to have him out of the way; but Alfonso King of Arragon maintained Pope Benedict the rather, that Pope Martin had declared Lewis, Duke of Anjou, to be King of Sicily. When Benedict had sate thirty years, and was dead, his Cardinals chose Pope Clemens the VIII. who sate four years; until Pope Martin, seeing the unlucky success of King Lewis, did agree with Alfonso concerning Sicily; then these two compound with Pope Clemens, that he shall have the Bishoprick of Majorca; and his Cardinals shall enjoy their hats, except some recusants that were committed; so the Schism was ended. Pope Martin was hot in the wars against the Bohemians. Angelus de Clavasio, a Minorite, in his Summa, at the word Papa, writeth, that this Martin, after consultation, granted licence unto a man to marry his own Sister. He sate fourteen years, and died An. 1431.

6. EUGENIUS the IV. was miscarried with ill advice, and troubled all things concerning God and men. Platin. By his covetousness he so provoked the Romans, that there was a great fight within the City, and he thought it his best way to steal away in a Monkish habit; when the Citizens knew that he was going down the river in a boat, they threw stones at him; but by means of his Captain Sfortia, he regained all that he had lost, and became very haughty. He loved wars, which may seem strange in a Pope, saith Platin. He was afraid of the event of the Council at Basil, when he saw it increase with multitude of Princes and Bishops from Spain, France, Germany, Hungary, &c. and had made an Act in Sess. 2. A Council is above a Pope; and all men of whatsoever condition, even Papal, ought to obey it; therefore he went about the translating of it to Bononia; but the Emperor, and all the Princes and Bishops there, charged him, that if he did not approve the Council, which was ordained by the former Council, and was called by the former Pope, and now had sate so long time by his own consent, the Nations there assembled would dethrone him: This Letter made him approve the Council by his Bull, An. 1434. When Sigismund died, Eugenius assembled his Cardinals and faction at Ferrara, and then (as followeth) at Florence, and would have taken all power from the Council; but the Council did so despise his threatnings, that they condemned Pope Eugenius as unworthy of Peter's Chair; and they chose another, to wit, the Duke of Savoy, who had lived an Eremita for some years; him they called FELIX the V. This was a new schism; some followed the one, and some the other, and some were neutral; so they were two Popes, and two Councils contrary unto one another. Behold the unity of the Roman Church! all the Acts and consecrations of Pope Eugenius were judged null at Basil, nor was he ever absolved from their curse; they called him, a rebel against the sacred Canons, a noto-
